For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

229271

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation202jannewy

229271

SEP 26 1966

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

INDEX FOR JANUARY-JUNE, 1966

THE

NATION

America's Leading Liberal Weekly Since 1865

INDEX TO VOLUME 202

JANUARY to JUNE, 1966

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section, following main entries.

Centennial issue, Sept. 20, is indexed in back pages.

1- 28	Jan. 3	378-407	Apr. 4
29- 56	Jan. 10	410-439	Apr. 11
57- 84	Jan. 17	443-471	Apr. 18
85-112	Jan. 24	474-503	Apr. 25
113-140	Jan. 31	506-535	May 2
141-168	Feb. 7	538-567	May 9
169-196	Feb. 14	570-599	May 16
197-224	Feb. 21	602-631	May 23
225-252	Feb. 28	634-663	May 30
253-280	Mar. 7	666-695	June 6
282-311	Mar. 14	698-727	June 13
314-343	Mar. 21	730-769	June 20
346-375	Mar. 28	762-791	June 27

A

- Abernathy, Rev. Ralph; speech in support of ousted Georgia legislator J. Bond 148
- Academic freedom; issue pinpointed by St. John's university faculty strike. M. R. Berube; S 172
- Accident prevention. See Automobiles
- Acheson, Dean; speech exalting force over international law disputed by U.N. Ambassador A. J. Goldberg; E 668
- Adcock, Betty Sharp
  - His gift; P 48
- Ad hoc committee on the triple revolution; advocacy of guaranteed income 544-545
- Adultery. J. Dickey; P 252
- Aerospace industry. See Space
- Africa
  - And now Nkrumah: the generals and the future of Africa. J. Kirk Sale; S .... 317; see also C, 506
  - Communist setbacks 607
  - Native rebellions in Portuguese possessions 640-641
  - Negro nations prod British action against Rhodesia and South Africa; E 477
  - Vital interest in status of South West Africa, before World Court .... 389 ff.
- Agriculture; conditions in China 257-258
  - Department sides with Southern plantation owner against sharecropper 736
  - Enemies of promise in Latin-American land reform. W. C. Thiesenhusen; S 90
  - Little benefit in South Vietnam from AID programs 198
  - Monopoly in the vineyards: the "grapes of wrath" strike of pickers in Delano, Calif. J. P. Degnan; S 151
  - Obsolete Negro in South being displaced by machinery. R. G. Sherrill; S .... 59; see also C, 168
  - U.S. depredation of Vietnam slated to destroy rice economy 483
- Alabama; Hale county Negro, Rev. H. McCaskill, threatened with violence in Greensboro Watchman for running for sheriff; E 766
  - Improved racial atmosphere at university; E 348

PAGE

  - Murder in Tuskegee; day of wrath in the model town. A. S. Kaufman; S ...... 118; see also C, opposite 197
  - Recent elections show rising Negro vote as sword in the heart of Dixie. J. Beecher; S 611
  - Segregationist defeats influencing nation 289-290, 291, 292
- Albany campus, state university of New York. Architecture reviewed by E. Galantay; S 629
- Algeria; brakes on revolution in overthrow of Ben Bella. By S. Coryell; S 116
  - Hunger strike of political prisoners. S. Coryell; C 492
- Alienation; among U.S. college students, as at New York City college .... 677 ff.
- Allen, V. L.
  - Nigeria: coup on a tightrope; S ...... 143; see also C, 427
- Alliance for Progress; ineffectiveness in Latin-American land reform 90, 91, 92
  - Sickness emphasized by resignation of "nine wise men" of economic and social council; E 604
- American bar association (ABA); declares Vietnam war legal, making truth a casualty. H. B. Hester; C 282
- American civil liberties union; efforts on behalf of peace demonstrator 2nd lieutenant H. H. Howe, Jr. ...... 204; see also E, 413
  - Investigating Army's detention of servicemen G. E. Smith and C. E. McClure 295
  - Opposition to obscenity legislation in California 457
- American dreams. L. Simpson; P 653
- American federation of labor—Congress of industrial organizations (AFL-CIO). See Labor—Union
- American friends of the Middle East; anti-Zionist outfit aided by foundations 542, 544, 556
- American institute for free labor development (AIFLD). See Labor—Union
- American legion; ousted pacifist post commander R. Hollis. By D. Ford; S 329
- American medical association (AMA). See Medicine
- American parable, an. D. Ignatow; P 783
- American telephone & telegraph company; AT&T: the folksy octopus. D. Smith; S 16
- Americans for democratic action (ADA); contrast in attitudes toward Communism in speeches by H. H. Humphrey and J. K. Galbraith; E 538
- Anarchism; and new U.S. Left 389
- Anastaplo, George; prevented from practicing law for views on revolution; defended by Justice Black 325-326
- Anchovies; imperiled off California by overfishing. R. G. Lillard; S 268
- Anderson, Senator Clinton; bill to restore Blue Lake, New Mexico, region to Taos Indians 477
- Anderson, Ernie; Cleveland disc jockey's satirical TV program Parma Place canceled. R. Fischer; S 470
- Angola. See Portugal
- Ankrah, General Joseph Arthur; leader of coup that ousted Nkrumah .... 319 ff.
- Anonymous
  - Spain: no homage allowed!; article on suppression of gathering to honor dead loyalist poet A. Machado 462
- Antigone (T. Stinchecum adaptation at Judson). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 224
- Apartheid. See South Africa, Republic of
- April light. M. Swenson; P 434
- Aptheker, Herbert; possible indictment for North Vietnam trip; E 87

PAGE

- Arab nations. See Middle East
- Arden, John. Play Serjeant Musgrave's dance reviewed by H. Clurman; D .... 372; see also 461
- Architecture. For reviews, see Galantay, E.
- Are the people infallible? B. Brecht, translated by E. Bentley; P 461
- Arendt, Hannah
  - Funds requested for de Madariaga scholarship fund; C 780
- Arensberg, Mrs. Mariada C.; executive secretary of Cuban freedom committee 543, 544
- Arizona; implications for newspapers of judge's order to officials and police not to comment on C. H. Schmid, Jr., murder case. R. Spangler: S 421
- Armament; costs in world deplored by director of Arms control and disarmament agency while U.S. hard-sells vast quantities, as to West Germany; E 732
  - Missiles
    - Johnson decision on costly anti-missile missile system awaited; E 114
  - Of Arab nations and Israel, with U.S. supplying both sides; E 170
  - Sale of U.S. weapons to foreignn governments through "chief salesman," deputy assistant Defense Secretary H. J. Kuss; E 85
- Art. For reviews, see Kozloff, M.; Berger, J.; Grosser, M.
- Asia; as last frontier for U.S. investment capital. J. Henry; S 480
- Aspinall, Representative Wayne; weakened 1964 wilderness act 393, 394, 396
- Astor library, New York; conversion to use by J. Papp's Shakespeare festival. E. Galantay; 500
- Atlanta; continuing racial bias of elite's opera guild; E 701
  - Vietnam war fans' rally; E 227
- Atomic bomb; hunt for missing U.S. H-bomb in Spain; E .... 141; E 283
  - Importance to Soviets of denial to West Germany in NATO 33
  - See also Armament—Missiles
- Atomic energy. See Nuclear energy
- Automation; "abundance" in perspective: should men compete with machines? R. Theobald; S 544
  - Cost of change to; futility of railroad firemen's strike; E 444
- Automobiles; harassment of safety crusader-muckraker R. Nader; E .... 316; see also C, 378; 412, 491
  - Insurance scandal uncovered by Senator T. J. Dodd; E 142
  - Manufacturers let Congress dictate safety standards. V. L. Bemis; C 634
  - New York car: design for survival; state-sponsored safety project. W. D. Gardner; S 489
  - Public outrage over safety; E 574
  - Why did Fiat instead of U.S. firm get Soviet construction deal?; E 636
- Aviation; jets could be parachute-equipped for emergency braking. H. P. Dinesman; C, opposite 85; see also K. M. Ruppenthal's Air safety: the lethal lapses, Dec. 27, 1965
- Awololo, Obafemi; imprisoned Action Group leader could lead Nigeria 145
- Axelbank; Albert
  - Japan: co-prosperity again; increasing trade with China despite U.S. opposition; S .... 479; see also 482

B

Babbitt, Milton. Relata I as interpreted by Cleveland orchestra. B. Boretz; M 438
Babel, Isaac. Play Sunset reviewed by H. Clurman; D 662
Bailey, Peter Howard; Marxist professor elected master of Balliol college, Oxford; C, opposite 57
Baker, Pauline Halpern
  V. L. Allen ill informed on Nigeria; C .... 427; see also 143
Balaguer, Joaquín; conservative Dominican presidential candidate .... 157, 520 ff.
Balducci, Father Ernesto; Italian priest imprisoned for defense of conscientious objector Gozzini 418-419
Balewa, Sir Abubaka Tafawa; Nigerian prime minister murdered 143
Ballet. For reviews, see Clurman, H.
Band of outsiders. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 406
Banks; benefit from abolishment of postal savings; E 349
  U.S. branches in South Vietnam 481
Barenblatt case; Justice Black's dissent 324, 326
Barnes, E. Richard; California anti-smut crusader 456, 457
Basic economic security (BES); new term for guaranteed income .... 546 ff.
Bathing place, the. N. O'Gorman; P 724
Bay area. See California
Beating. See Education
Beecher, John
  Alabama's rising Negro vote: sword in the heart of Dixie; S 611
Bell, David; AID director's testimony on South Vietnam expenditures 198
Bemis, Vernon L.
  Auto makers let Congress dictate safety standards; C 634
Ben Barka, Mehdi; presumed murder of Moroccan leftist in Paris rocked French government. A. Werth; S .... 200 and S 350
Ben Bella, Ahmed. See Algeria
Bennett, Representative Charles E.; instrumental in preventing burial of Communist R. G. Thompson in Arlington cemetery; E 171
  On U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam 474
Bentley, Eric
  Peter Weiss and Wolf Biermann; Marxist stand of East German playwright and poet; E .... 31; see also C, opposite 113 and 225
  See also Brecht, B.
Berger, John
  Reviews of art
    Giacometti: 1901-1966 341
Berman, Harold J.
  We can trade with the Communists; S 766
Bermel, Albert
  Critique of H. Junker on play reviewer S. Kauffmann; C .... 474; see also 307
Bernstein, Leonard; conducting of twentieth-century composers 112
Bernstein, Victor H.
  Private wealth and public office; the high cost of campaigning in U.S.; S 770
Berry, Wendell
  Strip-mine morality: the landscaping of hell in Kentucky; S 96
Berube, Maurice R.
  Faculty strike at St. John's university; S 172
Biermann, Wolf; political stand of East German poet. E. Bentley; E .... 31; see also C, opposite 113 and 225
Bill Watson's report from Canada. W. Stafford: P 159
Bingham, B. C.
  Doubts on choice of Dr. B. C. Keeney as chairman of national endowment of humanities; C, opposite 169; see also C, 282
Birch society, John; California rightists among leaders; activities in state 458, 459
  Members' connections with CIA-backed foundations 543, 544
  Membership analyzed 178
Birdbath (Café La Mama revival). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 404 Birth control; Justice Black on repeal of Connecticut law 322, 326
Black, Justice Hugo L.
  Appreciation for editorial on C. Durr; C .... 442; see also 199
  Justice Black at eighty: the common sense of freedom. N. Redlich; S .... 322; see also C, 410
Black panther party; militant Negro group in Alabama 614
Blacklisting. See Television
Blau, Herbert; co-director of Lincoln center repertory theatre .... 584 ff.
Bloch, Emanuel; Rosenberg counsel remiss in not cross-examining Gold. By S. B. Waterman; C .... 100; see also M. A. Fellows letter, Dec. 27, 1965
Bloomgarden, Lee Oscar
  Vietnam peace movement likened to Copperheads of Civil War; C 168
Bly, Robert
  Johnson's cabinet watched by ants; P 653
  On the war in Vietnam (translated from Swedish of G. Sonnevil); P 655
  Three Presidents: Andrew Jackson, Theodore Roosevelt, John F. Kennedy; P 108
  See also Machado, A.
Bobrowski, Johannes
  Kaunas 1941 (translated by R. and M. Mead); P 589
Bokov, Victor
  Thoughts at the mausoleum; P 445
Bond, Julian; Georgia's "uppity" Negro legislator. H. Shapiro; S .... 145; see also 388
Boretz, Benjamin
  Reviews of music
    M. Babbitt's Relata I and other modern American works as rendered by Cleveland and other orchestras 437
    Twentieth-century composers in New York 111
  Reviews of recorded music
    Bach's Brandenburg concertos (three versions) and Hohe messe; Beethoven's piano sonatas and Rasumovsky quartets 195
    Diamond, Ives, Messiaen, Britten, Stravinsky, and Berg 533
    Ruggles, Carl .... 278; see also C, 364
    Schubert, Wolf, Berlioz, Chopin, Mozart, Stravinsky, Mendelssohn 564
Borgese, Elisabeth Mann
  Vatican II council: anathema upon war; S 415
Bosch, Juan; former Dominican president's troubled relations with U.S.; running again .... 156, 157, 520 ff.
Boss, Robert
  Back issues of The Nation offered; C 45
Boumedienne, Premier Houari. See Algeria
Bowen, William; report on costs of Vietnam war in Fortune; E 478
Bowers, Lee E., Jr.; testimony on Kennedy assassination 739
Boyd, Alan S.; Commerce official's report outlined new maritime policy .... 71 ff.
Boyer, Leonard
  R. C. Garretson quixotic in Ruble-dollar road to peace; C .... 634; see also 576
Braden, Thomas W.; California editor, target of anti-smut hate campaign 459
Brannan, Charles F.; power-company official's advocacy of use of Flat Tops, Colorado, wilderness area's facilities 395
Brazil; Castelo Branco regime's anti-democratic acts backed by U.S. 10
Brecht, Bertold
  Are the people infallible?; P (translated by E. Bentley) 461
  Play The Caucasian chalk circle (Lincoln center production) reviewed and compared with others by H. Clurman; D 436
Brennan, Howard R.; testimony identifying Oswald as Kennedy assassin .... 741 ff.
Brief letter. J. Garrigue; P 597
British Guiana; AFL-CIO-run body, AIFLD, worked to overthrow Jagan government in 1964; E 700
Brown, Edmund G. (Pat); seeks renomination as Democratic candidate for California governorship .... 352 ff.
  Won nomination but will be underdog; E 732
Brown, Representative George E., Jr.; enjoins peace forces to be ready politically; E 636
Brown, J. Harold, M.D.
  Drug industry defended against R. G. Sherrill charges; C .... 666, with Sherrill reply
Bryant, Farris; segregationist, ex-governor of Florida, and friend of Johnson appointed director of Office of emergency planning; E 380
Buddhists; actions based on conscience, not clear to Americans. S. Sayeki; C 492
  Ky's counter-revolution against in Vietnam may not have been surprise to absentee Ambassador Lodge and U.S. intelligence; E 634
Budget, national. See United States—Finances
Buechner, George. Play Leonce and Lena reviewed by R. J. Schroeder; D 26
Bugbee, Helen
  Poor lack rights asserted in Cloward-Piven article; C .... 602, with editors' reply; see also 510
Bulgaria; foreign trade .... 767 ff.
Bundy, McGeorge; appointment to Ford foundation 381, 384
Bunker, Ellsworth W.; U.S. adviser to Interamerican peace force in Dominican republic .... 155 ff.
Burger, Judge Warren T.; ruling on consumers' rights in WLBT-TV case 412
Burns, Governor Haydon. See Florida
Business; acquiescent on Washington's wage guidelines; praise of J. M. Keynes's economics; E 113
  Bilking the public with defective goods; E .... 476; see also C, 620
  Investments in underdeveloped areas, as in southeast Asia, as key to U.S. foreign policy. J. Henry; S 480
  Skulduggery in political contributions; E .... 762; see also 770 ff.
  U.S. investments in South Vietnam guaranteed by AID; E 197
  Wall Street journal survey shows revival of expense-account living; E 765
Byrnes, James F.; as Secretary of State, objected to Commerce Secretary Wallace's conciliatory approach to Soviet Union 40, 42

C

Cabin, William D.
  R. Nader, in Nov. 1, 1965, article on Corvair, neglected states' non-inspection as accident cause; C 459
Cahill, Father Joseph; St. John's university president firm against faculty strikers .... 172 ff.
California; Bay area rapid transit: advance into yesterday through proposed elevated trains. M. Harris; S 679
  Continuing shift to right in primary elections, with special factors; E 732
  "Grapes of wrath" strike of pickers in Delano. By J. P. Degnan; S 151
  Judicial council's ban on photography and broadcasting of trials 422, 423
  Los Angeles artists to erect tower against Vietnam war; E 143
  Nearby deserts in the sea caused by overfishing. R. G. Lillard; S 268
  Parties in chaos. 1: The California sweepstakes. G. Hill; S 352
  The politics of smut: California's dirty book caper. W. Wingfield; S 456
  "Residential professional theatres" in San Francisco, Palo Alto, and Los Angeles. J. Novick; D 755
  UCLA law review study of anti-homosexuality law enforcement; E 572
  Ventura county: the barbarian conquest by oil drilling and bulldozer housing. J. D. Forbes; S .... 128; see also C, opposite 169
Cambodia; beset in Vietnam war. G. D. Stark; S .... 445; see also C, 715
  Prince Norodom Sihanouk's thanks for Nov. 29, 1965, editorial; C, opposite 57
  Vietnam conflagration spreading to; E 699
Canada; Canadian justice: the ordeal of Steven Truscott, youthful defendant in rape-murder case. E. Stafford; S 614
Capital; U.S. export for investment in underdeveloped areas as last frontier. J. Henry; S 480
Carmichael, Stokely; SNCC head's rejection of invitation to White House civil-rights conference 669
Carver, George A., Jr.; CIA analyst's article in Foreign Affairs 571, 701
Castro, Fidel. See Cuba
Catholic church; Cuban position 328
  Liberal priest C. O. Rice's participation in Pittsburgh anti-Vietnam protest; E 411
  Opposition to Salazar dictatorship in Portugal 638
  Pope's influence in arranging Vietnam Christmas cease-fire 1
  Union of priests proposed by Rev. W. H. DuBay; E 255
  Vatican II council: anathema upon war. E. M. Borgese; S 415
Caucasian chalk circle, the. Lincoln center and other productions reviewed by H. Clurman; D 436
Cavaglieri, Giorgio; architect's plans for remodeling Astor library for use by Shakespeare festival 501
Censorship; in Nigeria under Balewa 144
  In Portugal under Salazar 639-640
  Of news media, notably TV, on Vietnam coverage; E 1
  Of Vietnam correspondents by Defense department; E 668
  Open court and fair press; dangers of legal muzzling. R. Spangler; S 421
Chalk, Alfred
  Memories of beating in London school; C, opposite 29
Charity. See Poverty; Social workers
Chase, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 280
Chavez, Cesar; leader of Delano, Calif., grape pickers' strike .... 149, 151 ff.

Index

PAGE

- Chayette, Conrad
  - Vietnam war and Johnson's "abjectives"; C 730
- Chekhov, Anton. Play Ivanov (J. Gielgud production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D.... 661
- Chicago (Café La Mama revival). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 405
- Chicago, university of; sponsored conference on China to publicize myths and realities. S. Spector and J. H. Moore; S 256
- Chilcote, Ronald H.
  - Salazar's Portugal: fortieth anniversary on thin ice; S 638
- Children; Our disturbed children; who is to care for them? W. Ryan; S 775
- Chile; plight of agricultural workers; need for land reform ...... 90 ff.
- China, Communist
  - Activities in northern Thailand; E 29
  - Danger of retaliation to U.S. escalation of Vietnam air war and border encroachments; E 572
  - Foreign-policy mistakes 33
  - Increasing trade with Japan despite U.S. opposition. A. Axelbank; S ...... 479; see also 482
  - Less hostile attitude toward urged by Republican Ripon society; E 444
  - Myths and realities publicized in conference sponsored by U. of Chicago. S. Spector and J. J. Moore; S ...... 256; see also C, 314, 346, and 474
  - Next U.S. adversary in war if present Johnson course continues; E 253
  - No thaw with Soviet Union 32
  - Once more the yellow peril in western propaganda; myth of unbridled expansionism. C. P. Fitzgerald; S 606
  - Paranoid U.S. policy toward 68
  - Reasons for fear of U.S.; E 57
  - Relations with Cambodia. G. D. Stark; S 445
  - Secretary Rusk's immobile stand toward; E 378
  - Slight thaw in U.S. policy toward; E 700
  - Soviet reticence on at Moscow party congress ...... 518 ff.
  - U.S. should lend-lease U-2 planes to obtain information on American way of life. J. O. Crane; C 364
  - War with as top-priority issue for U.S.; E 199
- China, Nationalist
  - U.S. alliance with Chiang must end to ease tension with Communist China 701
  - U.S. bastion; E 58; 212
- Christianform; anti-Zionist organization's benefactions from foundations 542
- Christianity; shortcomings as remedy for national discontent 179
- Christopher, George; former mayor of San Francisco's aspirations for Republican Senate nomination 352, 354
  - Lost nomination to R. Reagan 732
- Cities, U.S.; new Democratic urban coalition wrought by civil-rights movement ...... 514 ff.
- Citizens crusade against poverty. See Poverty
- City college, New York. See Education
- Civil defense. See United States—Defense, national
- Civil disobedience; Protest, the fruits of. 1: Law, speech and disobedience. 2: Passion in clear reason. C. Cohen and D. Krech; S ...... 357 and 362; see also C, 506 and 523
- Civil liberties; Florence Lasker award to lawyer C. Durr; E ...... 199; see also C, 442
  - Foundations' lack of initiative in ...... 383 ff.
  - Threatened by Weltner bill against Cosa Nostra and Ku Klux Klan; E 413
  - See also American civil liberties union (ACLU)
- Civil rights. See Negroes—Civil rights
- CLEAN; California pressure group against dirty books ...... 456 ff.
- Cleveland, Ohio; orchestra's rendition of M. Babbitt's Relata I. By B. Boretz; M 437
  - Play House. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 689
  - Satirical program Parma Place on TV station WJW canceled. R. Fischer; S 470
- Cloward, Richard A., and R. M. Elman
  - The first congress of the poor, at Syracuse, N. Y.; S ...... 148; see also C, opposite 225
  - Poverty, injustice and the welfare state. Part 1: An ombudsman for the poor?; S 230
  - Poverty, injustice and the welfare state. Part 2: How rights can be secured; S 264
- Cloward, Richard A., and F. F. Piven
  - A strategy to end poverty by guaranteed income; S ...... 510; see also C, 602, with editors' reply, and C, 762

PAGE

- Clurman, Harold
  - Festivity and ritual: reflections on true theatre; Lincoln center, ANTA, and Soviet instances; D 583
  - Reviews of ballet
    - Noces, les (American ballet production) 195
  - Reviews of plays
    - Caucasian chalk circle, the (Lincoln center production) 436
    - Condemned of Altona, the 222
    - Ivanov (J. Gielgud production)...... 661
    - Journey of the fifth horse, the 661
    - Lion in winter, the 374
    - Marat/Sade 82
    - Notes on current offerings 194
    - Philadelphia, here I come! ...... 309; see also 307
    - Serjeant Musgrave's dance 372
    - Slapstick tragedy (The mutilated and The gnadiges Fraulein) ...... 309; see also C, 459
    - Sunset 662
    - Sweet Charity 248
    - Wait a minim! 374
    - White devil, the (Circle in the Square production) 54
- Coal; inefficiency as generator of electricity 34-35
  - Strip-mine morality: the landscaping of hell in Kentucky. W. Berry; S 96
- Cobbs, Hamner; editor of Greensboro, Ala., Watchman; wrote threat to Negro candidate for sheriff, Rev. H. McCaskill; E.... 766
- Coffey, Raymond R.
  - The people beneath the war in South Vietnam; no identification with military government; S 61
- Cogen, Charles
  - Critique of editorial on NEA and Negro teachers; C. opposite 169; see also 30
- Cohen, Carl
  - The fruits of protest. 1: Law, speech and disobedience; S ...... 357; see also C, 506 and 523
  - General Hershey's reply to Dec. 27, 1965, article Punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick, with editors' rejoinder; C, opposite 1; see also C. W. Griffin, Jr.; C, opposite 113
- Cohen, Daniel
  - ESP (extrasensory perception): science or delusion?; S 550
- Cold war; State department "theologians" lack flexibility; E 506
  - U.S. foreign policy following conclusion of. C. O. Lerche, Jr.; S 673
  - U.S. intellectuals' delusions on in 1962-1965. H. S. Hughes; S 7
- Coles, Robert
  - What poverty does to the mind; S 746
- Collective bargaining. See Labor
- Colleges and universities. See Education
- Colonialism; by U.S. in Vietnam. O. Lattimore; S 212
- Colorado; threat to Flat Tops wilderness area ...... 393 ff.
- Columbia broadcasting system (CBS). See Television
- Comecon; Eastern European economic organization's failure to attain goals 768-769
- Common market; provisional end of crisis 201-202
- Communism
  - Chinese world influence not formidable...... 607
  - Cuban organization 327-328
  - Elimination in Indonesia not followed by pro-U.S. sentiment; E 171
  - False analogies with Nazism in Vietnam context 65-68
  - "Ideologitis" of U.S. foreign policy toward 642, 644
  - Indonesian suppression 555
  - Influence on U.S. Left in 1930's ...... 386 ff.
  - Moscow congress: the old party and the young people. I. Deutscher; S 517
  - Outmoded U.S. reflex reaction to, as by Secretary Rusk; E 378
  - Setbacks in Africa through military coups 321
  - Soviet position vis-à-vis China improved among other Communist nations 33
  - U.S. fear of influences Latin-American relations 92
  - U.S. liberals' attitudes toward since mid-1930's ...... 238 ff.
  - U.S. trade agreements with supposed devilled Eastern European nations denounced by Rep. Harsha; E 635
  - We can trade with the Communists. H. J. Berman; S 766
  - Western European party organs' condemnation of Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; E 225
- Condemned of Altona, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 222
- Conflict of interest; serious questions, as in case of E. Power, recent regent of university of Michigan; E 350

PAGE

- Congo republic (ex-Belgian); effects of military coup 320, 321
- Congress for cultural freedom; link with CIA; E ...... 571; see also denial, C, 698
- Conley, Ralph; Ohio reporter on trial for contempt of court for publicizing civil action before trial 423-424
- Connally, Governor John B.; wounded with President Kennedy; testimony on assassination 706-708, 738, 743, 744, 745, 746
  - See also Texas
- Connecticut; Justice Black on birth-control law 322, 326
- Conscription. See United States—Defense, national
- Conservation; Battle in the wilderness: the benevolent wreckers; threats to preserved lands in 1964 wilderness act. L. P. Hudson; S 393
  - Debt to Senator F. G. Newlands of Nevada 454
  - Interests' opposition to Army Corps of Engineers 183
- Conservatives; Birchites and similar groups representative of national discontent 177-178
  - Extremist groups' sponsorship of rifle clubs 263
  - Rightist roster behind California anti-smut campaign ...... 457 ff.
  - Well-known figures on Cuban freedom committee, American friends of the Middle East, and other CIA-linked organizations. R. G. Sherrill; S 542
- Consumers; consumer wave coming in at last; E 574
  - Little protection from defective goods; E ...... 476; see also C, 620
  - Lobby's puny opposition to deceptive food packaging 212
  - Rights in broadcasting stressed in WLBT-TV case; E 412
- Consumers union; on food packaging and quality 209
- Cook, Fred J.
  - The Warren commission report on Kennedy assassination. I: Some unanswered questions; S ...... 705. II: Testimony of the eyewitnesses; S 737
- Cooney, Timothy J.
  - Civil service unionism: how to avert another strike like that of New York city transit workers; S 88
  - Interim director's plan to reorganize and reduce New York city's civil defense; E 509
- Cooper, Chester, not Sherman Cooper, was administration spokesman to opponents of Vietnam war mentioned in R. G. Sherrill's The consensus marchers, Dec. 6, 1965. F. L. Marx; C, opposite 29
- Cort, David
  - Barbara Powers: she married a sky spy; discusssion of book Spy wife; S 101
- Coryell, Schofield
  - Algeria: brakes on revolution in overthrow of Ben Bella; S 116
  - Algerian political prisoners' hunger strike; C 492
- Cosa Nostra; target of Weltner bill, which also threatens civil liberties; E 413
- Council on the humanities; President's poor choice of M. Willson to represent music; E 477
- Crail, Joe; financial sponsor of California right wing and CLEAN adviser 458
- Crane, John O.
  - Lend-lease U-2 planes to China to obtain information on American way of life; C 364
- Criley, Richard L.
  - W. Goodman's article of Nov. 8, 1965, The Klan discovers HUAC, not prophetic on harassment of civil-rights groups; C 28
- Crime; in Vietnam under Americans 702
  - Press's fight against muzzling by courts in reporting on. R. Spangler; S 421
- Critchfield, Richard; exposé of AID expenditures in South Vietnam 198
- Criticism; New York drama critics as common scolds. H. Junker; D ...... 307; see also C, 474
- Cross, Jennifer
  - Truth in packaging: the supermarket caper; S 208
- Crossword puzzles. F. W. Lewis. See back pages
  - May 11 dinner honoring F. W. Lewis 406, 438, 470, 503, 535
- Cuba; an American in Cuba. Part I: Seeing Oriente province in a jeep. Part II: The revolution of good cheer. E. R. John; S ...... 296 and 327
  - New York Times account of Bay of Pigs invasion; credit given to ground-breaking Nation story; E 730
  - Passport case of visiting Americans decided by Judge J. C. Zavatt against State department; E 508

PAGE

  Target of anti-Castro propaganda from U.S. of CIA-backed Cuban freedom committee 543, 544
Cup, the. N. Price; P 532
Curti, Merle; historian on failure of foundations to tackle crucial problems 382
Curtis, Representative Thomas B., leader of Republican House group scrutinizing draft 285, 287, 288
Cys, John M.
  Additional facts on Lieut. H. H. Howe; C ...... 282; see also Rechy article, 204
Czechoslovakia; analogy of Munich sellout cited against U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam 641-642
  Foreign trade .... 767 ff.

D

Dancing; by Johnson set contrasted with reality of Vietnam; E 637
Daniel, Frank; National rifle association secretary's activities against firearms legislation 261-262, 263
Daniel-Sinyavsky trial. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Books section of Index
Daniels, Elizabeth A.
  Jessie White Mario: Victorian in Italy; portrait of Nation's first Italian correspondent; S 13
Davis, Jerome
  Praise for editorial of Johnson message; invitation for readers to join international goodwill seminar; C .... 168; see also 85
Deadly game, the. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 310
DeBakey, Dr. Michael E. See Medicine
de Gaulle, President Charles. See France
Degnan, James P.
  Monopoly in the vineyards of California: the "grapes of wrath" strike in Delano led by C. Chavez; S 151
Delgado, Richard, and P. Hocking
  Marine reservists can't support Vietnam war; C 442
Democratic party; former supporter alienated by Vietnam course. W. Gibson; C 492
  Likely year for "loner" candidates, such as Pennsylvania gubernatorial nominee M. J. Shapp; E 637
  Majority in Maine legislature; accomplishments of session. D. L. Graham; S 43
  Parties in chaos. 1: The California sweepstakes. G. Hill; S .... 352; see also E, 732
  Parties in chaos. 2: The New York guerrillas. J. Desmond; S 355
  Realignment of coalition by civil-rights movement .... 514 ff.
  Reprehensible fund-raising activities, including President's club; E 762
De Rudder, Marcel; subject of overpublicized DeBakey heart operation; E 540
Desmond, James
  Parties in Chaos. 2: The New York Democratic guerrillas; S 355
Deutscher, Isaac
  Kremlin diplomacy: first year for the new team; S 32
  Moscow congress: the old party and the young people; S 517
Devick, William S.
  Theobald income plan would give bonus for babies; C .... 715; see also 544
Dickey, James
  Adultery; P 252
DiGiorgio Corp.; big California grower target of "grapes of wrath" strike by pickers 153, 154
Dillon, Henry J.
  According to Admiral Nimitz, U.S. suggested use of poison gas in World War II; C 378
Dinesman, Howard P.
  Jets could be parachute-equipped for emergency braking; C, opposite 85; see also K. M. Ruppenthal's Air safety: the lethal lapses, Dec. 27, 1965
Diversity; shortcomings as remedy for national discontent 179
DMSO. See Drugs
Dodd, Senator Thomas J.; D. Pearson charges of mishandling campaign funds should be investigated by Senate ethics committee; E .... 410; see also 772, 774
  Proposed legislation to regulate firearms fought by National rifle association .... 261-262; see also C, 410 and 427
  Uncovered auto-insurance scandal; E 142
Dominican republic; garbage murder by U.S. soldier followed on TV by detergent commercial. S. Gillers; C 168
  Intervention enraged U.S. intellectuals........ 8-9

PAGE

  Santo Domingo: labyrinth of policy in Interamerican peace force. T. Mockler; S 154
  Santo Domingo: the unfinished revolution. S. Lens; S 520
Dorn, Warren; Los Angeles county supervisor and right-wing causes 458
Douglas, Senator Paul H.; rabid anti-Communist foreign policy views as handicap for re-election; E 315 Draft. See United States—Defense, national Dreher, Carl
  Abusive phone calls to Vietnam servicemen's families probably from rightists; comment on "voiceprint"; C .... 538; see also E, 445
Dron, John A., Sr.
  Praise for J. D. Forbes on barbarian conquest of Ventura county, Calif.; C, opposite 169; see also 128
Drugs; drugs on campus: turned on and tuned out. M. B. Freedman and H. Powelson; S 125
  Likely field for correction 574
  LSD: research and joy ride. J. T. Ungerleider and D. D. Fisher; S 574
  Mislabeling incident 476
  Razz-ma-tazz in the drug industry; overwhelming promotion of harmful DMSO for arthritis, burns, etc. R. G. Sherrill; S .... 425; see also C, 506 and 666, with Sherrill reply
DuBay, Rev. William H.; Catholic priest's proposed clerical trade union; E 255
DuBois clubs of America; alleged subversive group brings guilt by pronunciation to Boys' club of America; E 317
Dulles, John Foster; fooled Eisenhower on Vietnam 213
Durr, Clifford; lawyer as worthy recipient of Florence Lasker civil liberties award; E .... 199; see also C, 442

E

Eastland, Senator James O.; faces trouble in fall Mississippi election from Republican and from Negroes; E 605
Eban, Abba; Israeli foreign minister's appeal for negotiations with Arab nations 170
Education
  Class of 1966 at New York City college: the loss of tragedy. L. Hamalian; S 676
  Cold-war G.I. bill backed by Johnson 7
  College-student draft threatened; minimal educational opportunities in armed services 286-287
  Continuing school segregation 735
  Cuban .... 297 ff.
  Decline in electrical power engineering courses as factor in industry lag and blackouts. L. J. Hollander; S .... 33; see also C, opposite 85
  Drugs on campus: turned on and tuned out. M. B. Freedman and H. Powelson; S 125
  Faculty strike at St. John's university. M. R. Berube; S 172
  Fulbright scholarships financially inadequate. R. Kostelanetz; S 725
  G.E. computer course for inmates of Atlanta federal prison; E 115
  General L. Hershey's reply to C. Cohen article of Dec. 27, 1965, Punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick, with editors' rejoinder; C, opposite 1; see also C. W. Griffin, Jr.; C, opposite 113
  Letters on R. M. Gummere, Jr., article of Dec. 6, 1965, Discipline in the dark: on beating school children, with Gummere reply; C, opposite 29
  National education association's exaggerated report of firing of Negro teachers in South; E .... 30; see also C, opposite 169
  New leftist D. Harris elected president of Stanford student body; E 573
  Paris crisis 557-558
  Professors and protest: Passion in clear reason. D. Krech; S 362
  Research: the Midas touch in Federal grants. H. S. Reuss; S .... 69; see also C, opposite 197 and 253
  St. John's university faculty strike caused by medieval concepts of administration; E 59
  Slow school desegregation in South 290
  Students' right to privacy of records endangered with escalation of Vietnam war; E 573
  Unfairness of draft-deferment tests; E 604
  Universities' new permissiveness on sex contrasted with FBI's Grundyism; E 541
  Unpublicized CIA infiltration and subventions; E 701

PAGE

Eisenhower, President Dwight D.; fooled by J. F. Dulles on Vietnam 213
Eisler, Ken
  Weariness with "an exercise in . . . ," as in H. Zinn on Left; C .... 506; see also 385
El Paso, Texas; demonstration against Vietnam war brought military imprisonment to 2nd lieutenant H. H. Howe, Jr. .... 205 ff.
Elections
  Alabama Negro, Rev. H. McCaskill, ran for sheriff in Hale county; life threatened; E 766
  Alabama Negroes' showing; sword in the heart of Dixie. J. Beecher; S 611
  California and New York gubernatorial. G. Hill and J. Desmond; S ...... 352 and 355
  Florida Democratic gubernatorial nomination won by liberal R. K. High against racist Governor H. Burns; E 669
  Increased neo-Nazi vote in West Germany 442
  Influence of TV, setting new style of politics, on young voters. H. Mendelsohn; S 669
  Mexican-Americans: new political wind from the Southwest. J. W. Moore and R. Guzman; S 645
  Mississippi, 1966: trouble for Senator Eastland; E 605
  1964 campaign costs 762, 770
  Peace candidates in U.S., 1966; E........539; see also C, 620
  Private wealth and public office: the high cost of campaigning in U.S. By V. H. Bernstein; S 770
  Stacked against minority candidates in U.S. 388
Elegy for Don Francisco Giner de los Rios. By A. Machado, translated by R. Bly; P 464
Elman, Richard M. See Cloward, R. A.
Encounter; magazine's indirect subsidy by CIA; E .... 571; see also denial, C, 698
Engineering; decline in field of electric power; relationship to blackouts. L. J. Hollander; S .... 33; see also C, opposite 85
Erlich, John L.
  Criticism of Cloward-Elman article on congress of the poor; C, opposite 225; see also 148
Ernst, Harry W.
  Two GI's in limbo; former Vietcong-held servicemen G. E. Smith and C. E. McClure, critical of Vietnam war, now held in Okinawa by Army; S ...... 294; see also E, 509
ESP. See Extrasensory perception
Estes, Billie Sol; Texas conviction for fraud reversed by Supreme court because trial had been televised 422-423
Europe; de Gaulle's ideas on defense contrasted with those of U.S. cold-war "theologians"; E 506
  Financing of parties' political campaigns 773-774
"Exercise"; weariness with phrase "an exercise in . . ." K. Eisler; C 506
Existentialism; and new U.S. Left 387, 388
Expense accounts. See Business
Extrasensory perception. ESP: science or delusion? D. Cohen; S 550

F

Fanfani, Amintore; Italian foreign minister's involvement in alleged peace feeler from North Vietnam; E 1
Farewell picture, a. .W Stafford; P 278
Farming. See Agriculture
February. D. Hoffman; P 242
Federal bureau of investigation (FBI). See United States—Justice department
Feldman, Irving
  Night; P 277
Fellows, Margaret A. See Bloch, Emanuel
Ferlinghetti, Lawrence
  Where is Vietnam?; P 654
Fetters, Richard
  B. Boretz on nonpublication of U.S. composers confirmed by 1938 book, Composers in America; C .... 364; see also 278
Fiat. See Automobiles
Figueres, José; intermediary between U.S. and Dominican republic 521
Film-makers' cinematheque; exhibited P. Weiss films 222
  Film Hubbub reviewed by R. Hatch; MP.... 139
Films. See Motion pictures
Firearms; regulatory legislation stymied by National rifle association propaganda. R. G. Sherrill; S .... 260; see also C, 410 and 474
Fischer, Abram; Afrikaner fighting South African apartheid. T. Land; S 650
Fischer, Ruth
  TV: no place for satire; program Parma Place on Cleveland's WJW canceled; S.... 470

PAGE
Fisher, Duke D. See Ungerleider, J. T.
Fisher, William H.
  K. H. Purnell on Republicans and Vietnam issue failed to mention Governor Hatfield of Oregon; C, opposite 141; see also 94
Fishing industry; causing deserts in the sea off California. R. G. Lillard; S 268
Fitzgerald, C. P.
  Australian on Chinese foreign policy 259-260
  Once more the yellow peril; myth of Chinese expansionism; S 606
Flat Tops wilderness area. See Colorado
Fleming, Robert S.; Johnson's deputy press secretary's treatment of newsmen; E 699
Florida; ex-Governor F. Bryant, segregationist and defender of duPont railroad interests, appointed director of Office of emergency planning by friend President Johnson; E 380
  Miami hotels' refusal to back compulsory fingerprinting of employees—for wrong reasons; E 413
  Racist Governor H. Burns lost Democratic nomination to liberal R. K. High; E 669
Flowers, Richmond; Negro-backed candidate for Alabama governorship ran second 611-612, 613
Flying saucers; may be investigated by House; E 413
Flynn, Joe; reasons for appointment of actor to California fine arts board. N. Narr; C 620
Food; truth in packaging bill before Congress: the supermarket caper. J. Cross; S 208
Forbes, Jack D.
  Ventura county, California: the barbarian conquest by oil drilling and bulldozer housing; S 128; see also C, opposite 169
  Vietnam: what role for the U.N.? The tactics of a truce; S 229
Ford, Daniel
  Bronze stars of peace: the legionnaire says no; pacifist American legion post commander R. Hollis ousted; S 329
Ford, Representative Gerald W.; on Vietnam stalemate 507
  Republican leader's hawklike stand on Vietnam 94, 96
Ford, Henry; material on requested. B. S. Kraft; C 556
Ford foundation. See Foundations
Foreign affairs; contributor G. A. Carver, Jr., not identified as CIA analyst 571, 701
Foreign aid; misused in Vietnam 62; E 198; 703
  Republican group's position paper on; E 444
  To Cambodia rejected since 1963 447-448
Foreign service. See United States — State Department
Fortune; on costs of Vietnam war; E 478
Foster, Luther; president of Tuskegee institute 122-123
Foster, Paul. Play The recluse (Café La Mama revival) reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 405
Foster, William C.; director of U.S. arms control and disarmament agency deplores world cost of armament; E 732
Foundations; Foundations in blinders: the cool billions; failure to tackle crucial issues. T. C. Reeves; S 381
  Right-wing propagandist outfits, such as Kaplan fund, as conduits for CIA. R. G. Sherrill; S 542
France
  Ben Barka is dead, with body apparently disposed of by French authorities. A. Werth; S 350
  De Gaulle and l'affaire Ben Barka. By A. Werth; S 350
  De Gaulle's policies held responsible for increased neo-Nazi vote in West Germany. A. Werth; E 442
  French eyes on Vietnam: America's colony in hell. A. Werth; S 702
  Provisional agreement on Common market 200-201
  Reaction to U.S. resumption of bombing of North Vietnam 201
  Realistic European policies contrasted to those of U.S. cold-war "theologians"; E 506
  Soviet sympathizers' condemnation of Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; E 225
  Wide condemnation of U.S. conduct of Vietnam war; E 225
  See also Paris
Francis, Peter; killing of Maine Indian by white man termed murder. L. Spiker; S 483
Frazier, Robert A.; FBI agent-marksman re-enacted Oswald shooting 711-712, 744
Freedman, Mervin B., and H. Powelson
  Drugs on campus: turned on and tuned out; S 125

PAGE
Freedom Democratic party
  On plight of Mississippi Negro farmers 59, 61
Fridlington, Robert
  Frederick Law Olmsted: launching The Nation; S 10
Friel, Brian. Play Philadelphia, here I come! reviewed by H. Clurman; D 309; see also 307
Friendly, Fred W.; resignation of CBS news division president over failure to telecast Kennan testimony at Fulbright hearings; E 225; see also C, opposite 253
Fuerza interamericana de la paz (FIP). See Dominican republic
Fulbright, Senator J. William; controversy over phrase "the arrogance of power" as applied to U.S. in Vietnam; E 602
  Investigation of AID in South Vietnam; E 198
  Tardiness of Vietnam hearings 292, 294
  Target of Johnson gibe 666
  Vietnam hearings transformed U.S. political situation; E 254
  Warning on danger to students' right to privacy of records in Vietnam war situation; E 573
Fulbright scholarships; financially inadequate. R. Kostelanetz; S 725

G

Galantay, Ervin
  Reviews of architecture
    Albany campus, state university of New York 629
    Astor library, New York, to be converted for use by J. Papp's Shakespeare festival; S 500
    Stony Brook, Long Island, campus, state university of New York 789
Galbraith, John Kenneth; speech to ADA attacked foreign-policy establishment on Soviet relations and Vietnam war; E 538
Galler, David
  The information; P 334
Gandhi, Prime Minister Indira. See India
Gannett, Lewis; tribute to late bookman. M. Young; E 200
Garcia-Godoy, Provisional President Hector. See Dominican republic
Gardner, W. David
  The New York car: design for survival; state car-safety project; S 489
Garretson, Robert C.
  The ruble-dollar road to peace; S 576; see also C, 634, 666, and 730
Garrigue, Jean
  Brief letter; P 597
Gas, poison; suggested use by U.S. in World War II, according to Admiral Nimitz. By H. J. Dillon; C 378
Gas industry; efficient "Total Energy" turbine system 35-36
Gaulle, President Charles de. See France
General Electric Co.; unique computer course for inmates of Atlanta federal prison; E 115
General motors corp.; harassment of safety crusader R. Nader 316, 412, 491; see also C, 378
Geneva conference, 1954; reconvening as preliminary to Vietnam settlement; E 226
Georgia; Negro legislator J. Bond unseated for statement on Vietnam. H. Shapiro; S see also 388
  Negroes on Schley county jury; E 348
Germany, West
  Forced to buy unwanted armament by Secretary McNamara; E 732
  Increased neo-Nazi vote, attributed to de Gaulle's policies. A. Werth; E 442
  Temporary suppression of writers and teachers' protest on U.S. policies in Vietnam; E 86
Gessner, Peter
  Films from the Vietcong; MP 110
Ghana; ouster of prime minister Nkrumah: the generals and the future of Africa. J. K. Sale; S 317; see also C, 506
Giacometti: 1901-1966. Reviewed by J. Berger; A 341
Gibson, William
  Former Democrat alienated by Vietnam war; C 492
Gielgud, John. Production of Chekhov's play Ivanov reviewed by H. Clurman; D 661
Gillers, Stephen
  TV news program depicting Dominican republic garbage murder followed by silly detergent commercial; C 168
Ginger, Ann Fagan, et al.
  Material and money sought for Meiklejohn civil liberties library, Berkeley, Calif.; C, opposite 57
Ginzburg, Ralph; Supreme court demeans itself in case's obscenity ruling; E 379; see also C, 556
Go. By D. Shapiro; P 339

PAGE
God; death of makes Time and Newsweek; E 443
Godard, Jean-Luc. Film Band of outsiders reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 406
Goldberg, Ambassador Arthur J.; dissent from D. Acheson on role of U.N. and international law; cool relations with Secretary Rusk; E 668
Goldman, Michael
  Trends in U.S. poetry, with special reference to L. Simpson; S 246
Goldwater, Barry; based 1964 presidential campaign on discontent 176, 178
  Political fate influenced by TV 671
  Proposal for U.S.-Soviet alliance against Asian Communists; E 478
Gomillion, Charles; Negro educator's "model" biracial town, Tuskegee, ablaze after murder of SNCC worker 118 ff.
  White collaboration criticized 613-614
Gonzalez, Representative Henry
  Proponent of firearms regulation 263
Goodman, Michael
  Reviews of motion pictures
    Weiss's Faces in the shadows and The mirage 222
Goodman, Walter
  Article of Nov. 8, 1965, The Klan discovers HUAC, not prophetic on harassment of civil-rights groups; C 28
Gorman, Patrick E.
  Correction to B. J. Widick article of Dec. 27, 1965, on AFL-CIO convention, concerning own attitude on Vietnam; C, opposite 113
Gospel according to St. Matthew, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 280
Gozzini, Giuseppe; Italian conscientious objector supported by Father E. Balducci; both imprisoned 418-419
Grace to be said at the supermarket. H. Nemerov; P 397
Graham, David L.
  Maine's year of the donkey; Democratic-majority legislature; S 43
Grant, Donald; U.N. correspondent on coolness between D. Rusk and A. J. Goldberg; E 668
"Grapes of wrath" strike of pickers against California growers. J. P. Degnan; S 151
Grass, the world of Günter. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 597
Graves, Stewart
  Supreme court straining at gnat in Ginzburg decision; C 556; see also E, 379
Great Britain
  End of traditional rivalry with Russia in Asia; E 86
  Legal aid for poor 267-268
  Measures against Rhodesia include interception of tanker bound for Beira; E 477
  Reliable ally when Marxist is elected master of Balliol college? P. H. Bailey; C, opposite 57
  Responsibility for Nkrumah's troubles. F. Laski; C 506
Great society; programs curtailed because of Vietnam war; E 666
Greenberg, Selig
  Medicare: promises and pitfalls; S 617; see also C, 698
Greer, William Robert; secret service agent's testimony on Kennedy assassination 709-710
Gregg, Richard B.
  U.S. treaty with Iroquois as scrap of birch bark; C 346
Gregory, Dick; Negro comic and civil-rights advocate joins Washington state Indians in fish-in for fishing rights. R. C. Lee; S 487
Grosser, Maurice
  Reviews of art
    Paris exhibitions: Guillaume-Walter collection at the Tuileries and Les années 25 at the Musée des Decoratifs 531
Group research, inc.; exposé of foundation-CIA links. R. G. Sherrill; S 542
Group theatre, San Francisco; vicissitudes and dissolution 583 ff.
Guillain, Robert; Le Monde correspondent on gangrene of Vietnam 414-415, 702-704
Guillaume-Walter; art collection exhibited in Paris. M. Grosser; A 531
Guinea; base for exiled Nkrumah 321, 322
Gummere, Richard M., Jr.
  Letters on Dec. 6, 1965, article Discipline in the dark: on beating school children, with Gummere reply; C, opposite 29
Guns. See Firearms
Guzman, Ralph. See Moore, J. W.

H

Hamalian, Leo
  Class of 1966 at New York City college: the loss of tragedy; S 676

PAGE

Harley, J. W. K.; Ghanaian commissioner of police helped oust Nkrumah 320
Harper's; P. M. Stern article on shortcomings of foundations 381-382
Harris, David; new leftist elected president of Stanford student body; E 573
Harris, Michael
  Bay area rapid transit: advance into yesterday through proposed elevated trains; S 679
Harrison, Will; late New Mexico columnist charged with contempt of court for criticizing findings in drunk-driving cases 424
Hart, Senator Philip A.; investigations of food packaging 208, 211
Harsha, Representative William H.; denunciation of Secretary Rusk for trade agreements with Communist Eastern Europe; E 635
Haskins, Doug
  Can Johnson be tried as warlock (oath breaker)?; C 28
Hassan II, King. See Morocco
Hatch, Robert
  Reviews of motion pictures
    Band of outsiders 406
    Chase, the 280
    Gospel according to St. Matthew, the 280
    Hubbub 139
    Italiano brave gente 221
    King and country 221
    Morgan! 502
    Shakespeare wallah 406
    Sleeping car murder, the 406
    Spy who came in from the cold, the 84
    10th victim, the 27
    Viva Maria 27
Hatfield, Governor Mark O.; Oregonian as Republican peace-seeker. W. H. Fisher; C, opposite 141
Hayden, Thomas; possible indictment for North Vietnam trip; E 87
Heine, Eeerik; slander suit against J. Raus acting for CIA; E 541
Henry, Jules
  Capital's last frontier; U.S. investments in underdeveloped areas; S .... 480; see also C, 620
Hershey, General Lewis B.
  Reply to C. Cohen article General Hershey's big stick in Dec. 27, 1965, issue, with editors' rejoinder; C, opposite 1
  Selective service director threatens draft of college men 286-287
Hester, Hugh B.
  Reaction to ABA's declaration that Vietnam war is legal; C 282
High, Robert King. See Florida
Hill, Gladwin
  Parties in chaos. 1: The California sweepstakes; S .... 352; see also E, 732
Hill, Mrs. Jean; testimony on number of shots in Kennedy assassination 737
Hilsman, Roger; former State department official's warning on Chinese entry in Asian war 253
His gift. B. S. Adcock; P 48
Hobbes, Thomas; political theories reviewed 449-450
Hoch, Paul K.
  Seconds B. K. Bingham letter on B. C. Keeney; C .... 282; see also C, opposite 169
Hocking, Philip. See Delgado, R.
Hodge, John
  H. Zinn criticized on nonviolence stand; C, opposite 141; see also 64
Hoffman, Daniel
  February; P 242
Hoffman, William. Play Thank you, Miss Victoria (Café La Mama revival) reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 404
Holland, S. M.; testimony on Kennedy assassination 738-739
Hollander, Lawrence J.
  Whooping cranes and power failures; blackout of electric power engineers in U.S.; S .... 33; see also C, opposite 85 and 169
Hollis, Robert; pacifist American legion post commander ousted from Connecticut post. D. Ford; S 329
Homans, George; sociologist's rewards-investment principle of foreign policy 644
Homosexuality. See Sex
Honolulu, declaration of; everything but peace in Johnson-Ky communiqué; E 197
Hoover, Herbert C.; as Secretary of Commerce, initiated expansionist trade policy followed by H. A. Wallace 39-40
Hoover, J. Edgar. See United States—Justice department
Hoover, Richard; general manager of Pittsburgh playhouse 690, 691
Hospitals. See Medicine
Hotels; refusal in Miami to back compulsory fingerprinting; E 413
House un-American activities committee (HUAC). See United States—Congress
Housing; cheap developments ruining Ventura county, California .... 140; see also C, opposite 169
  Discrimination against Negroes despite laws 290
  Of welfare recipients in U.S. 232, 235, 264
Howe, Lieutenant H. H., Jr.; in military prison for demonstrating against Vietnam war. J. Rechy; S .... 204; see also C, 282 and 346
  Released; E 413
Howe, Jane Lange
  Treatment of son, H. H. Howe, Jr., in military prison; C 346
Hsiu, H. L.
  Exceptions to R. C. Garretson's Ruble-dollar road to peace; C .... 730; see also 576
Hubbub. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 139
Hudson, Lois Phillips
  Battle in the wilderness: the benevolent wreckers; threats to preserved lands in 1964 wilderness act; S 393
Hughes, H. Stuart
  Post-cold-war delusions of U.S. intellectuals prior to North Vietnam bombings; S 7
  Vietnam war opponent target of State department snooping on trip abroad; E 412
Humanities, council on the; musical-comedy composer M. Willson sole representative of music; E .... 477; see also C, 620
Humanities, national endowment of; dubious choice of Dr. B. C. Keeney as chairman. B. C. Bingham; C, opposite 169, and P. K. Hoch; C, 282
Humes, Commander James J.; pathologist on anatomical facts of Kennedy assassination 741-742, 744
Humphrey, Vice President Hubert H.; assurances on inflation belied by Federal reserve 4
  Down the line for Vietnam war in speeches to ADA and AP; E 538

I

Iceland; abandonment of U.S. bases advocated by H. A. Wallace in 1946 42
Ideology; vacuum between private acts and public goals. H. S. Kariel; S .... 449; see also C, 570
Ignatow, David
  An American parable; P 783
Illinois; coming Senate race between rabid anti-Communist P. H. Douglas and moderate C. H. Percy; E 315
Income. See Poverty
India; death of Prime Minister Shastri; reconciliation with Pakistan at Tashkent; E 86
  India's first lady, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi; E 115
  See also Kashmir
Indians, U.S.; bill to restore sacred Blue Lake, New Mexico, region, to Taos; E 476
  Killing of Passamaquoddy P. Francis by white man. L. Spiker; S 483
  Treaty with Iroquois as scrap of birch bark. R. B. Gregg; C 346
  Washington state fish-in joined by Negro D. Gregory. By R. C. Lee; S 487
Indonesia; Breakfast with Sukarno; western misconceptions of country and president. D. Smith; S 553
  Defeat of Communists alters Asian political balance 33
  Pride and fall of Sukarno; transfer of power to General Suharto; E 346
  Still not pro-U.S. despite elimination of Communists; E 171
Inflation; built into 1967 U.S. budget; E 141
  Food scarcity as factor in Latin America 93
  Humphrey's assurances followed by Federal reserve's tight-money policy 4
  In South Vietnam as result of business as well as military spending; E 197
  Increasing in U.S. as consequence of Vietnam war; E 666
Information; Official information: how good is it?; E 284
Information, the. D. Galler; P 334
Insanity. See Mental health
International labor organization (ILO). See United Nations
Insurance; scandal among high-risk auto-insurance firms uncovered by Senator T. J. Dodd; E 142
Intellectuals; alienation from U.S. government's Vietnam policies; post-cold-war delusions prior to bombing of north. H. S. Hughes; S 7
Interamerican peace force (FIP). See Dominican republic
Iran; fate of political prisoners depends on world opinion. C. Kaupp; C .... 570; see also C, 634
Irving, Jules; co-director of Lincoln center repertory theatre .... 584 ff.
Israel; threat of nuclear war by Arab nations as safeguards are eroded; E 170
Italiano brava gente. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 221
Italy; conflict with pacifist churchmen on support of conscientious objectors .... 418 ff.
  Foreign Minister Fanfani's involvement in alleged peace feeler from North Vietnam; E 1
  J. W. Mario's writings on for early Nation. E. A. Daniels; S 13
Ivanov (J. Gielgud production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 661

J

Japan; Co-prosperity again; increasing trade with China despite U.S. opposition. A. Axelbank; S .... 479; see also 482
  Industrialized self without Communism; why didn't China? J. L. Weeke; C .... 314; see also E. T. Nash reply; C 474
  Unprofitable adventures in China 608
  U.S. economic adventures in Asia ended in Pearl Harbor attack 481-482
John XXIII, Pope; significance of encyclical Pacem in terris .... 416 ff.
John, Erwin Roy
  An American in Cuba. Part I: Seeing Oriente province in a jeep; S 296
  An American in Cuba. Part II: The revolution of good cheer; S 327
John Birch society. See Birch society, John
Johnson, Hiram W.; bipartisan tradition in California politics 353, 355
Johnson, President Lyndon B.
  "Abjectives" in Vietnam. C. Chayette; C 730
  All eyes on in Washington at year's end. R. G. Sherrill; S 4
  Appointment of Florida segregationist F. Bryant as director of Office of emergency planning; E 380
  Axis with Governor Connally in Texas; E 605
  Cannot "personally" decide for pilots in Vietnam whether to chase enemy planes into China; E 572
  Dancing revels of social set contrasted with reality of Vietnam; E 637
  Everything but peace in Honolulu declaration supporting Ky of South Vietnam; E 197
  Gestures to consumers; E 574
  Gibes at peace forces mask nervousness over rising opposition and loss of prestige; E 666
  Gimmick of selling part interests in government-owned loans to private investors to reduce budget deficit; E 605
  Hopes for unity in resumption of North Vietnam bombing; E 169
  Ill-judged appointment of M. Willson to represent music on Council on the humanities; E .... 477; see also C, 620
  Initiated Defense department review of draft; findings never publicized 287, 288
  Intellectuals' disillusion with messianic pose. H. H. Hughes; S 7
  Lost national consensus through Vietnam escalation; E 282
  News manglement and feuding with press corps; E 699
  "Old prestidigitator" and inflationary 1967 budget; E 141
  Pious self-deception on Vietnam in State of the Union message; E .... 85; see also C, 168
  Political fate influenced by TV 671
  Presence at rigged White House conference on civil rights 734
  Pressure on newsmen opposed to Vietnam policies; E 349
  Proposals for Federal electoral reform act 774
  Reliance on polls; should think about Stanford poll, which shows U.S. fragmented on Vietnam war; E 347
  Reprehensible Democratic fund-raising activities, as in President's club; E 762
  Should be tried as warlock (oath breaker) for new Vietnam stand. D. Haskins; C 28
  Thrust of Vietnam policy and its dubious assumptions; E 314
  Vietnam peace offensive hedged with conditions; E 57
Johnson, Nicholas; controversial U.S. maritime administrator .... 71 ff.
Johnson's cabinet watched by ants. R. Bly; P 653

Index

PAGE

Jones, Tom
Disagreement with R. Swerdlin on lowering voting age to 18; C .... 762; see also C, 620
Journey of the fifth horse, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 661
Judson poets' theatre. Productions reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 224
Junker, Howard
The art of animation in films; MP 249
The common scolds; New York theater critics, specifically S. Kauffmann of the Times; D .... 307; see also C, 474
The merchant marine: wilderness of tigers against new Federal maritime policy; S.... 71

K

Kaplan, Allan
The orange; P 750
Kaplan fund; link with CIA 543
Kariel, Henry S.
The ideological vacuum between private acts and public goals; S .... 449; see also C, 570
Kashmir; India-Pakistan agreement on through Soviet good offices at Tashkent; E 86
Katzenbach, Attorney General Nicholas deB. See United States—Justice department
Kauffmann, George
Objections to C. Cohen's apologia for liberals in article The fruits of protest; C ...... 523; see also 357
Kauffmann, Stanley; New York Times theater critic as common scold. H. Junker; D ...... 307; see also C, 474
Kaufman, Arnold S.
Murder in Tuskegee, Ala.: day of wrath in the model town; S .... 118; see also C, opposite 197
Kaunas 1941. J. Bobrowski (translated by R. and M. Mead); P 589
Kaupp, Carol
Fear for fate of Iranian political prisoners; C .... 570; see also C, 634
Kazan, Elia; vicissitudes as director of Lincoln center repertory theatre .... 583 ff.
Keating, Kenneth B.; when senator in 1964, introduced draft-review bill 287
Keeffe, Arthur John; law professor's efforts to free servicemen Smith and McClure from Okinawa detention 295
Keen, Elizabeth
Stricture on A. S. Kaufman article on Tuskegee's day of wrath; C, opposite 197; see also 118
Keeney, Dr. Barnaby S.; dubious choice as chairman of national endowment of humanities. B. C. Bingham; C, opposite 169, and P. K. Hoch; C, 282
Kellerman, Roy H.; secret service agent's testimony on Kennedy assassination 708-710
Kennan, George; testimony before Senate foreign relations committee not telecast by CBS; E .... 225; see also C, opposite 253
Kennedy, Senator Edward M.; proposal for advisory commission on China policy; E 700
Kennedy, President John F.; appointed commission on campaign costs 770, 774
1960 campaign called for self-sacrifice 176, 178
On Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba; E 730
See also Warren commission
Kennedy, Senator Robert F.; elicited admission from V.A. official that no definite information is available on educational opportunities in armed forces 287
Leader of New York state Democratic faction .... 355 ff.
Useful initiative on Vietnam; E 253
Kentfield, Calvin
Nov. 22, 1965, evaluation of Tokyo Olympiad based on mutilated film. D. Richie; C, opposite 57
Kentucky; strip-mine morality: the landscaping of hell. W. Berry; S 96
Kerr, Clark; on "point of no return" in university research 76
Keynes, John Maynard; posthumous favor of economic doctrines in U.S. business 113
Khrushchev, Nikita S.; policies reversed; not mentioned at Moscow party congress .... 517 ff.
King, Rev. Martin Luther, Jr.
Freedom's crisis: the last steep ascent in civil rights; S 288
Opposed to ouster of Georgia Negro legislator J. Bond 147
King and country. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 221
Kinnell, Galway
Last songs; P 528
Kirstein, George G.
Retiring publisher's statement to readers of The Nation 3

PAGE

Knight, Frances G.; militant anti-Communist head of State department passport office 412
Knott, Walter; CLEAN adviser and extreme rightist 458
Kolodziej, Edward A.
Congress and foreign policy: the timid political will; S 292
Korea, South; more troops to Vietnam 283
Sabotage of 1953 armistice likened to Ky's threats in Vietnam; E 114
Korean war; Truman's precedents in 212-213
Koski, Rev. George
First of all, obey first amendment and first commandment; C 410
Kostelanetz, Richard
In darkest Fulbright; program's inadequate stipend for scholars; S 725
Kozloff, Max
Reviews of art
Magritte, René 55
Matisse, H. 498
Newman, B. 598
Noland, K. 370
"Primary structures" sculpture show at Jewish museum 693
Stella, J. 370
U.S. section of Sao Paulo biennial, at National collection of fine arts, Washington 250
Kraft, Barbara S.
Material on H. Ford requested; C 556
Krech, David
The fruits of protest. 2: Passion in clear reason; S 362
Kruger, Lawrence
Unequal Federally subsidized professorial salaries; C, opposite 253; see also Reuss article, 69
Ku Klux Klan; membership proffer to chronic scourges, Lumbee Indians of North Carolina; E 380
Target of Weltner bill, which threatens civil liberties; E 413
Kuchel, Senator Thomas; declined Republican nomination for California governorship....353-354
Kuss, Henry J.; deputy assistant secretary of Defense as chief U.S. arms salesman to foreign governments; E 85
Ky, Premier Nguyen Cao. See Vietnam

L

Labor
Union
Algerian resistance to new conservative government 117
Catholic priests' organization proposed by Rev. W. H. DuBay; E 255
CIA-AFL-CIO; Lovestone-led AIFLD charged with CIA link by V. Reuther; E 700
Civil service unionism: how to avoid another strike like that of New York city transit workers. T. J. Cooney; S ... 88
Collective economic mobility unattainable by many of poor 510-511
Cost of change to automation; case of railroad firemen; E 444
Faculty strike at St. John's university. M. R. Berube; S 172
Failure of collective bargaining in New York transit strike; E 58
"Grapes of wrath" strike of pickers in Delano, Calif. J. P. Degnan; S 151
Justification for New York transit-strike settlement in exceeding administration's wage guidelines; E 113
Merchant-marine problems .... 71 ff.
Obstinate cold-warism of Meany-Lovestone leadership, culminating in AFL-CIO walkout from ILO conference; E 764
Subservient to administration's low wage-increase guidelines. B. J. Widick; C, opposite 169
Land, Thomas
Abram Fischer: an Afrikaner fights apartheid: S 650
Land came to an end, the. P. Zweig; P 370
Land reform. See Agriculture
Lasker, Florence, award. See Civil liberties
Laski, Frida
African progress weakened by ouster of Nkrumah in Ghana; C .... 506; see also J. K. Sale article, 317
Laski, Mrs. Harold
Afforestation of Sahara contrasted with lumbering in U.S. national forests described in G. McConnell article of Dec. 27, 1965; C, opposite 141
Last songs. G. Kinnell; P 528
Latin America; enemies of promise in land reform. W. C. Thiesenhusen; S 90
Resentment over one-sided negotiations by U.S.; sickness of Alliance for progress; E 604

PAGE

Lattimore, Owen
The point beyond decency: attempted colonial conquest by U.S. in Vietnam; S 212
Law; the fruits of protest. 1: Law, speech and disobedience. C. Cohen; S .... 357; see also C, 506 and 523
Redress for the poor .... 264 ff.
Le Carré, John. Film version of novel The spy who came in from the cold reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 84
League of Nations; former mandatory body for South West Africa .... 389 ff.
Lee, Robert C.
Dick Gregory goes fishing; joins Washington state fish-in of Indians; S 487
Left, U.S. See Radicals
Leng, Russell J.
Vietnam: what role for the U.N.? The strategy of a truce; S 227
Lens, Sidney
Santo Domingo: the unfinished revolution in Dominican republic; S 520
Leonce and Lena. Reviewed by R. J. Schroeder; D 26
Lerche, Charles O., Jr.
U.S. foreign policy after the cold war; S 673
Lerner, Max; on political influence of polls.... 670
Levertov, Denise
What were they like? (questions and answers); P 781
Lewis, Frank W.
Crossword puzzles. See back pages
Supper in honor of 406, 438, 470, 503, 535
Liberalism: opportunity from impasse. F. A. Warren III; S 238
Shortcomings of rationalist assumptions underlying welfare programs. R. McGee; S 174
Lillard, Richard G.
Deserts in the sea off California caused by overfishing; S 268
Lincoln, Abraham; statement against Mexican war; E 2
Lincoln center, New York city; chronicle of vicissitudes. H. Clurman; D 583
Lindsay, John V.; tests for new mayor of New York; E 29
Lion in winter, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 374
Literary gazette; snow-and-Lenin poem, greeting 23rd Soviet party congress, probably hoax; E 445
Locke, John; political theories reviewed'........ 450
Lodge, Ambassador Henry Cabot; globe-trotting before making "progress report" on Vietnam to Washington; surprised by Ky counterrevolution against Buddhists?; E 634
Long Island. See New York state
Los Angeles. See California
Losey, Joseph. Film King and country reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 221
Lovestone, Jay E.; AFL-CIO international affairs director charged by V. Reuther with helping undermine foreign governments; E 700
Forced AFL-CIO withdrawal from ILO conference because Pole was elected presiding officer; E 764
Lowe, J. Elmo; director of Cleveland Play House 689-690
LSD. See Drugs
Lubove, Roy
The welfare industry: social work and the life of the poor; S .... 609; see also C, 762
Luna, William A.
Praise for L. J. Hollander's The big blackout; C, opposite 169; see also 33
Lynd, Staughton; served country and cause of peace by "private diplomacy" trip to North Vietnam; E 87

M

McCarran, Pat; late Nevada Senator's career 455
McCarran-Walter act; dangerous amendment to proposed by Rep. Weltner; E 413
McCarthy, Senator Eugene J.; proposal for broadened Senate committee to oversee CIA operations 701
McCaskill, Rev. Henry. See Alabama
McClory, Representative Robert; naive opinion on progress of Vietnam war with people hostile .... 61 ff.
McClure, SP/5 Claude E. See Ernst, H. W.
McConnell, Grant
Denudation of U.S. national forests described in Dec. 27, 1965, article contrasted to afforestation of Sahara. Mrs. H. Laski; C, opposite 141
McGee, Reece
Welfare in affluent society: the mirage of rationalism underlying programs; S 174
McGovern, Senator George S.; speech on China policy 700, 701

Index

PAGE
Machado, Antonio
  Elegy for Don Francisco Giner de los Rios; P (translated by R. Bly) 464
  Gathering in homage to late Spanish loyalist poet suppressed; anonymous article .... 462; see also 460
McKeen, Richard F., Jr.
  Reservations on R. M. Gummere article of Dec. 6, 1965, Discipline in the dark: on beating school children; C, with Gummere reply, opposite 29
McKissick, Floyd; CORE director's run-around on Vietnam resolution at White House conference on civil rights 734
McLuhan, Marshall; on TV as most "involving" medium of communication 671-672
McNamara, Defense Secretary Robert S.; arm-twisting of West Germany on armament purchases from U.S.; E 732
  Optimistic statements on Vietnam war 95
  Trial balloon on selective service; E 667
  Vietnam pronouncements impossible to satirize; E 509
Madariaga, Salvador de; funds for scholarship fund requested. H. Arendt; C 780
Magritte, René. Reviewed by M. Kozloff;A 55
Maine; unequal justice for Indians pointed up by killing of P. Francis. By L. Spiker; S 483
  Year of the donkey with Democratic-majority legislature. D. L. Graham; S 43
Major, Robert
  U.S. must practice moderation in foreign policy; C .... 780; see also W. B. Saunders, C, 666
Malle, Louis. Film Viva Maria reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 27
Mandel, Dr. Emanuel. See Medicine
Marat/Sade. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 82
Marijuana. See Drugs
Mario, Jessie White; portrait of Nation's first Italian correspondent. E. A. Daniels; S 13
Mark Twain; statement against "loud little handful" agitating for war with Spain; E 2
Marshall, Chief Justice John; Justice H. L. Black likened to 326
Martians; in flying saucers should be investigated by HUAC; E 413
Martin, Gerhard M., M.D.
  Time on U.S. Vietnam bastion confirms Asian suspicions; C, opposite 113
Martin, William McChesney. See United States—Federal reserve board
Marx, Frances L.
  Chester Cooper, not Sherman Cooper, was administration spokesman to opponents of Vietnam war mentioned in R. G. Sherrill's The consensus marchers, Dec. 6, 1965; C, opposite 29
Marx, Karl; anticipated ideas in J. Henry article. I. K. Rolling; C .... 620; see also 480
Materialism; underlies U.S. welfare programs. R. McGee; S 174
Matisse, Henri. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 498
Meany, George. See Labor—Union
Medicine
  LSD: research and joy ride. J. T. Ungerleider and D. D. Fisher; S 574
  Medicare: promises and pitfalls. S. Greenberg; S .... 617; see also C, 698
  Medicare subsidizes medical industry more than needy 5-6, 7
  Our disturbed children: who is to care for them? W. Ryan; S 775
  Research and responsibility; Drs. Southam and Mandel injected cancer cells without patients' knowledge; E 284
  Surgical spectacular; DeBakey external-bypass heart operation publicized tastelessly in news media; E 540
  What poverty does to the mind. R. Coles; S 746
Meiklejohn civil liberties library; material and money sought. A. F. Ginger et al.; C, opposite 57
Melfi, Leonard. Play Birdbath (Café La Mama revival) reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 404
Mendelsohn, Harold
  TV and youth: a new style for politics through newly influential medium; S 669
Mental health; LSD experiments .... 574 ff.
  What poverty does to the mind. R Coles; S 746
  Our disturbed children: who is to care for them? W. Ryan; S 775
Merchant marine; wilderness of tigers against new Federal maritime policy. H. Junker; S 71
Meredith, James; wounding on march suggests reappraisal of nonviolent civil-rights policy; E .... 731 and 765

PAGE
Mexican-Americans: new political wind from the Southwest. J. W. Moore and R. Guzman; S 645
  Voted for anti-Negro Yorty in California 733 Mexico; uproar over decision to publish O. Lewis's The children of Sanchez, discussed in J. Sommers article of Dec. 27, 1965. M. Tejada; C, opposite 85
Meyers, William
  Doorbells: the politics of activism for peace; S 581
Miami. See Florida
Michigan; Ann Arbor protesters against Vietnam war constitute key case in civil disobedience 357, 359
  Conflict-of-interest legislation; resignation of university regent E. B. Power; E 350
Mid-evening. D. Ray; P 658
Middle East; plutonium keg in, as safeguards against Arab-Israeli war are eroded; E 170
Migratory workers. See Agriculture
Milani, Don Lorenzo; trial of Italian priest for support of conscientious objectors 419-420
Miller, Arthur; "house playwright" of Lincoln center 583, 584
Miller. Leslie A.; appraisal of Army Corps of Engineers 183
Miller, Warren; tribute to late literary editor of The Nation; E 509
Mills, Representative Wilbur D.; killed tariff-reduction proposal; E 635
Mining; nefarious legislation sponsored by Nevada Senators 453
  See also Coal industry
Minstrel show, a, or civil rights in a cracker barrel. Reviewed by L. Zimpel; D 276
Missiles. See Armament—Missiles
Mississippi; ambush shooting of J. Meredith in civil-rights march; E .... 731 and 765
  Displacement of Negro tenant farmers by machinery. R. G. Sherrill; S .... 59; see also C 168
  Election trouble ahead for Senator Eastland, from Republican opponent and rising Negro registration; E 605
  Freedom Democratic party worker shot; civil-rights laws not enforced 735, 736
Mitchell, Roger
  Reading a book of poems; P 565
Mockler, Tony
  Santo Domingo: labyrinth of policy in Dominican republic; S 154
Monde, Le; correspondent R. Guillain's articles on gangrene of Vietnam 414-415, 702-704
Moore, J. Hartwell. See Spector, S.
Moore, Joan W., and R. Guzman
  The Mexican-Americans: new wind from the Southwest; S 645
Morgan! Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 502
Morocco; involvement in French Ben Barka scandal .... 202 ff. and 350 ff.
Morris, John N.
  Photography; P 307
Moss, Senator Frank; sponsor of bill to change Interior department to National Resources department .... 180 ff.
Moss, Stanley
  Winter in Vermont; P 74
Motion pictures
  Art of animation, the. H. Junker; MP 249
  C. Kentfield's unfavorable Nov. 22, 1965, evaluation of Tokyo Olympiad based on mutilated film. D. Richie; C, opposite 57
  Films from the Vietcong. P. Gessner; MP 110
  For reviews, see Hatch, R.; Goldman, M.
Mozambique. See Portugal
Muckraking, 1966; example of R. Nader on car safety; E 316
Muir, Jean; interview telling of 1950 TV blacklisting canceled; E 30
Munich pacts, 1938; misuse of analogy in Vietnam war 65-67, 641-642
Museums. For reviews of exhibitions, see Kozloff, M.
Music; comparative impoverishment in Paris 557, 558
  M. Willson poor choice as representative on President's Council on the humanities; E .... 477; see also C, 620
  For reviews, see Boretz, B.

N

Nabokov, Nicholas. See Rougemont, Denis de
Nader, Ralph; muckraker of 1966, on car safety; target of General motors snooping; E .... 316; E .... 412; see also 491, 574: C, 378
  Nov. 1, 1965, Corvair article neglected states' non-inspection as accident cause. W. D. Cabin; C 459
  On ombudsman's duties 233

PAGE
Nash, Edward T.
  Reply to J. L. Weeke on necessity for Communism in China; C .... 474; see also C, 314
Narr, Nita
  Reasons behind appointment of M. Willson to humanities council; C .... 620; see also E, 477
Nation, The
  Back issues offered. R. Boss; C 45
  South West Africa: the World Court's ticklish case. Nation staff; S 389
  Statements to readers by G. G. Kirstein, retiring publisher, and J. J. Storrow, Jr., new publisher 3, 4
  Story of CIA preparations for invasion of Cuba antedated and inspired that of New York Times; E 730
  Tribute to late literary editor, W. Miller; E 509
  Two Nation portraits: Frederick Law Olmsted and Jessie White Mario. By R. Fridlington and E. A. Daniels; S 10, 13
  Typographical changes .... 285; see also C, 378
National conference for new politics; supports peace candidates. M. Peretz; C 620
National education association (NEA). See Education
National farm workers association (NFWA); strike against California grape growers ... 152 ff.
National rifle association. See Firearms
National rivers and harbors congress; lobbying organization backs Army Corps of Engineers 183
Nazism. See Germany, West
Negroes
  Civil rights
    Ambush shooting in Mississippi of J. Meredith on march; E 731
    Bubble of unreality in White House conference. R. G. Sherrill; S 734
    Comparative neglect by foundations 383, 385
    Freedom's crisis: the last steep ascent. M. L. King, Jr.; S 288
    Inadequate Federal enforcement of new laws 6
    Movement wrought new Democratic urban coalition .... 514 ff.
    Murder of SNCC worker in Tuskegee: day of wrath in the model town. A. S. Kaufman; S .... 118; see also C, opposite 197
    Possible coalition with Mexican-Americans .... 647; see also 733
    Reappraisal of nonviolence in light of J. Meredith shooting; E 765
    SNCC, free of dogma, compared with old Communist-influenced Left 386, 387, 388
    SNCC position on Vietnam used as ammunition for unseating of Georgia Negro legislator J. Bond .... 146 ff.
    SNCC's "black nationalism" deprecated by do-little whites; E 669
  Congress of poor at Syracuse, N. Y. By R. A. Cloward and R. M. Elman; S .... 148; see also C, opposite 225
  Exaggerated NEA report on teachers fired in South; E .... 30; see also C, opposite 169
  Gouged on food prices 210
  Helped win Florida Democratic gubernatorial nomination for liberal R. K. High; E 669
  Obsolete Negro, the; displacement by machinery in Southern agriculture. R. G. Sherrill; S 59
  Showing in Alabama elections .... 611 ff.
  Strategy for abolishing poverty through guaranteed income as basis for coalition with poor whites 514
  Target of racism on WLBT-TV, Jackson, Miss.; E 412
  Thaw in white Southern racism; E 348
  Watts riots and California primary vote 733
Nelson, Mrs. Helen; California consumer counsel organized supermarket shopping test .... 208 ff.
Nemerov, Howard
  Grace to be said at the supermarket; P 397
Nevada: the rotten borough. G. M. Ostrander; S 452
New Jersey; involvement in Manhattan world trade center and Hudson tubes 236, 238
New Mexico; labor and political ferment among Mexican-Americans 646, 647, 648
  Move to restore Blue Lake region to Taos Indians; E 476
New Republic; popular-front stand in 1930's.. 239
New school for social research; alleged prevention of circulation of Freedom house petition backing U.S. Vietnam commitment. J. Sandock; C 100
New York Central railroad. See Railroads

Index

PAGE
New York city
  Antiquated electric plants; Total Energy system needed .... 34 ff.
  Civil-defense reorganization and economies; E 509
  Class of 1966 at City college: the loss of tragedy. L. Hamilton; S 676
  Expensive 1965 mayoralty campaign 770, 771-772
  Failure of collective bargaining in transit strike; E 58
  How to avoid another civil-service strike like that of transit workers. T. J. Cooney; S 88
  Institutions paying low or no taxes; E 477
  "Other spiral" of inward deterioration not cited in three-newspaper merger; E 380
  Poverty programs and working of regular welfare services .... 266 ff.
  Reasons for transit-strike settlement to exceed Washington's wage guidelines; E 113
  Tests for Mayor Lindsay; E 29
  Welfare policies; many eligibles not on rolls 511-512
  World trade center: Manhattan's tower of Babel. By D. Smith; S 235
New York philharmonic; twentieth-century music reviewed by B. Boretz; M 112
New York port authority; proposed world trade center. D. Smith; S 235
New York state
  Car-safety project: design for survival. W. D. Garner; S 489
  Involvement in proposed Manhattan world trade center .... 235 ff.
  Long Island peace groups ring doorbells. W. Meyers; S 582
  Parties in chaos. 2: The New York Democratic guerrillas. J. Desmond; S 355
New York Times; account of Bay of Pigs invasion credits pioneering Nation disclosure; E 730
  CIA series organized around wrong question; E .... 570; see also C, 698
  C. L. Sulzberger columns, in contrast to editorials, strongly pro-administration on Vietnam war; E 349
  On U.S. capital investment in Vietnam ... 480 ff.
Newlands, Francis G.; Nevada conservationist-Senator 454
Newman, Barnett. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 598
Newman, Mrs. Sarah; National consumers league secretary on food packaging . 208, 211
Newspapers; exaggerated accounts of DeBakey external-bypass heart operation; E ... 540
  Handicapped by misleading information from government sources; E 284
  Open court and fair press; dangers of muzzling, as in Arizona judge's order for officials and police not to comment on C. H. Schmid, Jr., murder case. R. Spangler; S 421
  "Other spiral" of inward deterioration not cited in New York merger; E 380
  President Johnson's news manglement and feuding with press corps; E 699
  U.N. correspondents' functions and frustrations. H. Pick; S 648
  Washington correspondents under Johnson pressure; E 349
Newsweek; article cited foundations' lack of initiative 382
  Featured death of God controversy; E 443
  Interview with F.-J. Strauss on defense of Europe; E 506
Nickerson, Eugene H.; seeks New York Democratic gubernatorial nomination 356
Nigeria: coup on a tightrope. V. L. Allen; S .... 143; see also C, 427
Night. I. Feldman; P 277
Night watch, the. C. Wright; P 593
Nimitz, Admiral Chester W.; quoted on U.S. suggestion that poison gas be used in World War II. H. J. Dillon; C 378
Nixon, Richard M.; hawklike position on Vietnam 94, 96
Nkrumah, Kwame. See Ghana
Noerdlinger, Peter D.
  Drug DMSO, banned in U.S., sold abroad by U.S. firms; C .... 506; see also R. Sherrill, 385
Noland, Kenneth. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 370
Norris, Tom
  S. Greenberg mistaken in imputing extortion to U.S. doctors; C .... 698; see also 617
North Atlantic treaty organization (NATO); shaky U.S. position; de Gaulle and F.-J. Strauss prouncements; E 506
Novick, Julius
  Touring the hinterland; "resident professional theatres" throughout U.S.; D .... 626; see also C, 748
PAGE
  Hinterland II: Cleveland, Pittsburgh and points south; "resident professional theatres" 689
  Hinterland III: Pacific coast's "residential professional theatres" 755
Novy Mir (periodical). See Tvardovsky, Alexander
Nuclear energy; H. A. Wallace on control 40
Nuremberg trials, 1946; judgments as basis for civil disobedience 358, 360-361

O

Obscenity. See Pornography
O'Connor, Frank; New York city council president; possible Democratic gubernatorial nominee 356
O'Gorman, Ned
  The bathing place; P 724
Olmsted, Frederick Law; portrait of cofounder of The Nation. R. Fridlingtion; S 10
Ombudsman. Poverty, injustice and the welfare state. Part 1: An ombudsman for the poor? R. A. Cloward and R. M. Elman; S 230
On the war in Vietnam. G. Sonnevi, translated by R. Bly; P 655
Onyatch, Obuya
  State department unaware of Rhodesian office in Washington; C 314
Opera; Metropolitan company's refusal to attend segregated Atlanta luncheon; E 701
Orange, the. A. Kaplan; P 750
Orfila Reynal, Arnaldo; Mexican publisher said to be fired for decision to publish The children of Sanchez, discussed in J. Sommers article of Dec. 27, 1965. M. Tejada; C, opposite 85
Organization of American states (OAS). Santo Domingo: labyrinth of policy for Interamerican peace force in Dominican republic. T. Mockler; S 154
Ostrander, Gilman M.
  Nevada: the rotten borough; S 452
Oswald, Lee Harvey; presumed assassin of President Kennedy. See Warren commission
Oufkir, General Mohammed; involvement of Moroccan interior minister in Ben Barka scandal .... 202 ff., 350 ff.

P

Pacific coast; "residential professional theatres" in. J. Novick; D 755
Packaging. See Food
Pakistan. See Kashmir
Panyarachun, Anand
  Stark article one-sided on Thai-Cambodian relations; C ...... 715; see also 445
Papp, Joseph; on Astor library as winter headquarters for New York Shakespeare festival .... 500 ff.
Parapsychology. See Extrasensory perception
Paris; art exhibitions reviewed by M. Grosser; A .... 531; see also 559
  Cultural crisis as city "falls again"—into this world. P. Zweig; S 557
Pasolini, Paolo; film The gospel according to St. Matthew reviewed by R. Hatch; MP.... 280
Pasolli, Robert
  Reviews of plays
    Antigone (T. Stinchecum adaptation at Judson) 224
    Birdbath (Café La Mama revival) 404
    Chicago (Café La Mama revival) 405
    Deadly game, the 310
    Recluse, the (Café La Mama revival)...... 405
    Red cross 224
    Thank you, Miss Victoria (Café La Mama revival) 404
    This is the rill speaking (Café La Mama revival) 403
    War (Café La Mama revival) 404
    World of Günter Grass, the 597
Passports. See United States—State department
Patman, Representative Wright; investigation of foundations 383-384, 542, 556
Paul VI, Pope. See Catholic church
Peace and pacifism
  Abortive peace feeler from North Vietnam, involving foreign minister Fanfani of Italy; E 1
  American legion post commander R. Hollis ousted for peace-in-Vietnam picketing. D. Ford; S 329
  Doorbells: the politics of activism for peace. W. Meyers; S 581
  El Paso demonstration against Vietnam war brought military imprisonment to 2nd lieutenant H. H. Howe, Jr. By J. Rechy; S 204
  Foundations' lack of initiative in 383, 384
PAGE
  The fruits of protest against war. C. Cohen; S .... 357; see also C, 506 and 523
  Johnson gibes at Fulbright and others mask nervousness over loss of prestige; E 666
  Lincoln and Mark Twain statements against Mexican and Spanish-American wars and "loud little handful" of warmongers; E 2
  Peace candidates in 1966 U.S. elections; E .... 539; see also C, 620
  Pittsburgh Catholic diocese, under Bishop J. J. Wright and liberal priest C. O. Rice, joins religious consensus for peace in Vietnam; E 411
  Post-cold-war delusions of U.S. intellectuals shattered by bombing of North Vietnam. H. S. Hughes; S 7
  Promoting enduring peace's international goodwill seminar. J. Davis; C 168
  The ruble-dollar road to peace. R. C. Garretson; S .... 576; see also C, 634, 666, 730, and 780
  SNCC statement against Vietnam war; ouster of J. Bond from Georgia legislature. H. Shapiro; S 145
  Tower against Vietnam war to be erected by Los Angeles artists; E 143
  Two marine reservists can't support Vietnam war. R. Delgado and P. Hocking; C 442
  Vatican II council: anathema upon war. E. M. Borgese; S 415
  Vietnam protesters likened to Copperheads of Civil War. L. O. Bloomgarden; C 168
  Voters' pledge convention urged to be politically ready by Rep. G. E. Brown, Jr.; E 636
Pearson, Drew; columnist's hot potato of Senator Dodd's campaign funds; E 410
Pell, Senator Claiborne; queries on civilian deaths in Vietnam; E 763 Pennsylvania; upset victory of "loner" M. J. Shapp in contest for Democratic gubernatorial nomination; E 637
Pennsylvania railroad. See Railroads
Percy, Charles H.; prospective opponent of P. H Douglas for Senate taking advantage of Vietnam issue; E 315
Peretz, Martin
Peterson, Mrs. Esther; Assistant Secretary of Labor on food packaging 209, 211, 212, 574
Philadelphia, here I come! Reviewed by H. Clurman; D .... 309; see also 307
Philanthropy. See Foundations
Phonograph records. For reviews, see Boretz, B.
Photography. J. N. Morris; P 307
Pick, Hella
  Reporter on the U.N. beat; functions and frustrations; S 648
Pittman, Arthur
  Praise for H. Clurman review of Slapstick tragedy; C .... 459; see also 309
Pittman, Key; late Nevada Senator's career 454-455
Pittsburgh; Anti-Vietnam demonstration joined by Rev. C. O. Rice, liberal priest; E 411
Pittsburgh playhouse. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 690
Piven, Frances Fox. See Cloward, R. A.
Plays. For reviews, see respective titles and Clurman, H.; Pasolli, R. (off-Broadway); Schroeder, R. J.; and Zimpel, L.
Poem. J. Tagliabue; P 188
Poems
  Adultery. J. Dickey 252
  American dreams. L. Simpson 653
  American parable, an. D. Ignatow 783
  April light. M. Swenson 434
  Are the people infallible? B. Brecht, translated by E. Bentley 461
  Bathing place, the. N. O'Gorman 724
  Bill Watson's report from Canada. W. Stafford 159
  Brief letter. J. Garrigue 597
  Cup, the. N. Price 532
  Elegy for Don Francisco Giner de los Rios. By A. Machado, translated by R. Bly 464
  Farewell picture, a. W. Stafford 278
  February. D. Hoffman 242
  Go. By D. Shapiro 339
  Grace to be said at the supermarket. H. Nemerov 397
  His gift. B. S. Adcock 48
  Information, the. D. Galler 334
  Johnson's cabinet watched by ants. R. Bly 653
  Kaunas 1941. J. Bobrowski (translated by R. and M. Mead) 589
  Land came to an end, the. P. Zweig 370
  Last songs. G. Kinnell 528
  Mid-evening. D. Ray 658
  Night. I. Feldman 277
  Night watch, the. C. Wright 593
  On the war in Vietnam. G. Sonnevi (translated by R. Bly) 655

PAGE

  - Orange, the. A. Kaplan ... 750
  - Photography. J. N. Morris ... 307
  - Poem. J. Tagliabue ... 188
  - Reading a book of poems. R. Mitchell ... 565
  - Robes of the gods (For Stefan Hirsch, 1899-1964). T. Weiss ... 80
  - Sentence, the. A. Saroyan ... 250
  - She doesn't want to bring the tides in any more. R. Whitman ... 429
  - Sightseeing in Provincetown. M. Swenson 20
  - Thoughts at the mausoleum. V. Bokov ... 445
  - Three Presidents: Andrew Jackson, Theodore Roosevelt, John F. Kennedy. By R. Bly ... 108
  - To the rulers (to spare the innocents). M. L. Rosenthal ... 19
  - Variations on a theme by Robert Graves. By G. Stade ... 56
  - What were they like? (questions and answers). D. Levertov ... 781
  - Where is Vietnam? L. Ferlinghetti ... 654
  - Why are you walking? L. Simpson ... 690
  - Winter in Vermont. S. Moss ... 74
- Poetry; of read-in campaign on Vietnam; prefatory note to quoted poems ... 653
  - Trends in U.S., with special reference to L. Simpson. By M. Goldman; S ... 246
  - Poland; foreign trade ... 767 ff.
- Police; "parallel" groups in France discredited by Ben Barka scandal ... 201 ff.
  - Use of decoys in California to enforce anti-homosexuality laws; E ... 572
- Politburo; restored as title for Soviet ruling group ... 517-518
- Polls; guide Johnson on Vietnam; Stanford poll shows U.S. opinion fragmented on war; E ... 347
  - Influence on voters exaggerated. H. Mendelsohn; S ... 670
- Pollution; enforcement of water-pollution legislation left to states ... 6-7
- Popular front; U.S. liberals' role in 1930's movement ... 238 ff.
- Pornography. The politics of smut: California's dirty book caper W Wingfield; S ... 456
  - Supreme court demeans itself in ruling on R. Ginzburg obscenity case; E ... 379; see also C, 556
- Portugal. Salazar's Portugal: fortieth anniversary on thin ice. R. H. Chilcote; S ... 638
  - Target of British oil embargo against Rhodesia by interception of tanker; E ... 477
- Postal savings. See United States—Post office department
- Poverty
  - "Abundance" in perspective: should men compete with machines?; guaranteed income advocated. R. Theobald; S ... 544; see also C, 715
  - Both OEO and Citizens crusade against poverty lack adequate program and strategy; E ... 508
  - First congress of the poor, at Syracuse, N. Y By R A. Cloward and R. M. Elman; S ... 148; see also C, opposite 225
  - Justice Black on right of poor to counsel ... 323
  - Poverty, injustice and the welfare state. Part 1: An ombudsman for the poor? R. A. Cloward and R. M. Elman; S ... 230; Part 2: How rights can be secured; S ... 264
  - Strategy for abolishment by guaranteed income. R. A. Cloward and F. F Piven; S ... 510; see also C, 602, with editors' reply, and C, 762
  - The welfare industry: social work and the life of the poor. R. Lubove; S ... 609; see also C, 762
  - What poverty does to the mind. R. Coles; S ... 746
  - See also United States—Economics
- Powelson, Harvey. See Freedman, M. B.
- Power; companies' threat to wilderness areas L. P. Hudson; S ... 393
  - National policies and Army Corps of Engineers ... 180 ff.
  - Whooping cranes and power failures; blackout of electric power engineers in U.S. By L J. Hollander; S ... 33; see also C, opposite 85 and 169
- Power, Eugene; University of Michigan regent's resignation after conflict-of-interest charges with Xerox directorship; E ... 350
- Powers, Barbara; discussion of book Spy wife, by ex-wife of Francis Gary Powers. By D. Cort; S ... 101
- President's club. See Democratic party
- Price, Nancy
  - The cup; P ... 532
- Price, Robert; deputy mayor of New York on campaign costs ... 771-772, 773
- "Primary structures"; sculpture show at Jewish museum reviewed by Kozloff; A ... 693

PAGE

- Prisons; G.E. computer course for Atlanta inmates; E ... 115
  - In Cuba ... 297
- Protest, the fruits of. 1: Law, speech and disobedience. 2: Passion in clear reason. C. Cohen and D Krech; S ... 357 and 362
- Psychiatry; LSD experiments ... 574 ff.
  - Our disturbed children; who is to care for them? W. Ryan; S ... 775
  - What poverty does to the mind. R. Coles; S ... 746
- Psychical research. See Extrasensory perception
- Pucinski, Representative R. C.; defense of Secretary Rusk on being soft on Communism; E ... 635
- Puerto Rico; election fund act allots campaign money from commonwealth treasury ... 774
- Purnell, Karl H.
  - Peace for Vietnam: the GOP's nettle of success not grasped by hawkish leadership; S ... 94; see also E, 315; C, opposite 141
- Puryear, Paul; educator's militant position on Negroes in Tuskegee, Ala., poltics ... 121 ff.
- Puzzles, crossword. F. W. Lewis. See back pages
  - May dinner honoring F. W. Lewis ... 406, 438, 470, 503, 535

Q

- Quill, Michael J.; leadership of New York city transit strike ... 88

R

- Racism; of WLBT-TV, Jackson, Miss.; E ... 412
  - Southern thaw in; E ... 348
- Radicals. The old Left and the new: emancipation from dogma. H. Zinn; S ... 385; see also C, 506 and 602
  - New leftist D. Harris elected president of Stanford student body; E ... 573
- Radio; governmental pressure on in Vietnam coverage; E ... 1
  - Influence on national politics through use by F. D. Roosevelt ... 671
  - Propaganda of CIA-backed Cuban freedom committee ... 543
- Radosh, Ronald
  - The open door of Henry Wallace in foreign trade and policy; S ... 39
- Railroads; aided by early Nevada Senators ... 453
  - Bay area rapid transit: advance into yesterday through proposed elevateds. M. Harris; S ... 679
  - Futility of firemen's strike; E ... 444
  - Proposed Pennsylvania-New York Central merger raises questions. D. Smith; S ... 184; see also C ... 282; 637
- Rationalism; failure of assumptions in U.S. welfare programs. R. McGee; S ... 174
- Raus, Juri; defendant in E. Heine slander suit acted for CIA; E ... 541
- Ray, A. Joseph, Jr.
  - Distressed over R. G. Sherrill article on firearms control; C ... 410; see also 260
- Ray, David
  - Mid-evening; P ... 658
- Read-in; against Vietnam war; poems quoted ... 653 ff.
- Reading a book of poems. R. Mitchell; P ... 565
- Reagan, Ronald; rightist Republicans' candidate for California Senate nomination 352, 354
  - Won nomination, aided by special factors; E ... 732
- Rechy, John
  - "Conduct unbecoming . . ."; lieutenant on the peace line; 2nd lieutenant H. H. Howe, Jr., in military prison for demonstrating against Vietnam war; S ... 204; see also E, 413; C ... 282 and 346
- Recluse, the (Café La Mama revival). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 405
- Recorded music. For reviews, see Boretz, B.
- Red cross. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 224
- Redlich, Norman
  - Justice Hugo Black at eighty: the common sense of freedom; S ... 322
- Reece, B. Carroll; ex-Congressman's 1954 investigation of foundations ... 383
- Reeves, Thomas C.
  - Foundations in blinders: the cool billions; failure to tackle crucial issues; S ... 381
- Reporter, The; author of article on Vietcong worked in MIT center established by CIA ... 701
- Republican party
  - House group has the draft under fire. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 285

PAGE

  - New stirrings, as on foreign aid and China policy; E ... 444
  - Peace for Vietnam, "nettle of success," not grasped by hawklike leadership. K. H. Purnell; S ... 94; see also E; 315; C, opposite 141
  - Parties in Chaos. 1: The California sweepstakes. G. Hill; S ... 352
  - Private donors to ... 772-773
  - Republicans and the draft; E ... 284
- Research
  - Midas touch in Federal grants to universities. H. S. Reuss; S ... 69; see also C, opposite 197 and 253
  - See also Medicine
- Resnick, Representative Joseph; observed plight of Negro farmers in Mississippi ... 59, 61
- Reuss, Representative Henry S.
  - Research; the Midas touch in Federal grants; S ... 69; see also C, opposite 197 and 253
- Reuther, Victor; opposition to AIFLD and activities of J. Lovestone; E ... 700
- Reuther, Walter; auto workers' head challenged AFL-CIO president G. Meany on walkout from ILO conference; E ... 764
- Revolution; when violence is justified ... 64-65
- Rhine, J. B.; pioneer in extrasensory perception ... 552-553
- Rhodesia; legal problems in British deflection of Beira-bound tanker; E ... 477
  - State department unaware of office in Washington. O. Anyatch; C ... 314
- Ribman, Ronald. Play The journey of the fifth horse reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 661
- Rice, Rev. Charles Owen; liberal anti-war priest as hair shirt for Pittsburgh Bishop Wright; E ... 411
- Richie, Donald
  - C. Kentfield's unfavorable Nov. 22, 1965, evaluation of Tokyo Olympiad based on mutilated film; C, opposite 57
- Rivers and harbors; policies and projects of Army Corps of Engineers ... 180 ff.
- Robes of the gods (for Stefan Hirsch, 1899-1964). T. Weiss; P ... 80
- Rockefeller family; pressure for New York world trade center ... 236 ff.
- Rolling, Irving K.
  - J. Henry fails to credit Marx; C ... 620; see also 480
- Roosevelt, President Franklin D.; political use of radio ... 671
- Roosevelt, Franklin D., Jr.; possible New York Democratic gubernatorial nominee ... 356
- Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel. See Bloch, Emanuel
- Rosenthal, Representative Benjamin S.
  - Congratulations on editorial Bilking the public; bill for Department of consumers; C ... 620; see also E, 476
- Rosenthal, M. L.
  - To the rulers (to spare the innocents); P ... 19
- Rougement, Denis de, and N. Nabokov
  - Congress for cultural freedom free from governmental influence; C ... 698; see also E, 571
- Ruggles, Carl. Recorded music reviewed by B. Boretz; M ... 278
- Rumania; foreign trade ... 767, 769
- Ruppenthal, Karl M.
  - H. P. Dinesman letter on Dec. 27, 1965, article, Air safety, the lethal lapses, cites feasibility of parachutes for braking jets; C, opposite 85
- Rusk, Secretary of State; alleged cool relations with U.N. Ambassador A. J. Goldberg; E ... 668
  - On reasons for U.S. troops in Vietnam ... 95-96
  - Reassurances to South Vietnamese Premier Ky; E ... 113
  - Resignation demanded by Rep. Harsha for trade agreements with Eastern Europe; E ... 635
  - Typifies great American reflex to Communism; E ... 378
  - Uninspired diplomacy; E ... 87
  - See also United States—State department
- Russell, Senator Richard B.; on conditions for U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam; E ... 474
  - On Congress's responsibility for equitable draft ... 287-288
- Ryan, William
  - Our disturbed children: who is to care for them?; S ... 775

S

- Sadusk, Dr. Joseph; testimony of former FDA official on overtouted drug DMSO ... 425 ff.; see also C, 683
- Safer, Morley; report of Defense official A. Sylvester's upbeat-news-only talk to reporters in Vietnam; E ... 668
- Safety. See Automobiles

Index

PAGE

Sahara; afforestation of. Mrs. H. Laski; C, opposite 141
St. Louis, Missouri; regional conference on China 259-260
Salandria, Vincent J.; criticism of Warren report 740
Salazar, António de Oliveira. See Portugal
Sale, J. Kirk
  And now Nkrumah: the generals and the future of Africa; S .... 317; see also C, 506
San Francisco; Group theatre's vicissitudes and dissolution .... 583 ff.
  See also California
San Francisco mime troupe; play A minstrel show, or civil rights in a cracker barrel, reviewed by L. Zimpel; D 276
Sandock, Jules
  Thwarted in circulating Freedom house petition, supporting U.S. Vietnam commitment, at New school for social research; C 100
SANE: "voters' pledge" campaign on Vietnam; E .... 254; see also 581
Santo Domingo. See Dominican republic
Saroyan, Aram
  The sentence; P 250
Sartre, Jean-Paul. Play The condemned of Altona reviewed by H. Clurman; D 222
Saunders, William B.
  Praise for R. C. Garretson's The ruble-dollar road to peace; C .... 666; see also 576; C, 780
Sayeki, Shinko
  Buddhists' actions, as in Vietnam, based on conscience, not clear to Americans; C 492
Schill, Anthony J.
  D. Smith unfair to railroads; C .... 314; with Smith reply; see also 184
Schneider, John A.; new CBS chief off to bad start in refusing to telecast Kennan testimony at Fulbright hearings; E 225
Schmid, C. H., Jr. See Arizona
Schoenberg, Arnold; music at Carnegie Hall by Pittsburgh symphony 111
Schoenman, Theodore
  Clearing discernible in jungle of Chinese-U.S. relations; C .... 346; see also Spector-Moore article, 256
Schroeder, R. J.
  Review of plays
    Leonce and Lena 26
Schuman, Frederick L.
  Praise for and caveat on H. S. Kariel's The ideological vacuum; C .... 570; see also 449
Schuyler, George S.; Negro on advisory board of Free Cuba committee; frequent Birch speaker 543-544
Schwartz, William C.
  Social workers defended from aspersions in Cloward-Piven and R. Lubove articles; C .... 762; see also 510 and 609
Science; destructive side to lavish Federal research grants to U.S. universities 76-77
  ESP: science or delusion? D. Cohen; S 550
  In China 258
Sculpture. For reviews, see Kozloff, M.
Seattle repertory theatre. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 758
Segrest, Marvin; accused in murder of S. Younge, Jr., Tuskegee civil-rights activist 119
Seldes, Gilbert
  Lesson of G.M.'s come-uppance for snooping on R. Nader; C 378
Selective service system. See United States—Defense, national Sennott, Roger S.
  Address needed to send aid to displaced sharecroppers; C .... 168; see also 59
Sentence, the. A. Saroyan; P 250
Serjeant Musgrave's dance. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 372
Sex; academic permissiveness contrasted with FBI's Grundyism, as in dismissal of agent T. F. Carter; E 541
  UCLA Law Review report on police use of decoys in homosexual-law enforcement; E 572
Shahn, Ezra
  Law and Vietnam protesters in C. Cohen article; C .... 506; see also 357
Shakespeare wallah. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 406
Shapiro, David
  Go; P 339
Shapiro, Herbert
  Julian Bond, Georgia's "uppity" Negro legislator; S 145
Shapp, Milton J.; "loner's" upset victory for Pennsylvania Democratic gubernatorial nomination; E 637
Shapurian, A. M.
  Shah's justice to Iranian political prisoners; C .... 634; see also C, 570

PAGE

Shastri, Lal Bahadur; late Indian prime minister's reconciliation with Pakistan at Tashkent; E 86
She doesn't want to bring the tides in any more. R. Whitman; P 429
Shepard, Sam. Play Chicago (Café La Mama revival) reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 405
  Play Red cross reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 224
Sheppard, Dr. Sam; murder conviction reversed for excessive pre-trial publicity 423
Sherman, J. E.
  Investigation of California firearms factory stopped; C .... 474; see also 260
Sherrill, Robert G.
  Administration spokesman on Vietnam mentioned in Dec. 6, 1965, article, The consensus marchers, was Chester Cooper, not Sherman Cooper. By F. L. Marx; C, opposite 29
  Army Corps of Engineers: the pork-barrel soldiers; S 180
  The big shoot: regulatory legislation on firearms thwarted by National rifle association; S .... 260; see also C, 410 and 474
  Foundation pipe lines: the beneficent CIA; S 542
  The obsolete Negro; displacement by machinery in Southern agriculture; S .... 59; see also C 168
  Razz-ma-tazz in the drug industry; overwhelming promotion of harmful DMSO for arthritis, burns, etc.; S .... 425; see also C, 506 and 666, with Sherrill reply
  Republican House group has the draft under fire; S 285
  Washington wire: cold eye on Johnson at year's end; S 4
  White House conference on civil rights: bubble of unreality; S 734
Shipping industry. See Merchant marine
Shriver, Sargent; OEO head heckled by Citizens crusade against poverty 508
Siekevitz, Philip
  Criticism of H. S. Reuss on Research: the Midas touch; C, with Reuss reply, opposite 197; see also 69
Sightseeing in Provincetown. M. Swenson; P 20
Sihanouk, Prince Norodom
  Thanks for Nov. 29, 1965, editorial on Cambodia; C, opposite 57
  See also Cambodia
Sikes, Representative Robert; activity against firearms regulation 262-263
Silver; legislation on sponsored by Nevada Senators 454-455
Simon, Anne Langman
  TV's ailment dramatized by CBS's failure to televise Fulbright hearings; C, opposite 253; see also E, 225
Simpson, Louis
  American dreams; P 653
  Why are you walking?; P 690
Sinyavsky-Daniel trial. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Books section of Index
Siskin, Edgar E.; rabbi's exceptions to Senator Douglas's rabid anti-Communism 315
Slapstick tragedy (The mutilated and gnadiges Fraulein). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D .... 309; see also C, 459
Sleeping car murder, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 406
Smith, Desmond
  AT&T: the folksy octopus; S 16
  Breakfast with Sukarno; western misconceptions of Indonesia and its president; S 553
  Pennsylvania-New York Central merger: one big happy railroad; S .... 184; see also 637 and C 314
  World trade center: Manhattan's tower of Babel; S 235
Smith, Sergeant George E. See Ernst, H. W.
Smith act; ban on teaching overthrow of government; Justice Black's opposition to 324, 325
Smut. See Pornography
SNCC. See Negroes—Civil rights
Snooping industry; targets R. Nader (of General motors) and H. S. Hughes (of State department); E .... 316; E .... 412; see also C, 378; 491, 574
Sobell. Helen
  Request for support of petition for hearing of husband, Morton; C, opposite 225
Sobler, Benedict R.
  Fallacies in Zinn article on Left; C .... 602; see also 385
Social workers; pressures on and turnover among 232
  Private-agency traditions 266
  Target of resentment of poor .... 148 ff.

PAGE

  The welfare industry: social work and the life of the poor. R. Lubove; S .... 609; see also C, 762
Sonnevi, Goran
  On the war in Vietnam; P (translated by R. Bly) 655
South, U.S.; slow implementation of civil-rights laws 289-290
  Thaw in racism; E 348
Southwest, U.S.; new political wind from Mexican-Americans. J. W. Moore and R. Guzman; S 645
South Africa, Republic of; and South West Africa's status .... 389 ff.
  Apartheid fought by Afrikaner A. Fischer. By T. Land; S 650
  Black African nations' prodding for British crusade against in U.N.; E 477
  Dubious reasons for U.S. to keep trade and other "dialogue" open; E 316
South West Africa: the World Court's ticklish case. Nation staff; S 389
Southam, Dr. Chester. See Medicine
Southern Christian leadership conference. See Negroes—Civil rights
Space; U.S. program endangered by Vietnam war; E 603
Spain; hopes for NATO membership and Gibraltar settlement; E 506
  Hunt for missing U.S. H-bomb; E .... 141; E 283
  No homage allowed!; suppression of gathering to honor late loyalist poet A. Machado. Anonymous article .... 462; see also box on 460
Spangler, Raymond
  Open court and fair press; dangers of muzzling, as in Arizona judge's order for officials and police not to comment on C. H. Schmid, Jr., murder case; S 421
Spector, Stanley, and J. H. Moore
  The Dragon: China myths and realities—publicized in Chicago U. conference; S .... 256; see also C, 314, 346, and 474
Spender, Stephen, et al.
  Encounter free from CIA taint; C .... 698; see also E, 571
Speno, Edward J.; New York state senator, sponsor of safety-car project 490, 491
Spiegel, Der; published suppressed protest against U.S. in Vietnam by West German writers and teachers; E 87
Spiker, LaRue
  A blanket over homicide; killing of Maine Indian by white man; S 483
Spy who came in from the cold, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 84
Stade, George
  Variations on a theme by Robert Graves; P 56
Stafford, Ellen
  Canadian justice: the ordeal of Steven Truscott, youthful defendant in rape-murder case; S 614
Stafford, William
  Bill Watson's report from Canada; P 159
  A farewell picture; P 278
Stalinism; tentative resurgence at Moscow party congress .... 517 ff.
Stark, Gail D.
  Cambodia beset; S .... 445; see also C, 715
States, U.S.; Medicare role 617-618
  Residency requirements for welfare recipients 230-231, 232
Stella, Joseph. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 370
Stephenson, Robert C.
  Objection to J. Novick's use of "bourgeois"; C .... 748; see also 626
Stern, Philip M.; Harper's article on foundations' shortcomings 381-382
Stone, Edward Durell; architect of Albany campus, state university of New York 629-630
Stony Brook, Long Island, campus, state university of New York. Architecture reviewed by E. Galantay; S 789 Storrow, James J.
  Critique of L. J. Hollander article The big blackout; C, with Hollander reply, opposite 85; see also 33
Storrow, James J., Jr.
  New publisher's statement to readers of The Nation 4
Stratton, Representative Samuel S.; possible New York gubernatorial nominee 356
Strauss. Franz-Josef; on defense of Europe by Europeans rather than Americans; E 506
Strikes. See Labor; Education
Student non-violent coordinating committee (SNCC). See Negroes—Civil rights
Students for a democratic society (SDS); unideological compared with Left groups of 1930's 386, 387, 388
Suharto, General; transfer of Indonesian power to; E 346
Sukarno, President. See Indonesia

PAGE
Sullivan, Mark; on railroads' power to fix freight rates ... 184
Sulzberger, C. L.; New York Times column on Vietnam strongly pro-administration; E ... 349
Sunset. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 662
Supermarkets. See Food
Svede, E. M.
  Editorial on J. E. Hoover succession insulting; C ... 410; see also 254
Sweet Charity. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 248
Swenson, May
  April light; P ... 434
  Sightseeing in Provincetown; P ... 20
  Voting age should be lowered to 18; C ... 620; see also C, 762
Sylvester, Assistant Secretary Arthur. See United States—Defense, national Syracuse, N. Y.; site of first national congress of poor people ... 148 ff.

T

Tagliabue, John Poem; P ... 188
Taos. See Indians, U.S.
Tariffs; reduction killed by Representative W. D. Mills; trade agreements with Eastern Europe denounced by Representative W. H. Harsha; E ... 635
Tashkent conference; Soviet efforts brought India and Pakistan together on Kashmir; E ... 86
Taxes; exempt or near-exempt institutions aggravate New York city's financial plight; E ... 477
  See also United States—Economics
Taylor, Paul; agriculture authority on land monopolists' opposition to agricultural unions ... 154
Tejada, M.
  A. Orfila Reynal's firing as head of Mexican publishing firm attributed to decision to publish The children of Sanchez, discussed in J. Sommers article of Dec. 27, 1965; C, opposite 85
Telephones; abusive calls received by Vietnam servicemen's families; E ... 445; see also E, 538
Television
  CBS image tarnished by failure to telecast Kennan testimony in Fulbright hearings; E ... 225; see also C, opposite 253
  Exaggerated accounts of DeBakey external-bypass heart operation; E ... 540
  Expensive political-advertising medium ... 771
  Governmental pressure on in Vietnam coverage; E ... 1
  Juxtaposition of Dominican garbage murder and detergent ad. S. Gillers; C ... 168
  Racism and overcommercialization charged against WLBT-TV, Jackson, Miss.; E ... 412
  Still in blacklist era, as shown in cancellation of J. Muir interview; E ... 30
  TV: no place for satire; program Parma Place on Cleveland's WJW canceled. R. Fischer; S ... 470
Teller, Edward; advocate of costly anti-missile missile system ... 114
TELPAK: AT&T's rival to Western Union's TELEX service ... 17-18
10th victim, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 27
Texas; labor and political ferment among Mexican-Americans ... 645, 647
  Johnson-Connally axis; E ... 605
  Law against gathering pre-trial news; fraud conviction of B. S. Estes reversed by Supreme court because trial was televised ... 421 ff.
  Mass registration of new voters following repeal of poll tax, despite sabotage by Governor Connally; E ... 381
Thailand; aggression against Cambodia ... 446-447; see also C, 715
  New U.S. war theatre; E ... 29; E ... 699
Thank you, Miss Victoria (Café La Mama revival). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 404
Theatre
  Astor library to be remodeled for New York Shakespeare festival. E. Galantay; S ... 500
  Dearth of new plays in Paris ... 559
  Festivity and ritual: reflections on true theatre; Lincoln center, ANTA, and Soviet examples. H. Clurman; D ... 583
  New York critics, specifically S. Kauffmann, as common scolds. H. Junker; D ... 307; see also C, 474
  Touring the hinterland; "resident professional theatres" throughout U.S. By J. Novick; D ... 626, 689, 755; see also C, 748
  For reviews of plays, see respective titles and Clurman, H.; Pasolli, R. (off-Broadway); Schroeder, R. J.; Zimpel, L.

PAGE
Theobald, Robert
  "Abundance" in perspective: should men compete with machines?; guaranteed income advocated; S ... 544; see also C, 715
"Theologians"; of cold war. See Cold war
Theology. See God
Thiesenhusen, William C.
  Enemies of promise in Latin-American land reform; S ... 90
This is the rill speaking (Café La Mama revival). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 403
Thompson, Robert G.; Communist denied burial in Arlington cemetery; E ... 171
Thoughts at the mausoleum. V. Bokov; P ... 445
Three Presidents: Andrew Jackson, Theodore Roosevelt, John F. Kennedy. By R. Bly; P ... 108
Time; Featured death of God controversy; E ... 443
  U.S. Vietnam bastion article confirms Asian suspicions. G. E. Martin, M.D.; C, opposite 113
To the rulers (to spare the innocents). M. L. Rosenthal; P ... 19
"Total Energy"; efficient turbine-based generating system used by natural-gas industry ... 35-36
Trade; H. A. Wallace's open door policy. R. Radosh; S ... 39
  Japan's with China discouraged by U.S. ... 479-480, 482
  The ruble-dollar road to peace. R. C. Garretson; S ... 576; see also C, 634, 666, 730, and 780
  Secondary to capital investment for U.S. By J. Henry; S ... 480
  Tariff agreements with Communist Eastern Europe bring attack on Secretary Rusk by Rep. Harsha; E ... 635
  Traditional "Yankee trader" shut off from Communist markets, with Fiat getting big Soviet car-construction deal; E ... 636
  We can trade with the Communists. H. J. Berman; S ... 766
Transportation. See Railroads
Trexler, Richard C.; embattled historian at Texas Western college, El Paso; supported Vietnam peace rally ... 205, 206-207
Truman, President Harry S.; dismissal of H. A. Wallace as Commerce Secretary following conciliatory speech on Soviet Union ... 40-41
  Precedents for Vietnam in Korean war 212-213
Truscott, Steven; ordeal of youthful defendant in Canadian rape-murder case; E. Stafford; S ... 614
Tuskegee. See Alabama
Tvardovsky, Alexander; Novy Mir editor target of Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; E ... 225

U

Unemployment; must change to economic security for Negroes ... 291-292
  See also Poverty
Ungerleider, J. Thomas, and D. D. Fisher
  LSD: research and joy ride; S ... 574
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  And the United States
    Continued U.S. air surveillance revealed by loss of missile-carrying SAC bomber over Spain; E ... 283
    ESP experiments exaggerated ... 550, 551
    Goldwater proposal for alliance against Asian Communists; E ... 478
    H. A. Wallace speech on friendly competition contrary to Truman policy 40-41
    J. K. Galbraith speech to ADA advocating coexistence; E ... 538
    Limitations of 1962 détente ... 8-9
    New dogma-free U.S. Left not committed to U.S.S.R. ... 386-387
    Policy after the cold war. C. O. Lerche, Jr.; S ... 673
    The ruble-dollar road to peace. R. C. Garretson; S ... 576; see also C, 634, 666, 730, and 780
    Similarities in economic systems ... 176
    Trade stultified by U.S. policy, with Fiat winning big car-construction deal; E ... 636
    U.S. liberals' attitudes toward since mid-1930's ... 238 ff.
    We can trade with the Communists. H. J. Berman; S ... 766
  Co-operation needed to effect U.N. action in Vietnam negotiations; E ... 226; 227 ff.
  End of old rivalry with Britain in Asia; reaps credit for Tashkent peacemaking between India and Pakistan while U.S. loses credit in Vietnam; E ... 86
  Kremlin diplomacy; first year for the new team. I. Deutscher; S ... 32
  Moscow congress: the old party and the young people. I. Deutscher; S ... 517

PAGE
  Trading relations with other Communist states. H. J. Berman; S ... 766
  23rd congress greeted with probable hoax poem by V. Bokov; E ... 445
  Types of true theatre in. H. Clurman; D ... 585
  Western European Communist papers' condemnation of Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; E ... 225
United Nations
  AFL-CIO withdrawal from ILO conference because of pique at election of Pole as presiding officer; E ... 764
  Duty to intervene in Vietnam to effect settlement; E ... 226
  Mandatory capacity in South West Africa, with status before World Court ... 389 ff.
  North Vietnam's rejection of mediation ... 170
  Reporter on the U.N. beat; functions and frustrations. H. Pick; S ... 648
  Role defended by Ambassador A. J. Goldberg against implied disparagement by D. Acheson; E ... 668
  Vietnam: what role for the U.N.? The strategy of a truce. R. J. Leng; S ... 227. The tactics of a truce. J. D. Forbes; S ... 229
  Vietnam issue at Security Council. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E ... 169
United States
  And the Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  Agency for international development
    AID for whom in South Vietnam?; E ... 198
    Guarantees to U.S. business in South Vietnam; E ... 197
  Agriculture department
    Agriculture stabilization and conservation service committee elcetions rigged against Negro sharecroppers ... 60-61
    Sides with Southern plantation owners against Negro sharecroppers ... 736
  Central intelligence agency (CIA)
    And U-2 pilot F. G. Powers. By D. Cort; S ... 101
    Beneficence to right-wing propagandist foundations. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 542
    Charged with implication in Ben Barka kidnaping ... 202-203, 351-352
    Charged with supporting dissident Cambodian forces ... 448
    Claim to being above law, as in E. Heine slander suit; E ... 541
  Guatemalan preparations for Bay of Pigs invasion uncovered by Nation and New York Times; E ... 730
  Indirect subsidy of magazine Encounter, Congress for cultural freedom, etc.; E ... 571; E ... 701; see also denials, C, 698
    Link with AFL-CIO charged by V. Reuther; E ... 700
    New York Times series on points up anomalous position vis-à-vis Congress; E ... 570
    Opposed to Vietnam settlement; E ... 114
  Commerce department
    Expanded export markets sought by Secretaries Hoover and Wallace ... 39-40
    Maritime administration's attempt to institute new merchant-marine policy. H. Junker; S ... 71
  Congress
    Abdication to Executive in foreign affairs 170
    Civil-rights groups next on HUAC's list. R. L. Criley; C ... 28
    Foundations probed by House ... 383-384, 542, 556
    Fulbright hearings on Vietnam; E ... 225; E ... 254; see also C, opposite 253
    High costs of campaigning; Senators' economic background ... 770
    House may investigate flying saucers; E ... 413
    Influence of Army Corps of Engineers. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 180
    Nevada as rotten borough. G. M. Ostrander; S ... 452
    Republican House group has the draft under fire. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 285
    Senate ethics committee reluctant to investigate D. Pearson's financial charges against Senator Dodd; E ... 410
    Should have supervisory power over CIA; E ... 570
    Swing to moderation on Vietnam; E ... 507
    Timid political will on foreign policy. E. A. Kolodziej; S ... 292
    Trade agreements with Eastern Europe attacked and defended; tariff reduction killed; E ... 635
    Truth in packaging bill ... 208 ff.
  Constitution
    Justice H. L. Black on ... 322 ff.; see also C, 410
    May uphold civil disobedience and mass protest. C. Cohen; S ... 357

PAGE

- Defense, national
  - A. Sylvester's public affairs office as pro-U.S. propaganda shop; E 668
  - Army Corps of Engineers: the pork-barrel soldiers. R. G. Sherrill; S 180
  - Army holds G. E. Smith and C. E. McClure, servicemen who criticized Vietnam war when released by Vietcong. H. W. Ernst; S .... 294; see also E, 509
  - Budget increase, as in missiles and bombers 4-5
  - Civil-defense economies in New York city; E 509
  - Court-martial and conviction of 2nd lieutenant H. H. Howe, Jr., for demonstrating against Vietnam war. J. Rechy; S ...... 204; see also C, 282 and 346; E, 413
  - Department's low estimate of civilian deaths in Vietnam; E 763
  - Deputy assistant secretary H. J. Kuss as chief U.S. arms salesman to foreign governments; E 85
  - Draft as selective death sentence; unfairness of deferment tests; E 604
  - The draft under fire by Republican House group. R. G. Sherrill; S 285
  - General L. Hershey's reply to C. Cohen article of Dec. 27, 1965, Punishment by conscription: General Hershey's big stick, with editors' rejoinder; C, opposite 1; see also C. W. Griffin, Jr.; C, opposite 113
  - Gets lion's share of 1967 budget; E 141
  - "Lost report" of Pentagon on draft; E 142
  - McNamara trial balloon on Selective service; E 667
  - Merchant marine's role 72-73
  - Most purchases noncompetitive; E 59
  - Republicans and the draft; E 284
  - $3-billion annual loss from defective purchases; E 476
- Economics
  - "Abundance" in perspective: should men compete with machines?; guaranteed income advocated. R. Theobald; S 544
  - Administration's hypocrisy on wage guidelines in statement after New York transit-strike settlement; E 113
  - Dubious efficacy of poverty program under Johnson 6
  - Inflationary 1967 budget with something for everyone, especially the military; E 141
  - Projected effects of costly Vietnam war; E 478
  - Strategy to end poverty through guaranteed income. R. A. Cloward and F. F. Piven; S 510
  - Welfare in affluent society: the mirage of rationalism underlying programs. R. McGee; S 174
  - Vested interests in low-wage Negro labor pool 298
  - See also Poverty
- Executive branch
  - Makes Congress a rubber stamp in foreign policy. E. A. Kolodziej; S 292
  - Should share CIA control with Congress; E 570
- Federal communications commission
  - Inquiry on AT&T. D. Smith; S 16
  - Should protect broadcasters against coercion, as in Vietnam coverage; E 2
- Federal power commission
  - License to Con Edison of New York to build Storm King storage project revoked by court 396
- Federal reserve board
  - Raised price of credit just after Humphrey's assurances on inflation 4
- Finances
  - Foundations' tax-exempt status 382, 383, 384
  - Johnson gimmick of selling part interests in government-owned loans to private investors to reduce budget deficit; E 605
- Foreign policy
  - After the cold war. C. O. Lerche, Jr.; S 673
  - Analogies and images: thoughtways of. W. F. Whyte; S 641
  - Basic role of capital investment in underdeveloped regions such as southeast Asia. J. Henry; S .... 480; see also C, 620
  - CIA and; E 570
  - Congress's timid political will on. E. A. Kolodziej; S 292
  - Continues great American reflex to Communism; E 378
  - Example of ideological vacuum between private acts and public goals. H. S. Kariel; S 449

PAGE

  - Fulbright phrase "the arrogance of power" justified; E 602
  - J. K. Galbraith speech to ADA advocating coexistence; E 538
  - Mired by cold-war "theologians"; E 506
  - No freedom of choice in Southeast Asia with purchased allies; E 113
  - Pious self-deception on Vietnam and fascist regimes in Johnson's State of the Union message; E 85
  - Republican Ripon society urges less hostile attitude toward China; E 444
  - Setting the moral equation, as in Vietnam. H. Zinn; S 64
  - Slated to involve Communist China in shooting war; E 253
  - Slight thaw toward Communist China; E 700
  - War with Communist China as top-priority issue; E 199
  - See also Vietnam
- Foreign relations
  - With Brazil; backing of anti-democratic Castelo Branco regime 10
  - With Cambodia. G. D. Stark; S ...... 445; see also E, 699; C, 715
  - With Communist China provide reasons for it to fear us; E 57
  - With Dominican republic; intervention outraged U.S. intellectuals 9
  - With Dominican republic; labyrinth of policy in Interamerican peace force. T. Mockler; S 154
  - With Dominican republic; unfinished revolution in. S. Lens; S 520
  - With Indonesia; persistent coolness even after elimination of Communists; E 171
  - With Japan endangered by tactless opposition to China trade; A. Axelbank; S 479
  - With Latin America one-sided; sickness of Alliance for Progress; E 604
  - With Latin America subordinate reform to power politics 91-92
  - With South Africa; dubious reasons for keeping trade and other "dialogue"; E 316
  - With Thailand, new theatre of war; E .... 10; E 699
- Health, Education and welfare department
  - Food and drug administration relaxed rules in face of overwhelming promotion of harmful drug DMSO. R. G. Sherrill; S 425
  - Social security and medicare .... 617 ff.
  - Social security system's overwhelming share of U.S. welfare expenditures 611
- Interior department
  - Built-in threats to preserved lands severed from Forest service control by 1964 wilderness act. L. P. Hudson; S 393
  - Senate bill to change to Department of National Resources must buck Army Corps of Engineers. R. G. Sherrill; S 180
- Interstate commerce commission
  - Hearings on Pennsylvania-New York Central merger 185
- Justice department
  - Encourages harassment of DuBois clubs; E 317
  - FBI's sexual-conduct surveillance of agents, stricter than colleges' of students, brings dismissal of T. F. Carter; E 541
  - Non-enforcement of civil-rights laws attributed to influence of J. E. Hoover.... 736
  - Senate bill would keep J. E. Hoover from hand-picking successor as FBI director; E .... 254; see also C, 410
  - Soft approach on antitrust suits and voter registration 4, 6
- Labor department
  - No constructive action during New York city transit strike; E 113
- National aeronautics and space administration (NASA)
  - Costly failures from defetcive material; E 476
- Office of economic opportunity
  - Ignored congress of poor at Syracuse, N. Y. 149, 151
  - Lacks adequate program and strategy; E 508
  - Promoting programs of legal services for the poor 267
- Office of emergency planning
  - F. Bryant, segregationist and former governor of Florida, appointed director by friend President Johnson; E 380
- Post office department
  - End to postal savings; E 349
- State department
  - Begrudged diplomats: foreign service officials as stepsons of Foggy Bottom. H. S. Villard; S 36

PAGE

  - Passport regulation on travel to Cuba overruled by Judge J. C. Zavatt; E 508
  - Rejection of alleged peace feelers from North Vietnam; E 1
  - Slight thaw in Chinese policy; E 700
  - Snooping on H. S. Hughes overseas; E 412
  - "Theologians" of cold war, from Rusk down, lack flexibility to cope with issues of Vietnam, NATO, etc.; E 506
  - Unaware of Rhodesian office in Washington. O. Onyatch; C 314
- Supreme court
  - Demeans itself in ruling on Ginzburg obscenity case; E .... 379; see also C, 556
  - Historic free-speech rulings 358
  - Justice Black at eighty: the common sense of freedom. N. Redlich; S 322
  - Reversal of Texas conviction of B. S. Estes because trial had been televised 422-423
- Treasury department
  - Internal revenue service and expense accounts; E 765
- Unruh, Jesse; California politician's Democratic faction opposed to Governor Brown.. 354
- USCO; film Hubbub reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 139
- Utt, Representative James B.; defended John Birch society 458

V

- van Itallie, Jean-Claude. Play War (Café La Lama revival) reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 404
- Variations on a theme by Robert Graves. By G. Stade; P 56
- Vatican II council. See Catholic church
- Ventura county. See California
- Vernon, Raymond; former State department official on Latin-American resentment of U.S. policies 604
- Vicky; tribute to late cartoonist; E 348
- Vietnam
  - Abortive peace feeler from north, involving foreign minister Fanfani of Italy; E 1
  - Abusive phone calls received by servicemen's families in U.S.; E .... 445; see also C, 538
  - Air war heats up; danger of Chinese retaliation; E 572
  - Annual civilian dead by U.S. action—100,000 vs. 200; E 763
  - Antiwar resolutions at White House conference on civil rights 734-735
  - Behind deterioration of Soviet relations with U.S. and China. I. Deutscher; S 32
  - Buddhists' actions based on conscience, not clear to Americans. S. Sayeki; C 492
  - Business investments of Americans in South guaranteed by AID; E 197
  - Conditions in Johnson's "unconditional" peace offensive; E 57
  - Conflagration spreads to Thailand and Cambodia; E 698
  - Confusion on war in Washington; all eyes on Johnson .... 4 ff.
  - Cuban sentiment on war 327
  - Democratic party-induced dilemma alienates former supporter. W. Gibson; C 492
  - Demonstrating against war brings military imprisonment to 2nd lieutenant H. H. Howe, Jr. By J. Rechy; S .... 204; see also E, 143 and 509
  - Doorbells: the politics of activism in U.S. against war. W. Meyers; S 581
  - Escalation of war lost Johnson his national consensus; E 282
  - Everything but peace in Johnson-Ky declaration of Honolulu; E 197
  - Films from the Vietcong. P. Gessner; MP 110
  - French condemnation of U.S. conduct of war; E 225
  - French eyes on Vietnam: America's colony in hell. A. Werth; S 702
  - French reactions to resumption of U.S. bombings of North 201
  - Fulbright Senate hearings on war transformed U.S. political situation; E 254
  - Fulbright term "the arrogance of power" justified for U.S. actions; E 602
  - Gangrene of war; French writers on. A. Werth; S 414
  - H. H. Humphrey down the line on in speeches to ADA and AP; E 539
  - High cost of war to U.S.; E 478
  - History of misleading U.S. official information on; E 284
  - Issue at U.N. Security Council. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 169
  - Johnson "abjectives" in. C. Chayette; C 730
  - Johnson's hopes of unifying U.S. by resumption of bombing of North; E 169

Index

PAGE

  Lynd-Hayden-Aptheker "private diplomacy" trip to North served U.S. and cause of peace; E ... 87
  McNamara pronouncements on war impossible to satirize; E ... 509
  Munich pacts cited as argument against U.S. withdrawal ... 65-67, 641-642
  News on mangled by White House; E ... 699
  Parents of dead U.S. troops protest inglorious cause; E ... 475
  Peace movement in U.S. urged by Rep. G. E. Brown, Jr., to be ready poltically; E ... 636
  Peace stand would help U.S. Republicans. K. H. Purnell; S ... 94; see also C, opposite 141; E, 315
  People beneath the war in South; no identification with military government. R. R. Coffey; S ... 61
  Poetry of read-in campaign in U.S. against war ... 653
  Protests by Michigan students and various U.S. universities' professors bring legal and philosophical questions on civil disobedience. C. Cohen and D. Krech; S ... 357 and 362; see also C, 506 and 523
  Relations with Cambodia ... 446 ff.
  Religious consensus for peace joined by Pittsburgh Catholic diocese; E ... 411
  Role of U.S. capital investments in war. J. Henry; S ... 480
  Secondary to Communist Chinese confrontation as U.S. policy issue; E ... 199
  Setting the moral equation of war. H. Zinn; S ... 64; see also C, opposite 141
  Shadow of war cast on Moscow Communist congress ... 519-520
  Stanford poll shows U.S. public reaction fragmented; E ... 347
  "Stopper" of war critics' lack of easy alternative to U.S. policy; duty of U.N. to intervene; E ... 226
  Swing to moderation in U.S. Congress; E ... 507
  Tardiness of Fulbright hearings on war ... 292, 294
  Thrust of Johnson policy and its dubious assumptions; E ... 314
  Tower against war to be erected by Los Angeles artists; E ... 143
  Two G.I.'s in limbo; former Vietcong-held servicemen G. E. Smith and C. E. McClure, critical of Vietnam war, now held in Okinawa by Army. H. W. Ernst; S ... 294; see also E, 509
  Two U.S. marine reservists can't support war. D. Delgado and P. Hocking; C ... 442
  Uncle Sam's head in noose; E ... 113
  Unseating of Georgia Negro legislator J. Bond for statement on war ... 145 ff.
  U.S. administration's pressure on Washington newsmen who disagree with policy; E ... 349
  U.S. as would-be colonial conqueror. O. Lattimore; S ... 212
  U.S. Catholic objectors to war ... 420-421
  U.S. Defense official A. Sylvester expects only favorable news by reporters; E ... 668
  U.S. Goliath's dilemma; E ... 474
  U.S. intellectuals' disillusion with administration after bombing of north. H. S. Hughes; S ... 7
  U.S. investment in ... 644
  U.S. loses good will in Asia by war; E ... 86
  U.S. policy brings Europeans' distrust ... 507
  U.S. shipping shortage ... 73
  Usefulness of R. F. Kennedy initiative on negotiation; E ... 253
  Vietnam: what role for the U.N.? The strategy of a truce. R. J. Leng; E ... 227. The tactics of a truce. J. D. Forbes; S ... 229
  War bringing U.S. inflation and undermining Johnson prestige; E ... 666
  War contrasted with dancing revelry of Johnson set in Washington; E ... 637
  War fans at Atlanta rally; E ... 227
  War legal, according to ABA, making truth a casualty. H. B. Hester; C ... 282
  War protesters in U.S. likened to Copperheads of Civil War. L. O. Bloomgarden; C ... 168
  War vs. space program in U.S.; E ... 603
  Was Ky's counterrevolution against Buddhists a surprise for world-trotting Ambassador Lodge and U.S. intelligence?; E ... 635
  West German and Japanese protests on U.S. course; E ... 86
Villard, Henry S.
  Begrudged diplomats: foreign service officials as the stepsons of Foggy Bottom; S ... 36
Violence; more American tradition than nonviolence; E ... 765
  Problem of use in Vietnam war. H. Zinn; S ... 64; see also C, opposite 141
Viva Maria. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 27
Voting; age should be lowered to 18. R. Swerdlin; C ... 620; see also C, 762
  Limitations in securing Negro civil rights 388
  Mass registration of new voters following repeal of Texas poll tax, despite sabotage by Governor Connally; E ... 381

W

Wages; administration's hypocrisy on guidelines in statement on New York transit-strike settlement; E ... 113
  AFL-CIO's subservience to administration guidelines. B. J. Widick; C, opposite 169
Wagner, Robert F.; leader of New York state Democratic faction ... 355 ff.
Wait a minim! Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 374
Walker, Edwin A.; L. H. Oswald's alleged attempted assassination of rightist ex-general ... 744-745
Wall Street journal; survey of expense-account living; E ... 765
Wallace, George and Lurleen. See Alabama
Wallace, Henry A.; open door policy in trade and diplomacy. R. Radosh; S ... 39
Walsh, Richard; Syracuse mayor's tough attitude toward welfare recipients ... 150, 151
War (Café La Mama revival). Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 404
Warren, Frank A., III
  Liberalism: opportunity from impasse; S ... 238
Warren commission report on assassination of President Kennedy. I: Some unanswered questions. II: Testimony of the eyewitnesses. F. J. Cook; S ... 705 and 737
Washington, Booker T.; conservative founder of Tuskegee institute ... 118, 122
Washington state; Indians' fish-in for fishing rights joined by Negro D. Gregory. By R. C. Lee; S ... 487
Water; national policies and Army Corps of Engineers ... 180 ff.
  Resources of wilderness areas eyed by power companies. L. P. Hudson; S ... 393
Water pollution. See Pollution
Waterman, Samuel B.
  Rosenberg counsel E. Bloch remiss in not examining H. Gold; C ... 100; see also M. A. Fellows letter, Dec. 27, 1965
Webster, John. Play The white devil (Circle in the Square production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 54
Weeke, James L.
  Insistence in Spector-Moore article of necessity for Communism in China; Japan cited; C ... 314; see also 256 and E. T. Nash letter in reply; C ... 474
Weill-Tuckerman, Anne
  Vietnam at the U.N. Security Council; E ... 169
Weinstein, Jacob; rabbi's exceptions to Senator Douglas's rabid anti-Communism ... 315
Weisberg, Arthur; conducting of twentieth-century composers ... 112
Weiss, Peter. Films Faces in the Shadows and The mirage reviewed by M. Goodman; MP ... 222
  Play Marat/Sade reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 82
  Socialist stand of East German playwright. E. Bentley; E ... 31; see also C, opposite 225
Welfare. See Poverty; United States—Economics
Weltner, Representative Charles; bill directed against Cosa Nostra and Ku Klux Klan also threatens civil liberties; E ... 413
Werth, Alexander
  Ben Barka is dead; ramifications of scandal; S ... 350
  De Gaulle and l'affaire Ben Barka; S ... 200
  East and west from Paris; European Communist newspapers' condemnation of Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; and general French condemnation of U.S. "external fascism" in Vietnam; E ... 225
  French eyes on Vietnam: America's colony in hell; S ... 702
  Gangrene of Vietnam; French writers on war; S ... 414
  Straws in the wind of increased neo-Nazi West German vote, attributed to Gaullist policies; E ... 442
Wessin y Wessin, Elias; rightist Dominican general ousted ... 156, 521
Western union; appeal to FCC against AT&T incursions. D. Smith; S ... 16
Weiss, Theodore
  Robes of the gods (for Stefan Hirsch, 1899-1964); P ... 80
What were they like? (questions and answers). D. Levertov; P ... 781
Where is Vietnam? L. Ferlinghetti; P ... 654
White devil, the (Circle in the Square production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 54
Whitehead, Robert; dropped as director of Lincoln center repertory theatre ... 583 ff.
Whitman, Ruth
  She doesn't want to bring the tides in any more; P ... 429
Why are you walking? L. Simpson; P ... 690
Whyte, William Foote
  Analogies and images: thoughtways of U.S. foreign policy; S ... 641
Widick, B. J.
  AFL-CIO subservient to administration's low wage-increase guidelines; C, opposite 169
  Dec. 27, 1965, article, on AFL-CIO convention, corrected concerning P. E. Gorman's Vietnam attitude. P. E. Gorman; C, opposite 113
Wigner, Eugene P.; advocate of costly anti-missile missile system ... 114
Wilderness act, 1964; threat to preserved U.S. lands. L. P. Hudson; S ... 393
Williams, G. Mennen; Assistant Secretary of State's lame defense of U.S. relations with South Africa; E ... 316
Williams, Tennessee. Plays Slapstick tragedy (The mutilated and The gnadiges Fraulein) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 309
Willson, Meredith; inappropriate representative of music on President's Council on the humanities; E ... 477; see also C, 620
Wilson, Edmund; worthy recipient of National medal for literature; E ... 733 Wilson, Lanford. Play This is the rill speaking (Café La Mama revival reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 403
Winter in Vermont. S. Moss; P ... 74
WLBT-TV. See Television
Wolff, Representative Lester L.; under pressure from peace groups ... 582
World Court; ticklish case of South West Africa. Nation staff; S ... 389
World of Gunter Gräss, the. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 597
World trade center. See New York city
World War II; brought fiction of China as great power ... 606-607
Wright, Charles
  The night watch; P ... 593
Wulf, Melvin L.; ACLU counsel for H. H. Howe, Jr. ... 204 ff.; see also E, 413
Wyland, M. L.
  Objections to firearms-control legislation; C ... 410; see also Sherrill article, 260

XYZ

Xerox corp.; director E. B. Power's resignation as university of Michigan regent on conflict-of-interest charges; E ... 350
Yaffe, James. Play The deadly game reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 310
Yarborough, Senator Ralph; sponsorship of cold-war G.I. bill taken over by Johnson 7
Yorty, Samuel; Los Angeles mayor's aspirations to be California Democratic gubernatorial nominee ... 354
  Lost nomination but with disturbingly large vote; E ... 732
Young, Marguerite
  Tribute to bookman L. Gannett; E ... 200
Younge, Samuel, Jr.; Negro SNCC worker murdered in Tuskegee, Ala. ... 118 ff.
Youtz, Richard P.; ESP experiments ... 551
Zablocki, Representative Clement J.; estimate of civilian deaths in Vietnam ... 764
Zachry, H. B. (Pat); Texas millionaire as Johnson's model for poor San Antonio Mexicans ... 6
Zapruder, Abraham; film of Kennedy assassination disputes Warren commission findings ... 705 ff.; 741, 745
Zavatt, Joseph C.; judge's decision on passports of visitors to Cuba; E ... 508
Zimpel, Lloyd
  Reviews of plays
    Minstrel show, a, or civil rights in a cracker barrel (San Francisco mime troupe) ... 276
Zinn, Howard
  The old Left and the new: emancipation from dogma; S ... 385; see also C, 506 and 602
  Vietnam: setting the moral equation; S ... 64; see also C, opposite 141
  Vietnam war fans at Atlanta rally; E ... 227
Zweig, Paul
  The land came to an end; P ... 370
  Paris falls again—into this world; cultural crisis; S ... 557

(Vol. 202)

Index

(January-June, 1966)

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

R Reviewer
B Book review

PAGE

A

Abbey, Edward
Validity of W. Eastlake review of A. T. Vaughn's New England frontier; letter, opposite 253; see also 22, T. B. West letter, opposite 57, and Vaughn letter, opposite 141
Achebe, Chinua. "Nigeria's new man," author of A man of the people and other books. Article by R. Green 465
Adolescents, U.S. See Youth, U.S.
African stories. D. Lessing; B 78
Against interpretation: and other essays. S. Sontag; B 219
Agee, James. See Levitt, H.
America and China: a new approach to Asia. By Chang Hsin-hai; B 524
America's paradise lost. W. Price; B 753
Angel in the forest. M. Young; B 721
Anguish of India, the. R. Segal; B 30
Anonymous; R 132
Apter, David E.
The politics of modernization; B 723
Architecture. See Duncan, H. D.; Peisch, M. L.
Area of darkness, an. V. S. Naipaul; B 300
Aura. By C. Fuentes; B 24
Aurthur, Robert Alan; R 107
Autobiographical novel, an. K. Rexroth; B 688

B

Baran, Paul A., and Paul M. Sweezy
Monopoly capital: an essay on the American economic and social order; B 749
Baudet, Henri
Paradise on earth: some thoughts on European images of non-European man; B 787
Beauvoir, Simone de
A very easy death; B 718
Becker, James F.; R 366, 751
Beer, Samuel H.
British politics in the collectivist age; B 428
Belfrage, Sally
Freedom summer [Mississippi, 1964]; B 136
Bentley, Eric
Objections to H. Lohr article Letter from Berlin; letter, with Lohr reply, opposite 225; see also 31 and 51
Peter Weiss and Wolf Biermann; stands of East German writers; E 31; see also letters, opposite 225
Benton, William
The voice of Latin America; B 495
Berlin, letter from; "meet-ins" between East and West German writers; S. Heym reading. Article by H. Lohr 51; see also E. Bentley letter, opposite 225
Bergonzi, Bernard
Heroes' twilight: a study of the literature of the Great War; B 432
Berthoff, Warner
Ferment of Realism, the: American literature, 1884-1919; B 102
Bieler, Manfred
The sailor in the bottle; B 466
Biermann, Wolf; East German writer's stand. E. Bentley; E 31; see also letters, opposite 225
Bird, Caroline
The invisible scar: the great depression and what it did to American life, from then until now; B 366
Bittle, William E., and G. Geis
The longest way home: Chief Alfred C. Sam's back-to-Africa movement; B 530
Bonnet, Beauregard. Imaginary author of imaginary book In cold weather "interviewed" by L. L. Case (satire) 193
Bottomore, T. B.; R 623
British politics in the collectivist age. S. H. Beer; B 428
Bronowski, J.
The identity of man; B 559
Buchan, John. By J. A. Smith; B 191
Buckdancer's choice. J. Dickey; B 752
Buckman, Peter; R 163
Article Literary letter from London 340

PAGE

C

Capote, Truman
In cold blood; B 158
Carleton, V. B. See Freund, G.
Carpetbagger's crusade: the life of Albion Winegar Tourgée. By O. H. Olsen; B 272
Case, L. L.
Article Yet another interview with B. Bonnet, imaginary author of imaginary novel In cold weather (satire). 193
Case of Richard Sorge, the. By F. W. Deakin and G. R. Storry; B 687
Caute, David
The Left in Europe since 1789; B 784
Chang Hsin-hai
America and China: a new approach to Asia; B 524
Chekhov and his prose. T. Winner; B 684
Cheuse, Alan; R 218
Chicago school of architecture, the: early followers of Sullivan and Wright. By M. L. Peisch; B 657
Chicago. See also Duncan, H. D.
Children of violence. Vol. III: A ripple from the storm. Vol. IV: Landlocked. D. Lessing; B 716
China, America and: a new approach to Asia. Chang Hsin-hai; B 524
China, science and civilization in. Vol. 4, part 2: mechanical engineering. J. Needham (with the collaboration of Wang Ling); B 306
Chinese journey. Photographs by G. Kessle. Text by J. Myrdal; B 338
Cities, U.S. The making of urban America: a history of city planning in the United States. By J. Reps; B 526
Colette. Earthly paradise: Colette's autobiography, drawn from the writings of her lifetime. R. Phelps; B 720
Comedians, the. G. Greene; B 218
Complete plays of D. H. Lawrence, the; B 686
Congo (ex-Belgian); two books on 129
Conquest, Robert
Russia after Khrushchev; B 624
Cort, David; R 101
Cowan, Paul
Article The uneasy silence, on books inspired by summer of 1964 in Mississippi 136
Crippled tree, the. Han Suyin; B 303
Culture and democracy: the struggle for form in society and architecture in Chicago and the Middle West during the life and times of Louis H. Sullivan. By H. D. Duncan; B 657
Curtiss, Mina; R 160

D

Dalton, Margaret; R 271
Dangerfield, George; R 187
David Sarnoff. By E. Lyons; B 332
Davie, Donald (ed.)
Russian literature and modern English fiction; B 47
De Gaulle. By F. Mauriac; B 368
Deakin, F. W., and G. R. Storry
The case of Richard Sorge; B 687
Degnan, James P.; R 273
Dennis, Wayne
The Hopi child (reprint); B 365
Depression, the (U.S., 1930's). The invisible scar: the great depression and what it did to American life, from then until now. C. Bird; B 366
DeQuincey, Thomas. The mine and the mint: sources for the writings of Thomas DeQuincey. By A. Goldman; B 433
Deutscher, Isaac; R 590
See also letters, 698
Dickey, James
Buckdancer's choice; B 752
Dien Bien Phu. General Vo Nguyen Giap; B 781
Dignity of youth, the, and other atavisms. E. Z. Friedenberg; B 365
Discovery of time, the. S. Toulmin and J. Goodfield; B 561
Dowdy, Homer E.
Out of the jaws of the lion [Congo missionaries]; B 129
Downs, James F.
Objections to Tibetan data in S. and R. Gelber's The timely rain; letter, 587; see also 304
Drachkovitch, Milorad M. (ed.)
Marxism in the modern world; B 623
Dreher, Carl; R 332
Duncan, Hugh Dalziel
Culture and democracy: the struggle for form in society and architecture in Chicago and the Middle West during the life and times of Louis H. Sullivan; B 657

PAGE

E

Earthly paradise: Colette's autobiography, drawn from the writings of her lifetime. R. Phelps; B 720
Eastlake, William
New England frontier: Puritans and Indians, 1620-1675. A. T. Vaughan; B 22; see also T. B. West letter, opposite 57; Vaughn letter, opposite 141; and E. Abbey letter, opposite 253
Eby, Cecil D.
The siege of the Alcazar; B 23
Edmund Wilson: a study of literary vocation in our time. S. Paul; B 74
Ellmann, Mary; R 78, 431, 720
Ellul, Jacques
Propaganda: the formation of men's attitudes; B 397
English history 1914-1945 (The Oxford history of England: Vol. XV); A. J. P. Taylor; B 428
Esfandiary, F. M.
Article Iran: goodby to the nightingale; stirrings of reality among Middle Eastern writers 468; see also 460-461; A.M. Shapurian letter, with Esfandiary reply 587
Essays on Thomas Mann. By Georg Lukacs; B 590
Ethiopia: a new political history; B 132
Eye, the. V. Nabokov; B 81

F

Fall, Bernard
Viet-Nam witness, 1953-66; B 781
Fall of Paris, the: the siege and the Commune. A. Horne; B 786
Fanger, Donald; R 46, 684
Federal communications commission
Annual report for 1964 summarizing 30 years of electronic communication developments and current happenings in that field; B 402
Feifer, George; R 624
Ferment of realism, the: American literature, 1884-1919. W. Berthoff; B 102
Field, Andrew; R 47
First, Ruth
117 days [in a South African prison]; B 76
FitzGerald, C. P.; R 656
Folsom, Michael Brewster; R 242
Ford, Hugh D.
A poets' war: British poets and the Spanish civil war; B 23
Formosa betrayed. G. H. Kerr; B 656
Fowler commission, Canada
Report of the committee on broadcasting; B 402
Franck, Thomas M.; R 723
Frayn, Michael
The tin men; B 163
Free world colossus, the: a critique of American foreign policy in the cold war. D. Horowitz; B 214
Freedom summer [Mississippi, 1964]. S. Belfrage; B 136
Freund, Gisèle, and V. B. Carleton
James Joyce in Paris: the final years; B 338
Friedenberg, Edgar Z.
The dignity of youth and other atavisms; B 365
Fuentes, Carlos
Aura; B 24

G

Gardner, Frederick H.; R 559
Gargan, Edward T.; R 787
Gass, William H.
Omensetter's luck; B 563
Gaulle, Charles de. See De Gaulle
G. B. Shaw: a collection of critical essays. Edited by R. J. Kaufman; B 274
Geis, Gilbert. See Bittle, W. E.
Gelber, Stuart and Rona
The timely rain: travels in new Tibet; B 304; see also letters, 587
Gerassi, John; R 495
German tradition in literature, the, 1871-1945. R. Gray; B 593
Germany. Russia and Germany: a century of conflict. W. Laqueur; B 48
See also Berlin
Giap, General Vo Nguyen
Dien Bien Phu; B 781
Gilden, K. B.
Wrong emphasis in I. Deutscher review of G. Lucas' Essays on Thomas Mann; letter 698; see also 590
Gimbel, John; R 48
Gold, Michael
Jews without money (reprint); B 242

PAGE

- Goldman, Albert
  - The mine and the mint: sources for the writings of Thomas DeQuincey; B 433
- Goldman, Michael
  - Article The shoe in the shark, on trends in U.S. poetry with special reference to L. Simpson 246
- Goldstein, Laurence; R 274
- Goodfield, June. See Toulmin, S.
- Gordon, David J.; R 433, 686
- Goveia, Elsa V.
  - Slave society in the British Leeward Islands at the end of the eighteenth century; B 754
- Grass. Günter; 1965 campaign poem ridiculed by victorious candidate F. J. Strauss 589
- Gray, Ronald
  - The German tradition in literature 1871-1945; B 593
- Great Britain. British politics in the collectivist age. S. H. Beer; B 428
  - English history 1914-1945. (The Oxford history of England: Vol. XV.) A. J. P. Taylor; B 428
- Green, Robert
  - Nigeria's new man. Article on C. Achebe, author of A man of the people and other books 465
- Greene, Graham
  - The comedians; B 218
- Greene, Mary Frances, and O. Ryan
  - The school children: growing up in the slums; B 335
- Greenfield, Richard
  - Ethiopia: a new political history; B 132
- Gruppe 47 at Princeton; article by C. Mayer-Amery on meeting of German writers' group 588
- Guaranteed income, the. Edited by R. Theobald; B 751
- Guttmann, Alan; R 272

H

- Hall, Robert A., Jr.
  - New ways to learn a foreign language; B 398
- Han Suyin
  - The crippled tree; B 303
- Handke, Peter; Austrian writer's complaints at Gruppe 47 meeting 588
- Hauser, Ronald; R 593
- Haynes, Muriel; R 718
- Heiserman, Arthur; R 788
- Hendricks, King, and I. Shepard (eds.)
  - Letters from Jack London; B 105
- Heroes' twilight: a study of the literature of the Great War. B. Bergonzi; B 432
- Heym, Stefan; East German writer's readings from new novel Lenz or Freedom in West Berlin 53
- Ho Chi Minh
  - Prison diary; B 302
- Hobsbawn, E. J.
  - Primitive rebels: studies in archaic forms of social movement in the 19th and 20th centuries; B 625
- Hoffman, Frederick J.; R 74
- Hoffmann, Stanley
  - The state of war: essays in the theory and practice on international politics; B 189
- Hopi child, the (reprint). W. Dennis; B 365
- Horne, Alistair
  - The fall of Paris: the siege and the Commune; B 786
- Horowitz, David
  - The free world colossus: a critique of American foreign policy in the cold war; B 214
- Horowitz, Irving Louis; R 189
- Howe, Florence; R 432, 716

I

- Identity of man, the. J. Bronowski; B 559
- Ignatow, David; R 752
- In cold blood. T. Capote; B 158
- India. Two books on reviewed 300
- Insuring full employment. J. H. G. Pierson; B 751
- Invisible scar, the: the great depression and what it did to American life, from then until now. C. Bird; B 366
- Iran: goodby to the nightingale; stirrings of reality among writers. Article by F. M. Esfandiary .... 468. See also Shapurian letter, with Esfandiary reply 587

J

- Jackson, Gabriel; R 23, 786
- James Joyce in Paris: his final years. G. Freund and V. B. Carleton; B 338
- Jews
  - Other people's houses. L. Segal; B 494
  - Polish Jews: a pictorial record. R. Vishniac; B 338
- Jews without money (reprint). M. Gold; B 242
- John Buchan. By J. A. Smith; B 191
- Johnson, Chester; R 561
- Josephy, Alvin M., Jr.
  - The Nez Perce Indians and the opening of the Northwest; B 493
- Joyce, James. See James Joyce

K

- Kaplow, Jeffry J.; R 368, 784
- Karpatkin, Marvin A.; R 134
- Kaufman, Arnold S.; R 214
- Kaufman, R. J. (ed.)
  - G. B. Shaw: a collection of critical essays; B 274
- Keniston, Kenneth
  - The uncommitted: alienated youth in American society; B 245
- Kerr, George H.
  - Formosa betrayed; B 656
- Kessle, Gun
  - Chinese journey. Photographs by G. Kessle. Text by J. Myrdal; B 338
- Koch, Christopher; R 337
- Koch, Stephen; R 81
- Kriegel, Leonard; R 688
- Kuper, Hilda; R 76

L

- Lacouture, Jean
  - Vietnam: between two truces; B 524
- Laing, Alexander; R 103
- Lamott, Kenneth; R 687
- Landlocked. D. Lessing; B 716
- Lane, Ann J.; R 530
- Languages, the world's: grammars dictionaries. Sales catalogue of Stechert/Hafner, 13th edition; B 398
- Laqueur, Walter
  - Russia and Germany: a century of conflict; B 48
- Lasch, Christopher; R 397
- Latin America, the voice of. W. Benton; B 495
- Lawrence, D. H.
  - The complete plays of D. H. Lawrence; B 686
- LBJ brigade, the (in Vietnam). W. Wilson; B 784
- Left in Europe since 1789, the. D. Caute; B 784
- Leningrad 1941: the blockade. D. Pavlov; B 50
- Lessing, Doris
  - African stories; B 78
  - Children of violence. Vol. III: A ripple from the storm. Vol. IV: Landlocked; H 716
- Letter from Berlin. See Berlin
- Letters from Jack London. Edited by K. Hendricks and I. Shepard; B 105
- Letters from Mississippi. Edited by E. Sutherland; B 136
- Levin, Elaine B.
  - Objections to D. Markson article on M. Lowry; letter, opposite 253; see also 164
- Levitt, Helen
  - A way of seeing. Photographs of New York, with an essay by J. Agee; B 338
- Lieber, Joel; R 784
- Literary letter from London. Article by P. Buckman 340
- Lohr, Helga
  - Article Letter from Berlin, on "meet-ins" between East and West German writers; S. Heym reading .... 51; see also E. Bentley letter, with Lohr reply, opposite 225
- London, Jack
  - Letters from Jack London. Edited by K. Hendricks and I. Shepard; B 105
- London, literary letter from. Article by P. Buckman 340
- Longest way home, the: Chief Alfred C. Sam's back-to-Africa movement. W. E. Bittle and G. Geis; B 530
- Lowell, Robert
  - The old glory; B 103
- Lowry, Malcolm. Article Malcolm Lowry: a reminiscence, by D. Markson .... 164; see also E. B. Levin letter, opposite 253
- Lukacs, Georg
  - Essays on Thomas Man; B .... 590; see also letters, 698
- Lyons, Eugene
  - David Sarnoff; B 332

M

- Mackintosh, Mary
  - Phoniness ascribed to J. Meyer review of The torture of mothers, by T. Nelson; letter, with Meyer reply, 580 and 597
- McNickle, D'Arcy; R 365, 493
- Making of urban America, the: a history of city planning in the United States. By J. Reps; B 526
- Man of the people, a. C. Achebe; B 465
- Mandela, Nelson
  - No easy walk to freedom; B 76
- Mandelstam, Osip
  - The prose of Osip Mandelstam: The noise of time, Theodosia, The Egyptian stamp. Translated by C. Brown; B 46
- Mann, Thomas, essays on. G. Lukacs; B .... 590; see also letters, 698
- Man's nature and his communities. R. Niebuhr; B 19
- Markson, David
  - Article Malcolm Lowry: a reminiscence .... 164; see also E. B. Levin letter, opposite 253
- Marshall, Herbert (ed.)
  - Mayakovsky; B 271
- Marxism in the modern world. M. M. Drachkovitch, ed.; B 623
- Mauriac, François
  - De Gaulle; B 368
- Mayakovsky. Translated and edited by H. Marshall; B 271
- Mayer-Amery, Christian
  - Gruppe 47 at Princeton; article on German writers' group 588
- Mazlish, Bruce (ed.)
  - The railroad and the space program: an exploration in historical analogy; B 526
- Mazzeo, Joseph Anthony
  - Renaissance and revolution: the remaking of European thought; B 788
- Mercier, Vivian
  - Article My life in the new novel; interviews with Paris writers 434
- Meyer, June; R .... 496. See also M. Mackintosh letter, 570, with Meyer reply, 587
- Micronesia. America's paradise lost. W. Price; B 753
- Miller, J. Hillis
  - Poets of reality: six twentieth-century writers; B 659
- Miller, Loren
  - The petitioners: the story of the Supreme Court and the Negro; B 529
- Miller, Warren; R 338
- Mine and the mint, the: sources for the writings of Thomas DeQuincey. By A. Goldman; B 433
- Mirsky, Jonathan; R 302, 524, 781
- Mississippi. Three books on summer of 1964 discussed in P. Cowan article, The uneasy silence 136
- Monopoly capital: an essay on the American economic and social order. P. A. Baran and P. M. Sweezy; B 749
- Moser, G. M.
  - Portuguese society of writers suppressed; letter 168
- My escape from the CIA (and other improbable events). H. Rudd; B 273
- Myers, Oliver T.; R 75
- Myrdal, Jan. See Kessle, G.

N

- Nabokov, Vladimir
  - The eye; B 81
- Naipaul, V. S.
  - An area of darkness; B 300
- Needham, Joseph, and Wang Ling
  - Science and civilization in China. Vol. 4, part 2: mechanical engineering; B 306
- Negroes. Who speaks for the Negro? R. P. Warren; B 134
- Nelson, Truman
  - The torture of mothers (of "Harlem Six"); B .... 496; see also letters, 570 and 587
- New England frontier: Puritans and Indians, 1620-1675. A. T. Vaughan; B .... 22; see also T. R. West letter, opposite 57; Vaughn letter, opposite 141; and E. Abbey letter, opposite 253
- New ways to learn a foreign language. R. A. Hall, Jr.; B 398
- New York. A way of seeing: photographs of New York. By H. Levitt, with an essay by J. Agee; B 338
- Nez Perce Indians, the, and the opening of the Northwest. A. M. Josephy, Jr.; B 493
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
  - Man's nature and his community; B 19
- No easy walk to freedom. N. Mandela; B 76
- Norton, Eleanor Holmes; R 529

Index

PAGE

O

O'Connell, Shaun; R ... 563
O'Connor, James; R ... 749
Old glory, the. R. Lowell; B ... 103
Olsen, Otto H.; R ... 754
  Carpetbagger's crusade: the life of Albion Winegar Tourgée; B ... 272
Omensetter's luck. W. H. Gass; B ... 563
111 days in Stanleyville [1964 massacres] D. Reed; B ... 129
117 days [in a South African prison]. R. First; B ... 76
Other people's houses. L. Segal; B ... 494
Out of the jaws of the lion [Congo missionaries]. H. F. Dowdy; B ... 129

P

Painter, George D.
  Proust: the later years; B ... 160
Paradise on earth: some thoughts on Euro-images of non-European man. H. Baudet; B ... 787
Paris Commune. Fall of Paris, the: the siege and the Commune. A. Horne; B ... 786
Paul, Sherman; R ... 102, 657
  Edmund Wilson: a study of literary vocation in our time; B ... 74
Pavlov, Dmitri
  Leningrad 1941: the blockade; B ... 50
Peisch, Mark L.
  The Chicago school of architecture: early followers of Sullivan and Wright; B ... 657
Penskovskiy, Oleg
  The Penskovskiy papers; B ... 186
Petitioners, the: the story of the Supreme Court and the Negro. L. Miller; B ... 529
Phelps, Robert
  Earthly paradise: Colette's autobiography, drawn from the writings of her lifetime; B ... 720
Pierson, John H. G.
  Insuring full employment; B ... 751
Poetry. Recent U.S. trends, with special reference to L. Simpson, discussed in M. Goldman article, The shoe in the shark ... 246
Poetry of Yevgeny Yevtushenko, the: 1953 to 1965; B ... 271
Poets of reality: six twentieth-century writers. J. H. Miller; B ... 659
Poets' war, a: British poets and the Spanish civil war. H. D. Ford; B ... 23
Polish Jews: a pictorial record. R. Vishniac; B ... 338
Politics of modernization, the. D. E. Apter; B ... 723
Portugal; government's suppression of writers' society. G. M. Moser; letter ... 168
Powers, Barbara Gay
  Spy wife; B ... 101
Price, Willard
  America's paradise lost (Micronesian trust territory); B ... 753
Primitive rebels: studies in archaic forms of social movement in the 19th and 20th centuries. E. J. Hobsbawm; B ... 625
Prison diary. Ho Chi Minh; B ... 302
Propaganda: the formation of men's attitudes. J. Ellul; B ... 397
Prose of Osip Mandelstam, the: The noise of time, Theodosia, The Egyptian stamp. Translated by C. Brown; B ... 46
Proud tower, the: a portrait of the world before the war, 1890-1914. B. W. Tuchman; B ... 187
Proust: the later years. G. D. Painter; B ... 160
Puritanism. Revolution of the saints, the: a study in the origins of radical politics. M. Walzer; B ... 216

Q

Queneau; interviewed by V. Mercier ... 435

R

Radio. See Television
Railroad, the, and the space program: an exploration in historical analogy. Edited by B. Mazlish; B ... 526
Rebels, primitive: studies in archaic forms of social movement in the 19th and 20th centuries. E. J. Hobsbawm; B ... 625
Reed, David
  111 days in Stanleyville [1964 massacres]; B ... 129
Renaissance and revolution: the remaking of European thought. J. A. Mazzeo; B ... 788
Report of the committee on broadcasting (Fowler commission, Canada); B ... 402
Reps, John
  The making of urban America: a history of city planning in the United States; B ... 526

PAGE

Revolution of the saints, the: a study in the origins of radical politics [in Puritanism]. M. Walzer; B ... 216
Rexroth, Kenneth; R ... 306
  An autobiographical novel; B ... 688
Richler, Mordecai; R ... 191
Ripple from the storm, the. D. Lessing; B ... 716
Robbe-Grillet, Alain; dean of nouveau roman group in Paris ... 558
  Interviewed by V. Mercier ... 434
Roszak, Theodore; R ... 428
Rudd, Hugues
  My escape from the CIA (and other improbable events); B ... 273
Russia after Khrushchev. By R. Conquest; B ... 624
Russia and Germany: a century of conflict. W. Laqueur; B ... 48
Russian literature and modern English fiction. Edited by D. Davie; B ... 47
Ryan, Orletta. See Greene, M. F.

S

Said, Edward W.; R ... 659
Sailor in the bottle, the. M. Bieler; B ... 466
Sam, Chief Alfred C. The longest way home: Chief Alfred C. Sam's back-to-Africa movement. W. E. Bittle and G. Geis; B ... 530
Samuels, Charles Thomas; R ... 219
Sarnoff, David. By E. Lyons; B ... 332
Satire. Yet another interview with B. Bonnet, imaginary author of imaginary book In cold weather. Article by L. L. Case ... 193
Schoolchildren, the: growing up in the slums. M. F. Greene and O. Ryan; B ... 335
Schrag, Peter; R ... 335
Science and civilization in China. Vol. 4, part 2: mechanical engineering. J. Needham (with the collaboration of Wang Ling); B ... 306
Segal, Lore
  Other people's houses; B ... 494
Segal, Ronald
  The anguish of India; B ... 300
Semonin, Paul F.; R ... 129
Sender, Ramón
  Tales of Cibola; B ... 75
Shapurian, A. M.
  F. M. Esfandiary evinces ignorance in article Goodby to the nightingale; letter, with Esfandiary reply ... 587; see also 468
Sharp, Samuel L.; R ... 186
Shaw, G. B.: a collection of critical essays. Edited by R. J. Kaufman; B ... 274
Sheehan, Edward R. F.; R ... 300
Shepard, Irving (ed.) See Hendricks, K.
Siege of the Alcazar, the. C. D. Eby; B ... 23
Simon, Claude; interviewed by V. Mercier 435
Simpson, Louis
  Books At the end of the open road and Selected poems discussed in M. Goldman article The shoe in the shark ... 246
Skornia, Harry J.
  Television and society: an inquest and agenda for improvement; B ... 337
Slave society in the British Leeward Islands at the end of the eighteenth century. E. V. Goveia; B ... 754
Smith, Desmond; R ... 402
Smith, Janet Adam
  John Buchan; B ... 191
Snow, Edgar; R ... 303
Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; repercussions for Soviet writers at 23rd party congress. Article by A. Werth ... 621
Sontag, Susan
  Against interpretation: and other essays; B ... 219
Sorge, Richard, the case of. F. W. Deakin and G. R. Storry; B ... 687
South Africa; two books on ... 76
Space program, U.S. The railroad and the space program: an exploration in historical analogy. Edited by B. Mazlish; B ... 526
Spanish civil war. Poets' war, a: British poets and the Spanish civil war. H. D. Ford; B ... 23
  Siege of the Alcazar, the. C. D. Eby; B ... 23
Spy wife. B. G. Powers; B ... 101
State of war, the: essays in the theory and practice of international politics. S. Hoffmann; B ... 189
Stechert-Hafner
  The world's languages: grammars/dictionaries. Sales catalogue, 13th edition; B ... 398
Steckmesser, Kent Ladd
  The Western hero: in history and legend; B ... 107
Storry, G. R. See Deakin, F. W.
Sullivan, Louis Henri. See Duncan, H. D.; Peisch, M. L.

PAGE

Supreme Court, U.S. The petitioners: the story of the Supreme Court and the Negro. L. Miller; B ... 529
Sutherland, Elizabeth (ed.)
  Letters from Mississippi; B ... 136
Suyin, Han. See Han Suyin
Swans on an autumn river. S. T. Warner; B ... 431
Sweezy, Paul M. See Baran, P. A.

T

Taiwan. See Formosa
Tales of Cibola. R. Sender; B ... 75
Taylor, A. J. P.
  English history 1914-1945. (The Oxford history of England: Vol. XV); B ... 428
Teachout, Peter R.; R ... 466
Television. FCC: annual report for 1964 summarizing 30 years of electronic communication developments and current happenings in that field; B ... 402
Television and society: an inquest and agenda for improvement. H. J. Skornia; B ... 337
Theobald, Robert (ed.)
  The guaranteed income; B ... 751
Timely rain, the: travels in new Tibet. S. and R. Gelder; B ... 304; see also letters, 587
Tin men, the. M. Frayn; B ... 163
Torture of mothers, the (of "Harlem Six"). T. Nelson; B ... 496. See also letters, 570 and 587
Toulmin, Stephen, and J. Goodfield
  The discovery of time; B ... 561
Tourgée, Albion Winegar. Carpetbagger's crusade: the life of Albion Winegar Tourgée. By O. H. Olsen; B ... 272
Trachtenberg, Alan; R ... 526
Tuchman, Barbara W.
  The proud tower: a portrait of the world before the war, 1890-1914; B ... 187

U

Uncommitted, the: alienated youth in American society. K. Keniston; B ... 245
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Russia after Khrushchev. By R. Conquest; B ... 624
  Russia and Germany: a century of conflict. W. Laqueur; B ... 48
  The 23rd congress: no more angry shouts? Article by A. Werth on limits for Soviet writers ... 621

V

Vaughan, Alden T.
  New England frontier: Puritans and Indians, 1620-1675; B ... 22; see also T. R. West letter, opposite 57, and Vaughn letter, opposite 141
Very easy death, a. S. de Beauvoir; B ... 718
Vietnam: between two truces. J. Lacouture; B ... 524
Viet-Nam witness: 1953-66. B. Fall; B ... 781
Vietnam. Booklist on war ... 525
  Dien Bien Phu, by General Vo Vguyen Giap; B ... 781
  LBJ brigade, the. W. Wilson; B ... 784
Vishniac, Roman
  Polish Jews: a historical record; B ... 338
Voice of Latin America, the. W. Benton; B ... 495

W

Wagar, W. Warren; R ... 216
Walker, Franklin; R ... 105
Walzer, Michael
  The revolution of the saints: a study in the origins of radical politics [in Puritanism]; B ... 216
Wang Ling. See Needham, J.
Warner, Sylvia Townsend
  Swans on an autumn river; B ... 431
Warren, Robert Penn
  Who speaks for the Negro?; B ... 134
Way of seeing, a. Photographs of New York. By H. Levitt, with an essay by J. Agee; B ... 338
Webb, R. K.; R ... 625
Weiss, Peter
  I come out of my hiding place; speech on writer's road to commitment ... 652
  See also Bentley, E.
Werth, Alexander; R ... 50
  The 23rd congress: no more angry shouts?; article on limits for Soviet writers ... 621

PAGE

West, Thomas R.
  W. Eastlake's misplaced liberal zeal in review of A. T. Vaughn book New England frontier; letter, opposite 57; see also 22
Western hero, the: in history and legend. K. L. Steckmesser; B 107
Who speaks for the Negro? R. P. Warren; B 134
Wiesel, Elie; R 494
Wig, the: a mirror image. C. Wright; B 466
Wilson, Edmund: a study of literary vocation in our time. S. Paul. B 74
Wilson, William
  The LBJ brigade (in Vietnam); B 784
Winner, Thomas
  Chekhov and his prose; B 684
World War I. Heroes' twilight: a study of the literature of the Great War. B. Bergonzi; B 432
World's languages, the: grammars/dictionaries. Sales catalogue of Stechert-Hafner, 13th edition; B 398
Wreszin, Michael; R 19

PAGE

Wright, Charles
  The wig: a mirror image; B 466
Writers and writing. Gruppe 47 at Princeton; article on German writers' meeting by C. Mayer-Amery 588
  I come out of my hiding place; P. Weiss speech on road to commitment 652
  Iran: goodby to the nightingale; stirrings of reality among Middle Eastern writers. Article by F. M. Esfandiary ..... 468; see also A. M. Shapurian letter with Estandiary reply 587
  Lack of creativity in postwar France 558
  My life in the new novel; interviews with Paris writers. Article by V. Mercier 434
  "Oppositionism" of Sinyavsky-Daniel type scored at 23rd Soviet congress. Article by A. Werth 621
  Portuguese society repressed. G. M. Moser letter 168
  Writers confer: good show at the Paramount (international writers conference in Brooklyn). Article by J. Yglesias 460

PAGE

Y

Yevtushenko, Yevgeny
  The poetry of Yevgeny Yevtushenko: 1953 to 1965; B 271
Yglesias, José; R 24
  Writers confer: good show at the Paramount; article on international writers conference in Brooklyn 460
Young, Marguerite; R 721
Young, Marilyn; R ..... 304; see also letters, 587
Youth, U.S. The dignity of youth and other atavisms. E. Z. Friedenberg; B 365
  Uncommitted, the: alienated youth in American society. K. Keniston; B 245
Yurick, Sol; R 158

Z

Zinnes, Harriet; R 721
Zoll, Stephen; R 398, 753
Zweig, Ferdynand; R 245

229271
JAN 8 1966
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE
NATION

January 3, 1966 . . 35c

The Messianic Pose

POST-COLD-WAR DELUSIONS

H. STUART HUGHES

Washington Wire: COLD EYE ON JOHNSON

Robert G. Sherrill

AT&T: The Folksy Octopus

Desmond Smith

Hooligans and Indians

William Eastlake

LETTERS

General Hershey replies

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: The greatest misunderstandings that have arisen from the recent reclassification of a few students of the University of Michigan are, first, the widespread view that this procedure is something new in Selective Service, designed for this particular occasion, and second, the feeling that these students were reclassified because they were protesting United States policy in Vietnam.

Any reclassification action taken by local boards in the cases of these students was not related in any way to the political views of the registrants or their right to express them, by demonstration or otherwise. It was taken solely because these students, by their sit-in in a local board, interfered with the administration of the Selective Service Act in that board. Such action is prohibited by the Selective Service Act. Through the years, similar action has been taken in cases of men who failed to register, failed to keep their board advised of their current address or change in status, failed to report for physical examination, destroyed or mutilated their draft cards, or committed other acts which are in violation of the Selective Service Act or regulations. In these cases the local board has sole responsibility, delegated to it by the Congress, to determine whether the action of a registrant justifies reclassification or a declaration of delinquency.

For those who believe that Selective Service action in the Michigan cases was designed to curtail free speech or expression of political views, it should be pointed out that there was a demonstration in front of the Selective Service National Headquarters building in Washington not long ago, staged by students urging termination of the war in Vietnam and also the termination of the Selective Service Act. There was no thought of reporting these young people to their draft boards, because their protest was peaceful and legal, with no effort on their part to interfere with the normal conduct of business in the headquarters.

The Congress in the Selective Service Act, the President in the Selective Service regulations, and the courts in their opinions, have made it clear that no classification is permanent, that steps should be taken by the boards to keep currently informed concerning the status of classified registrants, and to examine their files in the light of world conditions and events, so that military requirements may be safeguarded.

The Congress has delegated to the local boards power to hear and determine, subject to the right of appeal, all questions or claims with respect to inclusion for, or exemption or deferment from, training and service for all individuals within the jurisdiction of such boards. It has further provided that the decisions of the local board shall be final, except where appeal is authorized and taken.

Each registrant, under the law and regulation is considered available for military service until his eligibility for deferment is clearly established to the satisfaction of the local board. No classification is permanent, boards are required to reopen a classification if there is a change in the registrant's status during the period of deferment, and any person having knowledge must report to the local board within ten days any fact that might result in a registrant being placed in a different classification.

In any case of reclassification, of course, the registrant is entitled to a personal appearance and appeal.

The regulation defining a student classification does not prescribe or require any particular scholastic achievement, and the Congress has made it very clear that local boards may not be required to base a student classification solely upon a registrant's scholastic ability. Within three months after President Truman authorized the deferment of students on a basis of test score or class standing, and at a time when responsible people in government and in the educational field believed that a student deferment would be mandatory if a registrant met the prescribed criteria of test score or class standing, the Congress amended the law to provide: "Notwithstanding any provisions of this act, no local board, appeal board, or other agency of the Selective Service System shall be required to postpone or defer any person by reason of his activity in study . . . or other endeavors found to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest solely on the basis of any test, examination, selection system, class standing, or any other means conducted, sponsored, administered or prepared by any agency or department of the federal government or any private institution . . . or individual employed by an agency or department of the federal government."

Gen. Lewis Hershey, Director
Selective Service System

Advance proofs of "General Hershey's Big Stick" by Carl Cohen (The Nation, Dec. 27) were sent to President Johnson, Lieut. Gen. Lewis Hershey, Richard Russell, chairman of the Sen-

(Continued on page 28)

THE NATION

Monday, January 3, 1966
Volume 202, No. 1

In this issue

EDITORIALS

1

Statements to Our Readers:

3 By George G. Kirstein
4 By James J. Storrow, Jr.

ARTICLES

4 Washington Wire:
Cold Eye on Johnson
Robert G. Sherrill
7 The Messianic Pose:
Post-Cold-War Delusions
H. Stuart Hughes

Two Nation Portraits

10 Frederick Law Olmsted:
Launching The Nation
Robert Fridlington
13 Jessie White Mario:
Victorian in Italy
Elizabeth A. Daniels
16 AT&T: The Folksy Octopus
Desmond Smith

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

19 Taking Man's Measure
Michael Wreszin
19 To the Rulers (poem)
M. L. Rosenthal
20 Sightseeing in Provincetown (poem)
May Swenson
22 Kidding Our Puritan Conscience
William Eastlake
23 Politics of Poetry and History
Gabriel Jackson
24 Palms in the Plaza
Jose Yglesias
26 Theatre
R. J. Schroeder
27 Films
Robert Hatch
Crossword Puzzle (opp. 28)
Frank W. Lewis

James J. Storrow, Jr., Publisher
Anne Abramovitz, Assistant to Publisher

Carey McWilliams, Editor
Robert Hatch, Managing Editor
Warren Miller, Literary Editor
Helen Yglesias, Assistant Literary Editor
Marion Hess, Copy Editor

Robert G. Sherrill, Washington
Alexander Werth, Paris

Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
Michael Goldman, Poetry

Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Jan. 3, 1966, Vol. 202, No. 1

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

MAR 4

EDITORIALS

The Peace Feeler

On Friday, December 17, the State Department announced that the U.S. was seeking "clarification" of a purported peace feeler from Hanoi. The Saturday morning papers gave prominent space to this development, which involved Italy's foreign minister, Amintore Fanfani, and two Italian professors known to him. Later in the day the bubble burst with a bang so loud that Sunday's New York Times carried stories on pages 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6 of the first section, a four-column roundup in "The News of the Week in Review," and an editorial, "Crushed Hope in Vietnam," that was critical of Washington's handling of the affair.

Whatever the proportions of truth and falsehood in the medley which was served up to the American public, two points stand out: First, the incident underlined the world-wide eagerness for an end to the futile and increasingly dangerous conflict; second, it left little doubt that at this stage the Johnson Administration prefers to exert further battlefield and aerial bombing pressures before negotiating.

What the Vietnamese proposals actually amounted to is hidden in the obfuscations of the belligerents and the do-it-yourself diplomacy of the two professors. They talked with President Ho Chi Minh and Premier Pham Van Dong for ninety minutes, presumably about other things than the weather. Clearly, the Hanoi assertion that the whole report was a "sheer, groundless fabrication" is itself a fabrication. Ho Chi Minh may not have echoed Secretary Rusk's asserted willingness to go anywhere, to meet anyone, but with both North and South Vietnam being devastated, it is a safe conclusion that some sort of overture, however tenuous, was made and transmitted on November 20 by Mr. Fanfani in his capacity of president of the UN General Assembly. The public statements of Secretary Rusk and President Johnson in the interval, and above all U.S. military operations in the same period, necessitated a complete disavowal by Hanoi. Since Mr. Rusk and Mr. Johnson know the rules of the game, it seems inescapable that if this was not precisely their aim, they were willing to risk such an outcome by acknowledging receipt of Mr. Fanfani's letter.

The State Department action must be viewed against the earlier disclosure that in 1964, Secretary Rusk had summarily rejected a suggestion from Hanoi, transmitted through U Thant, for a meeting of U.S. and North Vietnamese emissaries in Rangoon. The manner in which this brush-off came to light had earned Washington a bad press and given rise to increased distrust abroad. Washington was eager to avoid a recurrence and when it learned that the St. Louis Post-Dispatch had got word of the peace feeler, it decided to break the story itself. This torpedoed the prospective negotiations, although most of the discussion in Mr. Rusk's December 4 letter to Mr. Fanfani was quite in order. But what about the Rusk-Johnson statements between November 20 and December 4? If there was a genuine desire for peace, one would have expected either no comment or noncommittal remarks befitting the delicacy of the situation. Instead, the President and Mr. Rusk continued to complain of the "completely negative" attitude of Hanoi and the "discouraging response" to all American efforts to bring about talks.

Mr. Rusk's letter to Mr. Fanfani sounds as though he believed that the North Vietnamese had been softened up by the recent course of the war and hoped, when negotiations did take place, to put the squeeze on them at the conference table. In the meantime, more of the same treatment could not fail to be efficacious. This would be consistent with the use of B-52s against infiltration routes in North Vietnam and Laos, the bombing of the Haiphong power plant, large by Vietnamese standards, and plans for American invasions of Laos and Cambodia to check reinforcement of the Vietcong—while the U.S. was preparing to put 300,000 to 400,000 men into the field. This may, in fact, now become necessary, unless someone can manage to pull the fat out of the fire.

Fortunately—thanks largely to Pope Paul VI's timely and forceful intervention—a thirty-hour Christmas cease-fire was ordered by way of response to the earlier Vietcong proposal for a twelve-hour pause in hostilities. What is needed, as the Pope stressed, is cessation of fighting for an interval sufficient to give the parties an opportunity for "reflection and negotiation" and, also, to test their good faith and willingness to negotiate. A cease-fire that can be extended from twelve to thirty hours can be extended for a longer period or can simply be continued sine die. If there were a stabilized front, negotiations might have gotten under way while the fighting continued; it has happened in other wars. But in Vietnam there are no "lines" or "fronts" and the fighting includes acts of individual terrorism and sabotage from one end of South Vietnam to the other. In such a situation a cease-fire is imperative, if only to enable the participants to decide whether, how, when and where they will negotiate. In a sense, therefore, the first step toward peace in Vietnam has been taken; both sides have much to gain and nothing to lose by continuing the Christmas respite into 1966.

The Heat on TV

Vietnam is the first "television war" and so a new chapter opens in the eternal conflict between government and the news-gathering agencies. Not that TV cameramen and correspondents always tell the truth, nor that the government trafficks only in lies; but when a war is on, especially a war of aggression, the special interest of government is to make the war look as good as possible. A reporter, on the other hand, needs a certain irreducible proportion of truth or he has no story. The resulting hassles are now agitating the television industry—and should agitate the newsprint media as well.

Television and radio are in a more vulnerable position than newspapers and magazines. The electronic media are subject to government licensing and a host of administrative regulations which affect their daily operations. While the Federal Communications Commission is theoretically independent of the executive departments, the commissioners are appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate, and a maze of connections exists at all levels of power between the networks and governmental functionaries. The latter, fighting the war in Washington, are continually tempted to tamper with the news, and since the public is getting more and more of its news electronically, the urge to censor is focused more and more on TV, which brings both sight and sound from the battlefield into the home.

The radio-TV correspondent and the script writer back at the network headquarters are not oblivious to these facts of life. And they are human. Hence, self-censorship operates cumulatively with governmental censorship, even when the latter is unsuccessful. The salaried employee says to himself: I can't put that on film, I'll never get away with it. The more sensitive the area, the more cautious he is apt to be; in effect he is doing the censor's work for him Anything that involves the CIA, for instance, is known to bring severe pressures from on high.

The cases that become known are only the part of the iceberg that floats above the surface. When C.B.S. correspondent Morley Safer filed a story on our soldiers burning the huts of a Vietnam village, and the film footage showed a GI actually touching his cigarette lighter to a thatched roof, the action was at first angrily denied by the State Department, then justified on the ground that the village concealed a network of Vietcong tunnels. According to Variety (December 15 and 22), this story and footage "reportedly" brought pressure from the White House. Fred Friendly, the president of C.B.S. News, was asked to air a retraction; he refused. Also involved in this incident was Arthur Sylvester, the ubiquitous censor of the Defense Department. "He [Sylvester] was on the phone every fifteen minutes, raising hell," one network man reported.

Another incident in which right prevailed was N.B.C.'s The Tunnel, made in Berlin. The State Department wanted the program canceled and forced a high-level conference of government and network officials in Washington. N.B.C. refused to kill the film and later the State Department ordered 100 copies for world distribution—to show what a free country we are.

Under its present chairman, E. William Henry, the FCC is in many respects an admirable agency. It should look into cases of attempted coercion. It should not only prescribe and regulate; as far as lies in its power it should protect the broadcasters in the free exercise of their responsibility to the public. Educational TV might do a study of the ways in which pressure is applied in the commercial sectors of the medium. But the best hope lies with the printed press. In a sense, radio, TV and the printed media are rivals; but more important, they complement one another, and censorship menaces all. If it is tolerated in TV, the newspapers will be the next to feel it.

The Loud Little Handful

In this issue (p. 7) H. Stuart Hughes calls attention to the fact that European intellectuals have had occasion far more frequently than their American counterparts to criticize their governments for engaging in wars that offended their sense of morality and fair play. Such a situation, writes Mr. Hughes, is "almost without precedent in American history" although it is "perfectly familiar in the European democratic tradition." Among the exceptions which Mr. Hughes perhaps had in mind were Abraham Lincoln and Mark Twain. In a speech of January 12, 1848, Lincoln had this to say of the war with Mexico:

> The war . . . was unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced by the President. . . . When the war began, it was my opinion that all . . . should . . . remain silent on that point, at least until the war should be ended. Some leading Democrats, including ex-President Van Buren, have taken this same view. . . . I think I should still adhere to it were it not that the President . . . tells us that Congress with great unanimity had declared that "by the act of the Republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between that government and the United States," when the same journals that informed him of this also informed him that when the declaration stood disconnected from the question of supplies, sixty-seven in the House, and not fourteen merely, voted against it. . . . I cannot be silent.
>
> As to the mode of terminating the war and securing peace, the President is equally wandering and indefinite. First, it is to be done by a more vigorous prosecution of the war in the vital parts of the enemy's country; and after apparently talking himself tired on this point, the President drops down into a half-despairing tone, and tells us that "with a people distracted and divided by contending factions, and a government subject to constant changes by successive revolutions, the continued success of our arms may fail to secure a satisfactory peace." Then he suggests the propriety of wheedling the Mexican people to desert the counsels of their own leaders, and, trusting in our protestations, to set up a government from which we can secure a satisfactory peace; telling us that "this may become the only mode of obtaining such a peace." But soon he falls into doubt of this too; and then drops back on to the already half-abandoned ground of "more vigorous prosecution." All this shows that the President is in no wise satisfied with his own position. First he takes up one, and in attempting to argue us into it he argues himself out of it, then seizes another and goes through the same process, and then, confused at being able to think of nothing new, he snatches up the old one again, which he has some time before cast off. His mind, taxed > beyond its power, is running hither and thither, like some tortured creature on a burning surface, finding no position on which it can settle down and be at ease. Again, it is a singular omission in this message that it nowhere intimates when the President expects the war to terminate. . . . He [President Polk] is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show there is not something about his conscience more painful than his mental perplexity.

When this speech was made the nation was still at war and what Lincoln said then applies with equal force today; incidentally the speech should be of special interest to the leaders of the Republican Party. Nor is Lincoln the only distinguished American who found it impossible to remain silent while the government pursued a war which his conscience would not permit him to approve. "The loud little handful," wrote Mark Twain, at the time of the Spanish-American War, "as usual, will shout for the war. . . . A few fair men . . . will argue and reason against the war with speech and pen, and at first will have a hearing and be applauded; but it will not last long; those others will outshout them, and presently the anti-war audiences will thin out and lose popularity. Before long you will see this curious thing: the speaker stoned from the platform, and free speech strangled by hordes of furious men who in their secret hearts are still at one with those stoned speakers—as earlier—but do not dare to say so. And now the whole nation—pulpit and all—will take up the war cry, and shout itself hoarse, and mob any honest man who ventures to open his mouth; and presently such mouths will cease to open."

The curious thing about our democratic tradition is that never, but never, have any of those who make up this "loud little handful" been harassed, bullied, stoned, ostracized, or otherwise punished, formally or informally, for advocating the use of force or preaching war. When one reads of students in Des Moines being suspended from school because they wore anti-war armbands to manifest their hatred of war—and of a football coach who urged the student body to chant, "Beat the Vietcong" and called those who refused to do so "pinkos or Communists"—one is troubled by the thought that we are still not quite the peace-loving nonviolent Christian nation we fondly imagine ourselves to be.

STATEMENTS TO OUR READERS

In the Centennial Issue, Carey McWilliams wrote: "No one has ever 'owned' The Nation; it is impossible to own or possess it or bequeath it or sell it or mortgage it." In reality, The Nation's owners have been trustees who have held in trust for each succeeding generation a property of enormous, true value, regardless of what its financial worth may be.

For slightly more than ten years, I have been that trustee. Today, by all conventional measurements, The Nation is in the best condition it has enjoyed for years. Its circulation is now higher than at any time during the decade and is increasing at a satisfactory rate without promotion, without offering bargain rate "trial" subscriptions or other expensive "come-ons." Perhaps this growth is attributable to the publicity surrounding the celebration of the 100th Anniversary and the good will and wide acclaim engendered by the Centennial Issue. Perhaps the increased acceptance is due to an ever-widening sympathetic response to the magazine's continuous and continuing protest against the senseless war that is being waged in Vietnam. For whatever reason or combination of reasons, The Nation's health at the conclusion of its 100th year of existence is good. For whatever contribution I have made to its well-being as trustee, I am proud.

The completion of the magazine's first century of life ends one era and marks the beginning of a new one. It is a fitting time for a new trustee to take over. From my personal viewpoint there are many things I hope to accomplish in the years ahead. The new publisher has already been introduced to The Nation's readers through his achievement in producing the 100th Anniversary Issue. James Storrow probably learned more about the history and traditions of The Nation in preparing this issue than any of his predecessors knew about the journal at the time that they assumed responsibility. Mr. Storrow graduated from Harvard University in 1940 and spent one year at the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration. During World War II he was a member of the Seabees and served widely in the islands of the Pacific.

Mr. Storrow's task will be made lighter by the fact that every single member of the staff from the editors to the office boy has accepted his invitation to continue at their present assignments. A more loyal or competent group could not be assembled, and my own happy anticipation of the future is tempered only with regret that I will no longer share the day-to-day activities of my highly valued colleagues. My thanks go to each one of them for their devotion to The Nation and for their enrichment of my life.

On hundreds of nights in a dozen seas, I have reenacted the ancient ritual that occurs on ships each four hours the world over. A shape emerges out of the dark on the navigation bridge, salutes and says, "I am ready to relieve you, Sir." Information is exchanged as to the course and speed of the vessel, hazards to navigation which may be encountered, and whatever intelligence is available regarding the activities of the enemy. Satisfied that all is well, the new officer again salutes, accompanied by the ritual words, "I relieve you, Sir." The salute is returned with an informal expression of good will, and the watch on deck retires, knowing that the ship is in good hands.

George G. Kirstein

When George Kirstein asked me, two years ago, if I would undertake to prepare a special issue of The Nation in celebration of the magazine's hundredth anniversary, I questioned myself long and hard whether I was the right person for such a task. My background in business was varied but did not include publishing. But I had been a regular reader of The Nation and of other publications of its genre, felt what they had to say to be extremely important to a free society, and strongly disagreed with the often-expressed opinion that the magazine of dissent had become an anachronism. Diffidence finally succumbed to enthusiasm for the challenge, and I accepted the assignment. Mr. Kirstein, I think, had known all along that I would.

Today, upon becoming permanent publisher of The Nation, diffidence again makes itself felt. But I have come to know well the magazine and its history, and recognize its proprietorship as a unique public trust, unlike any other in or out of publishing. This trust has for over ten years been in the exceptionally capable hands of George Kirstein. He has guided The Nation with honesty, dedication and great competence. He has led it through many dark hours, to a point of renewed promise today. Of his period of stewardship, he may be proud, and we should be thankful for it.

I have undertaken to be the fiduciary of this trust because I believe that the magazine of opinion and dissent has to play a more vital role than ever before, in a free press which (with some significant exceptions) has ineluctably been losing its freedom. Competition between newspapers has steadily been fading. Our communications media are now more dominated by the advertising industry than ever. And "news management" is an excessively polite euphemism for what issues (or fails to) from official sources of information. I believe that only an informed people can remain free, and the only journal truly free to inform must draw its major support from its readers. Finally, I am convinced that there are enough intelligent, interested and involved people in this country who are willing to pay for The Nation, and thereby to know that it is beholden only to them. I'm betting on it.

James J. Storrow, Jr.

WASHINGTON WIRE

Cold Eye On Johnson . . . . Robert G. Sherrill

Washington, D.C.

All eyes are on Johnson. There is little curiosity here about what the Supreme Court will do this term, although it has several very important decisions to make; and even less curiosity about what Congress, led by tired and imitative men, would do if left alone next session. Everything is Lyndon, Lyndon. Did the President smile or frown, and what does it mean? Doesn't he look paler today than he did yesterday? All the rumors, all the speculations are tied to the actions of one man.

And for good reason. The President has manipulated himself into a position of extraordinary personal power by playing upon the nation's gratitude for his accomplishments through the 1965 Congress, its fears for the preservation of national pride in the Asian war, and its general confusion about what everything is all about anyway. Binding these sticks into a scepter of authority that any Hadrian would be proud to walk behind is the stout cord of duplicity.

The whole town reeks of it. Hubert Humphrey on December 7: "As of today there is no immediate threat of inflation." Two days later, Federal Reserve Board chairman, William McChesney Martin, said he raised the price of credit because "the U.S. economy is now facing inflationary pressures." Who was telling the truth? Johnson said he "regretted" Martin's actions, but The Wall Street Journal believes this is so much pretense—that Johnson actually wanted the raise, only he wanted it in January. And another financial writer, challenging Johnson's sincerity, points out that if he really wants to reverse Martin he can do it by a friendly appointment to fill the vacancy when a pro-Martin member leaves the board this month. Or will Johnson use the board's action as an excuse not to seek an extension of the minimum wage law?

Uncertainty, uncertainty. Top men in the antitrust division of the Department of Justice are let go. Division chief, Donald F. Turner, announcing a new policy, says he is less interested in how big corporations get than he is in the total effect of their mergers. He wants to do away with criminal actions, stick to civil suits. The number of antitrust suits of any kind have been dropping steadily, year by year. Now this means an even softer approach. What's left to protect competition?

The Vietnam situation is utter confusion and chaos in the capital. ". . . We are equally determined that every prospect for peace be exhausted before other hard steps be taken." What does he mean? The Washington Post headlines it, "Johnson Hints New Vietnam Escalation." The Washington Star makes the same hot-blooded interpretation. The Baltimore Sun hears it differently: "Johnson Pledges Every Effort to End Viet War," and The Wall Street Journal also detects the cooing dove.

Two weeks after a panel of civilian experts, appointed by Johnson, urged him not to expand the nation's missile armory, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara announces that the nation's defenses will in the future rely much more heavily on missiles. When Russian Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin complains that his country will have to increase its military budget 5 per cent because the United States is "setting the military tone," our State Department ridicules his complaint as "extreme distortion" and Secretary of State Dean Rusk says this nation is a "shepherd of peace." But within forty-eight hours McNamara is announcing an increase of at least 10 per cent in the overall defense budget and a new $1.75 billion building program for superbombers that will maintain our bomber force at four times the strength of Russia's. The Pentagon reveals the existence of a "hot-line telephone" for directing the war in Vietnam, and McNamara surrenders control of the war to the generals: "We will supply whatever forces our military commanders request, when they are requested."

The voices of Congressional dissent are growing feebler. Sen. George McGovern, once a gadfly against the Administration's handling of the Vietnam problem, now says that "we have gone too far . . . to curtail our military commitment —we have already crossed that bridge." And the voices seeking fierce suppression of dissent are growing stronger. Rep. Olin Teague, one of Johnson's Texas friends, suggests: "It's time we stopped talking about free speech and talked a little bit about treason. . . . Dissent gone too far is treason."

Johnson tells the national AFL-CIO convention by telephone that our only purpose is to help South Vietnam, but Seymour Topping reports from Saigon in The New York Times that the presence of the American troops has created a disastrous inflationary condition and that the traditional rural structure of life there is "crumbling."

Secretary Rusk insists that the bombing of North Vietnam has done damage to the enemy's movements of troops and supplies, but both Topping and James Cameron, a British newsman who traveled through the northern province, say that the bombings have had little effect other than, in Cameron's words, "to weld the nation together unshakably."

The year 1965 ended in depressing contradictions. Dealing again with the home front, the Defense Department announces the closing of 149 military bases for a total annual savings of $410 million. But one of the Maryland units on the list turns out to have been closed six months ago, with the personnel simply absorbed elsewhere on the base. The local newspaper editorially jeers at Johnson for handing out phony information "to garner a favorable image. Where is the financial savings?" Where indeed?

And the same question came up again when word got out that, instead of closing down bases in the area, the Defense Department plans to expand one Navy boot camp in Maryland by $65 million over the next five years. The Defense Department confirmed the plans to Senator Brewster, but denied them to the Washington Daily News.

Washington has never been the best town for finding an honest answer, but of late slippery misrepresentation has become an accepted mark of the Administration. That Johnson is not criticized more loudly for it is partly because he has successfully planted the thought spoken by Teague—"dissent gone too far is treason"—but also because the nation believes that, whatever his tactics, his objectives are pure. And in proof of that, it is common to point to his legislative achievements of the past session.

However, a fresh look at what were hailed as major achievements shows that the nation's gratitude has been demanded for more than is really there, or is likely to be. The Medicare program, which is supposed to have been Johnson's greatest victory of 1965, is expected to pay less than half the medical expenses of old people. If that is a step forward, one might be justified nevertheless in asking: toward what? There are signs that the result will not be so much the subsidizing of needy people as the subsidizing of an industry. Oddly enough, Johnson's Administration has turned over to the American Medical Association—which spent without stint to fight Medicare ($1 million in the last three months before its passage)—the responsibility of making the rules of the program, along with insurance and hospital association officials, who also bitterly contested the new law.

The medical industry's change of face, if not of heart, may perhaps be understood from such remarks as this, by Kenneth Williamson, associate director of the American Hospital Association: "For the first time, a federal law has clearly stated that hospitals must be reimbursed for the 'reasonable cost' of their services. This is of utmost significance and should provide enormous reassurance to hospitals. . . . It is in sharp contrast to those agencies of state and local government which through the years have beaten down hospitals on the reasonable costs of their services."

He called Medicare "a great new source of financing." One may be Vicky, London Evening Standard: Ben Roth forgiven for waiting a bit before giving thanks to LBJ.

Along the same line, as the Chicago Daily News's James McCartney outlined so crisply, Johnson gave in quietly and almost completely to the AMA on another of his much-heralded projects of compassion. Back in January, 1965, Johnson said he was launching an "all-out drive" on the three deadliest diseases: heart attack, cancer and stroke. A Presidential commission offered a program that would cost $2.9 billion over five years. The Administration's version that went to Congress asked for $1.2 billion. Congress cut out 70 per cent of that and twenty AMA-demanded amendments were tacked on, with the Administration's approval. Now the "all-out drive" is referred to by Administration officials, unashamedly, as "a foot in the door."

Much else of Johnson's program would indicate that he does not open doors wide enough for much to pass through. The Voter Registration Act of 1965 did not get the ballyhoo of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which was supposed to be the last word in emancipation; still the vote law was expected to work wonders. It hasn't. Johnson's underlying suspicion of civil rights is once again coming to the top. Just as he helped gut "his" civil rights bill of 1957 by supporting the amendment denying the attorney general enforcement powers, and just as, in 1960, he led opposition to giving the attorney general the right to bring civil rights lawsuits (he voted with the South on thirteen of the nineteen amendments to the bill that year), Johnson is still holding the attorney general's office almost powerless.

Not only has Katzenbach refused (on the President's orders, surely) to send more than a skeleton crew of registrars into the South, he has rendered useless the Community Relations Service—which Johnson, in a cruel moment, transferred from the Commerce Department to the Justice Department. Can one imagine any aroused community in the South negotiating through the hated Justice Department?

And the powers given to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare for cutting off federal funds to schools that don't integrate were once hailed as the mightiest integrating tool made by the Act of 1964. This might have proved to be true, if Johnson had used the powers. On the contrary, Southern school systems sent in "integration" plans that kept Negro children as isolated as lepers, but the plans were accepted in Washington.

Now the Administration is passing along the word that it would favor a new civil rights law in the next session, this time to give Negroes and civil rights workers the protection of a federal law against racial murder and racial assault. Is this to be another inoperative benevolence? Pat Watters, one of the Southern Regional Council's spokesmen, recently wrote a letter to The New York Times suggesting that instead of passing more and more laws, it might be nice for a change just to enforce the laws already on the books.

One might propose starting out, for example, with an enforcement of the second section of the 14th Amendment, which warns that "when the right to vote . . . is denied . . . or in any way abridged . . ." a state's representation in Congress will be cut proportionately. Johnson may think that's something the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party cooked up, but it has been in the Constitution since 1868—and hasn't been used yet. A conspiracy law was passed in 1870 to protect Negroes against assault and murder, yet only now, and timidly, is it being applied. Why pass more laws covering the same field? Just to show the Negroes what a swell guy Lyndon really is, at heart, even if he doesn't think it politically wise to enforce the laws once they're passed?

As for the anti-poverty program, that has become notoriously loaded at the executive level with political pay-offs and goof-offs. For every Headstart program that shows good results—and some of the children do show a 10-point-I.Q. rise after going through Headstart—there is a dismal and inefficient Camp Kilmer. From Syracuse to Chicago and points south one hears the old refrain that city hall is keeping the poor folks out of the management of the program because they might get independent.

A few weeks ago, down on The Ranch, one of LBJ's visitors was H. B. (Pat) Zachry, a multimillionaire builder from San Antonio. During the visit Johnson started talking about what the millionaire could do to help the morale of the poor Latins on San Antonio's west side. "I wish you would tell the Mexicans to get out and work with the grass, to prune the trees, to work with the flowers," said Johnson, getting preachy, as he is wont to do. "Tell them that's how you got started, Pat. Tell them to work with the soil, Pat. Tell them that's where you started, with the soil—and now you're a millionaire. Tell 'em that, Pat. They want to hear that, Pat. They want to be told that, Pat. You started with the soil and now you're a millionaire."

It's that simple. Just because your father and your grandfather and your great-grandfather "worked in the soil" all their lives without getting a nickel ahead, that doesn't mean you can't do it. Hit the migrant trail again—and remember Pat. What kind of anti-poverty program can you expect from a man who thinks like that?

Johnson's legislation to outlaw water pollution has been gushed over as opening a new era of cleanliness. Such judgment is, at best, premature. The new act is usually described as an enforcement of minimum federal standards for water purity. Since industry is looked upon as being the source of two-thirds of the pollution, the burden of reform will be borne by industry—if the act is enforced.

But what are the minimum federal standards that would be applied through this new act? The Public Health Service tells me they do not yet exist. And how would they be enforced, if they did exist? Well, first of all, under terms of the act, no enforcement at all will be attempted for a couple of years. After that, violators can drag it out through the usual hearings and then go into court. If, at last, they lose, what will be the penalty? None of the officials assigned to the program to whom I talked seemed to know. But one thing a high official of the Public Health Service did know was: "We aren't about to try to enforce pollution laws in fifty states. We just don't have the manpower."

So that leaves the new law just as strong as a state's determination to enforce its anti-pollution laws—which is notoriously so weak that the problem had to be brought to the federal level. Already big industry is resisting. At a national water conference of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce recently, industry leaders said the new law is "un-realistically" demanding, and they agreed that if any money is spent to correct waste disposal, the taxpayer, not industry, should put it out.

Interior Secretary Stewart Udall says he badly needs suggestions on how to carry out the jerry-built Solid Waste Disposal Act. Anybody, just anybody, please write. Officials who will handle the highway beautification program have indicated that they too aren't quite sure how to proceed.

A mildly addled tremor runs through the structure. Stop everything, the Budget Bureau tells the Small Business Administration, until we figure out what's going on over there. Some other departments learn of Johnson policies via news leaks. Dean Rusk doodles while his State Department tries to decide what the departure of McGeorge Bundy means: will it regain powers it can use in its constant bickering with the Defense Department, or will Johnson throw in Bundy's old duties as a little something extra for Jake Jacobsen to handle on the side, between patronage trips?

Meanwhile, true to his impulse to "tell 'em what they want to hear," LBJ gets ready to crank out some more noble pieces of legislation for the next Congress.

Among these, amazingly enough, will be a cold-war GI bill. Isn't that the bill Johnson opposed so bitterly in 1965? Isn't that the bill he sent Veterans Administration and Defense Department and Bureau of the Budget officials to testify against? Yes. And some beautifully wacky testimony they gave. There was Arthur W. Farmer, one of the VA's deputy chiefs, who argued that the vets of today do not merit such schooling because their term of service is shorter (when, actually, they serve an average of six months longer than the Korean vet, who had the GI benefits). Farmer's strength on the witness stand wilted when, under committee grilling, he admitted he didn't even know at what age men are now drafted!

And there was Brig. Gen. William W. Berg, who spoke for the Defense Department and for his Commander in Chief. Why did he not want a GI bill? Because, said Berg, if the draftees knew they could get some schooling when they left the service, they might be less inclined to re-enlist. Of course, only 10 per cent of the draftees re-enlist as it is.

Nevertheless, despite this opposition, Sen. Ralph Yarborough of Texas got the bill through the Senate, as he had done on two other occasions, with the assistance this time of Sen. Robert Kennedy of New York. Any troubles they might have faced in the House now can be forgotten. LBJ is taking over. Reportedly he will make the GI bill a part of his "program."

Why the about-face? There are two reasons. First, it will allow Johnson to take credit away from Yarborough, whom he dislikes very much, and from Kennedy, ditto. Yarborough is the spokesman for the Texas liberals, a group whose relationship with Johnson has traditionally been one of mutual suspicion.

But the main reason for Johnson's change is that all popular discussions of the Vietnam problem have moved from the rational sphere of foreign-policy debate to the emotional sphere of love-the-servicemen. Johnson will ride any national emotion. The time is right for a new GI bill, and Johnson is always ready when the time is right.

When Harry Truman asked help for his national health insurance program, Johnson's response was: "I want no part of socialized medicine. . . . The democratic answer to this form of socialism is more hospitals, more doctors, more nurses." He did not lift a hand to help, even behind the scene, until the field had been plowed and fertilized and planted and contoured for twenty years—by others—and finally the time was right for him to step in and reap the crop. And with just the same deliberate sense of timing he reaped the civil rights crop. Now he is ready to put his name to the cold-war GI bill, and carry away the credit.

That's how, in the midst of confusion and double talk, legends of the Great Leader are made. That's how, incidentally, the nation will get peace out of Johnson, if it ever does. When he hears that the people really want peace, he'll give it to them.

The Messianic Pose

POST-COLD-WAR DELUSIONS

H. Stuart Hughes

Not since the McCarthy era—now more than a decade in the past—has the American intellectual's attitude toward his government been so charged with distaste and fear as it is today. The Vietnamese war is without precedent in the way it has split university and official thinking. The beginnings of the rupture were apparent in the teach-in movement last spring. Although the center of gravity of those performances oscillated between disinterested inquiry and exhortation—on some campuses the emphasis inclining toward "factual" presentation, on others toward polemic—on balance the critics of Administration policy figured far more prominently than its defenders. Since the President's midsummer announcement that the country had crossed the threshold into a Korea-type war, the lines of cleavage have become still sharper. Frustration at its failure to have any influence whatsoever in Washington has added new bitterness to the tone and range of intellectual opposition.

Although this situation is almost without precedent in American history, it is perfectly familiar in the European democratic tradition. Across the Atlantic, expressed opposition to one's country's government in time of war—and especially of colonial war—is an accepted and honorable course of action. In Britain, there have been the examples of the Boer War and Suez; in France, the more protracted intellectual struggle against the war

---

H. Stuart Hughes, author of Consciousness and Society and other works, is professor of history at Harvard University. In 1962 he ran as an independent candidate for the United States Senate from Massachusetts.

Vicky, London Evening Standard: Ben Roth

"Let This Session of Congress Be Known as the Session—which Declared All-Out War on Human Poverty."—Lyndon B. Johnson in Algeria. In all these cases, the articulate opposition was a small minority: the national "consensus" was overwhelmingly bellicose. But the opponents of the war refused to be overawed by the weight of numbers. They felt that they had a more discriminating sense of the issues at stake, and that in the end the judgment of posterity would prove them right. In this latter expectation they were not mistaken.

I suggest that such is the case in America today. On any simple count of heads, the opponents of the war in Vietnam are pitifully weak. Why, then, do the President and his advisers become so nettled by what they say? It is not so much the expert opinion and the prominent names which the opposition can muster that give it an importance beyond its numbers. It is rather the sense it conveys of knowing that it is right—while the spokesmen of the Administration sound blundering and hesitant.

The opposition believes that it is right in the sense of having a clearer and less provincial view of the contemporary world than the President and his advisers. It feels that it is both more responsible and more aware of the long-range interests of its own country and of humanity at large. It is totally unimpressed by the argument that in a military sense "our side" can "win" the war since it sees little point in holding by force a heap of ruins in Southeast Asia. It considers itself in no way extremist: in terms of a world rather than an American ideological spectrum, it places the Administration on the far-right fringe and itself in the moderate center. All this would perhaps be clearer to the public at large if our country had not entered the war over so long a period and by such carefully graduated stages that it was next to impossible to find a single agreed-on moment at which to sound the alarm.

What in retrospect looks like the decisive step was the start of the bombing of North Vietnam last February. This turn of events caught most of the Administration's potential critics by surprise (my own first reaction was incredulity), for the bombing came at the end of the quietest two and a half years of the entire post-1945 era. The twenty-eight months following the Cuban missile crisis had beguiled a great many of us into a mood of deceptive security. In this period the American peace organizations began to feel that the tide was at last turning in their favor: the euphoria produced by the partial test ban of August, 1963, set these groups a paradoxical problem; their membership began to fall away as the less committed drew the hasty conclusion that their goal had been achieved.

Besides the test ban and President Kennedy's speech at American University two months earlier, which had sketched the outlines of a new course in foreign policy, two further changes had come about with less public fanfare. The first was a substantial alteration in Catholic sentiment following the publication of Pope John's last encyclical, Pacem in Terris; the second was the hesitant beginnings of a "peace bloc" in the United States Senate. This latter consisted for the most part of freshman members, but it also included the two veteran nonconformists, Senators Clark and Morse, and it could sometimes count on a representative of the inner circle itself when Senator Fulbright chose to speak his mind.

Even before the signing of the test ban, then, there was evidence that peace was becoming not only a respectable issue but even popular. Positions which a year earlier had been considered politically suicidal (witness my own experience as a Senatorial candidate) could now be advanced with impunity by independent-minded but perfectly realistic members of the Senate. What earlier had been the wildest heresies were starting to sound like simple common sense on Capitol Hill. Almost from the moment of his installation in office, President Johnson began to echo them himself. (This was the era of such films as Dr. Strangelove and Seven Days in May, whose public showing—let alone their box-office success—would have been unthinkable in the 1950s.) In the campaign of 1964, one of Johnson's fringe advantages over Goldwater was the fact that he had the peace sentiment on his side.

With these two and a half years behind them, it was understandable that those who had backed the President as a man of peace should have felt betrayed by his escalation in Vietnam. And their sense of betrayal grew to fury with the Dominican intervention two months later. But should they—we—have been quite so surprised? If we take another look at the "good period" from late 1962 to early 1965, I think we shall find that the course of events was not quite so favorable to us as we thought at the time. The new détente with the Soviet Union did not extend much beyond a tacit agreement to refrain from nuclear threats. On the great question that was displacing the danger of nuclear holocaust as the major international obsession—the "wars of liberation"—the two powers were as far apart as ever.

Even in Europe, the only part of the world where the détente was fully operative, the American Administration was pursuing policies that alarmed a number of its allies and all the Eastern European states. It was in this era that our country's quarrel with de Gaulle grew envenomed; it was in this era that the project for a multilateral nuclear force was hatched. Neither President Kennedy nor President Johnson seemed to realize the full implications of the Europeans' newly independent and newly self-confident situation. In the underdeveloped world, the best that can be said is that nothing very dire happened; but in Vietnam the time bomb was quietly ticking away. While President Kennedy made a start toward a more understanding policy in Latin America, the basic American assumptions about the formerly colonial nations were never subjected to the kind of radical critique that might have revealed their inapplicability to the third quarter of the 20th century.

The international ground gained in the twenty-eight months of calm is by no means totally lost. Despite the recent buffeting to which it has been subjected, much of the new cordiality in Soviet-American relations has persisted: the "parallel action" of the two countries at the time of the India-Pakistan hostilities has been rightly cited as an encouraging case in point. In Europe, the détente is still the overriding fact of life. Indeed, the chief complaint which European friends lodge against our country's current policy in Vietnam is that it endangers a relationship with Russia which seems to them infinitely more precious than any presumed gain to be derived from further fighting in Asia.

A trip to Europe last summer gave me a chance to hear such complaints on the spot. The inadvisability of the war in Vietnam was assumed without discussion by nearly all my hosts: the variations came only in the relative weight given to conservative or "progressive" arguments. Thus it was curious to find that irreproachably respectable officials in France shared with their Communist counterparts in Yugoslavia a common assessment of the world ideological landscape. This assessment was arrestingly different from the picture presented in our country's public propaganda: two discrepancies struck me with particular force.

First, there was the assumption—present in the atmosphere even when not explicitly mentioned—that the cold war was a thing of the past. From this perspective, the great event of the past twenty years is a kind of non-event: the avoidance of war between the Soviet Union and the United States. Different people offer different reasons for the happy outcome, but most ascribe it to a mixture of luck and forbearance at the critical moment—most notably on the part of the United States during the Hungarian rebellion of 1956, and on the part of the Soviet Union at the time of the Cuban missile crisis in 1962. Now that the once "inevitable" war has been staved off for nearly a generation, Europeans find it increasingly logical to surmise that it will never occur. And the natural corollary of such a conclusion is the hope that a similar détente can be achieved after a further generation of standoff between the United States and China.

The second European assumption is that revolutionary "wars of liberation" are a normal phenomenon of the mid-20th century and should be anticipated in most of the underdeveloped world. Some Europeans greet such movements with approval—more, perhaps, with indifference or hostility—but few underrate their potential or make much of a point of whether they originate inside or outside the country in question. Citizens of formerly colonial powers have had ample experience with the strength of indigenous revolutionary forces, and they sometimes take malicious pleasure in watching Americans squirm in the same kind of agonizing situations overseas that brought their own countries into ideological disrepute a decade or two ago. Such comparisons jar on American ears, but they are only the natural response to the moral scoldings we used to give Britain and France for their colonial misdemeanors.

In this perspective, the Soviet Union appears in the most advantageous light that it has enjoyed since the Second World War. Admittedly there are real—and perhaps growing—difficulties in Russia's international situation today. Both Soviet and Western European spokesmen keep voicing their concern as to how much longer the USSR can stay out of the Vietnamese struggle. But the very terms in which this worry is expressed suggest the strength of the Russian position. The usual picture that emerges—both East and West—of what used to be called the "iron curtain"—is of a long-suffering power which with the greatest difficulty is barely managing to maintain its international equilibrium against almost intolerable pressures and provocations; in short, of a massive force for moderation and restraint. Such a view puts the Soviet Union close to the "vital center" of the world ideological spectrum, with the United States and China on the wings as the two extremist powers that threaten the peace.

Few Americans can be expected to take so unflattering a view of their country's current situation vis-à-vis "world opinion"; and the picture is unquestionably exaggerated. At the same time, it is more accurate than the conventional line of Messrs. Johnson, Rusk, McNamara, et al., that the United States has first call on international virtue and that its policies find substantial backing in the rest of the world. The American view of the matter is parochial—the European view has a wider historical focus. Or, more precisely, the American attitude rests on a narrow understanding of the history of our country alone and on nostalgia for a period—the late 18th century—when the United States was in a very real sense the chosen vessel for the hopes of mankind. It takes the more comparative (and disabused) historical experience of the Europeans to show us how far 20th-century reality has outstripped the inherited rhetoric with which we deck our international doings.

Since I began mulling over these speculations last summer, the second (and decisive) coup d'état in Brazil has underlined their urgency. When the Castelo Branco government first came to power, its ultimate intentions remained unclear; many informed and liberal-spirited Americans were inclined to give it the benefit of the doubt and to stress the irresponsible character of its predecessor. Today such a guarded judgment is no longer possible: the events of last autumn have demonstrated beyond reasonable question that the rulers of Brazil had no hesitation about destroying what remained of democratic procedures—and that they were backed by the American Embassy along the way.

Thus Brazil has been added to the melancholy succession of Cuba, Vietnam and the Dominican Republic. Potentially, it is by far the most important in the series. True, an American military intervention has not yet occurred, but the most cursory reading of our Administration's public pronouncements leaves no doubt that it would take such action in the face of any widespread Brazilian revolt. It is unnecessary to detail the tragic effects that would ensue from such interference. Suffice it to warn, as our French friends already do, that Brazil—still more than Vietnam—could become America's Algeria.

In Vietnam, in Cuba—now in Brazil—the press revelations of the past few weeks have proved that the truth is even worse than the critics of the Johnson Administration have claimed. Those (like myself) who have tried to be fair-minded have been shown their error. Others who suspected that their government was not telling the whole story have been themselves surprised by the scale of the deception practiced upon them. With each week that passes, our government strays farther off course, as its statements both of fact and of ideology lose contact with any picture of the world that the rest of mankind can recognize.

It will take something more than a face-saving device to rescue us—to salvage the remnants of our psychological credit abroad. Not until we abandon the anachronisms of our Messianic pose, not until we cut our losses in Vietnam and resolve to refrain from the same errors again, can we begin the painful process of readjustment to the international and moral realities of our time.

Two NATION Portraits

Frederick Law Olmsted: Launching The Nation

Robert Fridlington

This article and the one that follows it complete the series of Nation biographies prepared as part of the magazine's observation of its centenary. Normally, the affairs of a publication are not thought an apt subject for journalism, but it seemed to us that, once in a hundred years, a magazine of opinion should examine the tradition from which it stems. It gives us satisfaction — mixed with some ironic amusement—that for the most part these sketches have been critical of the men and women they commemorated. A magazine that is quick to criticize the society in which it lives has a special responsibility to be critical of itself. In that regard, The Nation will continue in the future as it has operated in the past. — The Editors

In early May, 1863, Edwin L. Godkin wrote to a friend: "I have been thinking and talking a great deal about a first class weekly paper ever since I saw you. . . ." But Godkin was not sure that the friend shared his enthusiasm. "I don't know," he continued, "whether you were in joke or earnest in saying you would go into such a scheme with me; but if in earnest, I need hardly say, I should be very glad to make some such arrangement." As it happened, Godkin's friend, Frederick Law Olmsted, was very much in earnest. Thus was marked the incipience of the "weekly paper" that would be The Nation.

Frederick Law Olmsted is remembered today as the father of American landscape architecture. Central Park in New York is probably his best-known work, but he left many monuments to his greatness as an artist. He created lovely parks in the urban jungles of cities throughout the country; he designed campuses from Yale and Princeton in the East to Stanford and California in the West; and he fashioned dozens of other scenic landscapes, including Capitol Hill in Washington, D.C.

The son of a wealthy dry-goods merchant, Olmsted was born in Hartford, Conn., in 1822. His ultimate success in landscape architecture represents only one phase of a varied and versatile career. He was a distinguished writer; his three books of travel through the Southern United States—A Journey in the Seaboard Slave States (1856), A Journey Through Texas (1857) and A Journey in the Back Country (1860)—are classics of social observation. A political activist and a violent foe of slavery expansion, Olmsted labored hard for the free-soil cause in the 1850s. He was also a humanitarian, whose achievements as general secretary of the United States Sanitary Commission—the "Red Cross" of the American Civil War — have never been fully appreciated.

---

Robert Fridlington teaches in the History Department at Newark State College.

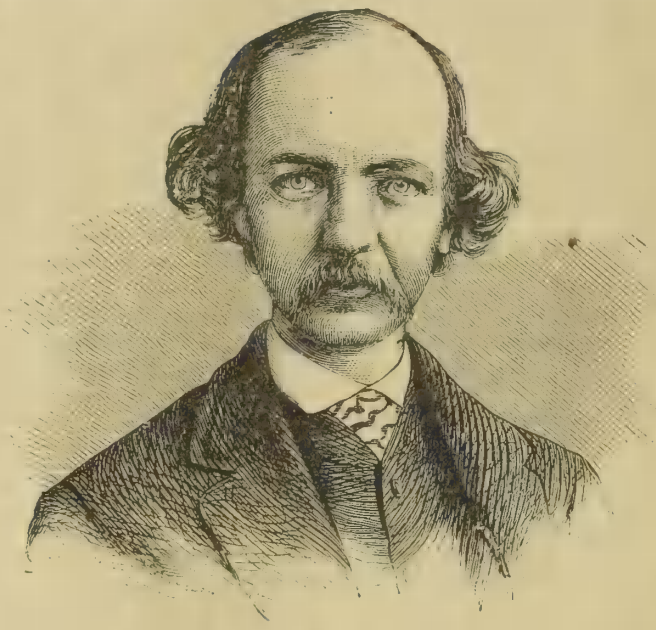
Olmsted and Godkin met in 1856, shortly after the latter's arrival in the United States. Olmsted, the elder by nearly ten years, was attracted by Godkin's eloquence, wit and European sophistication. For his part, the younger man was impressed by Olmsted's knowledge of political affairs and by his reasoned judgments. "There are," Godkin later wrote, "very few men in America—I know of none—who bring theories to bear as well on the practice of politics as Olmsted." The initial friendship grew with each passing year, for the two men shared the same intellectual interests. Both had been reared in the traditions of the classical economists; both regarded John Stuart Mill as their prophet. They saw eye to eye on matters of politics, economics and social problems. But there was one difference: Olmsted, the largely self-taught dilettante, lived in a ferment of intellectual quest and artistic experiment; Godkin, the university-educated journalist, reconciled his broader interests with the pursuit of a single career and a single, articulate point of view.

When Godkin proposed the "first class weekly paper" in 1863, Olmsted was particularly receptive. He had long recognized the need for a critical journal that would act as an opinion maker among America's intellectuals. It should be patterned, he believed, after the best English reviews and be devoted to politics, literature and the arts. Now, however, Olmsted saw the opportunity to dedicate such a publication to an even nobler purpose. Aimed at the educated citizenry, the paper would serve the cause of the Union and act as an outspoken friend of the Negro.

Although the paper was initially conceived as a joint project, Olmsted soon took sole charge. The reasons for this are easily understood. Godkin was an excellent newspaper man and would become a great editor. But as his later career bore out, he had little interest in the business side of publishing. He was, moreover, virtually a stranger to the intellectual circles of the East. Olmsted, on the other hand, delighted in planning and organizing, and he had the contacts to raise the necessary money. In the initial plan for the paper, Olmsted would be the publisher and would insist upon ultimate control of the publication. Godkin would serve as editor.



Frederick Law Olmsted

On June 25, the week before Gettysburg, Olmsted presented an informal prospectus, which he and Godkin had drawn up, to a group of potential investors in New York. The major purpose of the publication, the prospectus stated, "would be to secure a more careful, accurate and elaborate discussion of political, economical, and commercial topics than is possible in the columns of the daily press. . . ." In order that such intentions not be taken lightly, it added: "If this purpose should, at first thought, be considered quixotic, it must be remembered that while, four years ago, intelligent men could avoid giving much consideration to questions of government and legislation, this is no longer the case; henceforward they must give consideration to these questions or prepare themselves to accept the destruction of their country." The journal would give full support to the government in the war and would oppose all those advocating States' rights and the maintenance of slavery. In addition, it would contain articles of literary and scientific importance, book reviews and critiques of dramatic and musical performances.

To get the journal started, Olmsted needed $30,000. He hoped to raise half this sum in New York and the remainder in New England, where Charles Eliot Norton had promised to help. But the search for money was interrupted by the violent draft riots that swept New York in the middle of July. The men of wealth, upon whom Olmsted was counting, either left the city or turned their attention to more pressing matters. By the first of August only $3,000 had been pledged.

At this juncture Olmsted was offered the position of superintendent of the Mariposa Mining Estates in California, a huge complex of mining and commercial enterprises comprising an entire county and possessing a tenant population of some 7,000 persons. The decision was difficult to make. Olmsted desperately wanted to be of service to the nation during the war and in the great task of reconstruction ahead. His friends—Godkin, Norton and others—urged him to consider carefully before making a decision that would remove him to the West. Prospects in New York, however, were intangible; the California offer was immediate and quite tangible—his salary would be $10,000 a year and he would receive $100,000 in stock. Moreover, the offer came at a time when Olmsted was worried and despondent. The newspaper project was not going as well as he had hoped. His services with the Sanitary Commission had been at considerable personal sacrifice, and he was deeply in debt. His health, never strong, had been further impaired by his unremitting efforts on behalf of the commission, and there was the chance that the mountain air of the West might help him regain it. Concern for health and fortune dictated the decision. In September, Olmsted sailed for California, leaving Godkin to push the publishing project through to completion.

Godkin's progress was even slower and more difficult than Olmsted's had been. Olmsted had introduced him to Norton, who provided inestimable assistance; but this was not enough. Godkin was an Irishman, or an Englishman (or both, which was worse still), depending on one's point of view. The respectable men of wealth, who might have backed a Connecticut Yankee, were reluctant to underwrite the venture for someone of such suspicious lineage. Then, in the spring of 1865, the Philadelphia abolitionist, James Miller McKim, came to Godkin's rescue. McKim was trying to found a publication to represent the interests of the freedmen—and, incidentally, to create an editorial position for Wendell Phillips Garrison, who was about to become his son-in-law. Hearing of Godkin's project, McKim proposed they join forces. With McKim's support, solid financial backing, much of it from other abolitionists, was soon secured.

Just as the first issue of The Nation appeared in July, 1865, Olmsted was planning to return to New York. The Mariposa venture had been a failure, and Olmsted was coming back to the position he had held before the war, architect of Central Park. But responding to Godkin's plea for assistance, he also accepted an associate editorship on The Nation, with the understanding that he would stay on only as long as the park project would allow.

For the few months that Olmsted held his post with The Nation, he rendered valuable assistance, relieving Godkin of many of his duties and going over all editorial material with him. He also acted as mediator in a dispute between Godkin and a group of dissident stockholders that threatened to destroy the magazine before it became established. But his stay with The Nation was brief. Central Park demanded more and more of his time. At the end of the first year of publication, Olmsted resigned. The rest of his life was devoted to landscape architecture.

After leaving The Nation, Olmsted contributed only a handful of articles to its pages, either correspondence of passing interest or reviews of books on landscaping. He continued, however, to be a warm supporter of the reform principles Godkin advocated. During the fifteen years before Henry Villard bought the magazine, when Godkin labored under constant financial difficulties, Olmsted persistently urged his friend to continue, regardless of cost. When, for example, Harvard offered Godkin a chair of history in 1870, Olmsted advised him to accept only if he could retain direction of the magazine. If he could not, said Olmsted, "give up the professorship, for The Nation is worth many professorships." Then he added, probably with a pang of guilt: "It is a question of loyalty over a question of comfort."

Olmsted meant loyalty to the principles for which The Nation stood. Like many of his background, he was profoundly disturbed by the changes taking place in America. The materialism of the age and the corruption of postwar politics outraged him. The Nation was the last clear voice of reason. It represented the old traditions of high-minded public service, limited government and natural law. Olmsted and Godkin were both attached to the old traditions. Olmsted tagged himself a "socialist democrat" and Godkin called himself a "radical"; but under any label both men were conservatives. They looked backward, not forward. Theirs was a socialist democracy that abandoned the struggle for the rights of the freedmen. Theirs was a radicalism that led to unabashed admiration of that portly profile in courage, Grover Cleveland.

They sought a society dedicated to the old traditions, a society of scrupulously clean, efficient government, where public office would be a post of honor and where both politician and entrepreneur would be gentlemen. Though they did not fully recognize the fact, they wanted a society of the countryside and the small town—small not in the sense of Gopher Prairie but in the sense of Brookline, Mass., where Olmsted made his home, or Cambridge, where Godkin retreated in the 1870s. Only in such centers would government be so intimate that its members could hold one another to a high standard of personal honor rather than a mere technical conscientiousness. Here there would be no slums crying for corruption and boss rule. Only here could the very physical structure of society be graceful, mannered and leisurely.

Godkin's convictions led him into a blunt defiance of political and social realities. To a nation facing labor unrest, agrarian discontent, the expanding power of business, urban problems, and the manifold other issues of a new era, he preached tariff revision, civil service reform, hard money and Mugwump pieties. These could neither recapture the paradise lost nor solve the immediate problems confronting the country. Indeed, by advocating the rights of property, limited government and laissez faire, he ultimately served the ends of one of the forces he most diligently opposed—big business.

Olmsted's career as a landscape architect was perhaps more consistent with the implications of his social philosophy. In his work he would, in effect, carry out a direct assault on the industrial city. In the very centers of an urban culture he would locate and preserve the sights and associations of the Arcadian, pre-industrial America he loved. He thus became a Johnny Appleseed of scenic beauty, planting his parks and landscapes from coast to coast.

His work was also a portent of the future. He pioneered in the constructions of vast public pleasure grounds for the urban masses and, in changing the physical contours of urban culture, he approached modern city planning. But Olmsted changed only the face of the city; his laissez-faire philosophy precluded tampering with the vital organs of society. No more than Godkin did Olmsted perceive the implications of the new age. No more than Godkin could he have advocated a truly radical reform of 19th-century America.

Jessie White Mario: Victorian in Italy

Elizabeth A. Daniels

An obituary written by W. P. Garrison for the March 15, 1906 Nation drew attention to the death of Jessie Meriton White Mario, who had served as the magazine's correspondent on Italian affairs almost from its first issue:

> For forty years this name has been familiar by its initials, to readers of the Nation. . . . Last week we published her animated account of the new Italian ministry.
>
> . . . Two days before her letter appeared in the Nation, her funeral procession, as the Evening Post's London correspondent telegraphs, "passed the Casa Guidi in Florence, which was decorated in honor of the centenary of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. The association was just, as well as striking. . . ." Ever her thoughts were with the great idealist leaders of the Italian new birth, and she played the part of Old Mortality in editing their writings or memoirs. . . .
>
> To our deep regret we never met this admirable woman, an honor to her sex and to Britain's great name for ardent, world-wide philanthropy. She had a soul sensitive to all misery: our readers will recall her exposition of the horrors of the subterranean life of Naples, of the sulphur mines of Sicily. She was responsive to every proletary movement for relief from oppression or distress, though opposed to violence in the justest cause. . . .

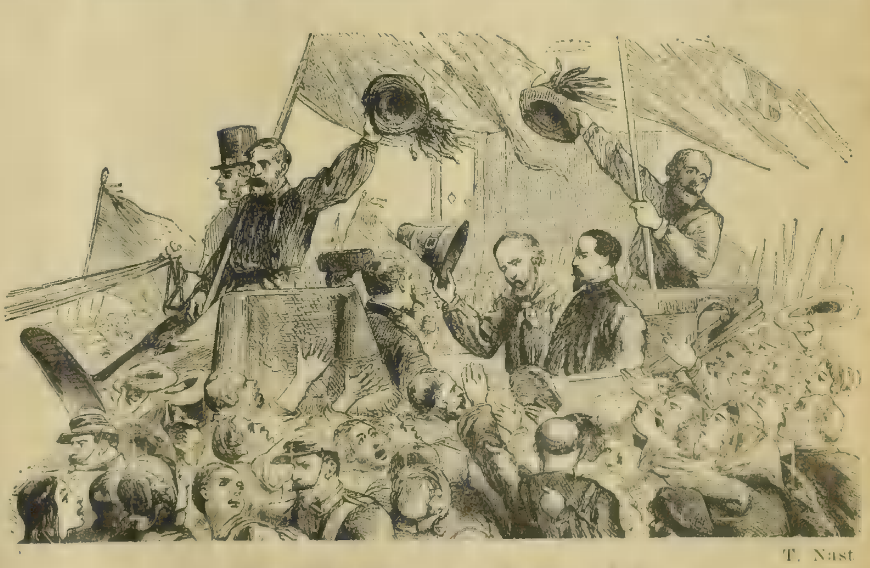
The Nation had chosen for its first Italian correspondent one of England's unusual Victorians. She was the most vigorous and versatile of a handful of women who, in the 1850s, had passionately thrown themselves into the work of the Friends of Italy Society. So impressive was the fervor of that group of revolutionary disciples, who thought of themselves as "possessed" by the "angel," that George Meredith undoubtedly drew on them as a composite model for the patriotic heroine of his Italian revolutionary novel, Vittoria. After the days of unification were over, however, and Mazzini and Garibaldi had failed to establish a republic, Jessie was able to transfer her interest to the larger challenge of the problems of the new kingdom. In her 143 articles written for The Nation between 1866 and 1906, she awakened her readers to the discrepancies between the ideal and the actual. Croce thought of her as an optimist, but when one looks back at her continuously serious criticism of the many ills besetting the new country, it can be seen that she was a realist. Jessie Mario never forgot her dreams of what Italy might have been had the Mazzinian republic materialized, but she pushed them to the side. Because she had had such a basic experience in Italian affairs, her strong sympathies with the objectives of Italian "reconstruction" permeated her Nation correspondence.

Jessie White, the child of a British loading-dock builder, Thomas White, and his American wife, Jane Teage Meriton, was born in Gosport, near Portsmouth, on May 9, 1832. Her father had an overweening preoccupation with religion, but also possessed a liberal political outlook. Even before 1848, he was interested in the stirrings on the Continent, and in that year of revolution he went to Paris to see for himself what was taking place. He apparently encouraged the members of his family to think independently about political and social change. Jessie was bright and very self-willed, and it was soon clear that she was too much for her family to manage. Her father recognized in her a lively intellectual curiosity, however, and was interested in fostering it. When a new young clergyman with advanced social ideas and a charted course of ranging ethical reforms came to Gosport in 1846, Jessie attached herself to him and begged him to teach her all he knew. (She echoed his views in a short story that she published in Eliza Cook's Journal in 1853.) John Daniel Morell was much too liberal for Gosport, and was shortly dismissed from his pulpit; but he started Jessie on her self-education. He persuaded her father to send her to Birmingham to attend the classes of George Dawson, who had recently begun experiments in the education of adults of both sexes. Jessie went from an ever-broadening experience in Birmingham to the Sorbonne, where she read philosophy and political economy with Cousin, the virtual head of the university, and where she encountered Lamennais, Beranger and many of the other liberals of the times. She was by then seriously interested in what she could learn of the revolution stirring in Italy.

In 1854, Jessie accompanied a woman named Emma Roberts, who was "engaged" to Garibaldi, on a trip to his home in Sardinia, and thence to Italy proper. Garibaldi was exiled on his island and could not himself travel through Italy; but he was interested in furthering



T. Nast

Garibaldi's Entry into Naples: 1860

Elizabeth A. Daniels, professor of English at Vassar College, is now completing a biography of Jessie White Mario.

Jessie's knowledge of the country, and saw to it that the women were introduced to patriotic Italians who could show them the signs of brewing trouble. When Jessie returned to England in 1855, she had apparently decided that she wanted to work for the cause of freedom in Italy. Garibaldi advised her to get some practical training in medicine, so that she could be prepared to alleviate the suffering in the bitter wars that he felt sure were coming. Through the influence of a doctor friend, she registered at the University of London; but after she had taken courses for a few months, she discovered that the university was unwilling to offer her a degree and she abandoned her formal study. At this time she became associated with the Ashursts, the English family that was the nucleus of the Friends of Italy group, and Mazzini's patrons. Through Emilia Ashurst, Jessie met Mazzini and decided to join his "movement."

Suddenly she was plunged into Italian affairs. At Garibaldi's suggestion, she translated Orsini's hair-raising Austrian Dungeons in Italy in 1856. To the work itself, she appended her own passionately idealistic preface. The book was a bestseller, running to 35,000 copies that year. Mazzini was never one to make light demands on those who offered to serve him, and although he was initially somewhat irritated by Jessie White's insistence on doing everything at once, he soon discovered that she was a versatile and willing worker. Within a few months, he involved her in a piece of revolutionary complicity. With one of his followers, Carlo Pisacane, he had decided upon a plan of capturing some ships in the harbor of Genoa, transporting ammunition and supplies in them to the lower coast of Spezia where, it was assumed, the local peasants would respond instantaneously to the invitation to revolt from the Bourbons. In this way he expected the Italian revolution might begin anew. Mazzini asked Jessie to apply for a commission as a reporter on Italian affairs for the London Daily News, in which role she could go to Genoa and carry out his surreptitious arrangements. Jessie did go to Italy, but without the newspaper commission and when the plot failed, she was tried for complicity and imprisoned in Sant'Andrea. She so irritated Cavour, the Prime Minister of Piedmont, and Sir James Hudson, the British ambassador in Turin, and she seemed so to implicate herself in the testimony that she gave at the tribunal hearing, that it took her several months to gain release from prison.

In Genoa, she had made the acquaintance of Alberto Mario, a Venetian journalist in exile. Mario had spent his life in the revolutionary struggle, but he was a Federalist, rather than a pure Mazzinian. During this era in Italy, however, subtleties of political position had to be subordinated to actual chances for action; and in 1856 Mario was engaged in the support of Mazzini.

Upon the failure of the insurrection, Mario, too, was imprisoned in Sant'Andrea, and before a week had passed, the newly acquainted prisoners were betrothed. They carried on an intensive courtship by the prison grapevine and through daily letters passed back and forth. The letters of courtship went beyond the conventions of love: Alberto gave his future wife a comprehensive course in Italian cultural history, corrected her Italian, and wrote her daily essays on Italian writers of the past and present. After their release from prison, the couple went to England and were married.

Mazzini now employed Jessie as propagandist. For a few months she lectured in England and Scotland on behalf of the Friends. In the fall of 1858, Mazzini decided to send the Marios to America. Through William Ashurst, who had visited William Lloyd Garrison in 1854, there were Mazzinian connections in America, and the leader felt that there was strong untapped support for his cause. In particular, the Abolitionists could be counted on to sympathize with an Italian movement for freedom.

The Marios traveled up and down the eastern seaboard of the United States for almost six months. Always speaking out boldly, and sometimes even recklessly, to influence popular opinion, Jessie gave many public lectures. She and her husband engaged in heated controversy, too, in the letters-to-the-editor columns of the New York daily papers. They lost no chance to draw attention to the repressions in Italy. Alberto did not join his wife on the lecture platform; English was a new language to him, and furthermore, although he was passionately dedicated to Italian freedom, he was considerably cooler than his wife toward Mazzini.

The American visit of the Marios was cut short in May, just as they were about to travel to Cambridge at the invitation of James Russell Lowell. It appeared that at long last the simmering movement for freedom was boiling up in Piedmont. Garibaldi had already been appointed head of a volunteer army, and the Marios did not wish to delay their own enlistment in his ranks.

Returning to the Continent, Jessie and Alberto bided time in Switzerland, retreating there from Italy where they were again temporarily incarcerated as revolutionaries. In Lugano, they edited a contraband newspaper for Mazzini; but Mario now often quarreled with the leader on matters of policy, and accordingly relations were progressively less cordial between Jessie and Mazzini.

When Garibaldi finally summoned the Marios to the Southern campaign, they joined him surreptitiously. Jessie soon organized his ambulance corps, of which she was chief nurse. She often went on the battlefields in Sicily and Naples. She put her earlier medical studies to use in supervising the temporary hospital that was established in the convent of Monte Pellegrino in Palermo. Meanwhile, whenever there was a respite, she investigated local conditions and talked with Sicilians and Neapolitans about their problems and aspirations. These casual observations supplied her with an excellent foundation for her later writing on the depressed conditions of the southern peasants.

When Italy was proclaimed a kingdom (although not yet completely unified) and the new government was being formulated, Jessie and Alberto, after a period of racking indecision, decided to settle permanently in Italy. Alberto was homeless, since Venetia had not yet been liberated, but Jessie was by then thoroughly an Italian by adoption. She had lost her ties with England, and found the Italian people very much to her taste. They responded to her warmly, but always thought her extreme and unpredictable, even for an Englishwoman.

In the summer of 1861, Jessie undertook a job as correspondent for the English Morning Star, for which she traveled in the north and south, enriching her impressions of the people and the country. Later in that year, she wrote an article on American slavery for Politecnico, Carlo Cattaneo's newly reinstituted positivist journal. At one point, she journeyed to Milan to persuade Garibaldi not to think of accepting an offer from Abraham Lincoln to go to America again and lead the Northern troops.

The Marios embarked on their lifelong careers as writers and editors after their return from a lecture trip to England in 1862. From that time, they thought of Italy as their permanent home. They lived sometimes in Florence, the seat of the new government until Rome was wrested from the Pope; sometimes in Rome; and sometimes in Lendinara, where in 1871 an uncle of Alberto left them a small house and garden. They traveled constantly.

In 1866, Jessie began reporting for The Nation. One can guess that she got the job by asking for it when she heard that the magazine had been founded. Her first piece appeared six months after The Nation began publication; it was among the periodical's first articles on foreign affairs. She signed it with the initials "J.W." Subsequently, many of her articles were signed this way, or with "J.W.M." or "W. M."; some were not signed. The first article was characteristic of the other 142 in make-up and subject matter. Entitled "Parties in Italy," it was an analysis of the composition of the new house of Parliament, which had met for the first time two months earlier. She felt that the ministry was not promising and was highly critical of the proposed coalition of the Left and the Right. She raised salient questions about the financial structure of the new kingdom. Like most of her pieces of reporting, this one reflected her search for relevant statistics and interesting details.

During the first three years of The Nation, Jessie wrote constantly of the problems of government, economy and the Church. She examined the condition of the daily press and scrutinized military operations, and crime and poverty. She compared the position of Italian women to that of women in England and America. On all of these matters she had strong views and she made them clear. She told of her visits to manufacturing companies that were experimenting with enlightened policies. She even wrote an article on a new process of mummification. In this early period of her work for The Nation, the editors presented her articles without comment, except for her fifth one, in which she urged that Garibaldi should interfere in the Venetian campaign, and revealed her impatience with the slowness of the constitutional process. The Nation editors took her up on this, pointing out that no one had the right to wage a private war.

After the first eighteen articles, Jessie's correspondence ceased for a decade; she did not appear again in The Nation until 1880. There seems to be no reason for this lapse, except that she was doing many other things. During the first part of the decade she accompanied Garibaldi to Republican France, from where she reported his part in the campaign against Prussia for the Scotsman. Her articles were written from Autun, Dijon and other significant campaign sites; she elaborated the series and published them as a book entitled I garabaldini. They are the most authoritative record of Garibaldi's ill-conceived and unsuccessful French mission. During this decade, too, she wrote and published a biography of Cattaneo and La Miseria di Napoli, a moving description of slums and poverty based on her own research and observation. In this period, a nervous disease incapacitated three fingers of one hand. She found it increasingly difficult to use her typewriter, which she had acquired in the sixties, and began to employ the services of an amanuensis.

Nevertheless, she resumed her articles for The Nation with the issue of December 23, 1880. By this time, she had become increasingly aware of the split in Italy between the more prosperous north and the impoverished south, and of the lack of responsible leadership in government. These became her dominant themes for the next twenty years.

The Nation's editors complemented her view of Italy with articles by William J. Stillman and his wife, Marie Spartali; William Roscoe Thayer; and Luigi Villari. Stillman and his wife wrote primarily about the antiquities of Italy; Villari, about books on art and literature. Thayer addressed himself to a broad spectrum of subjects. For the more thorough coverage of current events and developments, the magazine relied on Jessie, whose exhaustive scrutiny of Italy's condition entitles her to be thought of as their Italian reporter. On only one more issue did the editors dispute her views. They called upon Stillman, who was very close to Crispi when he was prime minister, to rebut Jessie's sharp criticism of his administration. Jessie distrusted Crispi even though he had formerly been a follower of Mazzini.

Jessie had an accurate sense of what she ought to report to the American people. She often wrote from the scene of an election, a convention or the dedication of a new public service. She collected firsthand impressions through extensive observation and interviewing. Beyond this, since many of the officials of the new government had been her associates at the period of unification, she often had special access to privileged or unpublished information.

Much of this, in fact, was in her own possession. In her spare time, she collected the personal papers of the Risorgimento heroes. These included diaries, letters and unpublished manuscripts. Many of the papers she eventually edited for publication; some she only copied or translated. All of the materials were at her disposal as sources for the generous illustrations and individual narratives which she used to give a sense of immediacy to her writing. Jessie Mario's collection is now in the Risorgimento Archives in Rome, where it provides a grab bag of primary source materials for scholars. (Her collection resembles her writing: a dried drop of Garibaldi's blood is in an envelope alongside a unique copy of a manuscript.) In addition to these documents, Jessie's personal library contained extremely varied holdings in literature, history, economics and reference works. And when one is mentioning sources, finally, Alberto Mario's steadying judgment and scholarly sense must be acknowledged. They probably often saved Jessie embarrassment.

As William Roscoe Thayer said when reviewing Jessie's posthumous Birth of Modern Italy for The Nation in 1909, she wrote with her heart rather than her mind. Yet she managed to convey a relatively disinterested view of what was happening in the new Italy. Although continuing to revere the courageous heroes of the past, every now and then touching off a chord in herself which took her on a sentimental excursion, Jessie moved with relative ease into the new world that she was reporting. She did not care for the form of monarchy; and like her husband, would have preferred a confederation of states, if not a unitarian republic; but that was now out of the question and she knew it. Even so, she felt strongly that Italy would not really be unified until it faced its chronic problems. One problem was the Pope. Jessie detested all things papal. Long after the Pope had been removed from the Quirinal, she continued to point to his inhibiting effects on suffrage, elections, literacy, free speech and education. She realized, too, that post-unification Italy lacked sufficient responsible leadership; men who had been good soldiers were not necessarily good governors. More and more she was impressed by the abysmal split between the comparatively enlightened north and the illiterate south. In Sicily and Naples she was alarmed by the Camorra and the Mafia. Crime was omnipresent, and there were no effective laws to deal with it. And there was overpopulation. Living conditions in the hill grottoes of Naples were bestial. Italy would never prosper, Jessie knew, until these conditions were corrected. Strikes would spread, and socialism would thrive. She felt a tragic contrast between the Italy of the '80s and '90s and Mazzini's new republic!

Jessie's journalism, written in the first person, sometimes seemed to imply a masculine voice; more often it merely suggested a human being of great natural curiosity. In some ways her exposition seemed not up to the honesty of her intelligence. She unhesitatingly "lifted" from her own writings; she poured out the fresh detail of her observations in stock phrases and stock responses. Too much detail, in fact, often weakened her argument, and in her haste to get to her interesting points she often anticipated her punch lines. Her writing was diffuse and rambling; like her mind, it was literal and filled with flat statement. Yet, just as it would have been rewarding to have Jessie, breathless and bursting with observations, as a friend, so her vivid impression of the shifting temper of Italy must have been interesting and informative to the Nation reader.

Godkin, as The Nation's editor, might have had genuine qualms about accepting Jessie as a correspondent. Although feminism was not her "cause," no one could read her work without knowing she was an aggressive exponent of its objectives; and Godkin was not in sympathy with them. Jessie had been a passionate Mazzinian; but the Italy she was to report for The Nation had outgrown Mazzini, and had new problems of adolescence. Godkin must have wanted sound reporting from Italy; he had no special ax to grind for Italy or its problems, and the question of whether Jessie could keep her own preconceptions under control must have been a real concern for an editor. Looking back, however, it seems that Godkin took a good gamble in contracting with this singular woman reporter.

AT&T

THE FOLKSY OCTOPUS . . . . . Desmond Smith

American Telephone & Telegraph, known to most of us as "the telephone company," may be in deep trouble. It stands accused by its long-time thorn-in-the-side, Western Union, of unfair business practices. AT&T, which tends to think of itself as a kind of national shrine—like Grant's Tomb or the Lincoln Memorial — is understandably peeved. The old-line telegraph company, for its part, has been complaining about the Bell System for some time. Until very recently, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), which is supposed to regulate both companies, has looked the other way. Now, with its telegraph-message business in a shambles, Western Union has told the FCC it can hardly continue to sustain this public service unless the telephone company stops its aggressive war on Western Union's "heartland" — its private-wire and data-communication service. The Bell System, naturally, denies all charges. But this time the FCC, under Chairman E. William Henry, has decided to take a close look at AT&T. And it has called for a complete inquiry into the cost, rate and earnings structure of the telephone octopus.

AT&T today is less a company than a quasi-political state. Never in history has a company made so much money—$1.76 billion in profits in 1964. This figure is greater than the combined income of the thirty poorest American states or the five richest. The Bell System's net income, after taxes, roughly equals the national income of Sweden. Moreover, if AT&T, in a fit of madness, were to give away its telephone business, its other activities would still rank it among the twenty biggest U.S. industrial companies. The company owned approximately $3.5 billion worth of cash and marketable securities at the end of 1964. This is despite annual capital expenditures greater than those of most European governments.

The most fascinating thing about these statistics is AT&T's obvious embarrassment when confronted with them. But the phone company gets results by practicing its particular saccharine style. Its performance, on the surface, reminds one of an old Frank Capra scenario. Frederick Kappel, the company's chairman, has been known to answer irate customer mail personally. A man of formidable intelligence,

---

Desmond Smith is a regular contributor to The Economist (London).

Kappel lards his speeches with Boy Scout maxims and folksy phrases. AT&T's headquarters is an aging sandstone building in a sea of cut-rate discount stores on Lower Broadway. "We try to stress we're a community business — you know us, your friendly telephone company," says one Bell executive, "Well, can you imagine what would happen to our image if we put up a seventeen-block head office?" Yet from 195 Broadway, AT&T runs Western Electric (the world's biggest telephone manufacturer), Bell Laboratories (the nation's finest research plant), twenty-one regional telephone companies in forty-eight states, and keeps tabs on some 800,000 employees. Theodore Vail, the company's first president, deliberately created this "federal" structure for AT&T: ". . . each local company occupying its own territory and performing all local functions; the AT&T binding them all together with long-distance lines and looking after the relations between local companies and other companies." As a result of Vail's ingenuity, forty-eight different state regulatory groups have to negotiate separate rates for regional services (only interstate rates are regulated by the FCC). The cash, however, flows back to one source—195 Broadway.

It is just this diffusion of political power that raises the most controversial questions. Wherever one turns these days, AT&T is sure to be part of the scene. Three years ago, Sen. Russell B. Long said on the Senate floor: "If one were seeking to employ a member of one of the outstanding law firms to represent him in a suit against this corporation, the odds are substantial that whichever firm he approached would be among those retained by the AT&T." Today almost every chamber of commerce in the country has Bell System executives among its more active members, and at least one of them will probably be found on its board. In view of all this it is not surprising to learn that the Bell System owns (the company has never sold a telephone in its history) 92 per cent of all the telephones in the United States, and has a 100 per cent monopoly on all long-distance calls. Perhaps the only area where the Bell System is less active than it would like is in the business sector of the economy. It is here that in recent years AT&T has dropped the image of kindly Mother Bell to wage a ferocious economic war on such competitors as RCA, Mackay, Motorola and others. But the chief victim of AT&T's aggression has been its old rival, Western Union. Inevitably, these battles raise questions about AT&T's size and power. But before such questions can be discussed it is worth going back briefly into history.

First came Theodore N. Vail, an ex-station agent for the Union Pacific; at that time, in the 1870s, Western Union, then fifteen times the size of Bell, was making deep inroads into the telephone business. Vail, hired by Alexander Graham Bell's father-in-law as general manager of the Bell Company, began to fight back. In 1879, he won a court case in which Western Union agreed to stay out of the telephone business, and Bell agreed to stay out of the telegraph field. Then Vail, one of the greatest organization men who ever lived, recapitalized the Bell Company. Meanwhile, he acquired monopoly control of Western Electric, the best telephone-equipment manufacturer of the day. In 1885, with the substantial backing of the Morgan interests, a new corporation, the American Telephone & Telegraph Company was formed. Money came from abroad too; among the financial backers were substantial British interests, including the British Government (which still remains a substantial stockholder). Inevitably, as the telephone passed from fad to necessity, other companies moved into the territory. Between 1893 and 1913, a murderous fight took place among the independent telephone companies, Western Union (which was trying to buy up the independents) and AT&T. In the course of all these shenanigans, Vail, who was nothing if not ingenious, managed to buy up 30 per cent of Western Union's stock—enough to seize control of the telegraph company.

By 1912, chaotic conditions in the telegraph and telephone industries brought pressure in Congress for some kind of antitrust action against Bell. When the Wilson administration took office in 1913, one of its first actions was to prepare and publish a report, "Government Ownership of the Electrical Communications Industry." To the New Freedom's challenge, Vail—a master propagandizer — responded with a massive advertising campaign. The slogan, similar to one Joseph Goebbels was to coin in the future, was "One System, One Policy, Universal Service." But suddenly, the government cracked down hard. To avoid government ownership, the AT&T signed an understanding with the Justice Department known as the Kingsbury Commitment. Under its terms, the Bell System agreed to dispose of its stock in Western Union, agreed to cease acquiring control over independent telephone companies which operated in competition with any portion of the Bell System and accepted the principle of free competition in both telephone and telegraph. In essence, the United States dissolved the Bell monopoly.

Between the two World Wars, AT&T spent millions on research, thus laying the foundations for its glittering postwar success. Western Union, in those years, paid little heed to technology and floundered through the thirties under a dismal "no-change" management.

It was a competitive free-for-all, and the way things turned out, it must be concluded that while Bell was selling service to an ever-growing telephone public, Western Union was sliding downhill. It was no coincidence that the telegraph company was accused of (1) low quality of service; (2) errors in transmission; (3) failure to maintain secrecy of messages; (4) slow service. The blunt fact was that the company favored business users over what it called its "social" telegram service. AT&T, without even trying, ate into Western Union's sales, and the company's domestic telegraph revenues slumped from 35.2 per cent (in 1926) to 18 per cent (by 1943) of total revenue. The public got a further battering from Western Union in 1943. In that year it was allowed to absorb its rival, Postal Telegraph, which victory it celebrated by immediately closing hundreds of public telegraph offices. Clearly, Western Union, not wanting the public message business any more, did its level best to get rid of it. Thus, at the end of World War II, with a money-losing operation on its hands, Western Union had no choice but to expand its private wire, TELEX, and data-processing service. These now became the telegraph company's "heartland." By the late fifties, when the computer age loomed up, Western Union was on top of the market. Its gross revenues from these services soared from $6 million in 1948 to $63 million by 1962.

Western Union's data-communication bonanza, however, didn't escape the attention of the telephone company's long-range planners. It was fairly obvious to AT&T that by the end of the sixties a saturation point would be reached in what it calls its horizontal market—a basic black telephone in a single household. With the introduction of its latest technological miracle, ESS (electronic switching system), Bell's chief engineer, in 1962, told the FCC: "I think it quite apparent that if we can have a maximum number of customers sharing facilities, particularly in a costly switching plant, we can get maximum utilization of this plant." Stripped of verbiage, AT&T was saying: "We put this huge system in ahead of demand; we now need an expansion of demand to justify the cost." This was the tip-off to Western Union that AT&T was planning to raid its heartland market.

Even earlier, AT&T had quietly dropped its sweet-young-girl-at-the-switchboard ads. In her place was an earnest young man wearing executive spectacles and pushing a copy line that read: "Get together with our Communications Consultant soon . . . he's experienced in spotting business communications problems." What is more, AT&T came up with a service that sounded suspiciously like Western Union's TELEX. The Bell System's busy communication consultant (euphemism for salesman) had the answer to the large company's problems—TELPAK. Basically, TELPAK is a scheme for block-selling a variety of written-word-and-voice services with price concessions for large-volume use. As the president of Western Union told the FCC:

> The TELPAK offering tends to force customers to take all of their requirements for private wire service from one carrier. Otherwise they cannot obtain all of the advantages of the lower charges. . . . For all practical purposes, the initial package makes him a permanent captive customer. (Emphasis theirs.)

In brief, AT&T was executing a classic monopoly ploy — building ahead of demand, shifting in with block-selling, hoping, in time, to pre-empt the market place. Such an aim has historic parallels with the famous Alcoa antitrust case. Judge Learned Hand then wrote:

> Nothing compelled it to keep doubling and redoubling its capacity before others entered the field. It insists that it never excluded competitors; but we can think of no more effective exclusion than progressively to embrace each new opportunity as it opened, and to face every newcomer with new capacity already geared into a great organization, having the advantage of experience, trade connections, and the elite of personnel. . . .

From an AT&T Advertisement

Today, Western Union is a shadow of its former self, while AT&T is thirty-five times the size of the telegraph company. Early last year, Western Union complained to the FCC that the giant telephone company was using its profitable telephone operations to help subsidize "unreasonably" low rates for business services. For once, the FCC acted and ordered the AT&T to produce its books. The result raised eyebrows. In 1964, the AT&T, according to its own figures, earned 10 per cent on its toll telephone services. By sharp contrast, its return on special services to business (including TELPAK) ranged as low as 0.3 per cent. It looked as though Western Union knew what it was hinting at.

All this open discussion about AT&T's rates has caused no end of commotion in the company's homely little offices at 195 Broadway. But at this juncture the FCC pulled yet another surprise. It told the telephone company to get ready for an investigation into its rate-and-earnings structure. Never in its seventy-five-year history has AT&T been subject to a full-scale federal investigation. Predictably, Chairman Kappel told the press, ". . . the telephone-using public will be the loser." As things stand at the present he is probably correct. AT&T has reckoned it will be out of pocket a cool $12 million just to get the books ready, and no doubt the telephone-using public will be expected to foot the bill. Meanwhile, things actually seem to be improving over at Western Union. The tired old telegraph company, no friend of the public in recent years, has suggested to the FCC that it might do something to lower rates on "social" telegrams. And not long ago it sent out an oral order asking its night operators to stop telephoning death messages. Instead, it suggested that messengers personally deliver what the company calls "dead stuff." Nothing, it seems, improves public service like a little competition—and an old-fashioned government inquiry.

Taking Man's Measure

MAN'S NATURE AND HIS COMMUNITIES: Essays on the Dynamics and Enigmas of Man's Personal and Social Existence. By Reinhold Niebuhr. Charles Scribner's Sons. 125 pp. $3.95.

Michael Wreszin

"Niebuhr is the father of us all." So spake the diplomat, George Kennan, and his fealty has been echoed by influentials in the government, clergy and the academy. Niebuhr is the father of a religious neo-orthodoxy which has taken an agonizing look at man's limitations. He is the fatherly philosopher of the school of political "realism" that plays such a dominant role in shaping and justifying current foreign policy. He is the darling daddy of academicians who, in their newfound maturity, have discovered a new dimension of existence, the dimension of anxiety, guilt and corruption. Surveying the lowlands from the magisterial heights of Mount Morningside, Reinhold Niebuhr has, for nearly the past four decades, taken the measure of man. In over twenty volumes and approximately 1,000 articles he has explored man's nature and his destiny and described his individual and collective morality and immorality. This monumental task has been accomplished with an eloquent and erudite humility mixed with a liberal dose of hard-boiled Realpolitik. Reinhold Niebuhr is not only a student of paradox but its master practitioner.

Man's Nature and His Communities is a slim yet weighty volume. In his autobiographical introduction, Niebuhr describes his long journey from a social gospel minister in the dingy environs of Detroit in 1916 to his present eminence as one of the nation's counselors in affairs of state. The story is full of fire and brimstone, for Niebuhr has consistently wrestled with the profoundest questions of the theological imagination and engaged in dialogue with its most eminent spokesmen. He has also been an activist concerned with nearly every major political and social issue of the last fifty years. After a decade as a member of the Socialist Party and a full-fledged Marxist critic of capitalist society, he became one of the founding members of the ADA. Although theologically Right and for most of his career politically Left, it has become much more difficult to label him in recent years. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., proclaims himself a Niebuhrian and has announced that Niebuhr as much as any other man has "helped to accomplish in a single generation a revolution in the bases of American liberal thought." Morton White, professor of philosophy at Harvard, in a critical attack on Niebuhr, has conceded that the theologian is "the most powerful, and it must be added, most democratic and courageous opponent of secular liberalism on the American scene." Russell Kirk, whom one might presume to be on the other side of the barricades, claims that Niebuhr's writings have "touched upon the failings of our life with a tone nobly conservative." Through it all he has been considered a "great and good friend" by Time magazine.

What it amounts to is that Niebuhr has always asked important questions and remained a severe self-critic. His public confessions of error have involved a sustained attack on most of the traditions of the West. As a theologian and devoutly religious man he has repeatedly contended that religion is irrelevant as a solution to the complex social and political problems of the modern world. As a moral man he has suggested that moral absolutes have no place in the political dialogue. As a champion of nearly every specific liberal cause that one can name, he has chided liberals for their stupidity, shortsightedness and refusal to understand the nature of man and his society. As a product of a social protestantism and pragmatic optimism he has ridiculed the idea of progress and the belief that man's capacity for reason makes a triumph over evil inevitable. As a critic of historical determinism his books are full

---

Michael Wreszin is the author of Oswald Garrison Villard: Pacifist at War. (Indiana University Press). Mr. Wreszin teaches history at Queens College.

To the Rulers

(to spare the innocents)

He who withdraws wins
by these souls.
Buonaparte
"stood for progress."
Simple killing changed all that.
Consider
the dead of the East.
Rulers,
fear ye not?
What bomb unmakes
the unblinking past?
What honor
(say what we will) unkills the blazing babe?
He who is right stays His hand
from thee and me.
Lay down arms.
Lo,
the poor addict
fears withdrawal.
Fear not.
Lay down arms.
Fear ye not.

M. L. Rosenthal

of demands that men take into account the inexorable forces of history. As a former Christian pacifist he has maintained since the 1930s a vigorous attack on pacifist politics. Consistency, foolish or otherwise, has never dogged the thought of Reinhold Niebuhr.

Niebuhr could be described as the patriarch of a post-utopian age. His formative training began in the era of disillusionment following World War I. Whatever residual faith he may have had in man's capacity, through reason or grace, to solve the problems of international barbarity was severely undermined by the aberrations of the Nazis. Organized genocide confirmed Niebuhr's increasing skepticism concerning the liberal belief in the innate goodness of man and his potential perfectability. Unfortunately, as he examined his own past liberalism within the framework of traditional Protestant theology, he adopted what he still considers the "historically and symbolically correct" concept of original sin. This proved to be a tactical error for the purpose of effective political dialogue. Although he had taken pains to deny the historicity of the "primitive myth of the Fall of Adam in the garden . . . the remnants of social optimism," both religious and secular, regarded him as "a regressive religious authoritarian, caught in the toils of an ancient legend."

Niebuhr's interpretation of original sin is, to be sure, not an exercise in rational logic but it is hardly old-fashioned. On the contrary, his conception is not far removed from the atheistic existentialism of Jean-Paul Sartre. Both are attacks on a complacent, liberal bourgeois mentality. For Sartre, man is an object in the world and at the same time distinguished from the inanimate and animal world by a transcendent consciousness. It is the ancient dualism between the physical world as opposed to the world of mind and spirit. Man's existence is in and moved by the contingencies of both realms. This presents the terrible dilemma of the "absurd human predicament." The vitality of man's transcendent consciousness compels him to desire to become God. This futile pride in attempting to grasp the unknowable is the source of man's absurdity. As Sartre puts it: "Man is a useless passion." Albert Camus discussed the same problem in The Myth of Sisyphus, where he related the absurd dilemma to Kierkegaard's Christian existentialist concept of sin. "Sin is not so much knowing (if it were everyone would be innocent) as wanting to know. Indeed it is the only sin of which the absurd man can feel that it constitutes both his guilt and his innocence."

Sightseeing in Provincetown

If your elbow were an eagle's head and your loins the mouth of a cat its tongue many ripped tongues of flame and if your ribs were the membranous wings of a dragon and if one leg were of black leather the bloody claw of a chicken grafted to the knee and if your buttocks were the cheeks of a laughing insane face the lips clasping a trumpet from which wasps were flying the wasps' eyes clearly seen glossy with mad hilarity and if although you were male your left breast were a large pale polyp with numerous nipples and the other breast a dog's head its jaws straining to swallow a severed thigh and if from your slick head that of a rhinoceros with inrolled eyes there curved instead of a snout

a snake with a fishhook through its neck and if rags of flame flew from your navel it being the unhinged door of a furnace and if looking down

you saw a cat's mouth between your legs giving birth to the dripping lower half of a face whose skin peeled back hung from the earlobes with raw lips stretched in a sonorous scream and if in the gullet's vortex there bobbed

a tiny figure scalded red a Janus-faced child both girl and boy impaled through one armpit by a tooth then you'd be elected

Chief Lucifer of S. H. Masters' Hell the colors like flesh like silk like fruit under an exceptionally clear patina smooth as petunia

"The Last Judgment" (Austria c. 1480) gilt-framed on a plum-velvet-covered wall in Provincetown 1965

May Swenson

Niebuhr's understanding of sin embraces the same enigmatic vision. For Niebuhr, man's freedom is his capacity to transcend the natural limitations he shares with the animal world. He too stresses the paradoxes and ambiguities that characterize the mystery of human existence. Man is both free through his consciousness and bound by his creatureliness. He is both limited and limitless. "Anxiety is the inevitable concomitant of the paradox of freedom and finiteness in which man is involved. Anxiety is the internal precondition of sin." Sin for Niebuhr is the inevitable arrogant pride of men who in their finiteness claim to have overcome it. It is man's desire to be God. Man is a useless passion.

Rational logicians are naturally disturbed by a concept that connects the inevitability of an act with sin, which connotes blame. Niebuhr has responded to charges of irrationality in a manner appropriately similar to Jonathan Edwards. That 18th-century Puritan divine suggested in his own Doctrine of Original Sin that "it signifies nothing to exclaim against plain fact . . . fact obliges us to get over the difficulty, either by finding out some solution, or by shutting our mouths and acknowledging the . . . scantiness of our understanding." Niebuhr has written: "The doctrine of original sin remains absurd from the standpoint of a pure rationalism. . . . But there is no resource in logical rules to help us understand complex phenomena, exhibiting characteristics which seem to require that they be placed into contradictory categories of reason." As a good "realist" he now abandons the term in favor of such substitutes as selfishness, self-regard and egoism in deference to the "remnants of social optimism."

The first and title essay, making up most of the volume, is a survey of "idealist" and "realist" political theories, particularly as they pertain to ideas about man's mixed capacity for both destructive egoism and creative altruism. Niebuhr believes that throughout history most consistent theories, whether "realist" or "idealist," and regardless of their religiosity or secularity, have neglected "to observe the intricate relations between the creative and disruptive tendencies of human freedom." Idealists have optimistically judged man's capacity to extend his sense of social obligation and have obscured man's individual and collective self-regard. The realist on the other hand has invariably emphasized man's egoism and obscured his residual moral and social capacity.

Although it is Niebuhr's point that both positions are in error in making such a rigid separation, he has been far more tolerant of the realist position than toward that of the idealist. In this volume he is more conciliatory and admits to a "rather violent, and sometimes extravagant, reaction" to what he conceives to be utopianism. When one remembers that his initial reaction began around the time that Bruce Barton was proclaiming Jesus as the first advertising man and predicting the imminent Kingdom of God and Business on earth, his former petulance is understandable. Nevertheless in this essay he wants to emphasize that it is not an either-or problem, but that there exists an intricate interrelationship between man's selfish and rational capacities, and that both play a part in his destructive as well as creative activities. He insists that there exists an "ideological taint of self-interest in the most rationally conceived social standards . . . [which] validates political realism in its debate with most idealistic theories. . . ." Conversely, "ambition or self-regard is not necessarily opposed to creativity . . . sometimes it is the source of the push which gives the opportunity for the exercise of creativity." Creativity is for Niebuhr, by definition, loyalty to ends that transcend self-interest. In any case, Niebuhr remains adamant in his contention that man's reason is not confined to his efforts to solve social and political problems. It is used in pursuit of narrow self-interest as well as in support of the most gregarious social behavior.

Niebuhr has, at times, expressed a note of mild optimism concerning the individual's ability to strike a creative balance between egocentrism and altruism, but he has been very much disturbed about the difficulty of national states doing the same. In Moral Man and Immoral Society he maintained that "collective self-regard of class, race and nation is more stubborn and persistent than the egoism of individuals." This was to discourage naive reformers who believed that by educating the individual one might purify the society. In this essay there appears to be a new development in his thinking. He still notes that nations show a marked tendency to seek their own interests and this, Niebuhr claims, justifies the realistic interpretation of international relations as "the only valid description of their behavior and possibly the only true solution to the problem this behavior poses." (Italics mine.)

It is this concept that self-interest in international relations may offer the only solution to the problem it poses that undoubtedly accounts for the increasingly contemptuous skepticism not only about the "realism" of contemporary realists, but about their sincerity as well. In his development of this paradox Niebuhr predictably pays homage to Hans Morgenthau as "one of the most brilliant and authoritative of political realists." Despite the fact that Mr. Morgenthau may be, at the present moment, chagrined by the application of some of his ideas, Niebuhr cites his assertion that regardless of the moralistic eloquence of statesmen, "power is always the immediate aim." Nations may possibly have noble and selfless ends but power is the only means by which any ends may be achieved, provided, of course, a nation has a realistic estimate of its own power. Niebuhr notes from another study that Morgenthau believes that most pretensions of loyalty to more inclusive values have been sheer hypocrisy. He feels that Morgenthau is probably right since he is dealing with the collective dimension of human behavior where "realist assumptions are most justified." But Niebuhr suggests that in pursuing this tack the realist may possibly obscure "the residual capacity for justice and devotion to the larger good" which may be found even within the policies of national self-interest. He questions the utility of Morgenthau's demand that statesmen confess their real motives in the manner of the Tammany boss, George Washington Plunkitt, who insisted that politicians candidly recognize their greed for honest graft. Niebuhr feels that one should ask: Is there anything in the "anatomy of man which prompts

100 years after this vivid, prophetic report was written, it is published in book form for the first time

"Vivid, honest, warm, full of concrete instances, and has few generalizations and few abstractions. No American historian can do without it; no novelist of that period should; certainly no future analyst of the mind and emotions of the south can overlook it."
—LILLIAN SMITH, Chicago Tribune

$6.95

THE SOUTH AS IT IS: 1865-1866

by John Richard Dennett

Edited and with an Introduction by Henry M. Christman

THE VIKING PRESS
625 Madison Avenue, N.Y.

ATTENTION EDITORS announcing

SECOND THOUGHTS

A new hard-hitting column of 600 words, written five days each week, for editors who want to inform, challenge and arouse their readers.

SECOND THOUGHTS will cover all phases of foreign and domestic affairs by veteran newspaperman Sherwood Ross, formerly of the Chicago Daily News.

Prices most reasonable.

For samples write:

ONE WORLD SYNDICATE
114 Seventh St., S.E.
Washington, D.C. 20003

Phone: 202 - 546-8564

his embarrassment about the consistent self-regard . . . and the consequent hypocrisy of claiming a higher motive than the obvious one"? Niebuhr's answer is yes. The evidence is the hypocrisy itself. Hypocrisy, Niebuhr argues, is an "index to a residual creative capacity of [man's] freedom."

Niebuhr seems to be saying that man's ability to construct philosophical, political, religious and scientific structures of culture and civilization that transcend the parochial limits of the national interest may be hypocritical, because in any conflict with the aims of the national interest they are subordinate, but they also may be creative. They are valuable because there is the possibility "that even a residual loyalty to values transcending national existence may change radically the nation's conception of the breadth and quality of its 'national interest.'" This may be unfair but it seems to suggest that if a nation repeats its hypocritical pretensions often enough they may come true. From the cynicism of George Washington Plunkitt to the "realism" of Norman Vincent Peale! Perhaps this is the source of so much banality emanating from the state and executive departments under the cloak of national idealism—or is it realism?

From this point on, Niebuhr abruptly lapses into the rhetoric of the cold war, and the eloquent universality of his observations gives way to a species of tribalism which he deplores in a later essay. In pursuing his discussion of those structures of cultural ideology that may broaden a nation's conception of its national interest, he deals with the two "super-nations," Russia and America. America is devoted to a pluralistic, democratic society. Russia, on the other hand, "scorns the pluralism of the West and intends to annihilate all scientific, cultural and religious interests and groups which do not subscribe to its dogma." Niebuhr seems determined in this discussion to use polemical rhetoric which forces the reader to return to an earlier observation concerning the "veil of democratic ideals [that] was inevitably used to cover the common, even universal impulses, which America shared with all nations—to increase its dominion and power."

Niebuhr feels, nevertheless, that something good may come out of these opposing ideologies. Both claim universal validity and both are forced to occasionally make their national interest conform to a broader and more humane cultural ideology. The foreign economic aid of both countries and the federal interference in the civil rights battle are cases in point. He concedes that they are not really sacrifices of the national interest but they do serve to "satisfy the conscience of the nation's most sensitive citizens." Thus a wise foreign policy is developing that recognizes the concurrent demands of power, prestige and force. The "prudent handling of these affairs is a modest but important triumph of human reason." Niebuhr seems to have forgotten his own warning that "the line between cynicism and realism is not too sharply defined when the realist seeks to unmask the pretensions of the idealist."

This tortuous rationalization may help to explain why the new technicians of power and Realpolitik have in recent years found Niebuhr's writing so satisfying. Niebuhr, even in this essay, has expressed the fear that the "realist" theory may encourage an "omni-competent and omnipotent political authority" and was prompted to reassert his conviction that a "realist conception of human nature should be made the servant of an ethic of progressive justice" rather than a "bastion of conservatism . . . which defends unjust privilege." Recent events offer small encouragement for this conviction and the men who have apparently profited by his writings show little inclination to heed his warnings.

Reinhold Niebuhr is 73. After several decades of intense scholarship and militant activity in political affairs it is understandable that he should be prudent and also exhibit some satisfaction in America's substantial achievements. He is now certain that the "open societies of the West have eliminated the injustices of early industrialism by their own democratic ideals, and not by communist means" and that their example provides the only hope for the future. At one point he suggests that the civil rights movement is in its final stages. By this he apparently means that it should not take longer than another century to achieve its ends. One suspects that younger militants will take little comfort from these cheerful pronouncements. Nor will a younger generation look with much fondness upon his continuing acceptance of an earlier belief that "the balance of power is about the highest goal to which a society can aspire."

Formerly, Niebuhr seemed to understand that visionary and utopian ideas provided the motive power for any progressive action. But, as he admits, it took "all the tragedies of history" to clear his mind of illusions. One at least hopes that as he continues to survey the scene he will be ever more mindful of an earlier promise to review his own errors whenever he is tempted to impatience with some young student who fails to disavow what he "realistically" understands to be illusions.

Kidding Our Puritan Conscience

NEW ENGLAND FRONTIER: Puritans and Indians, 1620-1675. By Alden T. Vaughan. Little, Brown & Co. 430 pp. $7.50.

William Eastlake

In 1620 a group of bigots called Puritans landed at Plymouth Rock after having just stolen some corn from the Indians across the bay, and in 1965 Alden T. Vaughan has written an apology for the extinction of the New England Indians by the Pilgrims, for that is what happened in the following 100 years. The Puritans' most apocalyptic genocide was the near elimination of the Pequots in 1637. Vaughan uses the euphemism "chastisement" in explaining the massacre. Pequot was the name of Melville's doomed ship in Moby Dick, and so Melville remembered that the extinction of any race, the subversion of any culture, even an "inferior" culture, is evil. This is true even when accomplished by the well-meaning, honorable, cool and just Puritans.

Part of the justification for the Puritan attack on the New England Indians was that many of the Indian tribes helped the whites in attacking the others. This is our justification for our actions in Vietnam today, for many of the people there are helping us. The Puritans wanted to bring "Rule by Law" to New England. They wanted to bring a Christian God. They wanted to stop the seeming anarchy, the communal, godless hedonism which they thought they saw in the sachems and their tribes. The Puritans failed in changing this, but they killed a lot of Indians. I don't know if there is a moral here for our behavior in Vietnam, but I believe there is a corollary. Americans are still dedetermined to do good even if it kills the object of their charity.

William Eastlake is the author of several novels, the most recent of which is Castlekeep (Simon & Schuster).

Vaughan contends that the white man did not push the Indians off his land, that it was all done legally. This is true, but it is also true that the laws were white man's laws. In 1633, in the midst of dissension with the Indians over land, in the words of one puritan Puritan: "God ended the controversy by sending smallpox among the Indians." It knocked out most of the New England Indians, including several chiefs and seven hundred Narragansetts. By the time the white man's epidemic was over many of the Indian settlements had lost their entire population. The white man's plague had affected virtually no Puritans. And did the Puritans regret the disaster, and show compassion? As Governor Winthrop drawled while not putting down his cigar: "If God were not pleased with our inheriting these parts, why did He drive out the natives before us and why does He make roome for us by diminishinge them as we increase?" Another Puritan later commented: "Without this awful and terrible stroke of God upon the natives we would with great difficulty have found room."

After remarking on the Pequot War Vaughan has the temerity, the gall—the absence of mind?—to state in his epilogue and conclusion: "The fact that one ethnic group deteriorated while another flourished in a given area is not proof of causal relationship." Indeed, indeed. Vaughan states in the same paragraph that by 1750 the Indians had almost disappeared from the New England scene. What do you suppose caused this? The hot sun, the warm rain? The high cost of airplane parts? That is no way to kid our Puritan conscience.

When the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth they came armed with some formidable gadgets; diseases against which the Indians had no resistance, including the romantic diseases like syphilis; guns; the lie of salvation; whipping posts and stocks. But it would be wrong to suggest that the Puritans were aggressive, at least during the first ten years after their landing, while they were still vastly outnumbered by the Indians. It was not until thousands of reinforcements had arrived, mostly at the Boston Bay Colony, which soon became larger than Plymouth, that the Pilgrims took the offensive, consisting of a moral castigation of the Indians, a further encroachment on Indian lands (all legal), outrage at the Indian pleasure principle (fornicating in broad daylight when they should be working), and finally when all else failed—war. The great war did not come until 1675, fifty years after the Pilgrims arrived. It was called King Philip's War after an Indian who led the tribes, and when it ended it finished any further nonsense on the Indians' part.

By popular myth today the Indian had no culture; he was a child of the forest. It is forgotten that when the Puritans arrived in New England the Indians lived in villages and had an agricultural economy and a code of conduct that was in many ways superior to the Puritans' righteousness. One of the prime purposes in the New World for the Puritans was to convert the Indians to Jesus Christ [illegible] lieved the Indians to be Jews, the Lost Tribes of Israel. They should have realized how tough it is to convert Jews. The Puritans didn't convert many Indians; they killed quite a few, though.

Politics of Poetry and History

A POETS' WAR: British Poets and the Spanish Civil War. By Hugh D. Ford. University of Pennsylvania Press. 327 pp. $7.50.

THE SIEGE OF THE ALCAZAR. By Cecil D. Eby. Random House. 239 pp. $4.95.

Gabriel Jackson

In A Poets' War, Hugh D. Ford has studied in great detail the personalities, the works and the political positions adopted during the Spanish Civil War by some two dozen British poets, most of whom were in their 20s at the time, and most of whom sympathized with the Republican government. He has also studied the positions taken editorially by the important newspapers and literary journals, and he reports the attitudes of well-known intellectuals such as J.M. Keynes and C.E.M. Joad.

A truly interesting literary problem raised by the book is whether an intense, and relatively naive, political commitment can be expressed in poetry of enduring value. A reading of Ford's book shows how many and formidable were the obstacles. Almost all the poets were young and self-conscious. They had not yet had time to forge their own poetic diction or identify their own poetic personality. Most of them tended, for poets, to be overly cerebral in their view of life, and this weakness was magnified by their conscious effort to fuse poetry with propaganda. They were writing about subjects of which they had very little personal experience, and they had had no time to absorb this experience before attempting to transmute it into poetry. The majority tried to portray the war without ever having left England. Those who fought in the international brigades tried to write convincingly of war before they had absorbed the first shocks of their own initiation. They hoped that in spite of fatigue, or wounds, they could summon the necessary concentration to create literature. They tried feelingly to portray the Spanish people, whose language and culture they did not know.

Considering their difficulties of inexperience with the subject matter, one senses also that they were uneasy with their political commitments. Most

---

Gabriel Jackson, author of The Spanish Republic and the Civil War (Princeton University Press) teaches History and Humanities at the University of California, La Jolla.

I WANT TO KNOW
How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out
If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________
STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

of them were Communists or "fellow travelers." A few were Socialists or anarchists. Their political faith was too new genuinely to have become a part of their fundamental emotional and intellectual reactions. Hence the bathos and the shrillness. In wrestling with their own doubts while accepting the duty to contribute to the cause with their pens, they lost sight of the critical standards they would probably have applied to their own work in other circumstances. Partial exception to the above generalizations should be made for the Communist poet John Cornford and for the pro-Nationalist poet Roy Campbell. But on the whole, the poetry cited by Ford makes dreary reading. All of which does not prove that political commitment cannot be transmuted into poetry. There are Euripides, Schiller, Wordsworth and Shelley to prove the contrary in the past. And the Romancero de la résistance espagnole, edited by Dario Puccini in 1962, contains many beautiful French and Spanish poems inspired directly by the Civil War. But the British poets studied by Mr. Ford were too uncertain both of their convictions and of their specific subject matter.

Mr. Eby tells the story of the siege of the Alcázar of Toledo. During August and September, 1936, the Popular Front militia attempted unsuccessfully to force the surrender of some 1,200 civil guards, cadets and other insurgents who had taken refuge in the Alcázar during the first days of the Civil War. His account is based largely on the biographical and memoir literature published under the Franco regime. These materials are supplemented by the author's interviews with survivors and their families, and by his detailed study of the physical setting. The description is very circumstantial. Dozens of persons are named, and colorful anecdotes about them abound. While the sources are listed at the back of the book, there are few footnotes, and it would be very difficult for a student to check the authenticity of details. The author quotes, as though there could be no question of their authenticity, the Nationalist "verbatim" texts of Colonel Moscardó's many telephone conversations with Republican officers or neutral diplomats. The colonel is properly laconic in dealing with enemies and meddling civilians. The book can be read as an adventure story by persons not too concerned with the accuracy of melodramatic details, or with the attribution of motives. When they read of the assassination of Father Pascual Martín, perhaps they will wonder with the author: "Were his outstretched hands, punctured like Christ's, meant as a final blessing for the assassins, or were they merely raised in an instinctive effort to push the bullets away?"

The obvious trouble with a book of this sort is that it does no justice to the very people it is eulogizing. The siege of the Alcázar was indeed an epic example of human fortitude in the service of religious and political ideals. Like other instances in both camps during the terrible Civil War, it deserves to be treated with the deepest respect for heroism, and with scrupulous attention to conflicts of motives and uncertainties as to facts. It does not deserve to be written up as a TV melodrama.

APPROACH Announces
Two $150 Poetry Awards
Deadline March 1, 1966
For details address:
APPROACH
114 Petrie Ave., Rosemont, Pa. 19010

FOR WRITERS!
Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to
PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

SUMMERLANE CAMP
in the tradition of
The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill
The Gorky Colony
Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.
Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19
BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

Palms in the Plaza

AURA. By Carlos Fuentes. Translated by Lysander Kemp. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 74 pp. $3.95.

Jose Yglesias

Carlos Fuentes' new book, Aura, is going to puzzle his admirers, accustomed, by his previous three, to mural-size canvases, century-long time spans, and large statements. This short Gothic tale, spun out to 74 pages by large type and small pages, seems at first to have none of his earmarks. A competent example of the genre, it is the story of a young historian who accepts the strange but lucrative job of boarding with an ancient, bedridden woman to prepare her long-dead husband's papers for publication. The old woman's housekeeper is a beautiful young niece who comes to the young man's bed the second night of his stay in the musty rat-infested house; with each passing day—or, rather, night—the niece becomes older, until the young man finds himself in bed finally with the toothless aunt with withered breasts. Was Aura, the niece, real? "She'll come back, Felipe," says the old woman as she takes him in her embrace. "We'll bring her back together. Let me recover my strength and I'll bring her back. . . ." And thus the book in its last paragraph, and none too soon, announces that there may be larger meanings.

Can Fuentes mean that love inevitably involves the loving acceptance of physical decay and death? Or are Aura and the old woman the two faces of Mexico? And does it, then, mean that young revolutionaries, like Fuentes, must learn to love this sacked old hag before they can make her beautiful again? Large, windy questions like these always seem to plague reviews of Fuentes' novels, but heretofore they sat more comfortably with reviewers, given, as the cliché has it, the historical sweep of Fuentes' previous novels. For a Gothic tale must, before anything, succeed by its power to fascinate and horrify, and this Aura does not do, despite a fine translation by Lysander Kemp, which is a considerable improvement on the original: I would hazard that only those fixated on nymphets and young boys will be hooked.

Fuentes' failures as a novelist seem obscured for the great majority—if one takes the praise of his work as genuine—by the stylistic firecrackers he sets off. I do not doubt that he is always talking about Mexico's tragedy, always harking back to what made its revolution fail, always damning its uneven capitalist development for the social and cultural emptiness of its present; but in a novel these ideas are merely opinions, unless they are so inherent in the story that plot and style become at least exemplifications of what he has to say. The kind words almost everyone has for him—except the State Department whose literary interests are minimal—confirm that most do take his ideas about the Mexican revolution as opinions and nothing more. Those who like Fuentes' novels because of his political ideas are suffering from a lapse of taste; they are the people who cannot tell what in Whitman is great poetry and what is geographical incantation.

Jose Yglesias is a novelist and translator of modern Spanish fiction.

But what people make of a writer's work is less telling than what the writer does. For all his social preoccupations, Fuentes' work shows, with a kind of unconscious obsessiveness, that he is at least equally interested in literary one-upmanship; he can write like Faulkner, Dos Passos, Sartre, Isak Dinesen. And he can go them one better: he can have Greek choruses addressing the hero, he can write interior monologues like William Carlos Williams' unpoetic poetry. A post-Stalin Marxist, he is going to prove that the social novel can utilize all the resources of literature; a Mexican radical, that he is not provincial: he knows there are palms in the lobby of the Plaza.

Aura in its way has all these affectations of the earlier books. His Gothic tale is written in the second person present tense (Kemp has expunged a second person future imperative that is pointlessly mixed in with the other) and it has lyric interior monologues with paragraphs of free verse arranged on the page as if by E. E. Cummings. If the story is really about Mexico, then one could stretch a point and admit to relevance the fact that the old woman's husband was a general of Maximilian's; but I suspect it is only an excuse to show that Fuentes is fluent in French, which he displays often here.

These stylistic devices are more at home and better handled in Aura than in The Death of Artemio Cruz in which they also appeared along with others. For one thing, they are fewer, and have been smoothed out by the translator; besides the messy second person future tense, Kemp has cleaned up and given orderly sequence to run-on sentences which hark back to the Faulk-

Subscribe Now & Receive

The 330-Page Centennial Issue

of THE NATION

This book-sized issue of The Nation, prepared by a special centennial staff, is a collection of essays — written expressly for this occasion — which deal with the problems and experiences of American life from Gettysburg to South Vietnam. In addition, the issue contains a complete (65,000-word) history of The Nation, covering both policies and personalities, and brief memoirs by George Kirstein, Carey McWilliams, Freda Kirchwey and others identified with the magazine in recent decades.

This many-faceted analysis, both historical and current, will be sent to you as a bonus copy upon receipt of your subscription order.

PARTIAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

The Staggered Culture—Louis Kronenberger
The First Anti-Imperialists—Barbara Tuchman
The Fat Cats of Labor—A. H. Raskin
Deviance and Deviates—Howard Becker
"Tell It Like It Is, Baby"—Ralph Ellison
The South Revisited—Howard Zinn
The Fear of Positive Thinking—Lewis A. Coser
Poverty: U.S.A.—Paul Jacobs
The Literary Mind—Alfred Kazin
Automation and Jobs—Eric Larrabee
Honor Bright, and All That Jazz—Dalton Trumbo
Theatre: The Laggard Art—Harold Clurman
Styles of the Modern Novel—William Phillips

Return the order form today to be certain that you will receive THE NATION'S portrait of its century.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a subscription to The Nation. I understand that I will receive, as my bonus issue, the special 330-page 100th Anniversary issue.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $5

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME____________________

ADDRESS____________________

CITY__________ STATE__________ ZIP No.__________

1-3-66

nerian passages of Where the Air Is Clear and The Death of Artemio Cruz. But Kemp did not translate the earlier novels, and they appeared in English in literal translations which added unintelligibility to the stylistic mélange, thus helping, no doubt, to awe reviewers who read them only in English. In Spanish, his more derivative passages read like translations which are trying to force the language to do what it cannot do, and achieve dissonance when he is trying for resonance.

For a while—maybe after his first book only—one could have said that Fuentes' faults were, primarily, the faults of excess, of reaching too far, trying for too much; all faults easily condoned, for they seemed historically right, as was the case with Dos Passos' USA: Mexico and the United States have turbulent histories, their stories and their landscapes are full of stretches no novelist can traverse with ease or digest entirely in the imagination. About his plots there were never any doubts: story-conference myths, rags-to-riches sagas which brought wealth and power to their heroes but not, of course, happiness. But we now have four books with which to judge Fuentes, and it seems clear that his genuine preoccupations are betrayed at every turn by True Confessions story elements, and his penchant for having a hand at other writers' styles: Yankee imperialism has harmed him more than he knows.

THEATRE

R. J. Schroeder

A DIFFERENT BUECHNER

George Buechner had but one true love in his short life — and his love object was death. However much scholars or directors discuss the extent to which that passion determines and dominates Danton's Death and Woyzeck, Buechner unquestionably woos surcease with unabashed abandon in his first play, Leonce and Lena. Director Ken Costigan captured the essence of the affair in his production of the play for the Clark Center Drama Company at the West Side YWCA.

Taking his cue from the fact that Buechner placed Death on stage as a speaking character, Costigan worked out opening and bridging sequences of music and choreography that conveyed a vivid sense of fascination with the beckoning unknown. The siren Death is played — it would be more accurate to say mimed and danced — with captivating effect by Valerie von Volz. Under flowing black vestments, her entire figure was clasped in flesh-colored tights. Her seemingly naked challenge thus unsparingly argued the ultimate seduction.

But she does not need to expose her appeal to Prince Leonce, for he begins the play as her willing accomplice. Leonce's initial involvement with Death is almost too convincing. If the Prince has indeed succumbed to oblivion's charms, how can there be a play? With the born showman's sense of timing, Buechner sounds a counterpoint to his constant and crescendo-less theme of doom sought and chosen. For all his fascination with death, Leonce is also not a little in love with the heady, God-miming fun of creating sardonic spoofs of his times and his life.

So, just as the players of our 19th-century melodramas broke up the heaviness of a portentous act with intermission interludes of She's Only a Bird in a Gilded Cage, Buechner interrupts Death's strumpet solicitation with a series of playful caricatures of the tragic hero. The spoofs begin when his Prince mimics that aspect of Hamlet who was the drama's first Angry Young Man, and his Lena celebrates her mad reaction to loss of her Prince's love with rosemary in her hair. Then, after a brief return to his séance with Death, Buechner shows that not even Goethe is immune from his young laughter by sending Prince Leonce on a long spree with a Mephistophelean compatriot. In this sequence, the ambisexual Leonce is shared by his male and female companions, and Lena is an innocent Gretchen whom he seduces along the way.

After another, almost ritualistic courting of Death, Schiller and Sturm und Drang come in for a turn of vaudeville. Leonce converts the Romanticists' exhaltation of the emotions of the individual hero into an exaggerated depiction of the self-pitying anguish of the individual anti-hero. The Prince enacts a preview of Woyzeck; the language is a perversion of Schiller's rhetoric.

Implicit in Leonce and Lena's ambivalences and dichotomies is a qualitatively new and different genre of drama. For the first time in the history of the stage, Aristophanes' style of incisive commentary upon his society and his contemporaries has been joined to a baring of the author's psyche.

Man is never more animal than in those periods when he feels newly deprived of godhood. Such a time was Buechner's. He was, in a sense, a victim of the Napoleonic heresy: he had thought to find, but had unaccountably lost, a deity. His reaction was a desire to foul this earth as he arranged his exit from it. His exposure on stage of the inner self he deprecated was a part of this process. Schopenhauer expressed the mood of the times philosophically, but Buechner expressed it viscerally.

Leonce and Lena is, as would be expected, an imperfect first work. But in terms of drama, not of politics, it is a revolutionary work. It is the first of the essentially interior dramas of psychological self-indulgence, and leads, in an unbroken line, to Jarry, Strindberg, Tolstoi, Joyce and O'Neill (and of course, to the currently most self-indulgent of the self-indulgent genre, John Osborne's marathon Inadmissible Evidence). Brecht's most rampant play, Baal, is modeled after Leonce and Lena, and most of what is seen today at the New York coffeehouses is artistically less valid Leonce and Lena.

Costigan's direction of the Clark Center production did not comment upon the play. Instead, it made way for Buechner's own comment. And it did so in a spirited and delightful manner. The confrontation with death's mystique became both awesome and knavish fun. Matters of state were ridiculed in high style, but their absurdity was not made silly. The sexual imagery was handled with imaginative finesse. Only in the final act did Costigan's direction falter. In this act, the dichotomies between Buechner's social farce and his masochistic poetry become, at least to American eyes, extreme. A dash of sustained European cynicism might have narrowed the gap. The playing was highly satisfactory throughout. Russell Horton as Prince Leonce quite properly refused to add his own self-indulgence to that of the playwright, and Beverly Luckenbach as Princess Lena was an evocative foil to Buechner's many moods. Jan McElhaney's choreography added to the mood and flow of the show.

---

R. J. Schroeder is a free-lance writer whose avocation is the theatre.

Comparison of this Buechner production with that of Danton's Death at Lincoln Center a few weeks ago is unavoidable. For me, at least, the spirit of George Buechner permeated Clark Center, after having been unable to so much as buy a ticket at Lincoln Center. It is almost impossible to believe that a Buechner who was so completely disillusioned with both the rationalism of Voltaire and the polemicism of Schiller, could have become absorbed in the realistic and single-minded preachments of Herbert Blau's version of Danton's Death. It is equally difficult to believe that a Buechner who was enticed by the psychoticism and suicide of Kleist, and who was a progenitor of the spirit of Beaudelaire and Rimbaud, could have become as purged of the love of death, and as unambiguously committed to uplifting social commentary, as Blau's "adaptation" would imply.

For a part of George Buechner must have loved the death of Danton, and thanked Robespierre vicariously for opening the welcome door. Blau's production at Lincoln Center showed New York only one chord of Buechner's melody of ambiguities. No — on second thought, it would seem that another aspect of Buechner was demonstrated. For, however Blau may have failed to play Buechner's orchestration of human ambivalence, he did follow the playwright's lead with respect to self-indulgence.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

THE 10TH VICTIM
VIVA MARIA

For Christmas week the Continent sent us two notably sanguinary comedies. The coincidence might be taken as a comment on the overkill diplomacy of our Johnson years; more likely, the pictures have no more pointed motive than to profit from America's traditional taste for risible mayhem. With sex heaped on like whipped cream from a squirt can.

The credits are scarcely wiped from the screen of The 10th Victim when Ursula Andress dispatches her pursuer with two shots fired at point-blank range from her armed brassiere. Moments later, Marcello Mastroianni does in his prey with a pair of explosive spurs. These two are participants in The Big Hunt, the 21st century's neurotic equivalent of war. The players—for the most part members of the "Au Go Go" set a few decades hence—are alternately hunter and quarry, each pair being selected by a computer stationed in Geneva. There is prize money for each match and anyone surviving ten encounters receives a million dollars (why so little?) and retires in great honor. As you might expect, Miss Andress, an adroit American killer (see stratagem cited above), is electronically selected to eliminate Mastroianni, highly regarded in Italian homicide circles. She arrives in Rome, accompanied by a TV crew that intends to film the assassination for a tea commercial. (I was entertained by the phonetically memorized English of the alleged American technicians. They clearly had no idea what they were saying, and were as well off in their ignorance.)

That all this is an excessively complicated and exceedingly tedious way to bring a man and woman into amorous proximity Mastroianni makes entirely clear. He performs with all the animation of a stand-in modeling the star's clothes at a lighting rehearsal, his only concession to an international reputation for gallantry being to vibrate slightly whenever a female comes within range. And his disaffiliation is the most noticeable only because he is at the center of the alleged action; I cannot recall another picture in which the cast's mind seemed so obviously fixed on lunch. The general air of disenchantment does nothing to cover the shortcomings of a story that is brittle, implausible and a little simple-minded even by the standards of routine science fiction. The actors seemed to be obeying, not the director, Elio Petri, but the imperfectly cabled instructions of an investment group headed by Joseph E. Levine.

Since The 10th Victim is set in the world of fashion a generation or so from now, it has been dressed up with examples of last year's Op art and other variously avant-garde work — notably some life-sized, three-dimension snow men who appear to be engaged in moving furniture. Similarly, the ladies have been put into sports outfits that look like the rather desperate costume bait to be seen on an August weekend at Grossinger's. The world of the future will surely not be so dependent for chic on back issues of Woman's Day. At one moment, some trick doors accidentally slid open to disclose Mastroianni's parents, hidden by him from the euthanasia squad (Italians, their son explains, have an unusually well-developed sense of filial responsibility). This suggested the plot for a picture more absorbing than cops and robbers with real bullets, but unfortunately the doors closed again and the lackluster chase continued.

From France, by way of "somewhere in Mexico," comes Viva Maria, a one-picture double feature offering both Jeanne Moreau and Brigitte Bardot. The girls are part of a music-hall caravan touring the donkey trails south of the border at the turn of the century. One night, by accident, they invent the strip tease and their fame sweeps Mexico; another night, also by accident, they become the appassionatas of a revolution, and lead peons by the hecatombs to glorious death.

Louis Mallé, who apparently intended his picture as a lusty musical comedy, spoils the chance by overdoing all his effects, straining for a synthetic naïveté and never implying what he can make explicit. Perhaps having persuaded the Mlles. Moreau and Bardot to appear on the same

"A STUNNING PLAY, ONE OF THE FINEST OF OUR AGE. YOU SHOULD NOT MISS IT."
—Howard Taubman, The N.Y. Times

JASON ROBARDS ANNE BANCROFT
THE DEVILS
Mon. thru Thurs. Evgs., Orch. & Front Mezz. $7.95: Rear Mezz. $6.25, 5.50, 4.50, 3.50, 2.95. Fri. & Sat. Evgs., Orch. & Front Mezz. $8.75: Rear Mezz. $6.50, 5.75, 4.75, 4.00, 2.95. Wed. & Sat. Mats., Orch. & Front Mezz. $6.25; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 4.00, 3.50, 3.00, 1.95.
BROADWAY THEATRE 53rd St. & B'way, 247-7992

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave. New York 10014

unique — useful — inexpensive

POEMS FOR WAR RESISTERS

An unusual Calendar and Appointment Book for 1966, containing a special 53 page anthology of anti-war poems.

Preface by Louis Untermeyer.

$1.50 each, $7 for five, postpaid, U.S.A.

Order from Dept. N

WAR RESISTERS LEAGUE
5 Beekman St., N.Y.C. 38

A R T

ORIGINAL ART COSTS LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! GRAPHIC CIRCLE offers you contemporary original signed lithographs, etchings, woodcuts for $3.50 monthly. Satisfaction guaranteed. Free Brochure — Graphic Circle, Dept. NA, 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

S E R V I C E S

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed insured, experienced. The COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC) 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709

P E R S O N A L S

TV BELLYFUL? Hucksters Sound Switch turns TV speaker on and OFF; 20 feet of wire. Easily installed. Ethical. Money back guarantee. Send $3.75 postpaid—The A. N. Mantell Co., Dept. N, P. O. Box 228, Ellenville, N. Y. 12428.

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons. $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 1-3-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

screen, he felt compelled to back up this redundancy of provocation with the maximum noise and confusion. The result is a film of heartless monotony: all those little men in white pajamas, straw hats and crossed cartridge belts from the murals of Rivera dying in the long grass because the girls are tired of doing the cancan. The use of violence in a musical wants a deft touch: one should not, for instance, impale a man with a billiard cue or allow the bullets to be seen cutting across a back; such details spoil the air of gaiety.

And what sort of humor sends Brigitte Bardot off in a closed wagon with three middle-aged café types, to return in the morning, sprung with exhaustion and murmuring that love is indeed a marvelous occupation? It set me to wondering what was the venereal rate in the small towns of Latin America in 1900, a sociological concern that is out of key with Gallic high jinks.

Style is what the Europeans are supposed to teach us, and style is what these two pictures lack. They have no inner conviction, no consistency of tone, no restraint, no wit (but plenty of gags), no originality (but plenty of gimmicks). They look very much as though they had been made to please a nation that serves ketchup with the filet mignon. Vulgarity is an odd sort of export commodity — every nation has enough of its own.

LETTERS

(Continued from inside front cover)

ate Armed Services Committee and Rep. L. Mendel Rivers, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. At press time, General Hershey's reply was the only one received.

Two things may be said of the General's defense of reclassifications that followed the University of Michigan incidents.

(1) The sit-down protesters were arrested, but their cases are pending in the courts and as of now, therefore, they are not guilty. But more to the point, if the protesters were in fact guilty of trespass or disorderly conduct or whatever, they will be punished in the courts; it is not the function of Selective Service to punish them.

(2) The General makes these reclassifications analogous to the action taken against those who attempt to avoid being called to military service by various illegal or dishonest means. But there is no analogy between a man who openly protests the draft (even if he uses means which are later found to be illegal) and one who covertly attempts to avoid induction.

Commenting on the Michigan draft board's action, publicly endorsed by General Hershey, Rep. Emanuel Celler, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee has said: "The draft was never intended to be used as a vehicle of castigation. I urge upon General Hershey and his staff to review this vexatious question before the draft law is further weakened in public acceptance and support."

And in the same week 103 professors from leading American law schools signed a letter to the President that urged him to "state unequivocally that the draft will not and legally cannot be used as a weapon to stifle criticism of Administration policies. . . ." General Hershey has pictured himself elsewhere as a parent administering well-deserved spankings to impertinent youth. Others do not see him in this paternalistic role.

The Editors

Washington coven

West Vancouver, B. C.

Dear Sirs: Lyndon Johnson swore an oath on assuming office to uphold the Constitution of the United States. By his conduct in respect to Vietnam he violated the Constitution. This breach makes him an oath breaker or warlock, to use the Scottish term.

Warlocks are male witches. Could not some antique witchcraft law be revived, and Johnson charged under it? This would be so much simpler than impeachment. Doug Haskins

Next on HUAC's list

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: Walter Goodman ["The Klan Discovers HUAC"; The Nation, Nov. 8] proves to be less than a prophet in his estimate that these hearings were not set up as a prelude to "investigating" the civil rights movement.

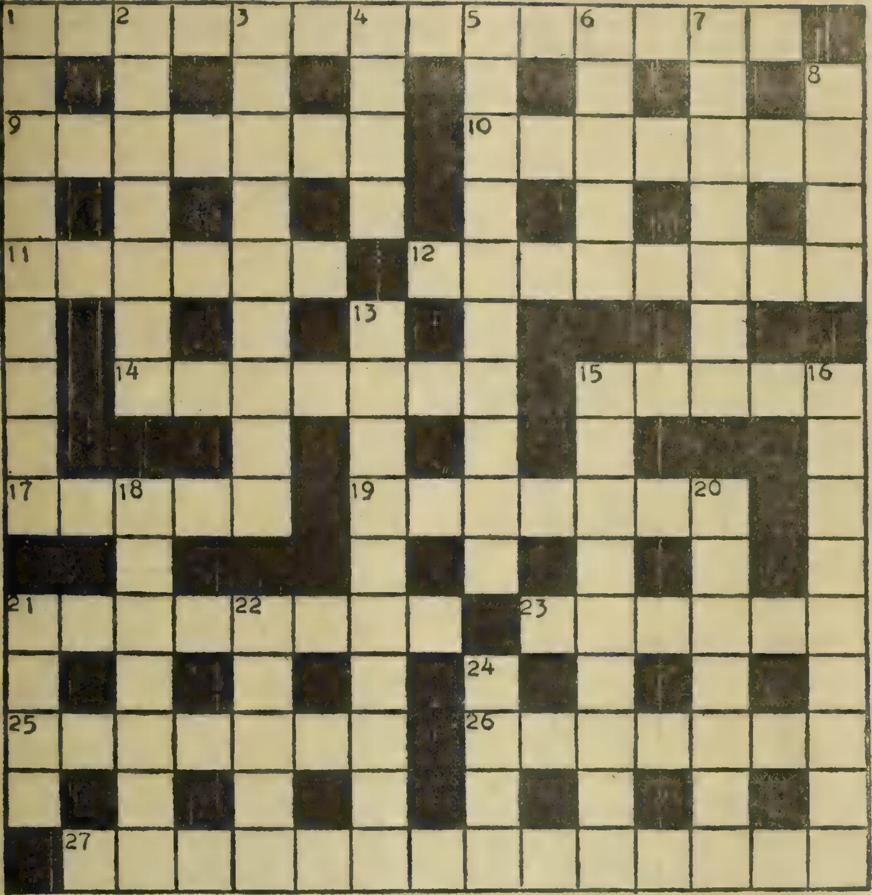
A UPI dispatch of Dec. 1, datelined Lafayette, La., states: "The House Committee on Un-American Activities may investigate civil rights groups in a manner similar to its Ku Klux Klan investigation, committee chairman Edwin Willis (D., La.) has hinted."

The dispatch continues: "Willis said his group last March realized the civil rights movement 'was exploited' and that the committee would not lose sight of its jurisdiction in all areas of subversive activities. . . ."

Richard L. Criley

Crossword Puzzle No. 1134

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Where cagey card-holders operate a place to hang things up before one orders the votes. (5, 2, 3, 4)
9 It is not obvious that the United Nations would have to be wrong to make a sort of warfare out of it.
10 Arum is a strange member of a certain oriental class. (7)
11 In the main, rather rough. (6)
12 Marks the building of justice, perhaps. (8)
14 Attached to something of importance. (7)
15 The sort of scum a writer is likely to produce. (5)
17 It could be extended to light amplifications by simulated emissions of radiation. (5)
19 Notice getting dressed around it reveals the foundation, by the way? (7)
21 No they don't, they swim! (But they might rise to it.) (5, 3)
23 Referring to a buck or calf is rather awkward! (6)
25 Terriers might be acting disloyal, perhaps. (7)
26 A boy in minor trouble might be considered sort of a hero! (7)
27 A certain amount of leeway in stock, though calm prevails. (5, 9)

DOWN:

1 Is the institution bad for the statesman? (9)
2 The chief construction of Double-O scale. (7)
3 Would it be a surprise if such a drink comes early? (3, 6)
4 In France, bear what belongs to us.
5 Race steward? The other way around where the tiller is concerned. (10)
6 Takes a few bars to get ready for the old-fashioned glamor-girls. (5)
7 No complimentary remarks for this car, mass-produced. (7)
13 Certainly not referring to one's in-laws! (10)
15 How to make one's boiler act like an automobile? (9)
16 Yodels around the high place, with several to pound. (9)
18 and 8 down Scion prepared for the slaughter? Officers might be given such instructions. (5, 2, 4)
20 A hero indeed! (At least judged so!) (7)
22 and 21 In Minnesota nine sailors? Gemini, rather! (4, 5)
24 What the cat did in a minor tiff?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1133

ACROSS: 1 Aftereffects; 9 Manhandled; 10 Cafe; 11 Thiamine; 12 Emigre; 13 Remit; 15 Skin-game; 16 New World; 19 Gatun; 21 Edison; 22 Inspirit; 24 Knot; 25 Unthinking; 26 Board of Trade. DOWN: 2 Featherbedding; 3 Ephraim; 4 Ennui; 5 Filters; 6 Cudgeling; 7 Sacking; 8 Aforementioned; 14 Tarantula; 17 Wash tub; 18 Drifted; 20 Thinker; 23 Stiff.

PUBLICATIONS

BOOK COLLECTORS
Seeking unusual items for your collections!
We notify when our worldwide contacts make notable finds. All fields A to Izzard.
BOOK LANDOE
6631 Hollywood Blvd.
Hollywood, Calif. 90028

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

"VIETNAM SONGBAG: The Ballad of LBJ and Other Lyrics," by Mortimer Frankel. Includes McNamara's Brand, Old Hitler Said It, The Great Society. "Written in a vivid satiric vein." — Fellowship Mag. — 20 page booklet $1.00. Survival Publications, 175 Fifth Avenue, New York 10010.

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

HISTORY AFIELD
Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
Postpaid $2, check, money order or cash
B. F. Johnson
BOX 2306, SAN DIEGO, CALIF. 92112

Fun to Read!
Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.
THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Entrancing. $2.00. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on total humanity, living and dead, to pray both before and after death for a World Democracy.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words): 3-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (min.)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

would be jeopardized by a continuation of fiscal acrobatics.

The new Mayor is liked also by the media; if he turns in a reasonably competent performance and commits no egregious errors, he is assured of a good press. He has started out with some excellent appointments and he will make more. He can do so, because outstanding men who would not have worked for a mediocre mayor will lend Lindsay a hand.

Riding above these advantages, moreover, are Lindsay's legislative know-how and his contacts in Washington, where the money must now be found for anything creative in urban affairs. Lindsay had a part in putting on the federal statute books many of the measures which can help pull the city out of the morass into which it has sunk through years of neglect and mismanagement. The federal government has provided for New York—or any other city that needs assistance—an adequate set of tools for the work to be done. Medicare will channel funds into the city hospitals, a major item in the city's budget. Federal funds are available for mass transit, for combating air and water pollution, for education, for coping with at least the most crucial problems of poverty and waste of human resources.

The troubles of New York are the troubles of practically all the great cities. Precisely because the difficulties are so formidable, they confront Mayor Lindsay with a test and a challenge of nation-wide proportions. The city has two options—to sink lower or to start going up. Any substantial improvement will have an enormously stimulating effect on all those who are struggling with the problems of urbanization. Lindsay has four years in which to show results. The Nation is not alone in wishing him well.

'Blooped Out'

The phrase refers to deletion of something on an audio-video broadcast tape that is deemed superfluous or ill-advised. Figuratively, it can also happen to a person. Fifteen years ago it happened to Jean Muir and many others—they were blooped out of the movie, TV and radio industries, with only the legitimate theatre offering a small minority a chance to continue making a living. Since then a few—John Henry Faulk being the most prominent—have fought back and made political black-listing a somewhat perilous profession. Some tried other ways of rehabilitating themselves. Jean Muir was one of these. She was never a Communist, but that did not save her. Recently she wanted to tell of her experiences, for ten minutes or so, on a WABC-TV program called Girl Talk. Girl talk apparently must not extend to such unpleasant topics as black-listing, and the producer proceeded to bloop out Miss Muir's story, on the ground that libel might be involved.

If the broadcasters had let her talk, they would have been better off, since they were unable to bloop out Jack Gould, who reported the whole affair in The New York Times on Christmas Day. Miss Muir was dropped in August, 1950, from the cast of The Aldrich Family, a popular program sponsored by General Foods Corporation. With scores of others, she became unemployable because the sponsor, or the sponsor's advertising agency, considered it inexpedient to engage artists who might be accused of harboring views offensive to some viewers. The only artists who were safe were those who had never had any political views, or those whose ideology conformed with that of Sen. Joe McCarthy's loyal followers. The advertising agency in the Muir case was Young & Rubicam, and the network was the National Broadcasting Company. Miss Muir intended to mention all three as parties to her dismissal, as indeed she had mentioned them in an earlier radio program over WBAI-FM.

There is nothing to indicate that N.B.C., Young & Rubicam or General Foods had anything to do with the current blooping-out. This was done by A.B.C. Films, a subsidiary of the American Broadcasting Company, which operates WABC-TV. The counsel for A.B.C. Films became exercised over possible defamation of the advertising agency or the sponsor. The earlier defamation of Miss Muir did not concern A.B.C. Films at all. A recital of the facts could go only a little way toward righting a wrong, but it might also militate against a recurrence. This was not to be weighed against the possible displeasure of those who had done the wrong, and might do it again.

The incident may be regarded as a timely warning. It means in essence that, fifteen years later, we are still living psychologically in the black-list era. The taboos that must not be violated are the taboos that ruled then, the interests that were sacred then are sacred still. The TV executives have learned something, perhaps, but there is much more that they have not learned, and probably are incapable of learning.

The NEA's Panic Button

Some organizations that call themselves friends of the Southern Negro have the most flabbergasting way of showing it. None is more consistently flabbergasting than the National Education Association, which last week came out with a report intended to prove that Negro teachers are being victimized—fired or demoted—by Southern communities that ruefully submit to federal demands for integration. The report, unfortunately, is a messy compilation of slipshod research and is likely to be used by hold-out segregationists as an argument that, see! the Feds are still distorting the picture!

For gathering their data in seventeen Southern and border states, NEA researchers allowed themselves only two weeks—and you can tell it. Three months ago the NEA predicted it would find at least 1,000 displaced teachers in the South. It didn't, but it did a pretty good job of disguising how far short it fell. The heart of the NEA's complaint is that "racial, rather than professional, reasons have caused 452 Negro teachers in the South to lose their jobs or be demoted to jobs beneath their qualifications." Most of these, it said, were displaced when integration of a community's white school brought about the closing of the Negro school.

A closer look at the report discloses, on page 39, that the 452 teachers have melted to only 427 "valid for this study," and that of these, 216 were Negro teachers in Florida who flunked the National Teachers Examination and had to take a pay cut—just like white teachers who flunked it.

All of a sudden, 452 become 211 teachers who were actually found by the NEA to have been fired or demoted for racial reasons. The whole report is blemished by this hocus-pocus quality.

Of the teachers who lost their jobs as the result of school closings, only 15 per cent were not later rehired somewhere else in the area. So it seems fair to suppose that perhaps—just perhaps—some of the Negro teachers should have been fired. Did the NEA research team delve into that possibility? When the question was put to Samuel B. Ethridge, coordinator for the NEA study, he replied shortly, "We're not in the business of evaluating teachers. Inasmuch as some of these teachers have taught in Negro schools for years, I would assume they are qualified."

That is precisely what the NEA should not assume. The low quality of Negro schools in the South is largely the result of poorly trained teachers who were themselves the products of a cruelly shoddy school system. The cycle must be broken; when it is, some Negro teachers will be hurt.

Of course there is discrimination against the employment of Negro teachers in integrated schools in the South (and in the North). The fact that there are today 1,200 Negro students but only one Negro teacher in previously all-white Alabama schools would suggest that student bodies are going to be fairly well blended long before faculties are.

But a mere head count will never tell the story. If the NEA really wants to help, it will borrow some more money from the U.S. Office of Education and go back down there to see how many qualified Negro teachers are being harried out of the profession and how many *un*qualified white teachers are still on the payroll. Such a study would be of historic importance in the education world, since it would signify that the NEA has finally come around to recognizing that certified teachers are not necessarily qualified teachers.

Peter Weiss and Wolf Biermann

Peter Weiss's play, known for short as Marat/Sade, opened at the Schiller Theater in West Berlin in the spring of 1964. It dramatized the viewpoints of the two title roles, Marat standing for social revolution, Sade for a desperate individualism. The West Berlin production gave to most observers the impression that the author sympathized with Sade, though oddly enough the director was a Pole and presumably a Marxist. It seems that Weiss approved the West Berlin production at the time, and as late as November, 1964, was still not siding with Marat when he gave a B.B.C. interview to A. Alvarez. A change became public, however, when the Marat/Sade production that opened in East Germany in March of 1965 gave unmistakable preference to Marat.

Weiss endorsed this interpretation immediately, and again later when he attended the Writers' Conference in Weimar in May. (That the Communists got him to this conference was itself a coup—America was not represented by anyone approaching Weiss's stature.) When the B.B.C. interview finally appeared in print, in the July-August, 1965 issue of the theatre magazine, Encore, Weiss wrote a letter to state that it was "ten months old" and out of date. This is the postscript which The New York Times has appended to its reprint of the interview (December 26), as if it were a brand-new statement specially written for them—even the figure "ten months" is unchanged, though it is now well over a year since the interview took place. In the early autumn of 1965, Weiss brought out in several different publications (one East and three West, I believe) his "Ten Theses," a document which now has a considerable underground reputation in countries where it has not been published at all, like the USSR and the U.S. The tenth thesis contains this sentence: "As between the two possibilities of choice which today remain to me I see only in the Socialist order of society the possibility of removing the existent inequities in the world." (For the record it should be added that The National Guardian gave a fairly lengthy account of the "Ten Theses" in its December 11 issue, and that The Nation applied for the right to print the whole text but did not get it).

Some Nation readers will agree with Weiss. Others will reject his main premise: that one must choose between the Eastern and the Western blocs. We do not think that the West must go to Kosygin or Mao for its socialism, or that our counterparts in the East must come to Lyndon Johnson for freedom. However, it is less important that we record our opinions on such matters than that we observe what is going on—namely, that Western intellectuals are tending more and more to reject "the West," and that the dialectical counterpart to this is that Eastern intellectuals are tending more and more to reject "the East."

The news about Peter Weiss in the latter part of 1965 is matched by the news of one of the leading artists of East Germany, Wolf Biermann. Biermann is a poet who sets his things to music and sings them to his own guitar accompaniment in cabarets or wherever else he is invited. He is a Marxist and was in the Communist Party till Ulbricht read him out of it about a year ago. His songs are fiercely anti-Stalinist, and therefore unfriendly to the ruling clique in the German party. On December 5 came Erich Apel's suicide. Any cultural ice that had thawed quickly froze again. Biermann was denounced in a 351-line article in the party organ, Neues Deutschland. Openly defiant at first, Biermann later wrote to Der Spiegel, which had featured his defiance, asking them to please lay off. At last report, he had left Berlin for an island in the Baltic.

ERIC BENTLEY

Kremlin Diplomacy

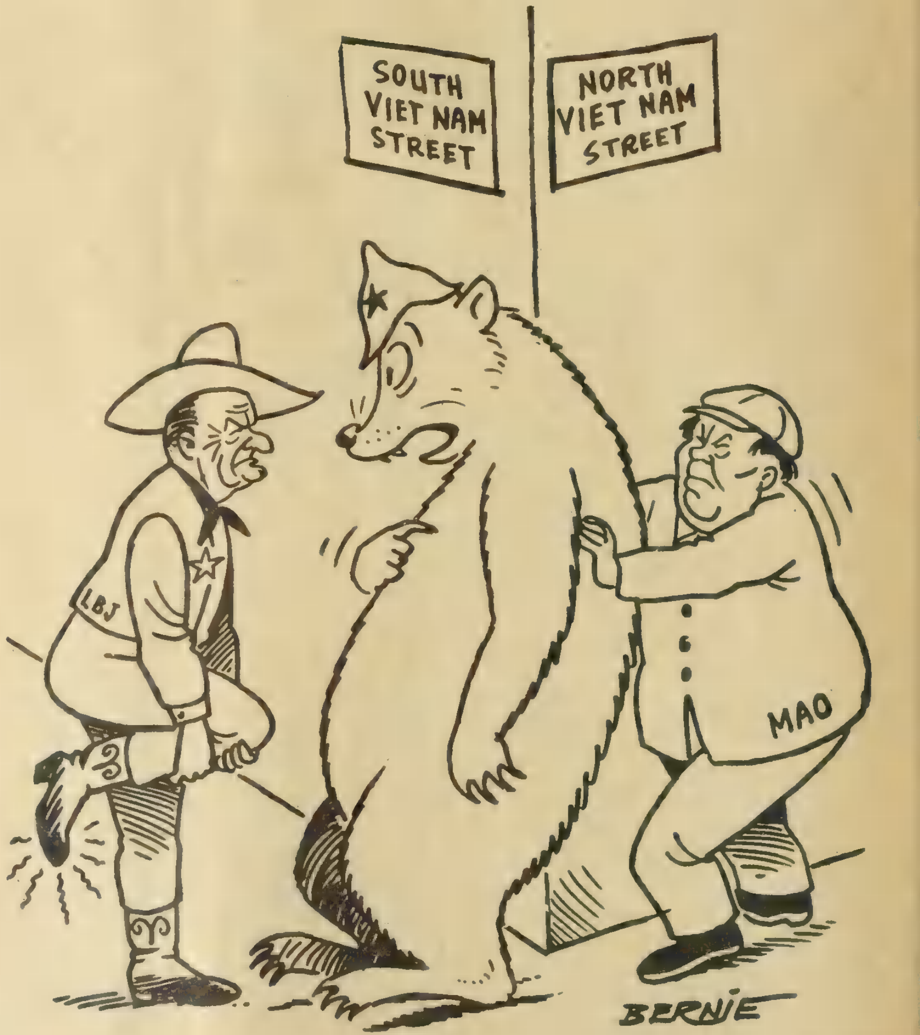
FIRST YEAR for the NEW TEAM . . Isaac Deutscher

On balance, the foreign policy pursued by the new men in the Kremlin during 1965 has not been favorable to the Soviet Government. After Khrushchev's downfall, his successors blamed him for the tension between Russia and China, the anti-Russian uproar in Eastern Europe, the virtual dissolution of Comecon and, not least, a deadlock in Russo-American relations. Brezhnev and Kosygin set out to correct Khrushchev's "errors"; and, without abandoning the intention to cultivate the détente with the West, hoped to repair the broken friendship with China. As a token of the peacefulness of their policy, they reduced military expenditures in their first budget. Toward China they made a gesture which was more than symbolic: they stopped all public polemic against the Chinese and resumed direct negotiations.

None of these efforts, it appears, has met with striking success. After a year in office, Mr. Kosygin speaks about a deterioration of Russo-American relations and raises defense expenditure; in his interview with James Reston of The New York Times he dismissed as untimely any suggestion of a meeting between himself and President Johnson. On the other hand, after a year during which the Russians (though not the Chinese) refrained from any public controversy over ideology, they are again broadcasting mutual polemics for the whole world to hear.

This simultaneous deterioration in Russia's relations with both the United States and China results, to some extent, from the course of the war in Vietnam. Peking and Moscow continue to disagree over policy there, although they have not so far defined any clear alternatives. The Chinese charge the Russians with being lukewarm and stingy in allocating aid to the Vietcong; whereas the Russians accuse the Chinese of making impossible a united Communist front over Vietnam. The Chinese have in fact obstructed any major Russian engagement in North Vietnam. They fear that if the Russians pour men and supplies into that country, they will come to control it and will then "sell it down the river" to the Americans. But the Chinese, for all their verbal belligerence, have themselves also avoided military involvement in Vietnam. The aloofness of the two big brothers may well suit the Hanoi government, but only as long as American escalation does not make massive help a matter of life or death. That point has evidently not yet been reached.

But are the Russians really prepared to sell North Vietnam down the river? They vigorously deny the accusation, professing themselves second to none in their hostility toward American intervention. It is therefore still hardly possible to detect significant differences between the Russian and Chinese utterances on the situation. Both invoke the Geneva agreements; both call for an end to American bombardments; both demand the withdrawal of American troops; and both know that the United States is in no mood to accept any of these demands. The supposed differences between Moscow's "soft line" and Peking's "tough line" may become more substantial and evident at a later stage of the war, when the United States has grown more weary of the fighting and more inclined to negotiate. Until then the complicated Russo-Chinese maneuvers over Vietnam will to some extent be shadowboxing.



Bernie, Paris: Ben Roth

"Excuse Me, Sir! . . . Somebody Pushed Me! . . ."

Isaac Deutscher is the author of many books on the USSR, among them The Great Contest: Russia and the West, and a three-volume life of Trotsky (both Oxford University Press).

The present Soviet leaders are nevertheless careful not to plunge back into full-dress ideological controversy with Maoism; they avoid the theological fury that characterized the exchanges in Khrushchev's days. While Peking's anti-revisionist vehemence remains unabated, Moscow retorts only rarely and controls its language.

This reticence and prudence have brought Messrs. Brezhnev and Kosygin some dividends. By the time of Khrushchev's downfall Moscow was almost isolated in the Communist camp—even anti-Chinese Communists thought that the Russians had gone too far in their attacks on Maoism. Moscow has now regained much of the Communist support in Europe and has managed to neutralize many Asian Communists. Today, the Chinese are increasingly isolated. As their accusations grow wilder, they become less convincing. Few Communists can swallow, for instance, Chinese allegations of capitalism in the USSR.

The Chinese have in addition committed a number of major mistakes and suffered several major defeats. They brought discredit upon themselves last summer when they rashly declared their support for Colonel Boumedienne, the new Algerian dictator, while most of the Algerian Left was still desperately resisting Boumedienne's coup d'étât. The Chinese hoped to secure through Boumedienne the convocation of the Afro-Asian conference in Algiers and to exclude the Russians from it. These tactics appeared unscrupulous even to many pro-Chinese Communists.

Then, during the conflict between India and Pakistan, the moral support which Peking gave Gen. Ayub Khan also outraged many of China's leftist friends in Asia and Africa who were inclined to wash their hands of both Shastri and Ayub Khan.

Most important—indeed momentous—has been the defeat which Chinese policy has recently suffered in Indonesia. For years the Indonesian Communists, led by Mr. Aidit and strongly supported by the Chinese, cultivated the so-called Front of National Unity under General Sukarno. They hailed the General as Indonesia's "national and revolutionary hero" — with results that are now clear. Even at the height of the anti-Communist terror in Jakarta, the Indonesian Communist party did not cease to appeal for protection to Sukarno.

The defeat of Indonesian communism has changed the political balance in Asia for quite a few years to come, even if the Communist party eventually recovers. In the whole history of international communism there are only two comparable defeats: one suffered by the Chinese party at Chiang Kai-shek's hands in 1927, and the other inflicted upon the German party by Hitler in 1933.

Aidit's policy vis-à-vis Sukarno was, by Communist standards, extremely "opportunistic" and rightist. Many Communists have been puzzled that Peking supported it; and they have seen this support as casting doubt on the sincerity of the Maoist strictures against "Khrushchevite opportunism." The defeat of Indonesian communism is therefore Maoism's defeat as well.

The net result of these developments is a considerable improvement in Russia's tactical position vis-à-vis China. If the Soviet leaders can maintain or improve it still further, they may well regain some of the elbow room they had lost; and may take more initiative in international affairs than they could afford in the last few years. In that case, they could assume once again the role of peacemaker between the United States and Communist Vietnam.

But the time for this is not yet at hand. And no Soviet government can afford to ignore Chinese susceptibilities, as Khrushchev ignored them, without being offered some quid pro quo by the Americans. Kosygin has made his terms of the bargain fairly clear; the price of any new Russo-American accommodation is NATO's unequivocal refusal to allow the Federal German Republic any access, direct or indirect, to nuclear weapons. The fact that the American Administration in the past year has repeatedly shelved this issue has probably brought a few sighs of relief to Moscow. But the deeper anxiety remains. It is always easier, the Russians reason, to stop a local war in Southeast Asia than to wrest nuclear weapons from German hands, once the Germans have been allowed to get hold of them.

For Russia, therefore, the latent crisis in Europe, which grows with the new rise of German military power, overshadows the open crisis in Asia.

THE BIG BLACKOUT

Whooping Cranes & Power Failures

Lawrence J. Hollander

In 1886, William Stanley, an early associate of George Westinghouse, installed one of the first transmission lines in this country. From his laboratory in Great Barrington, Mass., he operated a 4,000-foot line to the center of town to supply electricity for 150 lamps. Ever since the first blackout of that system—for surely there must have been one—power failures have grown in magnitude to encompass in one single failure more and more people, equipment, communities, cities, states and, in November, 1965, even countries.

What Sputnik did for science, the great blackout did for electric power engineering. Plain people and students, politicians and statesmen, painters and secretaries, policemen and straphangers are asking questions about electric power, grids, networks, generators, synchronism, stability and relays. Everyone is asking questions and there are so few who can give the answers. The conversation starts with: "Where were you . . .?" Sabotage? No, but it might be suggested that had there been a good supply of technically qualified electric power engineers, the great power failure might not have occurred.

---

Lawrence J. Hollander, First Vice President of the New York Chapter of Professional Engineers, is assistant to the dean of New York University's School of Engineering and Science. His scholarly field is electric power generation, transmission and distribution.

Before November 9, such engineers were as threatened with extinction as is the whooping crane. Power engineering is fast disappearing from this country; we are not taking the same interest in the preservation of this important technology as we do with our wild life. Every effort is made to preserve the whooping crane, but only the feeblest of effort is expended to preserve and improve the dwindling supply of brain power and skills that have built the greatest electrical system on earth.

It is known in academic circles that the public utilities, both the private tax-paying group and the government agencies, have for many decades considered the education of an electrical engineer beyond the level of the bachelor's degree as pure luxury. What need is there for a master's degree or a doctorate? For the first few years in the industry the low-paid "engineers" will fold blueprints, read meters, plot charts, gather statistics and perform other chores designed to make them feel like apprentices. It is only through this beating-down approach that the young engineers can be made to conform to the methods used since 1900. And why should there be a change? Even during the depression there were no layoffs.

Today's engineering student is well aware of that attitude, despite industry lip service to the contrary. It is no wonder that since World War II electrical engineering students by the tens of thousands have turned up their noses at the power industry, shifted their desires and interests to communications, computers and cryogenics. Professors of electric power found their classrooms not virtually empty, but completely empty. In fact they went out of business. Where in 1935 more than 150 major universities offered complete sequences of courses leading to degrees in electric power engineering, today the number of such schools may be counted on the fingers of one hand.

New York offers a striking example: a city having eight internationally known engineering schools, a city in which more than 10,000 students are presently studying for engineering degrees (both by sunlight and moonlight), a city in which can be found main offices of some of the most prominent consulting engineering houses, the best-known electric utilities and the largest manufacturers of electrical equipment. In this City of New York, in this scientific age, it is not possible to earn a bachelor's degree, a master's degree or a doctorate in electrical engineering with a major in electric power generation, transmission and distribution.

It has been said that some of the most spectacular achievements in science and technology have been propounded by young people, as for example, an Einstein at 26. If over a long period of time an industry does not bring in young people, that industry will suffer from stagnation and lack of innovation. This is true today in the electric power business. Engineers in the electric power companies are long lived; they have been there since the twenties, for surely the schools of this country for a score of years have not been training adequate replacements. Is it a wonder that in one of the biggest utilities the compulsory retirement age has been raised from 65 to 68?

These engineers build their power system today with not much fundamental change from what William Stanley built in 1886. It is true that after eighty years, machines are bigger, voltages are higher, system efficiencies have increased, interconnections have expanded, and reliability of service is at an all-time high. But even with all the evolutionary change, what is needed is something more radical, something which only an influx of young engineers can bring to an industry that has overmatured. It took a 30-million-people blackout to expose the ripeness and vulnerability of the great grid system which is enveloping the country like the net-type pattern on the skin of a cantaloupe.

These engineers desecrate the beauty of the land. They build power lines on all the open natural land from Storm King Mountain to the plains of Texas. If the land isn't barren, chemicals are sprayed under the power lines to "inhibit" the vegetation. As the voltage goes from high voltage to extra high voltage (EHV), the denuded strips become wider and wider. They cut across mountains, deserts, plains, cornfields, back and forth, over rivers and under the sea, ever and ever more complex. This country is getting so wound up in its grids that if all 350,000 miles of high-voltage transmission lines were laid along the equator, they would encircle the earth about fourteen times.

It is interesting to note that the latest report of the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department indicates that forty-four whooping cranes have arrived for the winter at Arkansas National Wildlife Refuge. There would have been forty-five except that one crane had been killed after colliding with a high-voltage line in Kansas on the way to Texas.

The power engineer views with alarm any development that would jeopardize the building of more and more transmission lines, higher and higher voltage lines, network ties, interties, grids and bigger grids. The towers have to be taller. Design them to look more beautiful, use helicopters to install them, fill the countryside with them, adorn them with colored porcelain, and drape the aluminum "scarecrow" tinsel (now in assorted colors) from one to the other. For what?

All of this is for the purpose of connecting one inefficient generating station to the next one. Just as two wrongs don't make a right, neither does the interconnection of many inefficient plants greatly enhance overall efficiency. Of course, efficiency is a relative thing, or is it?

In 1900, a kilowatt hour of energy required the consumption of 6 pounds of coal; today the coal is less than a pound. The National Power Survey published by the Federal Power Commission in 1964 records that during the thirty-eight years, 1925 to 1962 inclusive, the heat rate (amount of fuel required to generate one kilowatt hour) showed an improvement of 43 per cent, nearly two-thirds of which was accomplished in the fifteen years from 1925 to 1940, a golden age of the power industry.

Little improvement is to be expected in the future with the antiquated conventional steam-electric cycle, a system which in the most modern plant being built today has an overall thermal efficiency of just under 40 per cent. For every 10 tons of coal or other fossil fuel consumed, the energy of only 4 tons is converted into electricity and the energy of 6 tons is dumped into the river—a tremendous waste of the country's natural resources. Eighty-one per cent of the electricity generated in this country is by steam plants utilizing the energy of coal, natural gas or oil.

Barnell

The National Power Survey states that even a 5 per cent improvement in generating efficiency would save 45 million tons of coal a year, thus postponing measurably the exhaustion of the limited low-cost fossil fuel supply. Why do we permit this inefficiency? Are we going to wait until we run out of fuel as we are now running out of water? Why do we not get all the energy out of the fuel? Why don't our power engineers put together new concepts of generation which will give total energy?

The natural gas industry, a mere child in the shadow of the doting electric utilities, has perfected within the last few years a system which has become known as "Total Energy," one in which the thermal efficiency is not less than 40 per cent, but more than 85 per cent. The system is so simple in concept, so fundamentally sound, that it is truly the most effective means of complying with the portion of the Federal Power Act which directs the Federal Power Commission to give ". . . regard to the proper utilization and conservation of natural resources. . . ."

In its simplest form a Total Energy plant consists of a turbine (similar to a jet engine) connected to an electric generator; the turbine being fueled with natural gas (comparable systems are available for use with other fossil fuels). The hot gases which form the exhaust of the turbine are not "dumped into the river," but are collected and used for purposes of supplying the energy needed to produce hot water, heating and air conditioning. The waste is cut from the 60 per cent found in all steam-electric plants, to less than 15 per cent. The unit supplies both heat and electricity. Visitors to the New York World's Fair saw such a plant at the gas pavilion.

Total Energy is not an engineering fancy; it is an economic fact. Only five years ago less than ten Total Energy plants were in operation; today more than 300 are at work in such places as shopping centers, motels, schools, apartment houses, factories and office buildings. It is estimated that in ten years there will be 135,000 Total Energy plants in the United States. These plants are built at the location where energy is needed, therefore are termed "on-site" generation. The wary old-time power engineers degradingly refer to Total Energy plants as "do-it-yourself" power.

Total Energy does not have to be "do-it-yourself" power. It should have the full support of the electric utilities. In fact it should be sponsored by the electric utilities because it is good engineering, good economics, and good for the country. Bringing millions of tons of coal to cities like Chicago, Boston or New York, and then not "squeezing" all the energy out of it is the height of folly.

A Radio City should have a Total Energy plant; so should a Lincoln Center, a John Kennedy Cultural Center, a Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, a Prudential Center, a Roosevelt Field Shopping Center, and every large building complex requiring combinations of heat, hot water, air conditioning and electricity in great quantities. Because it delivers combinations of energy in the forms needed, Total Energy delivers the most energy per unit of fuel.

Of course, every great technological advance has been mocked at the outset; but here, with efficiencies doubled, energy costs are reduced, and that is important. It has been demonstrated, for example, that for installations at shopping centers, the developers make a profit from the Total Energy plant through the sale of electricity to the tenants. In fact, the profit is sometimes greater than that received from rents.

In New York and other big cities, with great compactness of tall buildings, such requirements for hot water, heating, air conditioning and process steam, Total Energy must find a place to share with the antiquated steam-electric generating system. In well-designed, multi-moduled Total Energy plants, power is available instantly at all times. As the hourly demand increases during the day the modules automatically start and the generators synchronize to the line in the barest part of a minute. It does not take six or more hours, as is the case with a steam-electric system. Total Energy plants occupy little more room than do existing heating plants.

The Edison Electric Institute obviously could not favor such schemes; the old-time electric power engineers would not permit it. Even the American Gas Association must tread softly, for many of its corporate members are combination companies, electric and gas. Under such circumstances the top management must see to it that the electric business does not compete with the gas business, each must work within its "territory." Only in those areas where the gas utility is separate from the electric utility is there true competition and promotion of Total Energy. It has been found necessary to form an entirely new promotional association, GATE, Group to Advance Total Energy, the membership being drawn primarily from the "pure" gas companies.

Although no Total Energy plant is now connected with the electric utility system, there is no engineering reason why they should not be. Were they so connected the overall thermal efficiencies of such plants could be increased even beyond the 85 per cent level now obtainable, for there would be no wasted energy. They would be stabilizing influences to a vulnerable grid system. At any time they could be separated from the grid and operated independently. On occasions of major power failures, of which we can expect to see more, Total Energy plants, when separated from the grid, could be "revived" in seconds.

The ownership of the Total Energy plant could be by the landlord, the electric utility or the gas utility, or by a service corporation. Whatever the arrangement, the consumer of the energy will benefit from lower rates. It has been found that with good engineering, the expense of the added equipment necessary for Total Energy is paid off in a period of three to five years, with the savings accrued from the electric bill. For only a small increase in the cost of fuel for heating, the electricity is virtually free. If this is "do-it-yourself" power, then we need a lot more of it.

Though Total Energy plants produce the same 60-cycle electricity that is supplied by the electric utilities, they have the added attraction of being able to provide, with relative ease and efficiency, not only combinations of energy but also combinations of electric frequencies such as 60 cycles and 420 cycles from the same module. This feature alone has tremendous advantages for lighting in large buildings. Fluorescent light, when operated at the high frequency, exhibits remarkable characteristics. High frequency eliminates the need for the bulk and weight of the ballast in the fixture; it reduces the watt consumption and at the same time increases the light output and improves the whiteness of the light; it increases the life of the fluorescent tube and eliminates the flicker effect. Thus electricity itself becomes a better product.

We are now only on the threshold of Total Energy and high frequency. The ultimate system for this country will encompass the best features of Total Energy in combination with the best features of interconnection. We need the engineers, unhampered by tradition, who will explore these concepts. We cannot continue to waste 60 per cent of our fossil fuels, nor can we tolerate power failures, whether they be in an area affecting millions of people or in the power supply or fuel cell of a rocket at Cape Kennedy. We must recognize that design and operation of power equipment is a highly technical problem, the study of which must find its way back into the curricula of the engineering schools. We must promote an interest in our young people to explore the opportunities in the power field; we need innovation. Just as we are doing everything possible to preserve the whooping crane, we must also preserve the technology of power engineering and, in fact, we must improve the breed.

Begrudged Diplomats

The Stepsons of Foggy Bottom

. . Henry S. Villard

The Foreign Service Officer of the United States is heckled by Congress, criticized by the press, suspect in the eyes of the public. Nowhere else in the world is the profession of diplomacy regarded with such distrust; nowhere else is it assumed that its practitioners are more concerned with selling out their country than promoting the national interest, more likely to be losers at the conference table than successful proponents of their government's view, more inclined to brinkmanship than keeping their people out of war and preserving the peace.

This skeptical attitude toward the Foreign Service and its parent body, the Department of State, dates back to the days when foreign affairs were conveniently dismissed by quoting George Washington's farewell warning against the dangers of entangling alliances. For many years, it suited the temperament of a nation intent on its own internal growth and prosperity to insulate itself insofar as possible from political turmoil in other lands; relations with foreigners and foreign governments were somehow a threat to the foundations of the republic, and anyone who advocated an increase in money or personnel for diplomatic intercourse came close to being considered unpatriotic. Two global wars drastically changed the outlook of the United States, but the misgivings of Congress and the public have remained much the same.

In times now past, when great wealth was a prerequisite for diplomacy — and rigorous examinations were not — there may have been grounds for questioning the caliber and competence of American representatives abroad. Franklin D. Roosevelt, openly indifferent to the Foreign Service, may have been irked by the presence of a few holdovers from the dilettante days. But in 1924 Congress took sober note of the responsibilities that were beginning to descend on the shoulders of our foreign affairs establishment. The Rogers Act, a farsighted piece of legislation, created a body of professional officers, whose careers would be devoted to learning the game from the ground up, and

---

Henry S. Villard, former ambassador to Libya, Senegal and Mauretania, is the author of Libya, the New Arab Kingdom of North Africa (Cornell University Press) and Affairs at State (Thomas Y. Crowell). Charles W. Tait in "Whatever Happened to the State Department?" (issue of September 13) dealt with still other aspects of the country's diplomatic shortcomings.

whose experience and skill would be brought to bear on the increasingly difficult problems of the times.

The result, up to 1939, was a closely knit group of career men, whose reporting ability, good judgment, knowledge and technical skill served the country well — even if there was no perceptible increase in public appreciation of their services. The Foreign Service is still composed of exceptionally able and devoted public servants; its accumulated experience in any given segment of the world is unique and impressive; and abroad it is recognized as a hard-headed, hard-working, well-informed and conscientious corps. But while it more than holds its own in the esoteric realm of international relations, it is beset by flaws which cannot fail to be of concern today.

If the Service had been allowed to develop professionally along the lines laid down by Congressman Rogers, not only might it have more prestige at home but it might have more influence in the policy-making process and carry more weight among such other government agencies as the Pentagon and CIA. Two events, however, thwarted a natural growth commensurate with America's rising burdens and obligations. One was the failure of the Department during World War II to assert its prerogatives in the field of foreign affairs and to strengthen its professional structure; the other was the witch hunt of Sen. Joseph McCarthy in the early fifties, which dealt a devastating blow to the morale of the Service.

The war interrupted a promising evolution in the twenties and thirties toward a strictly professional body, the members of which advanced in their careers on the basis of merit alone. Up to that point, American diplomacy had more or less confined itself to a spectator role — as when we decided not to join the League of Nations and named a neutral "observer" to Geneva. Then, at the very moment when our participation in world affairs was to be assured by Pearl Harbor, and when foresight would have dictated a long-range plan for building up the Service, recruitment was suspended in deference to the country's military needs and for fear that diplomats would be considered draft dodgers. Instead of training more men to deal with the political upheaval then taking place — as well as its inevitable aftermath — the Department made do with a vastly inadequate staff. The Foreign Service emerged at the end of hostilities woefully undermanned and thinly spread.

It thus became necessary to bring in persons from the outside, without the requirement that they pass highly competitive examinations and start their careers on the lowest rung of the ladder. This was the so-called "lateral entry" or "side-door" principle—an innovation that did much to damage the esprit de corps which was the hallmark of the professional service. Next came the forcible enlargement of the Foreign Service, under Secretary Dulles, by amalgamation with the permanent home staff — an operation quickly known as "Wristonization" because Henry M. Wriston, then President of Brown University, headed a committee that issued the decree. The watchword here was "interchangeability"—service abroad or at home, regardless of training or inclination; and from a total of 1,285 regular Foreign Service Officers, the size, but not necessarily the strength, of the corps was nearly tripled overnight. How that affected the regulars, who had begun at the bottom, may be imagined: the preferred stock of the original system, it seemed, had suddenly been watered.

(An even greater dilution is in sight today under the pending Hays bill, H. R. 6277, which gives the President authority to effect a wholesale transfer "without examination," of "all officers and employees" in State, USIA and AID, except for those few paid under the Federal Executive Salary Schedule.)

But if the spirits of the career men were depressed by tinkering with the machinery, the destruction wrought by McCarthyism in the name of "loyalty" was infinitely greater. It caused the resignation of senior officers, regardless of their anti-Communist records; hounded out of their jobs men who may have erred in judgment but were never disloyal to the United States; frightened off in droves likely candidates for the career, and generally besmirched the reputation of the Service both here and abroad. The results of McCarthy's attack were that morale sank to an all-time low, and that, because many officers thought twice before writing reports that might be interpreted as leaning to the left, performance was Light Refreshments at the U.S. Embassy seriously impaired. Confidence in the Service as a career dropped correspondingly.

In addition, certain built-in factors have tended to inhibit the full flowering of a diplomatic career in this contradictory age of specialization and mass production. The first is the inherent nature of a bureaucracy—to grow bigger. Despite efforts that are made from time to time to hold it in check, there seems to be something compulsive about the way bureaucratic cells subdivide. An already huge "foreign affairs complex" nevertheless seems inadequate to handle the variety of subjects coming under its jurisdiction, not to speak of the various international crises and emergencies the country is heir to. When Henry L. Stimson became Secretary of State under Hoover in 1929, the Department's entire staff, including Foreign Service officers who happened to be on duty in Washington, could be assembled on the back steps for a photograph at lunch time. Today, counting all hands here and overseas, State's payroll carries nearly 25,000 employees, with the prospect that specialists will continue to be added in sundry new categories. The carefully selected individual who enters the Foreign Service on the basis of his particular background and education, is rapidly becoming lost in the crowd. Moreover, the larger the organization grows, the larger the army of administrators required to run the show. Mundane problems of administration overshadow the workings of political units, and what used to be a serviceable housekeeping tail is beginning to wag the whole diplomatic dog.

If that were not enough to discourage departmental initiative and creativity, the paper jungle retards policy makers and obscures policy decisions. As Secretary Rusk has testified, in a moment of truism, "layering is an obstacle to the extent that it is burdensome." By "layering" Rusk meant the number of offices and officers that intervene between him and the handling of a given issue. Suppose an incoming telegram does not follow its tortuous course through the establishment: "somebody," said the Secretary, "feels that he is being deprived of his participation in a matter of his responsibility." Nothing more sharply pains a bureaucrat than to be deprived of participation in a matter for which he shares the very least modicum of responsibility.

At the same time, Rusk expressed justified concern at the size and intricacy of the administrative structure abroad. For example, with at least forty-four agencies of the government represented in London, our embassy has its work cut out supervising and backstopping activities that are not its primary concern but that reflect the multiplicity today of fingers in the policy-making pie. In some posts, the representatives of AID, USIA, CIA and the Peace Corps—to mention only a few—far outnumber the Foreign Service career officers.

To attain its present pitch of efficiency, the Foreign Service has had to labor under other handicaps. The attitude of Congress toward appropriations for the "cooky pushers" is notorious: State's budget is the merest fraction of our disbursements for guided missiles, nuclear submarines, agricultural price supports, or for exploring the moon. Of the total estimated government expenditures for the fiscal year 1966, the Department's share comes to .04c out of each dollar; it received $204,618,000 for the "administration of foreign affairs," including salaries and operating expenses and the acquisition, operation and maintenance of buildings abroad. Of this modest sum, $993,000 was for what Congress jocularly refers to as the "booze allowance"—the money used for official entertaining by representatives of the United States. For reasons which it is difficult to fathom, Congress has never permitted the funds so allocated to be exceeded in any fiscal year. Hospitality is a basic technique of diplomacy. An ambassador or other officer with independent means may not have to worry on this score, but one who must live within his salary—not high by business standards—is concerned about picking up the tab for a meal when he is coming to the end of his annual allotment.

This leads to consideration of another fact of Foreign Service life. Career men have long been resigned to the spectacle of top posts going to outsiders—ambassadorial appointments made in exchange for campaign contributions or other political support. "Fat cats" have one obvious virtue as ambassadors—they can mount the necessary social functions at no cost to the government. But for an officer who has come up from the ranks, the ultimate reward is to become chief of mission; yet he knows that between a quarter and a third of the embassies go to beneficiaries of the spoils system. However competent and intelligent the latter may be in their own spheres, they have no training for the peculiar demands of diplomacy. In the State Department itself, area specialists may find themselves working under men who have no previous government service and who must depend on a seasoned deputy for guidance. It is a deterrent to ambition, to say the least, when a substantial proportion of the responsible jobs are denied to those best qualified to hold them.

Finally, the State Department suffers endless intervention in its attempt to formulate foreign policy. When anything goes wrong in our relations with the rest of the world, as is bound to happen from time to time, the Department or the Foreign Service is a handy whipping boy. Americans tend to forget, however, that State is not alone in the foreign field. The conduct of foreign affairs begins in the White House; the President is charged by the Constitution with that responsibility, and Presidential advisers from Colonel House to McGeorge Bundy have been evidence of that fact. Congress is increasingly influential in questions of foreign policy—as indeed seems inevitable when massive sums for foreign aid are involved—and policy makers must reckon with expressions of views from either side of the aisle in both the Senate and the House of Representatives. In addition, when diplomats make decisions these days, they must take into account the pronounced views of the Department of Defense, not to speak of the active and far-flung operations of an expanding CIA. Finally, the often strident voices of the public, the press and organized pressure groups must be given a hearing. It is no wonder that State may sometimes have to take action against the better judgment of its experts—and bear the resulting criticism in silence if things turn out badly.

As foreign affairs grow more and more complex, the job of the Foreign Service becomes correspondingly harder, and the need for a strictly professional body of experts is more critical. Capable and selfless as the members of the Service are today, their efficiency can be too easily compromised by forces at work in their rear—particularly by the red tape of a proliferating bureaucracy, by the sacrifice of the career principle, by the limitation of funds for essential purposes, and by politics. If maximum service is to be rendered to the American people, reforms are indicated.

(1) The entire organization, at home and abroad, should be placed on a career basis—its members recruited, trained and promoted according to that principle. With the rare exception of a distinguished, qualified citizen, ambassadors should be appointed from the career.

(2) Salaries and allowances should be at least as liberal as those in private business. All expenses incurred in line of duty, including those for entertainment and household maintenance, should be borne without question by the government.

(3) The size of the State Department should be cut by a quarter or a third; if that is initially impossible, because of civil service entrenchment, a halt should be called to multiplication of the bureaucrats, together with their managers and administrators, and jobs should be allowed to wither away with the passage of time. In the process, we might learn whether two persons can be trained to do what three do at present.

(4) More study should go into reducing paper work, eliminating nonessential reports, overhauling the system of committee clearances, and streamlining the decision-making procedure.

(5) The President should give the Secretary of State the power and backing to run the everyday business of foreign affairs without obstruction, interference or circumvention by others. If experts are to be hired by the taxpayer, their judgment should be relied on and they should be entrusted with authority commensurate with their qualifications.

(6) Morale should be raised in what is essentially a highly honorable profession through a wide-scale campaign to inform the people about their Foreign Service. The public needs to understand what the State Department does and does not do, what it can and cannot do, and what the career can mean to those who are qualified.

The last point is of great importance if the Foreign Service is ever to get the support it must have to carry out its assignments. Only by interest on the part of the people can it receive proper attention from Congress. And without Congressional support—and Presidential approval—there is small likelihood that any of the above program can be realized.

The Open Door of Henry Wallace

Ronald Radosh

To many of Henry Agard Wallace's contemporaries, it appeared that he was an arch-New Dealer, a radical exponent of the "century of the common man." Regarded favorably as an anti-imperialist liberal by those on the Left, and condemned as a radical by many on the Right, Wallace was in reality an exponent of the traditional foreign policy advocated by American statesmen since 1898 — economic expansion through the technique of the Open Door abroad for American commerce. Wallace believed that business, labor, agriculture and government formed a four-way partnership. One partner could for a time obtain a larger share of the national income, but this "pressure game" would explode unless they all united to produce a larger income to divide. The source of this income was the "assurance of large and expanding" markets for business, upon which the private-enterprise system was dependent "for its very survival." As Secretary of Commerce, Wallace held his goal to be the creation of a "revitalized foreign trade service," which he hoped would "play a more effective role" in promoting "vigorously a high level of foreign trade on a sustained basis." Full employment and 60 million jobs would be the result of government cooperation "with the export trade" to put on "an aggressive sales campaign abroad."

Wallace argued that export markets were a necessity because American industry produced in excess of domestic demand. As soon as productive capacity caught up with postwar purchasing capacity at home, Americans would again have to "look to foreign markets in order to exchange our surplus industrial and agricultural production." For this reason, Wallace joined such leading corporate spokesmen as Chamber of Commerce president, Eric Johnston, and John Abbink of the National Foreign Trade Council, in demanding a postwar loan to Great Britain. If Britain did not obtain funds with which to buy American goods, Wallace forecast that American productivity would dry up from lack of markets. The result would be depression. To those Americans who argued that loans made to Britain under a Labour government would further socialism in Europe, Wallace replied that "money is being loaned to Britain for the purpose of enabling her to do business in the way we are doing, rather than to pursue any further the path of socialization or nationalization." He believed that private enterprise in foreign trade would permit other countries to "embrace [the American] system, which is not only in our best interests but in theirs also."

Wallace's program of saving the economy by a search for large export markets owed a great deal to the approach first used by another 20th-century Secretary of Commerce, Herbert Hoover. Wallace was frank to acknowledge his debt. "I have considerable sympathy with Herbert Hoover's problem as Secretary of Commerce right now," Wallace stated after his appointment, "because I can say that I am going to go all out to get the maximum use of whatever powers may reside in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to foster and develop trade here and abroad." Predicting an excess of exports over imports for at least ten years, Wallace admitted he "would be contributing perhaps as much as any single individual to producing a situation like that for which I criticized the Republican Party back in the decade of the twenties." The continuation of America's traditional program of foreign expansion was largely ignored by liberals who hoped that American influence would create a liberal and peaceful world. Only such conservative critics as Sen. Robert A. Taft understood that while "dollar diplomacy is derided . . . it is exactly the policy of Government aid to our exporters which Mr. Wallace himself advocates to develop foreign trade, except that [previously] it did not involve our lending abroad the money to pay for all our exports."

---

Ronald Radosh is instructor of history at Queensborough Community College in New York, and an associate editor of Studies on the Left.

It was to Henry A. Wallace's great credit that, although he subscribed to the need for American expansion, he would not follow the lead of cold-war statesmen who believed that America should use its postwar position of strength to structure the world in its own image. The cold warriors hoped to push Russia from Eastern Europe, thus opening the Danube Valley and Eastern Europe to the goods and capital of the West.

Wallace preferred to "discuss with the Russians in a friendly way their long-range economic problems and the future of . . . cooperation in matters of trade." He saw the Soviet Union as a natural billion-dollar market for American industrial surplus and as a source of necessary raw materials. Moreover, mutually advantageous trade relations, it could be hoped, would create a basis for negotiations and lead to an end of political misunderstanding. Problems relating to Eastern Europe might be solved if economic arrangements were worked out first. "Russian economic penetration of the Danube area might be countered," Wallace suggested, "by concrete proposals for economic collaboration in the development of the resources of this area, rather than by insisting that the Russians should cease their unilateral penetration and offering no solution to the present economic chaos there." Wallace believed that Soviet behavior was the "result of their dire economic needs and of their disturbed sense of security," and he urged that "we can disabuse the Soviet mind . . . by proving to them that we want to trade with them and to cement our economic relations with them." His commitment to increasing cooperative trade relations placed Wallace in opposition to those who would refuse any loan to Russia, and to those, like Averell Harriman, who suggested granting piecemeal credit in return for specific political concessions.

Wallace developed an equally penetrating critique of postwar policy on the control of atomic energy. In an era when influential Americans argued that the Soviets would never produce an atomic bomb, and that the United States should keep its "secret" until Russia agreed to be policed by the United Nations, Wallace answered that it was illusory to base policy on the idea of an atomic monopoly that could not be maintained. When Bernard Baruch introduced the United States plan for control of atomic production to the UN in June, 1946, Wallace declared it unrealistic. He held that other nations should not be required to stop research on the military use of atomic energy and to disclose their resources, while the United States retained its right to withhold technical knowledge until an acceptable international control and inspection system existed.

The United States was notifying the Russians that if they were "good boys," America would eventually turn over to them its knowledge of atomic energy. But, Wallace noted, "there is no objective standard of what will qualify them as being 'good' nor any specified time for sharing our knowledge." Only after the Soviet Union had revealed its hand would the United States announce whether it would play out the game. An equitable agreement would be one in which the United States committed itself to disclose information and destroy its bomb stockpile at a specific time, not at its own unfettered discretion. Wallace was convinced that the Russians would respond to such a proposal.

After Harry S. Truman assumed the Presidency, the posture of the American Government toward the Soviet Union became more hostile, and Henry A. Wallace intensified his criticism of those who sought to avoid any cooperative relations with the Russians. On September 12, 1946, at Madison Square Garden, Wallace delivered the speech that led to his forced resignation from the President's Cabinet. He summarized and reiterated the approach that he had taken for the past year. "Russian ideals of social-economic justice," he told his audience, "are going to govern nearly a third of the world. Our ideas of free enterprise democracy will govern much of the rest. . . . By mutual agreement this competition should be put on a friendly basis, and the Russians should stop conniving against us in certain areas just as we should stop scheming against them in other parts."

Wallace's speech became political dynamite. As he spoke, Secretary of State James F. Byrnes was in Paris, about to negotiate with the Russians on postwar peace treaties. The speech threatened to disrupt Byrnes's get-tough approach, since Wallace claimed that the President had read his speech and said that it "represented the policy of his administration." Truman later claimed that he had approved only Wallace's right to present the speech, and had not endorsed it "as constituting a statement of the foreign policy of this country." On the 18th, Secretary Byrnes asked the President to prevent Wallace from discussing foreign affairs, since Wallace's views led diplomats to wonder whether Byrnes's policy would be followed. On September 19, Truman asked Wallace to resign, calling attention to the need of government to "stand as a unit in its relations with the rest of the world."

In his Memoirs, Truman wrote that he had not read the Garden speech and that Wallace had only "told me he was going to make a speech." However, the official record of the President's press conference on September 12 indicates that President Truman did approve of what Wallace was to say. In response to a question whether the speech represented administration policy, Truman replied "that is correct," and later reiterated that "I approved the whole speech."

It has not hitherto been explained why the President, himself a leader of those who advocated a militant position toward Russia, had been reluctant to allow Wallace to leave the Cabinet. Truman himself offered the explanation that "Wallace had a following," and that "his appeal had some effect." If he was kept in the Cabinet, "I might be able to put some check on his activities."

The second part of this explanation does not stand up, since Wallace's most active public role was that of consistent critic of American policy. Wallace had spoken out directly, and even after the Garden speech, made it clear that he would continue to do so. On the other hand, Truman did have good reason to fear Wallace's potential drawing power. As David A. Shannon pointed out in The Decline of American Communism, "it was not until mid-1947 that Truman appeared as a champion of liberalism, after a Republican Congress afforded him a conservative backdrop. The Democratic record on price control and inflation had been poor, housing was a mess, and Truman had even asked Congress for power to draft strikers. . . . In 1946, it seemed to the liberals that Truman would undo everything Roosevelt had gained." In this atmosphere, the President may have hoped that the liberals would not become an effective opposition force if Wallace remained in the Cabinet. Even under pressure from Byrnes, Truman first asked only that Wallace refrain from criticism until the Paris negotiations were completed.

But granting that Truman may have had good reason not to break with his Secretary of Commerce, why did Wallace prefer to stay within the administration, when he might have led his supporters out at a time when this form of pressure could have forced reversal of policy? To answer this, one must first know that Wallace did not hold the President responsible for the negative turn in foreign policy. Truman had consistently told Wallace that they shared the same approach toward American-Soviet relations and Wallace believed that this assured his ability to influence the course of policy from within the administration itself.

Some examples will indicate the effectiveness of the President's approach. On March 14, 1946, Truman had appointed Gen. Walter Bedell Smith ambassador to Russia. Wallace wrote Truman expressing hope that Bedell Smith would be able to break the diplomatic deadlock in American-Soviet relations. He believed Smith's task would be made easier if the United States consented to discuss long-range economic problems with the Russians. Soviet intransigence was due to the Russians' dire economic needs and to their disturbed sense of security. America should prove its desire for peace, Wallace wrote, by trading with the Russians, and a group should be sent to Moscow to initiate talks on the subject.

President Truman wrote later that Bedell Smith had asked for Wallace's letter, along with Truman's initials, to indicate that the President approved of Wallace's view. Truman wrote: "I ignored this letter of Wallace's. I had expressed my policy to Bedell Smith and had suggested the approach he should take to the Kremlin. I could see little to be gained from the Wallace proposal."

It is clear that Truman did not intend to test whether increased trade with Russia and a receptive attitude toward Soviet demands for security in Eastern Europe would lead to a lessening of tension. But he did not include in his Memoirs the answer he gave Wallace. On March 20, he wrote Wallace that he "appreciated very much your letter in regard to the Russian situation which you handed me at the cabinet meeting last Friday. I have seen General Smith and have discussed conditions with him. I believe he is going to Russia with the right attitude in mind. I have great hopes of his getting our relations on a better plane. He impressed me as being a capable person." In the context of events, Wallace took this skillfully worded reply to mean that Truman agreed with his suggestions. Therefore, when Wallace appeared with the President at a dinner held on March 23, he praised Truman as one who was carrying on FDR's fight for peace. Claiming that the "people believe as you do, Mr. President," and that they "dislike all this talk of inevitable war," Wallace's approach brought forth no repudiation from the President.

Wallace had become involved in yet another conflict in March of 1946—a debate over the presence of American military bases in Iceland. He had told a Swedish A.P. reporter that if it was true that Scandinavians did not want the United States to remain in Iceland, and had appreciated Soviet withdrawal from the Danish island of Bornholm, that as a "private individual and not as a member of government" he thought it would be better for world peace if the U.S. "pulled out of Iceland." The comment found its way to The New York Times, which printed the private remark as a public statement. Secretary of State Byrnes became upset, since he felt that his attempt to gain bases in Iceland had been aborted by Wallace's statement. Secretary of Defense Forrestal supported Byrnes, declaring it to be inappropriate for a Cabinet member to make comments on foreign policy contrary to the position of the Secretary of State. The bipartisan Senate leader, Arthur Vandenberg, agreed that "everything was quite agreeable" until Wallace's statement interfered with policy. Wallace was depicted as an administration member whose actions were defeating his own government's avowed policy.

The press pictured Wallace as opposing a course of action with respect to Iceland bases that was favored by the President. The Alsop brothers, writing in Life for May 20, declared that Wallace opposed "the agreed policy of the American government, approved by the President." They used the same argument that the President himself would adopt when dismissing Wallace four months later. Wallace had a "right to his opinion," the Alsop brothers wrote, but if it did not prevail, he should "resign or . . . remain silent." Similarly, a June 2 column by Bert Andrews of the New York Herald Tribune claimed that the President believed Wallace should "go along with the policy . . . or keep quiet."

The debate over Iceland air bases was a foreshadowing of the impending confrontation over the Garden speech. Yet in June, Truman again indicated to Wallace that he was not dissatisfied with his Secretary's approach. Wallace had sent the President a copy of his answer to Life, in which he claimed that the Alsops had distorted his real views and had based their statement on his purely personal talk with the Swedish reporter. Truman's answer to Wallace on June 7 indicated that he agreed the press was once again distorting Wallace's views and treating him unjustly. Truman wrote:

> Your note of the 3rd enclosing me copy of your correspondence with Wilson Hicks of Life is all right. I was happy to receive it. It seems that Life, Time and Fortune magazines take particular delight in garbling anything that you or I have to say.

By judicious choice of language, Truman had connected distortions of the press against Wallace with those against himself. Wallace did not know that at a Cabinet meeting from which he was absent, Secretary Byrnes had argued that he "must not thus be 'shot in the back' by his own colleagues." Wallace's reaction to Truman's letter was to feel assured once again that the President supported the fight for peace. Wallace would constantly argue, until his dismissal—that he and the President stood side by side on the question of Russian policy.

This conviction led Wallace to reject any thought of forming a third party, and to choose instead to fight within the government "as long as blind acquiescence is not a condition of service in the Cabinet of the President." Wallace was never acquiescent. He intensified his critique. On July 23, he had presented a memorandum to the President summing up his entire approach toward foreign policy. It looked to the world, Wallace wrote, as if the United States were preparing for a war it held to be inevitable. Four-fifths of its budget was spent for warlike purposes, and it had secured air bases around the world from which the rest of the earth could be bombed. Asking the President to consider reversing events, Wallace inquired "how it would look to us if Russia had the ten-thousand-mile bombers and air bases within a thousand miles of our coast lines and we did not?" Wallace insisted that "we should be prepared, even at the expense of risking epithets of appeasement, to agree to reasonable Russian guarantees of security."

President Truman was himself making liberal use of such epithets. He recorded in his diary for September 18, a day on which he had conferred with Henry Wallace, that "Mr. X" was not as "fundamentally sound" as he had thought. X was a "pacifist 100 per cent," who wanted to "disband our armed forces, give Russia our atomic secrets and trust a bunch of adventurers in the Kremlin Politburo. . . . The Reds, phonies and 'parlor pinks' seem to be banded together and are becoming a national danger. I am afraid they are a sabotage front for Uncle Joe Stalin." Such was the response of the President to Wallace's reasoned criticisms—a caricature of his Secretary's true arguments which allowed the President to evade a confrontation with Wallace's views by vulgarizing them.

In retrospect, the criticisms offered by Wallace in 1946 were more than well taken. Standing almost alone, he held it was folly to believe that the United States could maintain a long-term monopoly on the knowledge needed to produce atomic weapons. He urged that the United States should not base its policy on an illusion, and therefore opposed any use of the bomb as an instrument of diplomacy. Because of his suggestion that Russian demands for security in Eastern Europe be honored, he was accused of "appeasement" and pro-communism. The equation of dissent and criticism with treason and radicalism had begun. Henry Wallace's examination of the assumptions of cold-war policy are still relevant. Americans concerned with the backward nature of contemporary foreign policy have much to learn from his views and his experience.

Government by Freshmen

Maine's Year of the Donkey . . .

David L. Graham

Freeport, Me.

Wouldn't a Nation reader find a term in Maine's traditionally conservative state legislature frustrating and dismal? You might think so, but I have been through the experience and found it educational, stimulating and, at times, wildly exhilarating—as, for instance, when a pair of bills I was sponsoring squeaked through in the last days of the session, one of them by two votes.

State legislatures, like families, have their little jokes. A favorite of the 102nd Maine Legislature was to hail Rep. Dana Childs as the best Democratic Speaker of the House in half a century. No question about it. The Democrats hadn't elected a majority of the House, hence a Speaker, since 1914.

Except for the very close victory of Rep. Stanley R. Tupper, a Republican who had dissociated himself from Goldwater, Maine Democrats made a clean sweep in 1964, electing one U.S. Senator (Muskie), as well as Maine's other U.S. Congressman, and winning majorities in both houses of the state legislature.

It was in an almost panicky anti-Goldwater stampede that many Democratic legislators were hustled into office. The mill towns, being predominantly Franco-American, were Democratic as usual, only more so, but my town of Freeport hadn't sent a Democratic Representative to Augusta since before Lincoln's time.

We Democrats who awoke on November 4 as victors were almost as dismayed as we were elated; a sudden burden of responsibility had descended upon us. We hadn't expected to win control of the legislature. Many of our successful candidates had really been stand-ins, allowing their names to be used just to fill out the ticket. Rumor had it that one victorious Democrat was indignantly demanding a recount.

By the opening of the legislative session last January, a good many Democrats were wondering uneasily if their party, after more than fifty years on the side lines, could do anything substantial for the state of Maine. Not only had these elected Democrats never been a majority party; more than 50 per cent of the entire legislature were freshmen. Fortunately we had one very good and experienced man in the House, whom we chose Speaker; and an equally good and experienced man in the Senate, who was elected President of that body. These two became the Democratic leadership, with the eminence grise of Senator Muskie hovering benignly in the background.

Along the Maine Coast

To me, the most important bills in the legislature were, of course, the ones I myself introduced. Shoving these bills up the ladder to enactment, or struggling in vain to keep them from tumbling off into the eternal night of "indefinite postponement" was a cram course in politics. The lesser duties of a legislator, the errand-boy aspect of the job, I plunged into with zeal, wangling passes to the races, getting jobs for people, and even filling a rush order for a license to trap muskrat. It behooved me, I felt, to perform these humble chores faithfully, because who was going to rely on a freshman Representative, a political innocent, to push through important legislation? But being known from my weekly newspaper columns as a liberal, I soon acquired what one newspaper man described as the "three most controversial bills of the session."

However, I had begun working on one bill even before the session started—it was to provide a decent school for Pownal, a town in my district that had nothing but five dilapidated, overcrowded, one-room schoolhouses. Pownal was already getting the maximum help from the state, and lacked sufficient taxable property on which to borrow the money that would be needed to build the simplest consolidated school. Only by wheedling a special grant from the legislature could the job be done. The task fell to the town's state Representative—me.

David L. Graham, who represents Freeport and adjoining towns in the Maine legislature, writes a weekly column that appears in three of the state's newspapers.

My first step—first maneuver, if you will—was to get myself appointed to the Joint Committee on Education. Every bill has a hearing before the appropriate committee, and there its future is usually decided by the committee's "ought to pass" or "ought not to pass" report. The Department of Education wrote up my bill for me, the Legislative Research Committee put it in proper form, and I dropped it in the hopper. The notion that legislators dream up and write up their own bills is a myth. Certainly 95 per cent of our bills emerged full blown from some lobbyist's pocket. I use the word in the broadest sense—not just to cover paid agents, who must register with our Secretary of State, but any individual, company or group (including departments of the state government) that promotes the passage or defeat of any particular bill or bills.

In due course the Pownal bill had its committee hearing and the Pownal School Board ably presented its arguments. But afterward, in executive session, the committee balked. They deeply sympathized, they said, but felt they couldn't make an exception for Pownal. If they approved a bill making Pownal a one-town school district, twenty or thirty other towns that were as badly off would demand like favors.

My answer to this had two parts: (1) Let them, I said; if they are as wretchedly equipped as Pownal, they deserve special help; and (2) oh, no they won't, I assured my colleagues, it's too late for any more bills to be introduced in this session. Let the next legislature worry about the precedent of Pownal.

Like most glib answers, mine impressed almost no one but the utterer. The Education Committee issued a 7-to-2 "ought not to pass" report, which is enough to kill nearly any bill. But when Pownal came before the House, I arose in my legislative innocence and moved that we accept the minority report. Choking with nervousness — this was my maiden speech—I suggested that outhouses had little educational value, that Pownal's children were entitled to a school with plumbing, good lighting and adequate space.

Lacking eloquence, my voice quavered with sincerity, one of the rarest of legislative commodities. The House ignored the committee's recommendation and went along with Pownal. The Senate did not, but the Committee of Conference—three members of each house—which resulted from the deadlock rewrote the bill with minor changes and then approved it unanimously.

With victory apparently at hand, the bill was then held up in the House. Prayers and entreaties heavily seasoned with tact overcame the objections, and the hope of Pownal plunged forward once more, finally landing on the Senate appropriations table. This was the last hurdle on the track to the Governor's desk. In Maine all such money measures must clear the Senate's appropriation table, where bills requiring expenditures are matched to available funds. A sort of legislative "pearly gate," this appropriations table; from here money bills introduced by members of the majority usually go to their reward and minority party bills are cast into outer darkness.

For weeks the Pownal bill lay dormant on the appropriations table. Meanwhile, the legislative mills were grinding out my other bills. One of these, affecting kindergarten education, I had introduced "by request"—from courtesy rather than conviction; yet it went through with no delay and without the slightest assistance from me. I was photographed with the Governor as he signed it, and never did a legislator get more publicity for less work. But another bill that would have permitted tow-truck operators to claim abandoned cars that they had hauled off the highways and kept for a reasonable time ran into opposition from General Motors and General Motors prevailed.

However, it was the Pownal bill and three others that provided the basis of my political education. Early in the session representatives of the NAACP asked me to sponsor a so-called "Fair Housing Bill," to prohibit racial and religious discrimination in the rental of housing. No bill seemed to me more important or more worth while.

My second controversial bill would have permitted Maine savings banks, like those of Massachusetts, to sell life insurance. Again flattered to be allowed to carry the ball and eager to emulate Justice Louis Brandeis, who in his younger days had led the fight to bring Savings Bank Life Insurance to Massachusetts, I accepted at once—only to find that I was no Louis Brandeis. The life insurance lobby slaughtered us.

The contrast between the fates of these two bills was a lesson in the workings of democracy. Both were clearly in the public interest; both were controversial in the extreme, being bitterly opposed by special interests; both had not passed in previous legislatures.

Behind our Fair Housing Bill we had a small but persistent pressure group, the NAACP, which, though insignificant as a political force in Maine, had, with the aid of various churches, state-wide coverage and dedicated workers. These people got their campaign going even before the legislature convened. Voters from all over the state began approaching their legislators by letter, telephone or personal interview. Several newspapers gave the bill their blessing. Meanwhile I and the bill's co-sponsor, a prominent Republican whom we had prevailed upon to join us and add the luster of social respectability to the cause, began lining up our legislative colleagues one by one.

Except for one organization, the Maine Association of Real Estate Boards, the opposition was furtive and ashamed. And the association's opposition was so extreme—it called the bill "discriminating legislation" and referred to it as "Forced Housing"—that it reduced its case to absurdity. Some 400 supporters turned out at the bill's public hearing before the Judiciary Committee. More than a score of speakers discussed the merits of the bill from different angles, speaking briefly and with feeling. Whereas the bill's opponents (consisting of a paid lobbyist, several real estate salesmen and two or three overwrought extremists) made themselves seem isolated, selfish and anti-democratic.

In executive session, the Judiciary Committee amended the bill to the extent of excluding from its provisions small, owner-operated rooming houses and two-family dwellings, one unit of which was occupied by the owner. An anti-discrimination bill that allows a little discrimination is like a virgin who admits she is a tiny bit pregnant. In accepting this tampering with our bill—statutory rape, you might call it—we compromised our principles. But we had to do it to get a favorable verdict from the Judiciary Committee, which then handed down a 9-to-1 "ought to pass" report.

Victory seemed at hand. But we took no chances, because in the previous session the bill had gone through twice, only to be defeated on its third and final vote. Three of us dedicated ourselves to canvassing the entire legislature. For me this meant talking with some forty members of the House, pleading, cajoling, vote swapping.

Meanwhile, the bill's supporters around the state maintained the pressure on their respective Senators and Representatives. And as if to dramatize our cause, the march on Selma got under way. "The road to social justice leads through Augusta also," we said.

Our presentation in the House was good—we could speak with sincerity and feeling. As rarely happens, several legislators switched sides as a result of the debate and came over to us. Our roll-call vote was a smashing 87-to-47 triumph. And when, next day, die-hards attempted to add crippling amendments, we beat them even more decisively. In the Senate with its larger Democratic majority things went even better. We had won.

The Savings Bank Life Insurance bill, while intrinsically as worthy—why shouldn't the people of Maine be allowed to buy inexpensive, over-the-counter life insurance?—had no drive behind it. The Savings Bank officials were for it—most of them—but in a dignified, business-as-usual way. Against us we had one of the most powerful lobbies in America, the life insurance lobby, which kept itself in the background, letting the insurance agents man the barricades.

About 500 of the latter, showing up at the public hearing, believed or pretended to believe that our little bill would run them out of business. The citizens for whom we were fighting watched from a distance, uncomprehendingly, if they watched at all. Newspapers which had favored the Fair Housing Bill were afraid to touch the sacred subject of life insurance. From the speeches of hostile legislators, you would have thought we were trying to sell some yokels the Brooklyn Bridge. The Committee on Business Legislation came out with a 9-to-1 "ought not to pass" report and the House voted us down by almost the margin with which it had approved the Fair Housing Bill. Special interests, capitalizing on apathy, had defeated the public interest.

The lesson I learned from this may seem elementary, but it is one that no legislator can afford to forget: it is not enough that a piece of proposed legislation have merit. Every bill is somebody's "good bill." What all bills, especially controversial bills, need for enactment is support — intelligent, earnest support right up to the moment the governor signs them into law.

A final measure rounded out my political education. This was the most controversial of them all—a state income-tax bill. The League of Women Voters, loath to see the state sales tax of 4 per cent increased, and yet convinced of the need for additional state services, were the sponsors. The ladies could find no one to introduce the bill until, at last, they came to me "You believe in the ability-to-pay principle in taxation, don't you?" (Yes.) "You wouldn't load more sales taxes on the backs of the poor, would you?" (No.) "You realize the state is going to need more money this biennium?" (Of course—the state needs more money every biennium.) And so I agreed: partly because I do believe in the ability-to-pay principle; partly because the party leadership implored me to oblige—they wanted to have an income-tax bill in the works, just in case; and partly, I'm afraid, because all this attention intoxicated me. I hardly saw the noose I was sticking my head into.

Maine has no state income tax. The news that I was introducing one in the legislature hit the afternoon papers. That evening angry telephone calls began pouring into my home; then letters and postcards. After that, there was no place for me to hide. From being a bashful, fence-sitting freshman Representative, I had become overnight a man to be despised—and respected; to be denounced—and praised. For praise also was forthcoming; especially, praise for my courage. I shall always be grateful to the League of Women Voters: they got me typed as a "courageous" legislator.

What the backlash at the next election will be I cannot predict. Probably most people will have forgotten all about the income tax—I hope. Needless to say, nothing came of it. The Democratic majority wasn't going to pass an income tax if it could possibly avoid doing so. To reward the voters thus for giving the party power after more than fifty frustrating years seemed suicidal. The leadership got the Republican Governor to agree to a package that raised some existing taxes and put a sales tax on intrastate telephone calls. But no income tax.

Thus Maine's first Democratically controlled legislature in more than a generation wound up its regular session, and the state was still solvent — nay prosperous. Even the ultraconservative Bangor News hailed our achievements. No legislature had ever done more for education. In addition, we raised the wages of nearly 7,000 state employees, enacted a pesticide-control law, forbade racial and religious discrimination in housing and employment, raised the minimum wage, liberalized Maine's employment security law and the workmen's compensation law, and expanded health and welfare services. Summing it up, the conservative Portland Press-Herald said, "Maine's Legislature, Under New Management, Chalks Up Fine Record."

As for my own fondest hope, the Pownal School bill: during the final hours of the session, the Senate majority leader raised it from the appropriations table and rammed it through to enactment. My sponsorship, at the party's request, of the state income-tax bill had not been forgotten.

LETTERS

(Continued from inside front cover)

not going to give up all we have gained since the Reformation," and something to the effect that the "white race" is there in Asia, etc. . . . I leave it to you and your readers to explain the thinking behind such rhetoric.

Frances L. Marx

Back issues

New York City

Dear Sirs: I have back issues of The Nation covering the last ten or twelve years which I would be glad to send in whole or in part to any interested person.

Robert Boss
98 Riverside Drive

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Posthumously Rehabilitated

THE PROSE OF OSIP MANDELSTAM: The Noise of Time. Theodosia. The Egyptian Stamp. Translated, with a critical essay, by Clarence Brown. Princeton University Press. 200 pp. $5.

Donald Fanger

These are the memoirs in prose of a major Russian poet who did not—in Akhmatova's phrase — know how to reminisce; modernist elegies that give new life to the dead tradition they sing; the work of an essentially non-Jewish Jew of Isaac Babel's generation who was as brilliant a writer and as tragic a victim of the so-called "cult of personality." Mandelstam (born 1891), died in a Siberian prison camp in 1938, and has been, in the official phrase, "posthumously rehabilitated." What this means is that his name and works can once again be mentioned in print in Russia. Real rehabilitation would mean republishing the collected works and permitting serious critical discussion of them. That must come, but it has not yet, and while Akhmatova has recently reported literary youth in the Soviet Union to be "wild" about this prose, the fact remains that the only substantial reprintings in Russian have been done in this country. And now we have an elegant English translation, with an equally elegant critical commentary.

Mandelstam's is the experimental prose of a poet convinced—as were so many of his generation—that the revolution marked not only the end of a cultural era but of the forms associated with that era. The preconditions for traditional fiction seemed gone: the individual was dwarfed by social forces, and opportunities for heroism appeared not so much in life as in art. "A new heroic era has opened," Mandelstam wrote in 1921, "in the life of the word. The word is flesh and bread. It shares the fate of bread and flesh: suffering."

The result, as Clarence Brown notes in his introductory essay, is that "one's feeling in reading him is constant and unflagging amazement — amazement precisely at the novelty and originality of his vision, and the uniquely personal character of his conception of the world." The Noise of Time, for instance, begins with a child's-eye evocation of "the unhealthy tranquillity and deep provincialism" of the 1890s, the period and atmosphere that we think of as Chekhovian—all in terms of their characteristic furniture: ladies' bouffant sleeves, drop-seat droshkies, a suburban railroad station with its usual change of conductors "which seemed to me a change of dynasties."

The temptation to quote this prose at length is overpowering. Here is the Czar moving in his carriage through streets along which "policemen had been spilled like peas." Here are "the monotonous prettiness of the host of infantry and its steeds, the stone-faced battalions flowing with hollow tread down the Millionaja, gray with marble and granite," brilliant evocations of student riots, French governesses, and a cultural life summed up with astonishing tact in this fashion: "Like summer insects above the hot globe of a lamp, an entire generation was carbonized and scorched by the flame of literary celebrations with garlands of allegorical roses, enormous assemblies which bore the character of a cult and expiatory offering for the generation."

The key to the form of these fragmentary memoirs lies in Mandelstam's desire to speak not about himself but to "track down the age, the noise and germination of time," and in his observation that "where for happy generations the epic speaks in hexameters and chronicles I have merely the sign of the hiatus, and between me and the age there lies a pit, a moat, filled with clamorous time, the place where a family and reminiscences of a family ought to have been." The times being out of joint, only a disjointed prose can be honest; hence the "heroism" of Mandelstam's accomplished word.

Much of the force of the perspective in The Noise of Time comes from the fact that Mandelstam sees himself as poised, culturally, between a mirage and a chaos:

> All the elegant mirage of Petersburg was merely a dream, a brilliant covering thrown over the abyss, while round about there sprawled the chaos of Judaism—not a motherland, not a house, not a hearth, but precisely a chaos, the unknown womb whence I had issued, which I feared, about which I made conjectures and fled, always fled.

The point is important, for unlike Babel, Mandelstam can find no spiritual sustenance in ancestral traditions. "Once or twice," he reports, "I was taken to a synagogue as if to a concert." Not in his own house but in another did he meet Semën Akimych Anskii, from whom "Russian-Jewish folklore . . . flowed out like a thick stream of honey in marvelous unhurried stories." As a result, there is no overt pathos in Mandelstam's testimony to his era. "I so love," he says in a characteristic passage, "to extinguish the heat of literature with the frost and the barbed stars. Will it crunch like the crust of snow? Will it brighten up in the frosty weather of the Nekrasovian street? If it is genuine, the answer is yes."

The other two pieces in this book are also concerned with "the noise of time." Theodosia, published in 1925, is an evocation of a Crimean town at a particular moment during the civil war, in the hands of the Whites, exotic, unreal, a relic of "normalcy" whose days are numbered, its hills "populated sepulchres." Contemplating it "on one of those icy Crimean nights," Mandelstam senses "with physical clarity the plague that had descended upon the world, a Thirty Years' War, with pestilence, darkened lamps, barking of dogs, and, in the houses of little people, appalling silence."

Theodosia is concerned only with the present moment. The Egyptian Stamp—a fragmentary blend of fiction and memoir—returns to the mirage of Petersburg, and to the literary tradition of that mirage which runs through Gogol and Dostoevsky in the 19th century to Blok and Andrei Biely in the 20th. Parnok, the 20th-century counterpart of the traditional "little man" (and Mandelstam's alter ego), is adrift in the dangerous and nightmarish city, as cut off from its past as he is from his identity and the prosaic items of apparel that symbolize it. The dominant feeling of this surrealistic fiction is terror: "It is terrifying to think that our life is a tale without a plot or hero, made up out of desolation and glass, out of the feverish babble of constant digression, out of the delirium of the Petersburg influenza." Memory here, for the hero as for the writer, is not so much a conscious act as a desperate gamble at escape from an intolerable present, a new ice age; it is "a sick Jewish girl who steals away in the night from her parents' house to the Nicholas Station thinking that perhaps someone will turn up to carry her off."

---

Donald Fanger is visiting professor of Slavic and Comparative Literature at Harvard, and author of Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism (Harvard University Press).

The gamble is a marginal success. "Destroy your manuscript," Mandelstam writes at the end of The Egyptian Stamp, "but save whatever you have inscribed in the margin out of boredom, out of helplessness, and, as it were, in a dream." Having apparently done as much himself, Mandelstam has performed an act of literary salvage, and added a strange but living link to a century-old tradition.

This is difficult prose—difficult in the diverse manners of Joyce and Biely. As such it is of enormous interest and importance for anyone concerned with modern Russian literature, or with modernism in general. Felicities of vision and phrasing are abundant enough to sustain a nonspecialist reader; but the larger connections and deeper meanings need elucidation. This the translator's long introduction and notes provide. Clarence Brown's prefatory essay is a model of its kind—informed, cogent and graceful. Professor Brown has been through the critical literature, has interviewed the survivors of Mandelstam's period who could throw light on him or his work, and has given us a fascinating and nuanced chapter of cultural history in his portrait of the man and his work.

The volume itself is beautifully produced, complete with period illustrations, photographs and a Picasso drawing. The translation reads very well, and offers few grounds for criticism. When Mandelstam is made to say: "In my childhood I absolutely never heard jargon," the last word should be "Yiddish." And "gymnasium" for secondary school, like "football" for soccer, may mislead some American readers. But these are minor lapses in a distinguished and important book.

Was Tolstoy A Gentleman?

RUSSIAN LITERATURE AND MODERN ENGLISH FICTION. Edited by Donald Davie. University of Chicago Press. 244 pp. $5.50. $1.95 paper.

Andrew Field

Surely this anthology of critical essays, articles and reviews is grossly mistitled, but then a book must have some title, and one is hard put to find the suitable label for Donald Davie's collection. Although I am fully aware of its inadequacy, I offer as a suggestion for future reprintings: The Russian Soul As Seen on English Soil (and Vice Versa), Being Also a Panoramic Survey of Social Attitudes and National Prejudices, Both Negative and Positive. Of course even this title does not acknowledge the presence in the book of a good deal of Russian criticism of Russian literature, an essay by Thomas Mann on Chekhov, or a long essay by Ford Madox Ford on John Galsworthy (which includes an anecdote or two about Turgenev), but I think it does better capture the spirit of the collection, and so I ask indulgence to refer to it in this way.

I hasten to add at this point that The Russian Soul As Seen on English Soil is on the whole a joyful and enriching reading experience. Donald Davie has made a discovery the importance of which at this writing can only be guessed at, namely, that literary criticism of little intrinsic value as criticism may, all the same, possess great social value and charm when dug up years later by the sensitive anthologist. This new approach was foreshadowed by the usage of mock criticism as a literary device in such authors as Jorge Luis Borges and Vladimir Nabokov, but Donald Davie is the first to have built an entire book from the curiosities which are usually cited once or twice in stuffy old-fashioned modern studies.

The collection begins with an anonymous 1862 review of Tolstoy's Childhood and Youth which announces: ". . . We naturally wish to know what a creditable Russian is like. But the translator, although possessing a very fair command of the English language, knows very little of English tastes. . . . The world can get on very well without criticisms written by a son on the behaviour of his father at his mother's funeral."

But Tolstoy did gain slowly with the English, and in 1907 we find George Saintsbury writing: "The Count is a gentleman as Lamb was and as Byron was not; just as he is a gentleman as Shelley was and as Hazlitt was not." Saintsbury, to whom Anna Karenina was uninteresting as a literary character, cites Matthew Arnold to question whether Tolstoy's novels are works of art at all; and to claims for their verisimilitude to life, he snorts: ". . . perhaps they are, but in a strangely unlicked and unfinished condition."

The essay by George Moore, written in 1919, has an opening sentence which could be envied by any writer of criticism: "One morning, while thinking of Tourgueneff, my thoughts were interrupted by the galloping of a horse." Turgenev, decides Moore, is in reality a Greek tragic genius, and "did not whisper once reach me that Tourgueneff came from the Crimea, once a Greek colony?" Tolstoy, on the other hand, is "a Tartar hungering for the desert."

D. S. Merezhkovsky on Dostoevsky and Tolstoy is included, presumably on the grounds that his essays were early translated into English and therefore had a formative effect on English opinion. (Certainly there can be no other grounds.) Merezhkovsky, with his fatal penchant for philosophical questions and critical antipodes (in this his Tolstoy and Dostoevsky must bear the indirect paternity of George Steiner's Tolstoy or Dostoevsky), uses both authors for his own ends. But Merezhkovsky does always keep the texts before him as he preaches, which gives him a decided advantage over some of the other contributors to The Russian Soul.

The most lively selections—really, almost none, except serious old Henry James, are dull!—are those by D. H. Lawrence. Here we fully appreciate the importance of the context in which the articles appear, for we see not only the themes dear to Lawrence's heart but also the critical tradition in which he follows: "We've got another of these morbidly introspective Russians, morbidly wallowing in adoration of Jesus, then getting up and spitting in His beard. . . . Oh, how I love purity!—and so forth. Then they give a loud crepitus ventris as a punctuation." To this irritating

---

Andrew Field is currently at work on a critical study of Vladimir Nabokov, to be published by Little, Brown, and is a regular contributor to The New Leader and other journals.

national character defect Lawrence gives the term "Russianizing."

This anthology is not really for the student of Russian or English literature, but it is of great value to those seeking a picture of the socio-literary atmosphere of the past. One can imagine what good use might be made of our critical press in a century. The overall impression is that of approaching an exotic statue from behind and attempting, from the grimaces and gesticulations of the crowd in front of the statue, to construct an image of it in your mind. The Russian Soul is especially recommended for those who have grown overly complacent about the "comparative literature problem."

There is a sudden shift of tone toward the end of the anthology with a spirited and interesting exchange (1961) between Henry Gifford and Raymond Williams on D. H. Lawrence and Anna Karenina, and—an afterthought?—homage is given to modern American criticism with Philip Rahv's 1949 essay on Gogol. Most important, there is a long and rambling essay on Tolstoy, Lermontov, Stendhal, Sterne, Pushkin, Rousseau, Turgenev and a few others by Donald Davie himself. At 40 pages it is by far the most extensive piece in the collection, and one fears that uncharitable minds will accuse Davie of having built an anthology to house his own piece. But there is no doubt in this reviewer's mind that Donald Davie's book is one of the most refreshing and fascinating literary put-ons of our time.

Mutual Misunderstanding

RUSSIA AND GERMANY: A Century of Conflict. By Walter Laqueur. Little, Brown and Co. 367 pp. $6.75.

John Gimbel

Mr. Laqueur states in his preface that this book is "a study in mutual misunderstanding," that it is a "history of ideas and attitudes as they shaped the political consciousness of millions of people in Central and Eastern Europe, thus decisively affecting the history of our time," and that it is written with a "feeling of immediacy." He states, further, that it concentrates "on the metapolitics of Russian-German relations. Diplomatic initiatives should not be overrated," he continues, because "diplomats really had very little scope for their activities" since "they did what they were told to do."

Mr. Laqueur hopes that he will not be "rebuked for failing to provide a systematic diplomatic history," but he is convinced "that what Germans and Russians thought about each other, their civilizations, ways of life, and political systems mattered much more in the long run than all the diplomatic reports." It would, admittedly, be unfair to criticize him for not writing the diplomatic history he never intended to write. It is fair, however, to question whether it is possible to shed light on political questions by discussing "metapolitical" relations. In short, the uninitiated (unconsecrated?) reader who is accustomed to rely upon more mundane evidence and documentation will find the "metapolitical" approach less than convincing, if not disturbing.

Approximately half of A Century of Conflict is covered in the first 50 pages. The bulk of the study traces Nazi-Soviet "misunderstandings and misjudgments" roughly from the end of World War I to the end of World War II. There is a brief and superficial discussion of postwar developments, a chapter—only tangentially related to the rest of the study—on Stalin and Hitler, and a short chapter entitled "Russia, Germany and the Future." The study concentrates particularly on the objectives and functions of the Anti-Komintern; on the Nazi image of communism; on the Soviet image of fascism; and on the role of the Baltic Germans (Alfred Rosenberg, Marx Erwin von Scheubner-Richter, et al.), and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion on the rise of National Socialism.

Mr. Laqueur's description of the Nazi image of communism and the Soviet image of fascism is indeed lucid and clear. The Nazis viewed communism as "the revolt of the criminal underworld against the Aryan race and all its values" or as "the Judaeo-masonic revolt of the racial underworld." The Nazi position was not an ideological one and it made little sense in Rome and Tokyo. It was, however, sufficient for Germans and National Socialists. They "were not great theoreticians but they knew instinctively who were their enemies." The Soviets, he shows with precision and detail, viewed fascism as "the open terrorist dictatorship of the most reactionary, chauvinistic, and imperialistic elements of monopoly capitalism," and they thought Fascists to be "the praetorian guard of monopoly capitalism." This view of fascism blinded Communists to some of the essential characteristics of totalitarian National Socialism: its strong nationalist base and its tendency to make the "economy subservient to its own non-economic purposes (such as war or aggression)." The Soviet view of fascism is particularly interesting in light of the observation that the Soviets did not study fascism anew from 1945 to 1953 and that they have done nothing substantial since 1953.

Mr. Laqueur is obviously at his best here. His main interest was, from the outset, what Germans and Russians thought about each other. When he writes with this focus, his contribution is significant and most interesting. But his discussions of the Baltic-German influence and the Anti-Komintern—both major segments of the book—are not convincing, and they have the deleterious effect of destroying the focus of the book.

Why should we accept his idea that Rosenberg, Scheubner-Richter, and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion had a "more tangible and substantial impact" on the early Nazi movement than those factors which have been "prominently featured" in the literature to date? His own statements beg the question: The Nazis' early propa-

John Gimbel is associate professor of history at Humboldt State College. He is the author of A German Community under American Occupation: Marburg, 1945-1952 (Stanford University Press), and under a Rockefeller grant is presently preparing a book analyzing the impact of American occupation policies on German politics.

His Gift

My father loved my mother when she died.
After that he stayed away from houses.
He lived in forests with the hounds and foxes who made an old, fierce grief articulate.

I learn still from small animals of wood he carved and put into my hands in place of words.

Betty Sharp Adcock

ganda "was directed against the 'November criminals' (the Social Democrats and Democrats) who had stabbed the victorious German Army in the back and accepted the Versailles Treaty. . . . Ideologically, Scheubner-Richter's impact on Hitler was negligible. . . . Hitler and Rosenberg did not need the assistance of Russian right-wing extremists [whose ideas were spread in Germany by Rosenberg] to formulate a National Socialist political philosophy. . . . Close relations between these Russian groups and the Nazis were not resumed after Hitler emerged from prison. . . . The Nazis were indifferent to these potential allies, and did everything to discourage them [at a time—it might be added — when the Nazi Party emerged in its full colors]. . . . Hitler always had a propensity for autosuggestion."

In sum, these statements suggest that despite his extensive treatment of the Baltic-German influence, Mr. Laqueur is himself not quite ready to abandon the prevailing analyses of the origins of National Socialism found in the works of George L. Mosse, Allan Bullock, A. J. P. Taylor, Gerhard Ritter, Friedrich Meinecke, and even William L. Shirer. (It may be an insignificant curiosity, but none of these people are mentioned anywhere in the book, and only Bullock is listed in the bibliography.) Mr. Laqueur states that Hitler's enemies, in the beginning, were Jews, the peace treaties and Marxism, which meant "in nine cases out of ten, the ruling Social Democrats, not the Communists." From all this it might be concluded that Hitler may not have needed the Baltic Germans at all. True, the latter provided convenient ammunition to use against Hitler's enemies, but the mainsprings of his movement seem to be the very factors "prominently featured" in current analyses of the origins of National Socialism.

Had Mr. Laqueur related the Baltic-German influence to the conventional wisdom on the ideological roots of National Socialism, the personal prejudices Hitler developed in his Vienna and Munich experiences, and the political, social and economic problems faced by Germans because of the lost war, the economic crises and the peace treaties, his contribution would be most significant. It is simply asking too much to expect the reader to assimilate this new information and relate it to the body of literature already in existence, no easy task even for the scholar steeped in the subject. Since the reader is in no position to do this, and since Mr. Laqueur did not do it, one is led to wonder if it can be done with any degree of clarity at all. It is apparent from Mr. Laqueur's own statements, and from his summary of what a future historian will say about fascism, that the Baltic-German influence is hardly a substitute for the conventional wisdom on the origins of National Socialism.

Discussion of the Anti-Komintern—another topic on which Mr. Laqueur adds new material—is no more satisfying. Mr. Laqueur's major point is that "the true aim of the Anti-Komintern was not to denounce the Soviet Union but to gain support in the West for Nazi policy." This interesting and provocative idea literally begs documentary support of a political rather than metapolitical nature. But the reader gets only the same idea three times restated, and three times the reader is denied clear and precise documentation. As a matter of fact, what documentation there is raises more questions than it answers. For example: Mr. Laqueur submits a statement by the secretary of the Anti-Komintern to the effect that it had "only one assignment; the struggle against Judaeo-Bolshevism," and then quickly adds the undocumented correction that "its real aim was to win friends and support for Nazi Germany." In support of this correction, he quotes—without citation—Ribbentrop's observation that Anti-Komintern activities "will make us many friends abroad," and then goes on to show at some length that the Anti-Komintern sought contacts with the Western world through its office in Holland and by other activities. But is this sufficient evidence for such a new and revolutionary thesis? Given his position, what else should Ribbentrop have said on his first meeting with the secretary of the Anti-Komintern? Where else should the Anti-Komintern have sought contacts? In Russia? But Mr. Laqueur himself tells us that the Gestapo handled the campaign against Bolshevism and that the Anti-Komintern's "assistance was in any case hardly needed."

More crucial than the foregoing details is Mr. Laqueur's failure to relate his thesis to the dissolution of the Anti-Komintern. He reports the fact of the dissolution in August-September, 1939, but he fails to show how this is related to its attempt to win friends in the West. The traditional view is that the new political alliance with Russia caused its demise. But if its purpose was never anti-Communist or anti-Russian, one might ask why it didn't just change tactics and continue to promote its real objective? In any case, the Anti-Komintern's public posture as an agency to combat communism and the fact of its dissolution at the time of the Russian-German rapprochement need to be set aside, if a case is to be made that its "real" objective was to win friends in the West. Neither is done effectively.

So long as Mr. Laqueur confines himself to his objective to show what Germans and Russians thought

ANY 3 of these best sellers at $1 each

	LIST
☐ ORIGINS: THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORDS — ERIC PARTRIDGE	$16.00
☐ THE WORKS OF MARQUIS DE SADE (complete Justine, Philosophy in the Bedroom)	15.00
☐ GAMES PEOPLE PLAY — ERIC BERNE. M.D.	5.00
☐ THE OLYMPIA READER — MAURICE GIRODIAS, ed.	12.50
☐ MANCHILD IN THE PROMISED LAND — CLAUDE BROWN	5.95
☐ BARTLETT'S FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS — latest edition	10.00
☐ THE CRADLE OF EROTICA — EDWARDES & MASTERS	9.50
☐ ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE GREAT QUOTATIONS — GEORGE SELDES	15.00
☐ AN AMERICAN DREAM — NORMAN MAILER	4.95
☐ WOMEN — JOHN PHILIP LUNDIN	6.50
☐ UNDER THE VOLCANO — MALCOLM LOWRY	5.95
☐ GOING TO MEET THE MAN — JAMES BALDWIN	4.95
☐ LITTLE BIG MAN — THOMAS BERGER	5.95
☐ MARIE BEGINNING — ALFRED GROSSMAN	4.50
☐ THE BOLSHEVIKS — ADAM ULAM	9.95
☐ NEGATIVES — PETER EVERETT	4.95
☐ I LOST IT AT THE MOVIES — PAULINE KAEL	6.00
☐ THE DEMONS (2 vols.) — HEIMITO VON DODERER	13.50
☐ THE WAPSHOT SCANDAL — JOHN CHEEVER	4.95
☐ THE FAMILY MOSKAT — ISAAC BASHEVIS SINGER	5.95
☐ ANTI-SEMITE AND JEW — JEAN-PAUL SARTRE	4.00

Check 3 books wanted and mail with your name and address to The Mid-Century Book Society, 400 Community Drive, Manhasset, N.Y. Only obligation is to buy three additional books in the coming year from the many to be offered. Invoice for $3 plus handling will accompany books.

NA-11

about each other, he does an outstanding job. In suggesting a new factor in the origins of National Socialism and a different orientation of the Anti-Komintern, he apparently forces his materials beyond what they will demonstrate. The first point he hardly believes himself, and the second he does not document adequately, nor does he reconcile his conclusions with the evidence to the contrary which he presents also.

What impression does the author hope to leave with readers when they have forgotten all the details: that the National Socialists are gone and have long since been replaced by Germans who are willing to analyze the totalitarian episode in their past, and that this results in a clearer view of the totalitarian nature of the Soviet regime? What he writes about Soviet writers since Stalin is revealing in this context: "However emphatically Soviet writers might denounce Fascism, there would be uncomfortable parallels, and how could they possibly fail to compare it with other dictatorships? Reading about the fuehrerprinzip [sic] in Germany, for instance, what Soviet citizen could help thinking about the 'cult of the individual' nearer home?" Is the book trying to tell the reader that Germans no longer misunderstand Communists in the way Nazis did, but that the Soviets persist in misunderstanding fascism?

Thank God for Goering!

LENINGRAD 1941: The Blockade. By Dmitri Pavlov. Translated by John Clinton Adams. Foreword by Harrison E. Salisbury. University of Chicago Press. 186 pp. $4.50.

Alexander Werth

Harrison Salisbury, who now contributes an admirable foreword to it, strongly urged in The New York Times three years ago that Pavlov's book on the blockade of Leningrad should be published in English. It is excellent that his advice should at last have been followed. Written by a Soviet official who describes himself a little vaguely as one "who dealt with problems of food supply from the beginning of the siege [in September, 1941] till the end of January, 1942," Pavlov's story is one of the most important source books on the grim subject of the Leningrad famine. According to the Russian figure quoted at the Nuremberg trial, more than 600,000 died in Leningrad as a result of the blockade, but it is now commonly asserted in Leningrad that at least a million died (that is, about one-third of the 3 million people trapped in the city by the Germans on September 8, 1941). Pavlov does not go into this; what his book contributes is a mass of factual and statistical material. A part of Pavlov's story is a severe indictment of the unjustified optimism, thoughtlessness and incompetence of the people in charge of the city's defense. Instead of evacuation, they mobilized nearly a million people to dig trenches and build fortifications which would slow down the German advance. In this they were perhaps right; though there were at least 2 million others who could have been evacuated. Even old people to whom evacuation was suggested but who proved reluctant to leave were praised by the authorities for their courage and their "Leningrad patriotism."

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________
STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

This heroically unrealistic attitude was to end in tragedy. Some quite absurd things happened; when the Germans started their air raids on Leningrad, many children were evacuated to places that were about to be captured by the Germans, and had to be promptly brought back to the city. Important food stores were moved from areas in the south and west threatened by the German advance, but instead of sending such stores to Leningrad, they were sent farther east. Plans had also been drawn up for evacuating most of the industrial equipment of Leningrad. However, by the time the German ring closed round the city (except for the precarious waterway across Lake Ladoga), very little had been done, and the bulk of the industrial equipment could not be sent east until the famous Ice Road across the lake had properly come into operation, that is, not until February, 1942.

Pavlov's story is particularly valuable for supplying exact figures of the incredibly low food reserves in the city of 3 million people, and for explaining, in great detail, how the rations, already meager enough in September, had to be lowered five times between the beginning of the blockade and November 20, when they reached the all-time low of half a pound of bread for "privileged" ration-card holders, and of a quarter of a pound for the "unprivileged." This lasted till December 25, when the rations were very slightly increased, but so slightly that at least 5,000 people continued to die of hunger every day, often dropping dead in the street, their bodies lying there, covered with snow for days. Several hundred thousand people died of hunger between November and February; but many hundred thousand more died of the aftereffects of the famine between February and the next summer.

If the first part of Pavlov's story is a serious indictment of those who had failed to foresee the blockade, the second part is, on the contrary, a warm tribute to the heroism and stoicism of the people of Leningrad, and to Zhdanov, who organized, under incredibly difficult conditions, a life line across Lake Ladoga. It was essential, above all, to have enough food for the 200,000 or 300,000 soldiers who were firmly holding the fortified lines both north and south of Leningrad—in some places only 2 or 3 miles outside the city boundaries. Under German bombs and shellfire, small ships and barges brought food to Leningrad across the 30 miles of Lake Ladoga, and when the lake froze, the great problem was to build an Ice Road across it. By capturing Tikhvin, east of the lake on November 9, the Germans ruined the chances of the Ice Road. The Russians could then reach Lake Ladoga only along an improvised 200-mile road crossing a wild forest. This road proved completely useless, and it was only by recapturing Tikhvin on December 9 that the Russian troops, under General Meretskov, literally saved Leningrad. It was during this critical "Tikhvin" phase that the rations in Leningrad were cut down to almost nothing. Even after the liberation of Tikhvin it took at least six more weeks before the famous Ice Road could be put into operation. By February the road was working well; its organization was a remarkable feat of human endurance.

Alexander Werth, The Nation's European correspondent, is the author of Leningrad (Knopf, 1944) and Russia At War (Dutton, 1964). His De Gaulle: A Political Biography has been published in England and will be brought out here by Simon & Schuster.

The grim story of the civilians of Leningrad is one of the most tragic in the whole war. With one exception, I was the only Western correspondent to have been in Leningrad during the blockade; that was in 1943 when the city was still under shellfire, but the worst of the famine was over. Literally everybody talked about the famine of the winter of 1941-42. When I was in Leningrad again last year, older people who had lived through the famine still talked about it. It was a nightmare which, even twenty years later, they could not forget. And yet, most of them recalled those days with a touch of pride. The tragedy was different in quality from, say, that of the Nazi extermination camps; Leningraders died often with the comforting last thought that the city had not been surrendered to the Germans. Pavlov rightly pays tribute to the discipline and the high morale that marked Leningrad even during those fearful months; to the incredible toughness and endurance of the young people who, though faint with hunger themselves, were cutting timber, looking after the sick and dying, and spending hours on roofs doing anti-fire service.

Some of the more fearful aspects of the famine are glossed over in Pavlov's book; but there are some references to them in an equally, perhaps more valuable Russian book, A. V. Karasev's Leningrad in the Days of the Blockade, not yet translated. Karasev speaks of the numerous cases of "psychic trauma" produced by the famine; and when I was in Leningrad last year, I heard of elderly people I had known in my youth, and of others, who had gone insane during the famine. It is also well known that, in desperation, people cut off pieces from the corpses lying all over the place and ate them (often with fatal results), and that there were even some cases of cannibalism when children were killed and eaten.

There is, I think, another element which might be added to the Leningrad story—even though it is an odd word to use in this tragic context — and that is luck. Not only did the Germans fail to capture Leningrad in September, 1941, but during the 900 days of the siege that followed they failed to destroy it, despite Hitler's maniacal screams that this should be done. Is it not a case of again saying "thank God for Goering!"? For if the Luftwaffe had been able to do to London, Moscow or Leningrad what the Western air forces did to German cities like Dresden (not to mention Hiroshima), the war might have taken a different course. If in the worst air raids on London not 2,000 but 100,000 had been killed each time, I doubt whether London could have "taken it." I am not trying to minimize the heroism of the soldiers who stopped the Germans; what I mean is that World War II was probably the last major war in which the weapons of destruction were often still not strong enough to make human courage and endurance quite meaningless—as no doubt they will be in World War III—if and when it comes. Even in 1945, German and Japanese courage no longer mattered.

Pavlov's book constitutes a strong critique of Stalin, who is held responsible, at least indirectly, for Leningrad's fearful plight; it is, at the same time, an apologia for Zhdanov and other leaders of the city's defense. I know from my own 1943 experience that Stalin was not popular in Leningrad, and his pictures, even in public offices, were fewer than Zhdanov's. After Zhdanov's death in 1948, Stalin started a major purge against the Leningrad party chiefs who had had the effrontery to suggest that, after all it had suffered and achieved, Leningrad be made the capital of the RSFSR (i.e., the Russian Republic), while Moscow remained that of the USSR, with the result that most of the leaders of the defense of Leningrad were shot.

Today Leningrad is a sad city. It has become provincial. What talent Leningrad produces—in science, in literature, in the arts, the theatre or cinema —sooner or later drifts to Moscow. Among the writers, there are a few die-hard Leningraders still — Anna Akhmatova, Olga Bergholz, Yuri German and a few more. The spiritual, rather than physical decline of Leningrad since the war is one of the saddest phenomena of postwar Russia. It is impossible to dissociate it entirely from the tragedy of 1941-1944, which killed not only people but also something of the historical and cultural tradition they represented.

LETTER from BERLIN

Helga Lohr

Between intellectuals of East and West Europe, a device that might be termed "meet-ins" may succeed in blowing life into the concept of peaceful coexistence, such as the by now famous conference on Kafka in Prague several years back; the West German and International Writers Meetings in East Germany in May of last year; the Rome meeting of the European Community of Writers on the meaning of European avant-garde (report by Elisabeth Mann Borgese, The Nation, November 1); and the 8th International Week of Documentary and Short Films in Leipzig (November 13-21).

While these conferences took place on an international and professional level, there are other, more casual "meet-ins" which concern exclusively the two parts of Germany, the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic. Writers, theatre people and other creative artists have an opportunity here to meet a public which, while sharing similar intellectual interests, are of differing ideological views. Such gatherings may be prose or poetry readings in East or West Berlin; the opening in West Berlin of an exhibition of the work of an East German artist, followed by a cocktail party where discussion flows freely; or a lecture where an actor from an East Berlin theatre group discusses new problems in Socialist theatre with interested people in Hamburg. Reactions are generally unexpectedly fresh, stimulating new cultural as well as politi-

---

Helga Lohr is a free-lance journalist and commentator for the German Democratic Republic radio. She has spent many years in the United States and is now living in East Germany.

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

The FBI Nobody Knows

by Fred J. Cook. 414 pp. Pyramid Books.
Paperback Edition.

A portion of this important book first appeared in The Nation (October 18, 1958), as a special feature and attracted nationwide attention and the highest praise. Now it has been rewritten and enlarged with much new material.

"... an effective and powerful document. ..."
—Mark DeWolfe Howe, New York Review of Books

"Fred Cook must be credited with a courageous as well as an illuminating book. Let those who dispute his charges refute them if they can."
—Alan Barth, New York Herald Tribune

"A devastating case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its veteran director, J. Edgar Hoover."
—San Francisco Chronicle

"J. Edgar Hoover won't like this book ... well-documented ... likely to cause plenty of furor."
—Publisher's Weekly

THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS has the unique distinction of being the central point in the plot of Rex Stout's latest Nero Wolfe who-dun-it, THE DOORBELL RANG.

For your FREE copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $5
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

1-10-66

cal viewpoints between the divided minds of East and West.

In the course of the last two years, some of these gatherings have become regularized, particularly the literary evenings held in Siegmunds Hof, a student settlement in West Berlin. In a hall seating barely 150 people, sometimes as many as 200 crowd in to listen to some well-known German Democratic Republic poet, like the late Johannes Bobrowski, or novelist, like Anna Seghers, reading from their own works. Nobody seems to mind having to stand for two or three hours. The important thing is to succeed in throwing a barbed question at the visitor from "the other side" to elicit answers pointed to new aspects of the subject under discussion. It is particularly the younger people who are most eager to open doors to one another's minds.

They are a highly sophisticated section of the youth, from both East and West. Although liberal in their thinking and tolerant in their attitudes, young intellectuals from West Germany have little or no inclination to accept Socialist doctrine or Socialist reality as they see it today. Their approach is one of fairness, their motivation a mixture of a genuine desire to find answers for themselves and an honest curiosity about how the other side "thinks." They share with their East German counterparts a desire to prevent a deepening of the emotional and intellectual schism within their country.

Reunification of a divided homeland is only touched on at the periphery; there is too much realistic thinking in the ranks of this group to see such an eventuality as conceivable within the near future. West Germans, however, do express cynicism toward their government's conduct of foreign affairs, and do not condone its stubborn refusal to recognize officially the existence of the German Democratic Republic, or to deal with it in a manner conducive to political rapprochement.

West German writers like Günter Grass, Rolf Hochhuth and, to a certain extent, Heinrich Böll, are heroes to these young liberals because they do not shrink from personal engagement in their writings and in their actions. I saw some of these bright, open-minded young people, bearded and unbearded, at a pre-election meeting with Günter Grass in Oberhausen in the Ruhr. They acclaimed Grass for the contempt with which he dealt in his talk with former defense minister, Franz Joseph Strauss, prime mover in the campaign against relaxation of tensions between East and West, and applauded Grass's support for the patient negotiations between the late GDR deputy minister, Erich Wendt, and West Berlin Senator Horst Korber for an agreement permitting West Berlin citizens to visit relatives in East Berlin. This rally marked the first time that West German writers campaigned for a political party, in this case the Social Democratic Party. The fact that Chancellor Ludwig Erhard and party spokesmen like Franz Joseph Strauss labeled these writers Pinschers and attacked their political involvement as "childish" only further endeared Grass and Hochhuth to this youth.

A tendency to cast doubt on the integrity and judgment of these young people exists on both sides. In the East, however, the original fear that meetings such as those held at Siegmunds Hof might turn out to be an occasion for "decadent" West Berlin students "to make trouble" has faded; while on the Western side both fear and criticism are on the increase.

As recently as last November 13, the Hamburg daily, Die Welt, featured a lengthy article: "It Would Be a Pity for Berlin," subtitled: "Discontent With the Development of an Intellectual Trend." The author, Hans Nerth, expressed deep-felt regret at the passing of the old hostile attitude toward Eastern intellectuals that marked the founding of West Berlin's "Free University." He labeled this generation of West Berlin youth "unprejudiced" but also ahnungslos (without any conception of what they are doing), because they have undertaken to create small breaks in rigidly frozen attitudes. He described the writings of East German authors as "chromed Marxist-Leninist confessions" and bemoaned the lack of ideological training in the West to guarantee immunization against greater mutual tolerance. He worried that: "Here and there, the present generation of (West) Berlin already harbors rather easterly dreams today," and feared that this might lead to a "secret longing for vacation-and-study trips, for closer contact with the Zone (the West's term for the German Democratic Republic), with Hungary, Poland or Russia and to the labeling of any skeptic as a 'cold warrior.' "

A rising neo-Fascist atmosphere in West Germany breeds a climate of hysteria against nonconformists, in which occurred the recent book burnings in Düsseldorf, where The Tin Drum by Grass and works by Erich Kaestner were consumed by flames. This mad ritual, reminiscent of Hitler days, was performed by the "Young Forceful Christians" with the permission and full approval of the city authorities of Düsseldorf.

I was present at this season's opening session of the Siegmunds Hof "meet-ins," when GDR author Stefan Heym read a chapter from his latest published novel, The Lenz Papers, dealing with the 1849 revolution in Baden. Written originally in English, as are all his lengthier works (Heym was born in Germany but spent most of his formative years in the United States), a GDR edition appeared in 1963 and a West German edition has just appeared under the title: Lenz or Freedom.

To the "in" audience present that evening, it was common knowledge that there is a manuscript by Heym on the Berlin events of June 17, 1953, which has not yet been published in the GDR. The chairman, in opening the meeting, expressed disappointment that Heym was not reading from that manuscript. To the question, "When will it be published?" Heym replied: "Within a historically foreseeable future," and promised to come and read from it four weeks before publication. To the question, "Why do you think it is not being published?" he simply answered, "Probably it is at present not useful." "Not useful to socialism?" "Yes, not useful to socialism."

On the day of his appearance in West Berlin, a whole page of quotes from The Lenz Papers had appeared in one of the foremost West German cultural weeklies, Die Zeit, all of which obviously were chosen to display the rebellious mind of Stefan Heym. The page carried the misleading, but sensationally useful head: "The Novel About the 17th of June." It was amusing to note that of the quotes used, a good number were directly from Marx and Engels, who appear as characters in Heym's book, which deals with one of the most active periods of their involvement in the German revolution. The original source of the quotes, however, was conveniently not mentioned by the editor of the page. A week earlier, the same paper had reprinted a piece by Heym from Les Lettres Françaises and the Italian cultural magazine, Rinascita, stating Heym's credo of the responsibility of a Socialist writer to advance the cause of socialism by telling the truth. There had also been two TV interviews with him in West Germany in October.

It was clear that a large number of those who packed the little hall in Siegmunds Hof had come to hear a controversial writer debate his political views as an artist. This, however, did not constitute the main discussion; the emphasis of the debate was on literary values. In its course, it became clear that literary taboos existing in both parts of Germany are instrumental in creating mutual misunderstanding and that writers and readers in both worlds suffer from such limitations. West Germany had published only one of Heym's numerous books until Lenz or Freedom was issued at the end of September. On the other hand, writers in East Germany have limited access to valuable new writing published in West Germany and elsewhere in the West. Though it is possible to obtain copies of avant-garde works through libraries or other sources, the efforts involved in doing so are so time consuming that they interfere with the day-to-day work of writing. In the West, the whole spectrum of the literary market is available, from realistic to the most experimental works, except, naturally, all that appears politically undesirable to the literary guardians of that society. Within the great mass of this mostly mediocre literature, there is some very good writing which is very much missed. These losses may turn into a serious handicap even for the best of writers in the Socialist world. Because they are judged and criticized only within the words

If words interest you, first buy a good dictionary. Then buy a good Roget.
We don't publish dictionaries.
We publish the BEST Roget. 1405 pp.

THE ORIGINAL
Roget's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases
Americanized for the first time.
Plain $6.95
Thumb Indexed $7.95
ST. MARTIN'S • New York

COMMENTARY*
*WORLD'S BEST ?
SEE FOR YOURSELF

TRIAL 8-MONTH
Subscription $3.87
(Reg. $8./year)
Outside USA—add $1.

COMMENTARY, NA-2
165 East 56 St., N.Y., N.Y.
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name ....
Address ....
City/State ....
New Subscribers Only

framework of one school of writing, the "Socialist realism" school, Socialist writers are deprived of important critical standards which other forms might impart to their own, realist style.

Heym's audience judged the style of the section of the work he read as too simple, and so realistic in detail as to suggest a cinemascope film. Heym explained: "You think I am old-fashioned in my writing. But the problems I want to get across are too complicated for me to engage in stylistic tricks." He mentioned Aragon as somebody akin to his own style. Yet, one could see, his listeners were not entirely convinced.

In the end, though a total meeting of minds was not achieved, there was undoubtedly a great deal of heightened mutual respect. Once again, a small break had been made in a rigidly frozen ideological front.

THEATRE

Harold Clurman

THE WHITE DEVIL

Down amid the roisterers and derelicts of Bleecker Street in the oblong room which is known as the Circle in the Square, off-Broadway's literate audience has made a hit of John Webster's 1612 "tragedy of blood," The White Devil. Little wonder: it is a thoroughly contemporary play.

As I left the theatre (unshaken) I asked myself if it is also "great," a masterpiece or whatever it is we usually call a play that has survived the ages. All I felt at the moment was that, with due allowance for near-plagiarism from Shakespeare, it is a "well-written" play, as people (critics included) say when they wish to avoid thinking about a play's content. It is better than well written; it is magnificently written. But was it, I put the question to myself, good!

The story is intricate. At times one fails to discern the connective plot tissue. The style alternates between rank melodrama and doleful lyricism, with, in addition, the mad scenes beloved by the Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists. There are flashes of savage wit; there is chronic anger. I counted at least seven murders.

The audience doesn't simply approve the play; it has a ball with it! It is in its element. For The White Devil is anti-Establishment: all, any, every Establishment from its time to eternity. Webster based his play on events which took place in Italy, but we know he was thinking beyond the confines of the peninsula.

Paul Tillich called Hamlet the first existentialist hero. For existentialist read "modern." But Marlowe's Tamburlaine and Faustus were already that. Machiavelli had previously dissected, explained and rationalized the anatomy of rule (he is mentioned in The White Devil) to the evident consternation of Shakespeare and other sweet souls. The secret was out — government, officialdom, the church, courts of law — were all instruments of a destructive process which Jan Kott in his Shakespeare Our Contemporary designates as the Great Mechanism. The Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists were bitterly skeptical of power, politics and chivalric action. Hamlet doubts the moral validity of the revenge he is enjoined to wreak upon the King. His doubt renders him indecisive, hopeless and great.

Shakespeare's pessimism is mitigated by love. There is no mitigation in Webster. "Blood, Iago, blood!," Othello cries out in piteous horror. There is no pity in Webster. His heroes are villains. The most fascinating — I almost said attractive — characters in The White Devil are a whore and a pimp — brother and sister.

What lends the corruption and violence of the play dignity and makes it something more than a butcher's holiday is its social indignation. For example: "Wilt hear some of my court wisdom? To reprehend princes is dangerous, and to overcommend some of them is palpable lying." Or, "He was a kind of statesman that would sooner have reckoned how many cannon bullets he had discharged against a town, to count his expense that way, than how many of his valiant and deserving subjects he had before it." And again, "I have known men that have come from serving against the Turk, for three or four months they have had pension to buy them new wooden legs and fresh plasters; but after that, 'twas not to be had."

Not only are the aristocracy scorned but the law and religion as well. ". . . here they sell justice with those weights they press men to death with." And, "The first bloodshed in the world happened about religion." War alone is not feared. "There are mighty strokes come from the hand, But there are killing strokes which come from the head." Princes as well as the people suffer. "Misery of princes. That must be censured by their slaves! Not only blamed for doing things are ill, But for not doing all that men will —" And finally, "O, happy they that never saw the court. Nor ever knew great men but by report."

Retribution is rarely suggested except in such lines as: "Dost thou imagine thou canst slide in blood, And not be tainted with a shameful fall?" Treachery not only commands and prevails but is pictured as inescapable. One suspects that the young man who metes out justice at the end — "Let guilty men remember, their black deeds Do lean on crutches made of slender reeds"— would prove still another sanguinary miscreant if the play were to go on.

Here and there as in all plays of this period there are the customary obscenities—as inevitable as the obligatory nudes in present-day films. These too make our audience feel at home. They recognize kinship with this unhypocritical play. It combines features of the play of social protest with those derivatives of the Theatre of the Absurd which extenuate the impulse to protest. But much of these aspects in The White Devil remain abstract to our audience. The play is fun, "art"— undisturbing. There is no pain in it at all.

To a large extent this is due to Jack Landau's production. It is "well spoken, with good accent and good discretion." In this sense one may commend Frank Langella, Paul Stevens, Eric Berry, Robert Burr, Maria Tucci and the blond oddness of Carrie Nye (the white devil) whose diction, voice and carriage of neck and shoulders are equally peculiar. But though continuously interesting it is in another sense hardly a production at all. For economy's sake the

"A STUNNING PLAY, ONE OF THE FINEST OF OUR AGE. YOU SHOULD NOT MISS IT."
—Howard Taubman, The N.Y. Times

JASON ROBARDS   ANNE BANCROFT
THE DEVILS
Mon. thru Thurs. Evgs., Orch. & Front Mezz. $7.95; Rear Mezz. $6.25, 5.50, 4.50, 3.50, 2.95. Fri. & Sat. Evgs., Orch. & Front Mezz. $8.75; Rear Mezz. $6.50, 5.75, 4.75, 4.00, 2.95. Wed. & Sat. Mats., Orch. & Front Mezz. $6.25; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 4.00, 3.50, 3.00, 1.95.
BROADWAY THEATRE 53rd St. & B'way, 247-7992

characters are dressed in mufti. Modern clothes do not make a play any more contemporaneous than period dress since on the stage everything must be both false and real — in a word expressive of a dramatic meaning. For economy's sake too we get no significant sense of place. Imaginative costumes, settings and character make-up would contribute much to the kind of atmosphere this play demands if it is not to be a bare graph.

The production's most serious lack is some "flower of evil." The actors all struck me as wholly without blemish, even without concupiscence: thoroughly innocent! The White Devil becomes child's play. Is it that — together with the painted horror — which pleases its Village audience? Never mind: it deserves its longevity; it is still worth seeing.

ART

Max Kozloff

EPIPHANIES OF ARTIFICE

As recently as five years ago, I had resigned myself to a mere fondness for the art of René Magritte. His deadpan pranks in paint, such as the choo-choo steaming out from beneath the mantle, tickled a genuine, if self-indulgent wonder. But it was not the regressiveness of my taste for seeing impossible things which held back respect. Rather, it was the absence of any striving for the impossible in his way of seeing them. Which is to say that the transparent means by which he visualized his images were academic, or at least appeared to be academic.

And now, after Johns and Pop art, after the "chosisme" of Robbe-Grillet, and the illusionist theories of Ernst Gombrich, there seems something not only more cagey and owlish in Magritte but more profound and liberating as well. The enigmas which he set out "to picture" have backfired into the substance and meaning of that "picturing" — that is, the representational process itself. Currently, a nice retrospective of this Belgian Surrealist, dealing with his career from 1927 to the present, is on view at the Museum of Modern Art. It is something of a revelation.

Practically everything within Magritte's extremely diversified output can be summarized by the word "contradiction." If one does not understand that objects or conditions are deliberately opposed to each other, one understands nothing. The village sleeps in deadest night, and the sky unpretentiously glows with the day, in "The Empire of Light." These are hard, unalterable facts. But, of course, there are differing values of contradiction and of understanding. Conversely, there are also different aspects of intention and overall significance. What so frequently happens in Magritte is that a self-evident idea-puzzle conceals a subtle epistemological jolt. Understanding has here to be a little tactless, a little analytical.

Perhaps the least arresting of his procedures is initially the most shocking: metamorphosis. Nothing by now could be more banal than fish-headed humans, shoe feet, and burning tubas. Such mutations or miracles, long a stock in trade of fantastic art, are arch when they are not romantic. And Magritte, with his factual style and suburban outlook, tends not to be a Romantic.

But the discrepancy between metamorphosis and displacement gratifies the curiosity in a more demanding way. Perhaps the most celebrated of his canvases is "The False Mirror," 1928, an enormous eye whose iris has been replaced by the sky, and whose pupil becomes a black sun. Instead of rapidly adjusting to slick plastic surgery—the sort of thing so tasteless in Dali—the spectator here oscillates between the sensation of looking through, and of being observed by, an aperture; or of being simultaneously inside and outside an interior. Spatially, it is a clever enough double-entendre; but intellectually, it succinctly illuminates Magritte's diabolical open-endedness. The mind and the eye are false mirrors of reality, echoing nothingness between themselves. And yet, they are the only organs of perception we have. Although he rightly disclaims using symbols, here is Symbolism of a kind—and the real chimera of his vision.

From "The False Mirror" to "The Human Condition I," 1934, the most archetypal of his ideas, one takes only a short step. A view of a landscape from a window is almost blocked out by a canvas on an easel, depicting that same landscape. Yet, with huge coincidence, "painted" and "real" nature turn out to be identical. The contradiction here consists in not showing the difference one expects. There is a tradition in modern art of painting pictures within pictures. Whether the contained is in the same style as the container is relatively unimportant, if the overall style, that is, the particular subjugation of the outer world, is established. But Magritte's transparency, his apparent stylelessness gives this scene a disturbing plausibility. By showing that there is no difference between "fact" and "representation," he undermines both. "The Human Condition" is an epiphany of artifice. No matter how objective, the artist is doomed to paint only what pre-exists in his mind. Yet, if sensory data happens to concur with mental prejudice —and in Magritte nothing is accidental—then the idea of the imagination itself is a figment. It goes a long way to explain the still-point, or perhaps the still-life, aspect of Magritte's art, that everything one knows is at the same time self-canceling and affirming. Painting, considered simply as a process of "making" images and "matching" them with observed "reality" — in Gombrich's terms — becomes an infinitely mysterious business.

As if to ward off those who would insist on making distinctions of quality within that mystery, Magritte reiterates that he is not interested in painting. This is his ultimate contradiction. The real heresy to an artist of his persuasion would be the sniffishness of a spectator who would deflate enchantment into a sequence of handsome or indifferent objects. Often enough, in his works, one finds no correlation between extraordinary conceptions, such as those I've just mentioned, and beautiful handling. Under no circumstances will Magritte tolerate any aesthetic distance from the bewilderment he hopes to elicit. But in the tradition of

SUMMERLANE CAMP

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

■

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

■

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

this is a heresy the viewer in turn transcends, if he recognizes at all the differences between art and life. Any distractedness, any merely prosaic limning of the Magrittean world, in fact, tends to prevent him from entering with the desired credulity. These delirious coincidences have to "exist" after all, and only the power of painting—luminous, tactile and chromatic—can bring about that existence.

The most remarkable aspect of Magritte's pictorial vocabulary is its uncanny equilibrium between the general and the specific. Rather flat and dry, with a firm tonal control, his execution is well suited to a descriptive chore it never quite completes. Part of its appeal is that it can obviously tell so much more than it is willing to tell. Solidity is just a trifle too bald, and atmospheric distance a bit overschematized, to root one down or gear in space with perfect comfort. The light, too, in his paintings is tangible without being particular. Unlike de Chirico, who in other respects greatly influenced him, Magritte de-emphasizes shadow. Given these strictures, it requires the most exquisite discrimination, the most diffident bravura, to cube a fluffy clouded sky, or paper it onto the walls of a room. And to anyone interested in the vicissitudes of lines that lose themselves in leafy shapes, or blur into mountain creases or ocean foam (they exhibit a surprising similarity), Magritte's drawing can be a very subtle spectacle. Throughout, there is a whiff of stage-set painting here, done up, however, with a great deal more good faith, high definition, and optical brilliance than the "real" thing.

Or rather, I should say there is a portrayal of stage-set situations, for if one can accept, one cannot quite locate, the environment of his various tableaux. Psychologically, it is absolutely necessary that this be so, for to personalize a dilemma is also, in some fashion, to be able to escape from it. Magritte's settings, while obviously Northern European, are denatured enough to press deeply into everyone's consciousness of the familiar. Yet there is nothing very nostalgic or very immediate about his quotidian. A homeless naturalism informs his parks and caves and hotel rooms; and a geographical vagueness lurks under every physical clarity. Exempt from time, the bourgeois context, with its imaginatively wrought déjà vu, distills a reluctant poetry.

But it is more in a kind of inverted logic that Magritte, diverging rapidly from orthodox Surrealism, excels. Rain may fall on top of a lowly cloud, a tree may take the shape of one of its leaves, or a house will appear within the room revealed by one of its own opened windows. In "The Wind and the Song," 1928-29, a pipe is subtitled "Ceci n'est pas une pipe"—startlingly, but rationally, since one can't smoke it. Representations, words and the objects they label are demonstrated not to be the same things, which makes a great deal of sense, but not to customary usage. Magritte was also among the first to make primers of discontinuity, so that a man reading a paper is present in only one of four portrayals of his living room, or the body of a nude is segmented rather agonizingly in five small panels. These irrevocable absences, cuts from a witless cinema, are highly disconcerting.

Variation on a Theme by Robert Graves

O greater mother consider the case of one who twists his neck from under your foot to bite the big toe.

Six times!
I brought you
libations and flowers.
Each time I came you gobbled us up
then fed me the fish-eye through two of my blind ribs.

O mantis-muse
flexing calves to crack
an inferior back
I'm going to cloud
your mirror with my death.

George Stade

Milder, but I think more beautiful, are the analogies, sometimes incidental, sometimes prominent, that the artist makes between disparate phenomena. The striations in a giant tortoise-shell comb and in cloud patterns have something to do with each other. And the conical turret juxtaposed with a receding boulevard the same height and shape, on a canvas within the canvas ("The Promenade of Euclid"), almost foil examination. These are not visual quips so much as isolations and magnifications of neglected confusions. Compared to such extremely simple, intimate analogies of totally unlike presences, techniques of scale change and levitation, spelled out elsewhere, do not reveal Magritte at his best. For, they require him to "picture" an exotic vista, instead of far more sympathetically camouflaging, and hence abstracting, the ordinary.

By means of this camouflage, Magritte raises the most fruitful doubts about the conventions of painting—doubts that are now seen to have pointed toward the future. Johns, for instance, unconsciously takes Magritte's juggling of known conventions into real space, expunging representation entirely. And yet, to oppose, as he does, the perception of literal material, mere markings on a cloth, with the illusionistic potential of that material, echoes the example of Magritte. As for Jim Rosenquist, he enlarges, subdivides and transplants the processes of the Belgian master into our hectic hard-sell advertising imagery. Despite the quietism of the one, and the uproar of the other, Magritte himself goes blithely on, in confirmed and beguiling impurity.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709

PERSONALS

TV BELLYFUL? Hucksters Sound Switch turns TV speaker on and OFF; 20 feet of wire. Easily installed. Ethical. Money back guarantee. Send $3.75 postpaid—The A. N. Mantell Co., Dept. N, P. O. Box 228, Ellenville, N. Y. 12428.

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons. $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

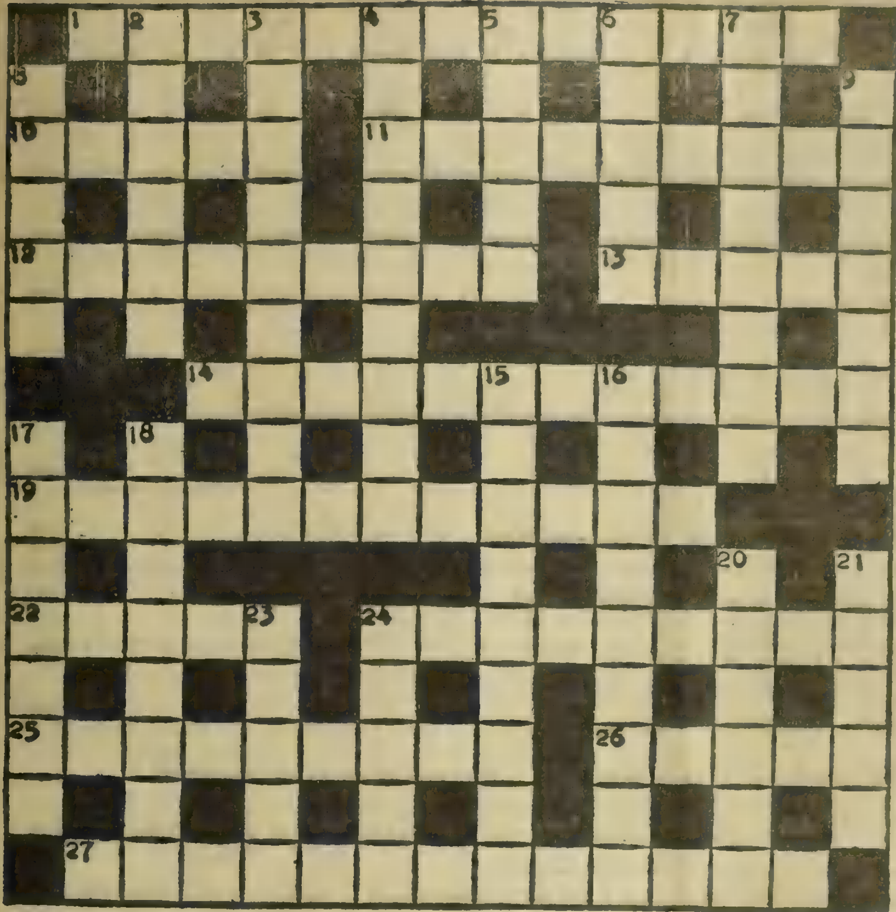
THE NATION 1-10-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1135

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 People who scan their work shouldn't necessarily consider them supercilious. (8, 5)
10 Felt an aversion to death, in a way. (5)
11 Would you have duty lie so, in the manner of dull routine? (9)
12 Could one possibly consider it up to prior construction? (Someone undoubtedly put a lot into it.) (9)
13 One might be expected to keep such fruit, unless one is spoiled.
14 One of the things a soldier should remember makes the old-fashioned movie fare less lively. (6, 6)
19 Lie euphemistically? (12)
22 Proving Kenneth Roberts is beat, at heart. (5)
24 Rephased a point of the attack, perhaps. (9)
25 No proper action implied of ice nor mud. (9)
26 Finding six in 1 could cause a sheepish expression. (5)
27 Check with the automobile magazine you have—not everyone believes in it! (13)

DOWN:

2 Sat, in a way, with possibly the brave and cunning. (6)
3 Mythological 27 of the dead Roman. (9)
4 Forbid an indirect T-formation (9)
5 More than one spoke to the point!
6 Could it be interpreted as 0501 to 500? That's about the shape of it!
7 One of the first things to do if the set performance is bad. (4, 4)
8 Cracks made by commen men? (5)
9 Assays visually perhaps—but the result isn't pleasant to look at. (7)
15 Initially he might have his college close to his heart. (6,3)
16 The sole position might be in the way (5, 4)
17 Koko's victim was seized by a little one. (7)
18 Ask Barnaby to reluctantly allow something. (8)
20 One bit of trouble Il Duce made!
21 A psychiatrist might sound just the type to mix things up! (5)
23 As a philosopher, might one be rasher? (5)
24 A country such as this might be associated with a lupine comedown. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1134

ACROSS: 1 Close to the vest; 9 Unclear; 10 Samurai; 11 Choppy; 12 Marshall; 14 Annexed; 15 Camus; 17 Laser; 19 Roadbed; 21 Trout fly; 23 Fiscal; 25 Ratting; 26 Paladin; 27 Horse latitudes. DOWN: 1 Churchill; 2 Osceola; 3 Eye opener; 4 Ours; 5 Husbandman; 6 Vamps; 7 Sarcasm; 13 Extralegal; 15 Cabriolet; 16 Shillings; 18 and 8 Shoot to kill; 20 Decided; 22 and 21 Twin stars; 24 Spat.

PUBLICATIONS

HISTORY AFIELD

Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
Postpaid $2, check, money order or cash
B. F. Johnson
BOX 2306, SAN DIEGO, CALIF. 92112

Fun to Read!

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. [redacted]

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

TARZAN, "Talcum X," little LeRoi Jones, Berkeley, Africa, Pongo-Ni, Man from O.R.G.Y., et al, are X-posed & X-rayed in BLACKMAN issue of NEXUS. Send $1—or $5 for year's subscription: F. BRANDS, BOX 1A, Stuyvesant Sta., N. Y. C. 10009

BOOK COLLECTORS
Seeking unusual items for your collections!
We notify when our worldwide contacts make notable finds. All fields A to Izzard.
BOOK LANDOE
6631 Hollywood Blvd.
Hollywood, Calif. 90028

The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

MUSIC

5-WEEK COURSE
CONCERTINA
— Amazing Results In Short Time —
Concertina Rented For Course
MATUSEWITCH ASSOCIATES
1697 Broadway (53rd) CI 7-0919

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014.

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

that—World War II declarations to the contrary—Formosa is not part of mainland China. (In fact, our man, Chiang Kai-shek, argues that mainland China is part of Formosa.)

(3) Made Formosa into a naval and air base, one of the strongest in the world, and entered into an alliance with Chiang which was backed up by a Senate resolution.

(4) Gave Chiang military and economic aid, to hold offshore islands in the very mouth of the Chinese harbor of Amoy, to maintain constant aerial surveillance over the mainland, and to keep threatening to restore his sovereignty there by force of arms. General Eisenhower, while standing for the Presidency, announced his intention to "unleash" Chiang.

(5) Consistently spearheaded the fight to keep China out of the United Nations—it would have been admitted long since but for our hostility. The widely accepted belief that China would not accept membership has been knocked down most effectively by Robert Elegant of the Los Angeles Times; he says in essence that China would accept membership and wants it, but not on a "second-class" basis.

(6) Consistently tried to make it difficult for China to trade. We have done our utmost to put the quietus on all Chinese trade and cultural missions in Latin America, Africa and in all countries where arm-twisting or bribery could avail.

(7) Deliberately kept our people uninformed about China. With no more than a single exception, our journalists have not been permitted to travel there. When so hardheaded a historian as Hugh Trevor-Roper visits China and writes a generally critical, even hostile, report, but does say: "One man's aggression is another's defense," and adds that the danger of Chinese aggression is at present remote, only a few American newspapers carry the statement. But whatever makes the Chinese look like lunatic aggressors is headlined in the American press.

(8) Ringed China with bases (see map, p. 66, this issue), staged an enormous military build-up in South Vietnam and Thailand, maintained a huge army in South Korea, and solicited combat detachments from other Asian countries (currently the Philippines) and Australia.

Almost any week, the Chinese leaders can read in the U. S. press a blast by some high-ranking officer, active or retired, advocating bombing of their nuclear installations. They can also read public-opinion surveys indicating that almost half the Americans questioned would approve using nuclear weapons in Vietnam if the Chinese should join the fighting. They have also read reports of Messrs. Rusk and McNamara's speeches at the December NATO meeting, warning against China's nuclear potential and demanding European help in Vietnam.

Is the Chinese conviction that they are threatened by us so incredible? If we were on the receiving end, and the Chinese had the power to harm us that we have to harm them, we would have blown our tops long ago.

Collective Bargaining?

As this is written, the New York transit strike continues with no immediate prospect of an early settlement. Once again, the familiar plaintive query has been raised: why has collective bargaining failed? But it is the collective bargainers, not collective bargaining that is at fault in this instance; there has been all too little collective bargaining. The transit workers opened with an initial proposal that was far in excess of any "package" they might reasonably expect to receive. That is more or less standard procedure, but in this instance the opening demands were so astronomically high as to seem frivolous. Even so, the Transit Authority should have made a prompt counter-offer, if only to create the "aura" of collective bargaining. The Authority made no response until one day before the strike deadline.

By then the union's demands had been reduced, but by then, also, the merits of its case has been almost completely obscured by the histrionics of Mike Quill—his posturing, his arrogance, his gutter tactics—all of which came though with intolerable clarity on television. The mediators, experienced men, could act only within a framework of "voluntarism"; the parties had first to be willing to bargain in good faith, which neither seemed interested in doing, before the experts could help. Nor was the collective bargaining process furthered when an injunction was sought. The first effect was to arouse labor's ancient hostility to "labor injunctions." Quill's brief visit to jail did nothing to break the jam. Tough fines levied against the union's treasury would have been more to the point. Nor did Mayor Lindsay's in-again, out-again attitude expedite the bargaining; the proposition that he could not accept responsibility before taking office, sound enough in law, did not square with the realities.

But there is a more basic explanation for the failure of the collective bargaining. There has been very little genuine bargaining between the TWU and the TA these many years. "Political fixing," not collective bargaining, has been the rule. A series of carefully staged, artfully rehearsed sessions usually culminated in a cliff-hanger solution whereby, at the last moment, a general tie-up was averted. To some extent, this "fixing" formula has been unavoidable; a public agency, which operates under a specific grant of authority and with specific limitations, cannot bargain in precisely the same way as a private concern. But in New York the element of politics has become the main consideration, with the various major city employee groups in active competition and with the leaders of these groups being forced into an increasingly irrational position. Neither party to the transit dispute seemed to realize that time had run out on this makeshift bargaining, and both seemed surprised when the old routine did not work. Some new form of bargaining, tailored for public agencies, must be brought into being if the equities of city workers and the public interest are both to be safeguarded.

Defense Without Competition

It is ironic that the U.S. Defense Department, the biggest buyer in what is supposed to be the most competitive nation in the world, consistently purchases more than 80 per cent of its merchandise without allowing formal competition through bids. How do the department's 15,000 purchasing agents do business? By "negotiated contracts" mostly. That—they insist—does not mean whim and favoritism. They will admit that they buy where and how they please, but J. M. Malloy, head of the Defense Department's purchasing division, has said very earnestly: "There is absolutely no politics in our buying program."

But neither is there much shopping around, and his assurances of politics-less buying, like much else that the Defense Department says, must be taken on faith. Almost all missile and aircraft contracts—the real plums of the defense budget—are awarded after "negotiations." That is the way Lockheed, which has led the pack in defense work for four years straight, won its recent $1.3 billion job to build fifty-eight of the new Air Force transport giants. It may have been a nonpolitical (though highly arbitrary) decision, but the results of the decision will be very political indeed: since Lockheed's Georgia plant will get most of the money, Sen. Richard Russell will gather some gratitude votes when he runs next fall against Governor Carl Sanders, his strongest competition in years. The Defense Department has seventeen excuses for not accepting bids. Perhaps the most interesting is the catch-all excuse, "Impractical to Secure Competition by Formal Advertising," which it used last year to spend 14 per cent of its budget.

Every once in a while, Defense Secretary Robert McNamara puts out a pious statement about how he sure wants to increase competition. He was proud that last year his department pushed its competitive buying up to 17.6 per cent of the budget—a record!

The escalation of the Vietnam war has nicely deferred any further reform along that line. Lockheed, General Dynamics, McDonnell Aircraft, General Electric Co., North American Aviation—the top five prime defense contractors last year—and other great champions of private enterprise are safe once more from the specter, puny though it was, of being required to put their bids on record.

A Thousand Years Too Late

The threatened strike at St. John's University, called by the United Federation of College Teachers, will be a reality by the time this is in print, barring the unlikely possibility of a cave-in by either side in the controversy. St. John's, following a period of extremely rapid growth, is now the largest Catholic university in the United States. Shortly before the Christmas recess, more than thirty members of the faculty were summarily dismissed. The administration gave no reasons for this wholesale firing, either to the teachers or in response to repeated requests by the Federation, the press or by other interested parties. Attempts on the part of the city labor commissioner and others to mediate were rejected with a statement to the effect that this was a purely "academic matter," and that negotiation would therefore be "inappropriate."

For roughly a thousand years, from the 5th to the 15th centuries, education was the almost exclusive property of the Church; the ability to read and write, in fact, was confined for the most part to communities of religious, who were bound, as a condition of receiving this exclusive privilege, by vows of absolute obedience to their superiors. The notion of academic freedom, as understood today, would have been unthinkable in that milieu. Nevertheless, such scholarly communities preserved for us the history and literature of the Classical period. For this we are thankful.

But the president of a large modern university who discharges his professional colleagues out of hand, giving them neither hearing nor reason, is today both irrational and grotesque. To demand unquestioning obedience of college teachers, as though they were monks under the absolute authority of an abbot, is not merely out of date. It is a thousand years too late.

The Obsolete Negro . . . . Robert G. Sherrill

Washington, D.C.

The misery of the black men of Mississippi is reaching such proportions that the Johnson Administration's conscience could be measured once and for all according to its response to their needs. The Delta Ministry of the National Council of Churches has predicted that between 10,000 and 12,000 Negro sharecroppers will be evicted this winter. The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party recently reported that, according to its best count, 2,000 are already homeless. On one plantation alone, 200 families—an estimated 1,000 persons — were turned out.

It is hardly necessary to add that these people, most of whom earned no more than $3 a day during crop time, have no savings, have nowhere to go, have little clothing and no food. Such help as they are getting comes mostly from other Negroes, who have little enough to share. One Negro farmer offered 40 acres of his place to any of these wanderers who want to set up tents and try to survive the winter there.

The New York Times reports tent cities going up in Alabama, too, especially in Lowndes County, where perhaps fifty families have been evicted for registering to vote.

New York Rep. Joseph Resnick went down to Mississippi and looked it over. He was a long way from his own district, but no one else would go and the Negroes pleaded with him to come. He found complaints were modest compared to the actual situation. In a letter to Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach he warns that the white people of Mississippi have set upon a calculated campaign to drive Negroes out of the state.

"In spite of the fact that this potential human disaster is well known in Mississippi," he writes, "not one single state or federal employee or agency has made plans to cope with the extremely unfortunate situation.

"These people will need temporary housing immediately to withstand a cold winter, with agricultural surplus foods delivered by federal authorities—as state authorities will not distribute them through the normal welfare department procedures or permit other agencies to do it for them."

That's the short-range goal. Long range, one sensible plan would seem to be to do everything possible to keep these people on the farm, but in such conditions that they earn more than slender subsistence. The alternative is to watch them drift inevitably into big-city slums.

Those Negroes who are still holding on to a place are convinced that they too will eventually be forced, by economics, into leaving unless they can have more of a voice in the Agriculture Stabilization and Conservation Service Committee that determines who gets what crop allotments and farm loans.

Last year the Negroes organized in twenty-one counties of Mississippi and put up candidates of their own—enough candidates, in fact, to control the ASCS committees in each county. Thirty-two Negroes won positions in six counties, but only nineteen were voting delegates, and in no county did they come close to winning control of the committee. The whites outmaneuvered them, sometimes by cheating, sometimes by duplicity, sometimes by threat of violence.

The ASCS elections are conducted by mail. Many Negroes received envelopes containing no ballots. Many sharecroppers did not receive ballots because they were sent to their white plantation bosses instead. Some Negroes received ballots but their wives didn't (although they were entitled to vote). In addition, the whites tried to split the opposition vote by putting other Negroes on the ballot who did not want to serve and, in several instances, did not know they were running. One Negro who was so listed against his will is 73 years old, blind, has heart trouble, is illiterate, and could not possibly have served if he had been elected.

One Negro candidate was visited at midnight by a carload of white farmers who told him he'd better get off the ballot. Negro farmers who met in a church to map campaign strategy heard that they were going to be bombed. They notified the FBI, but without results. They stayed on anyway, one of their leaders setting the mood by declaring that he had decided to run for election against the white man who owned his land and his house because "I used to be afraid of the white man, but I've changed. There's one of two things I'm gonna be—either a living free man or a dead free man."

Now that the election is over and the Negroes are beaten again, the whites continue to get revenge. Roosevelt Sais, who was a candidate in 1964, and whose child is in an integrated school in Rolling Fork, was turned down when he tried to get a loan for wheat. He tried to get a loan for breaking land and was turned down again. He should have his land prepared now for this year, but doesn't, and can't. His equipment and cattle are mortgaged. He owes on his land. Many others, turned away by the white-dominated ASCS committee, are in the same bind.

Their desperation is such that Mrs. Ada Holliday, acting secretary of one Negro farmers' group in Clay County (where fraud in the elections was most evident), wrote Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman, demanding a recount and adding in tones new to the dark citizens of Mississippi:

> For the first time, Negro farmers are challenging the right of white men to dominate completely our lives. Because of the importance of the ASCS committee, we Negroes are willing to stake our lives, if necessary, to have a voice in this committee. The ASCS office will not run another year without us, and we will go to jail again if needed, to make our participation in the control of our livelihood a reality.

Significantly, she asked that Freeman have the allegations of vote fraud investigated by somebody other than the FBI, an organization which has been notably indifferent to Mississippi Negro appeals for fair play. Said Mrs. Holliday, "Our experience with the FBI has been that a federal payroll does nothing to change a man's heart."

Will the Department of Agriculture require a new, strictly supervised election? At this moment it is still "studying" the matter.

The ASCS elections were the main reason why Representative Resnick went to Mississippi, and he wrote Freeman shortly afterward: "The voting irregularities were so flagrant in the three counties I visited that I came away convinced that all other ASCS elections in Mississippi were being run on the same basis."

Aside from rigged elections, Resnick found that the FHA would lend money to white farmers to build houses but wouldn't lend to Negro farmers; that federal employees working for the Department of Agriculture refused to talk to Negro farmers on the phone, making them come into the office; that federal employees in Mississippi refuse to call Negroes by ordinary respectful titles; that federal farm agencies will help white farmers with their crops but won't help Negroes.

The rough treatment Negroes get from state agencies is something else again. "A farmer was fined $149 for transporting surplus food from a depot to the outlying plantations," Resnick said. "The state police claimed that he did not have the proper type license plate."

Resnick found also, as might be expected, that every piece of social legislation passed in the last two sessions of Congress, from the Voting Rights Act of 1965 to Headstart and other welfare programs, is being "repealed by non-enforcement."

All this and more Resnick has put in letters to Freeman, Katzenbach, President Johnson and Vice President Humphrey. So far there is no tangible sign that they have heard, or understood.

The Freedom Democratic Party has added its own appeals, complete with stacks of affidavits from displaced farmers, such as this from Fred Morganfield of Rolling Fork:

> The day the bossman told me to move I'd been working and came in for dinner. Bossman said he had another family to move in (no one ever did) and that we'd have to be gone by next day. The same morning my wife had registered Joe and Lester in the white school in Rolling Fork. Three weeks before this the bossman took another son's pay ($9.75 for three and one-fourth days work) and put it on my debt. I said I didn't take my family's pay to pay my debt, but he took it anyway.

If the Morganfields don't like it, they can get out of the state. Machinery will take their place anyway.

Some believe that the Mississippi black man is not so dispirited that he will not, if pushed much further, fight back. Resnick came away thinking so. He has warned Katzenbach of the possibility of "a full-scale guerrilla war which would disgrace and shame us all." He is convinced that unless the Johnson Administration does something fast, "it is my terrible feeling that what happened in Watts will be a tea party compared to what will happen in Mississippi."

The Freedom Democratic Party, which is in much closer touch with the Negroes and which knows of that letter, has not disputed it.

The People Beneath the War . . . Raymond R. Coffey

Rep. Robert McClory (R., Ill.) was winding up a two-day visit to Vietnam when he was encountered one afternoon armed with a movie camera and loping down Saigon's Le Loi Boulevard in a late November downpour. One of the more obscure members of Illinois' Congressional delegation, McClory had dropped in for a firsthand look at the war as it can be seen from the well-traveled V.I.P. path being worn into the Vietnamese terrain these days.

"I find the [Vietnamese] people range from indifferent to hostile," McClory began as he came in out of the rain, joining a reporter in the shelter of an arcade. "But things are going well for us," he concluded. Though he appeared oblivious to the paradox in what he said, McClory had neatly stated one of the saddest facts of the war.

Everyone talks about this being a political war in which the key to victory is, as the weariest cliché in Saigon goes, to "win the hearts and minds of the people." And yet, as the fighting grows in scale and intensity, there appears to be more and more inclination to judge progress in military terms alone. What's happening to the Vietnamese people, what they're getting out of it all, and what they think about the war appears to be of ever diminishing concern.

The shooting war is coming to be such a full-time job that political and social problems get shuffled to the bottom of the pile. And, almost imperceptibly, people like McClory—and others with considerably more experience and responsibility in Saigon—develop the notion that the war can be going well even if the Vietnamese are indifferent, hostile, apathetic or unhappy. The fact is, the long-suffering people have been given little reason to support the government side of the war. The United States's goal, supposedly, is to guarantee them liberty and an opportunity to establish some kind of free and representative government. But if the shooting stopped tomorrow, the populace of Vietnam would still be stuck with a military dictatorship, a system that is astonishingly corrupt and incompetent.

---

Raymond R. Coffey has recently returned from a four-month reporting assignment in Vietnam for the Chicago Daily News.

It's probably true, as U.S. officials in Saigon insist, that the military is the only organization in the country capable of running a government in the current situation. It is also perhaps true that the last thing the country needs for a while is another coup. But it does seem that, with all the leverage our economic and military presence gives us, the United States should be able to lean on the Saigon government a lot harder to make it more responsive to and more concerned with the people.

The Vietcong are hardly popular heroes, despite what many of the anti-war demonstrators at home appear to think. They can be harsh and terroristic, they conscript labor and troops by force, they bleed the peasantry for rice and taxes. But they do, as one U.S. counterinsurgency expert in Saigon put it, have an "image of morality" and they do promise the people a better life, even if they haven't delivered. That puts them far ahead of the Saigon regime, with its generals roaring around in big black limousines and their wives getting rich by speculating in real estate near American bases.

Premier Nguyen Cao Ky, the jaunty little Air Force general who heads the present government, is considered to be personally honest and to have a genuine concern for his country. His own position, however, is precarious and he is trapped with very little personal power in a sick system that almost daily gives the people another reason to doubt in victory and its rewards.

Several weeks ago the U.S. mission pulled its aid representatives out of Binh Tuy Province on the basis of evidence that the province chief, a Lt. Col. Pham Dinh Chi, had diverted to his own uses a substantial amount of U.S. money. The aid men also had reportedly been threatened with death if they exposed the situation. Ky hemmed and hawed for weeks under U.S. pressures to oust Chi. Finally he did—but only to give him another post in the defense ministry where the pickings may be even better.

The government also talks a good game of political freedom. Ky informs student groups, for example, that they are free to discuss and criticize the government. Anyone who takes him at his word is looking for trouble. "We are not going to have seminars [demonstrations] in the streets," Ky says. One of Saigon's English-language newspapers was recently slapped with a five-day suspension because a censor decided that it was printing news stories comforting to the Vietcong. Anyone who shows promise of leadership or of developing a following is looked upon as a dangerous threat to the incumbents, instead of as an asset to a country that needs leaders as much as it needs peace.

Shortly before leaving Vietnam, I wrote a story about a political-social action project in one of Saigon's worst slum quarters. A small group of dedicated young army officers and government officials had persuaded Ky to let them try a new approach among the poor who are most vulnerable to the Vietcong and have the least reason to believe in the government. They had recruited hundreds of part-time student volunteers who were helping the people to build schools, establish dispensaries, organize hog-raising co-ops, even to hold unofficial hamlet elections to choose their own spokesmen. The project greatly interested the United States; it was a hopeful new effort to "win the hearts and minds of the people." Ky and U.S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge themselves had visited the project.

But less than twenty-four hours after the story about the project had gone through the government-run cable office, a young army lieutenant, who is one of the leaders of the project, was called upon by a representative of the national police and reprimanded for getting "too much personal publicity."

The Vietcong promise the people land reform and a better break in life. Now and then the Ky government talks about reforms, too, but mostly it simply lectures the people sternly about how it is everyone's duty to support the war and the government. No one bothers even to tell the people what they might expect in the way of improvement if and when the war ends.

"They [the government] don't trust the people," the young lieutenant who was reprimanded said. "The crisis in our country is that no one has confidence in anyone any more. We cannot have a [social] revolution just by changing the actors in the scenario. We must start at the bottom with the people." The people, according to the lieutenant, don't believe anything the government says. They want to see action—the kind of action they were getting from the student volunteers in the slum project—before they will start believing words again.

The most discouraging thing about the whole situation is that the government, from Saigon to the remotest district, is indifferent to what the people want or expect. Every province and district chief is appointed by Saigon and is a military man with command responsibilities, as well as civilian administrative duties. U.S. military and civilian representatives out in the country complain that often they have a hard time even getting their Vietnamese counterparts to stand around and look interested in village "civic action" programs, such as visits by American medical teams. The U.S. representatives take great pains to make it appear that such aid comes from and is arranged by the Vietnamese government. But their efforts are often futile because the local Vietnamese government man makes plain that he knows nothing about the program and cares less.

A U.S. adviser, giving one typical example, said that his district chief agreed to take part in a food and clothing distribution program only after he was permitted to take for his wife a few of the surplus WAC blouses that were to be distributed among the needy women of a village.

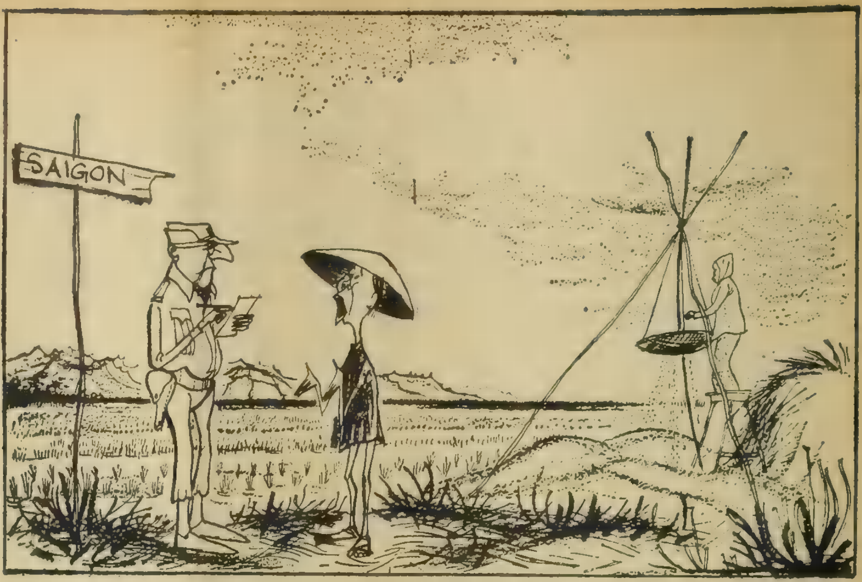
If, then, the job is winning over the people, it is a job that is going very badly. And, despite McClory and the U.S. military brass whose opinions he was obviously echoing, the military side of the war is not going a great deal better. It's perhaps true, as Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara says, that we've "stopped losing," but we're still a long, long way from winning, even militarily.

Astonishment is sometimes expressed that Hanoi does not seem exactly panting for the chance to negotiate. The reason seems plain enough: the other side is nowhere near convinced that it has lost all chances for victory. American and Vietnamese troops are inflicting tremendous casualties on the enemy. But our own losses are mounting and, despite the thousands of enemy soldiers killed in the past year, enemy strength has grown. The Vietcong now control a greater part of the countryside than they did a year ago. Thus the Saigon government is invisible and unknown in many areas of the country. How can people be persuaded to support something they can't even see, a government that offers them no security against the Vietcong?

The U.S. forces in Vietnam, now totaling around 200,000 men, are performing splendidly. They are brave, tough, resourceful, well motivated in battle. Beyond that, they generally exhibit more interest in and compassion for the people they're living amongst than does the Vietnamese government. The same, unhappily, cannot be said of the Vietnamese military. They continue to suffer many more casualties than do the Americans, and that indicates something about their willingness to fight. However, many of their casualties still result from an apathetic unwillingness to learn the lessons of guerrilla warfare, and from a lack of aggressiveness and leadership among their officers.

The officer corps is very weak, excessively occupied with keeping Saigon happy and inclined to duck a fight. Vietnamese commanders are always more than ready to break off an engagement in time to get back to camp for lunch. They tend to look upon their jeeps as something they have been given to get their kids to and from school. Beyond all this, it is a fact that Americans don't really trust the Vietnamese who fight beside them. American commanders privately complain that security is often compromised as soon as the Vietnamese are informed of a military operation.

Another factor that weighs against the "things are going well" judgment of McClory and others is the massive increase in enemy arms and men being infiltrated from the north. The enemy is no longer a ragtag bunch of poorly armed guerrillas wearing black pajamas and wondering where their next bowl of rice is coming from. In the recent major battles in the Ia Drang Valley, for example, the U.S. First Air Cavalry Division tangled with North Vietnamese regulars who were well equipped and well armed with Russian and Chinese weapons, including a high proportion of automatic weapons that can be deadly against low-flying aircraft. The enemy troops were carrying, in many cases, a basic load of 120 rounds of ammunition per man. That is more than a whole platoon of Vietcong guerrillas would often have in days not long past.



Tanner, Australian Bulletin; Ben Roth

"Sure I'm pro-Government—Which Government Do You Mean?"

The one great weapon we have that the enemy still lacks is air power. But air power, the way it is being used in this war, is not always an asset. There have been many calls for an end to the bombing of North Vietnam, but it appeared to some in Vietnam that a more urgent problem was restricting the "in-country" bombing of South Vietnam.

Our pilots have done a magnificent job of providing close air support for troops engaged with the enemy on the ground. And no one argues with the use of air power in those situations. However, there are also hundreds of air strikes every day against villages and other targets "suspected" of harboring the Vietcong in cases where there is no ground engagement. Thus one day just outside Saigon six Vietcong were reported seen among a string of thatch huts lining a canal. Hours later, long after the enemy had left, I rode along with a Forward Air Controller in a light Cessna who directed a flight of eight Skyraider dive bombers in an attack on the target. Four huts were destroyed, four were damaged and huge black craters were torn in the surrounding rice paddies. Should it take eight airplanes and thousands of pounds of bombs to knock out eight flimsy huts? And what evidence was there really that the huts and rice paddies were owned by the Vietcong?

On another day, a paratroop unit approaching a small village drew half a dozen rounds of small-arms sniper fire. The unit halted and called in an air and artillery strike that leveled the village. It seemed an extraordinary response to a few rounds of sniper fire, and one not likely to "win the hearts and minds" of any innocent civilians in the village.

Many of the Vietnamese jamming the refugee camps all over the country make clear that they came into the government areas not out of any particular fondness for the government and not to escape the Vietcong, but to get out from under our bombs. Top military authorities in Saigon say great care and discrimination is exercised in selecting targets. But some of the top counterinsurgency experts in the U.S. mission, and some of the advisers working out in the countryside, still believe the "in-country" bombings in some cases are hurting our cause among the uncommitted people.

But, as Congressman McClory's distressingly innocent comments made so discouragingly plain, there are people who somehow believe the war can be going well regardless of what the Vietnamese people think or feel or want.

VIETNAM

SETTING THE MORAL EQUATION

Howard Zinn

When those of us who would make an end to the war speak passionately of "the moral issue" in Vietnam, only our friends seem to understand. The government continues to bomb fishing villages, shoot women, disfigure children by fire or explosion, while its policy brings no outcry of opposition from Hubert Humphrey, Oscar Handlin, Max Lerner or millions of others. And we wonder why.

The answer, I suggest, involves the corruption of means, the confusion of ends, the theory of the lesser evil, and the easy reversibility of moral indignation in a species which is aroused to violence by symbols. To explain all this, however, is to get involved in a discussion of dangerous questions, which many people in the protest movement avoid by talking earnestly and vacantly about "morality" in the abstract, or by burrowing energetically into military realities, legal repartee, negotiating positions and the tactics of "broad coalition." Yet it is only by discussing root questions of means and ends— questions such as violence, revolution and alternative social systems—that we can understand what it means to say there is "a moral issue" in Vietnam.

To start with, we ought to recognize the escalation of evil means during this century—a process in which few of us can claim innocence. What Hitler did was to extend the already approved doctrine of indiscriminate mass murder (10 million dead on the battlefields of World War I) to its logical end, and thus stretch further than ever before the limits of the tolerable. By killing one-third of the world's Jews, the Nazis diminished the horror of any atrocity that was separated by two degrees of fiendishness from theirs. (Discussing with one of my students Hochhuth's The Deputy, I asked if we were not all "deputies" today, watching the bombing of Vietnamese villages; she replied, no, because this is not as bad as what Hitler did.)

The Left still dodges the problem of violent means to achieve just ends. (This is not true of Herbert Marcuse and Barrington Moore in the book they have done with Robert Wolff: A Critique of Pure Tolerance. But it was so true of the Communists in the United States that the government, in the Smith Act trials, had to distort the facts in order to prove that the Communists would go as far as Thomas Jefferson in the use of revolutionary violence.) To ignore this question, both by avoiding controversy about comparative social systems as ends, and forgoing discussion of violence as a means, is to fail to create a rational basis for moral denunciation of our government's actions in Vietnam.

I would start such a discussion from the supposition that it is logically indefensible to hold to an absolutely nonviolent position, because it is at least theoretically conceivable that a small violence might be required to prevent a larger one. Those who are immediately offended by this statement should consider: World War II; the assassination attempt on Hitler; the American, French, Russian, Chinese, Cuban revolutions; possible armed revolt in South Africa; the case of Rhodesia; the Deacons in Louisiana. Keep in mind that many who support the war in Vietnam may do so on grounds which they believe similar to those used in the above cases.

The terrible thing is that once you stray from absolute nonviolence you open the door for the most shocking abuses. It is like distributing scalpels to an eager group, half of whom are surgeons and half butchers. But that is man's constant problem—how to release the truth without being devoured by it.

How can we tell butchers from surgeons, distinguish between a healing and a destructive act of violence? The first requirement is that our starting point must always be nonviolence, and that the burden of proof, therefore, is on the advocate of violence to show, with a high degree of probability, that he is justified. In modern American civilization, we demand unanimity among twelve citizens before we will condemn a single person to death, but we will destroy thousands of people on the most flimsy of political assumptions (like the domino theory of revolutionary contagion).

What proof should be required? I suggest four tests:

(1) Self-defense, against outside attackers or a counterrevolutionary force within, using no more violence than is needed to repel the attack, is justified. This covers that Negro housewife who several years ago in a little Georgia town, at home alone with her children, fired through the door at a gang of white men carrying guns and chains, killing one, after which the rest fled. It would sacrifice the Rhineland to Hitler in 1936, and even Austria (for the Austrians apparently preferred not to fight), but demands supporting the Loyalist government in Spain, and defending Czechoslovakia in 1938. And it applies to Vietnamese fighting against American attackers who hold the strings of a puppet government.

(2) Revolution is justified, for the purpose of overthrowing a deeply entrenched oppressive regime, unshakable by other means. Outside aid is permissible (because rebels, as in the American Revolution, are almost always at a disadvantage against the holders of power), but with the requirement that the manpower for the revolution be indigenous, for this in itself is a test of how popular the revolution is. This could cover the French, American, Mexican, Russian, Chinese, Cuban, Algerian cases. It would also cover the Vietcong rebellion. And a South African revolt, should it break out.

(3) Even if one of the above conditions is met, there is no moral justification for visiting violence on the innocent. Therefore, violence in self-defense or in revolution must be focused on the evildoers, and limited to that required to achieve the goal, resisting all arguments that extra violence might speed victory. This rules out the strategic bombing of German cities in World War II, the atom bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki; it rules out terrorism against civilians even in a just revolution. Violence even against the guilty, when undertaken for sheer revenge, is unwarranted, which rules out capital punishment for any crime. The requirement of focused violence makes nonsensical the equating of the killing of village chiefs in South Vietnam by the Vietcong and the bombing of hospitals by American fliers; yet the former is also unjustified if it is merely an act of terror or revenge and not specifically required for a change in the social conditions of the village.

---

Howard Zinn is the author of The Southern Mystique (Knopf) and SNCC: The New Abolitionists (Beacon).

(4) There is an additional factor which the conditions of modern warfare make urgent. Even if all three of the foregoing principles are met, there is a fourth which must be considered if violence is to be undertaken: the costs of self-defense or social change must not be so high, because of the intensity or the prolongation of violence, or because of the risk of proliferation, that the victory is not worth the cost. For the Soviets to defend Cuba from attack—though self-defense was called for—would not have been worth a general war; for the United States to defend Hungary from attack—though self-defense was called for—would not have been worth a general war. For China or Soviet Russia to aid the Vietcong with troops, though the Vietcong cause is just, would be wrong if it seriously risked a general war. Under certain conditions, nations should be captive rather than be destroyed, or revolutionaries should bide their time. Indeed, because of the omnipresence of the great military powers—the United States and the USSR (perhaps this is not so true for the countries battling England, France, Holland, Belgium, Portugal) — revolutionary movements may have to devise tactics short of armed revolt to overturn an oppressive regime.

The basic principle I want to get close to is that violence is most clearly justified when those whose own lives are at stake make the decision on whether the prize is worth dying for. Self-defense and guerrilla warfare, by their nature, embody this decision. Conscript armies and unfocused warfare violate it. And no one has a right to decide that someone else is better off dead than Red, or that someone else should die to defend his way of life, or that an individual (like Norman Morrison) should choose to live rather than die.

It would be foolish to pretend that this summary can be either precise or complete. Those involved in self-defense or in a revolution need no intellectual justification; their emotions reflect some inner rationality. It is those outside the direct struggle, deciding whether to support one side or to stay out, who need to think clearly about principles. Americans, therefore, possessing the greatest power and being furthest removed from the problems of self-defense or revolution, need thoughtful deliberation most. All we can do in social analysis is to offer rough guides to replace nonthinking, to give the beginnings of some kind of moral calculus.

However, it takes no close measurement to conclude that the American bombings in Vietnam, directed as they are to farming areas, villages, hamlets, fit none of the criteria listed, and so are deeply immoral, whatever else is true about the situation in Southeast Asia or the world. The silence of the government's supporters on this—from Hubert Humphrey to the academic signers of advertisements—is particularly shameful, because it requires no surrender of their other arguments to concede that this is unnecessary bestiality.

Bombings aside, none of the American military activity against the Vietcong could be justified unless it were helping a determined people to defend itself against an outside attacker. That is why the Administration, hoping to confirm by verbal repetition what cannot be verified in fact, continually uses the term "aggression" to describe the Vietnamese guerrilla activities. The expert evidence, however, is overwhelming on this question:

(1) Philippe Devillers, the French historian, says "the insurrection existed before the Communists decided to take part. . . . And even among the Communists, the initiative did not originate in Hanoi, but from the grass roots, where the people were literally driven by Diem to take up arms in self-defense."

(2) Bernard Fall says "anti-Diem guerrillas were active long before infiltrated North Vietnamese elements joined the fray."

(3) The correspondent for Le Monde, Jean Lacouture (in Le Viet Nam entre deux paix) confirms that local pressure, local conditions led to guerrilla activity.

(4) Donald S. Zagoria, a specialist on Asian communism at Columbia University, wrote recently that "it is reasonably clear that we are dealing with an indigenous insurrection in the South, and that this, not Northern assistance, is the main trouble."

One test of "defense against aggression" is the behavior of the official South Vietnamese army—the "defenders" themselves. We find: a high rate of desertions; a need to herd villagers into concentration-camp "strategic hamlets" in order to control them; the use of torture to get information from other South Vietnamese, whom you might expect to be enthusiastic about "defending" their country; and all of this forcing the United States to take over virtually the entire military operation in Vietnam. [See article by Raymond R. Coffey, p. 61].

The ordinary people of Vietnam show none of the signs of a nation defending itself against "aggression," except in their noncooperation with the government and the Americans. A hundred thousand Vietnamese farmers were conducting a rebellion with mostly captured weapons (both David Halberstam and Hanson Baldwin affirmed this in The New York Times, contradicting quietly what I. F. Stone demolished statistically—the State Department's White Paper on "infiltration"). Then they matched the intrusion of 150,000 American troops with 7,500 North Vietnamese soldiers (in November, 1965, American military officials estimated that five regiments of North Vietnamese, with 1,500 in each regiment, were in South Vietnam). Weapons were acquired from Communist countries, but not a single plane to match the horde of American bombers filling the skies over Vietnam. This adds up not to North Vietnamese aggression (if indeed North Vietnamese can be considered outsiders at all) but to American aggression, with a puppet government fronting for American power.

Thus, there is no valid principle on which the United States can defend either its bombing, or its military presence, in Vietnam. It is the factual emptiness of its moral claim which then leads it to seek a one-piece substitute, that comes prefabricated with its own rationale, surrounded by an emotional aura sufficient to ward off inspectors. This transplanted fossil is the Munich analogy, which, speaking with all the passion of Churchill in the Battle of Britain, declares: to surrender in Vietnam is to do what Chamberlain did at Munich; that is why the villagers must die.

The great value of the Munich analogy to the Strangeloves is that it captures so many American liberals, among many others. It backs the Vietnamese expedition with a coalition broad enough to include Barry Goldwater, Lyndon Johnson, George Meany and John Roche (thus reversing World War II's coalition, which excluded the far Right and included the radical Left). This bloc justifies the carnage in Vietnam with a huge image of invading armies, making only one small change in the subtitle: replacing the word "Fascist" with the word "Communist." Then, the whole savage arsenal of World War II—the means both justified and unjustifiable — supported by that great fund of indignation built against the Nazis, can be turned to the uses of the American Century.

To leave the Munich analogy intact, to fail to discuss communism and fascism, is to leave untouched the major premise which supports the present policy of near genocide in Vietnam. I propose here at least to initiate such a discussion.

Let's refresh our memories on what happened at Munich. Chamberlain of England and Daladier of France met Hitler and Mussolini (this was September 30, 1938) and agreed to surrender the Sudeten part of Czechoslovakia, inhabited by German-speaking people, hoping thus to prevent a general war in Europe. Chamberlain returned to England, claiming he had brought "peace in our time." Six months later, Hitler had gobbled up the rest of Czechoslovakia; then he began presenting ultimatums to Poland, and by September 3, 1939, general war had broken out in Europe.

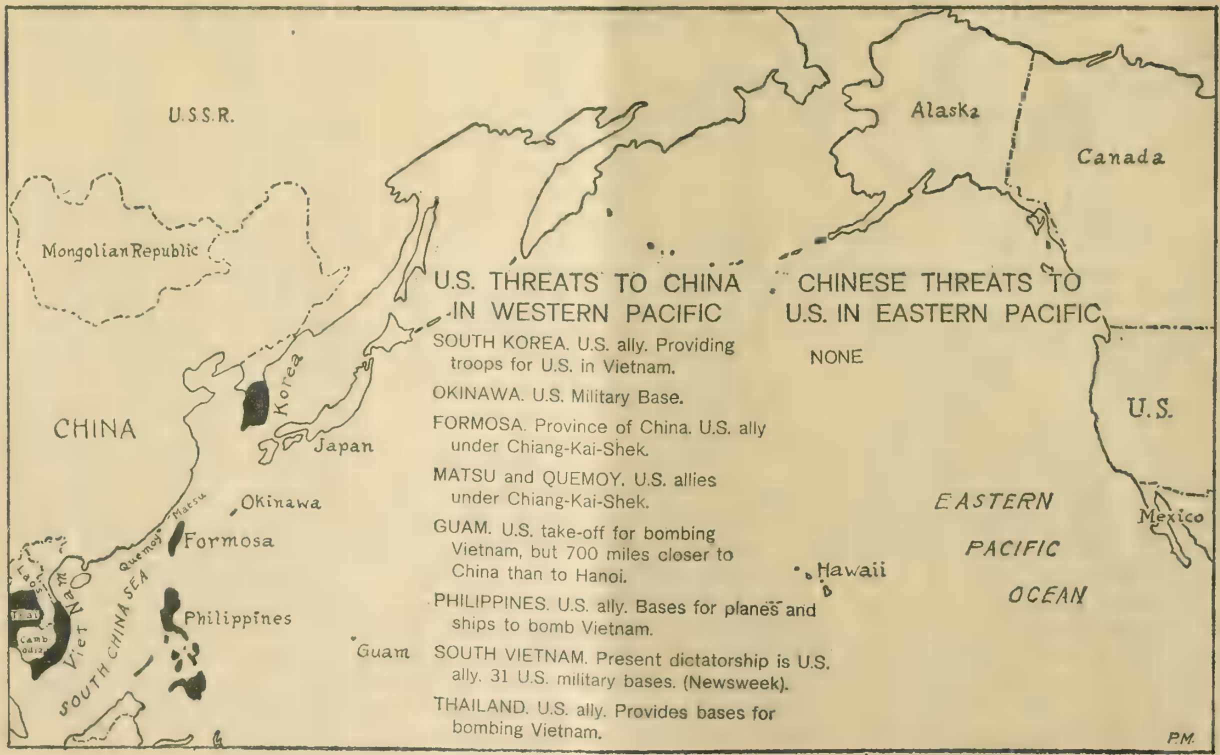
There is strong evidence that if the Sudetenland had not been surrendered at Munich—with it went Czechoslovakia's powerful fortifications, 70 per cent of its iron, steel and electric power, 86 per cent of its chemicals, 66 per cent of its coal —and had Hitler then gone to war, he would have been defeated quickly, with the aid of Czechoslovakia's thirty-five well-trained divisions. And if he chose, at the sign of resistance, not to go to war, then at least he would have been stopped in his expansion.

And so, the analogy continues, to let the Communist-dominated National Liberation Front win in South Vietnam (for the real obstacle in the sparring over negotiations is the role of the NLF in a new government) is to encourage more Communist expansion in Southeast Asia and beyond, and perhaps lead to a war more disastrous than the present one; to stop communism in South Vietnam is to discourage its expansion elsewhere.

We should note, first, some of the important differences between the Munich situation in 1938 and Vietnam today:

(1) In 1938, the main force operating against the Czech status quo was an outside force, Hitler's Germany; the supporting force was the Sudeten group inside led by Konrad Henlein. Since 1958 (and traceable back to 1942), the major force operating against the status quo in South Vietnam has been an inside force, formed in 1960 into the NLF; the chief supporter is not an outside nation but another part of the same nation, North Vietnam. The largest outside force in Vietnam consists of the American troops (who, interestingly, are referred to in West Germany as Bandenkampfverbande, Bandit Fighting Units, the name used in World War II by the Waffen-S.S. units to designate the guerrillas whom they specialized in killing). To put it another way, in 1938, the Germans were trying to take over part of another country. Today, the Vietcong are trying to take over part of their own country. In 1938, the outsider was Germany. Today it is the United States.

(2) The Czech government, whose interests the West surrendered to Hitler in 1938, was a strong, effective, prosperous, democratic government—the government of Benes and Masaryk. The South Vietnamese government which we support is a hollow shell of a government, unstable, unpopular, corrupt, a dictatorship of bullies and torturers, disdainful of free elections



U.S. THREATS TO CHINA IN WESTERN PACIFIC

SOUTH KOREA. U.S. ally. Providing troops for U.S. in Vietnam.

OKINAWA. U.S. Military Base.

FORMOSA. Province of China. U.S. ally under Chiang-Kai-Shek.

MATSU and QUEMOY. U.S. allies under Chiang-Kai-Shek.

GUAM. U.S. take-off for bombing Vietnam, but 700 miles closer to China than to Hanoi.

PHILIPPINES. U.S. ally. Bases for planes and ships to bomb Vietnam.

SOUTH VIETNAM. Present dictatorship is U.S. ally. 31 U.S. military bases. (Newsweek).

THAILAND. U.S. ally. Provides bases for bombing Vietnam.

CHINESE THREATS TO U.S. IN EASTERN PACIFIC

NONE

and representative government (recently they opposed establishing a National Assembly on the ground that it might lead to communism), headed by a long line of tyrants from Bao Dai to Diem to Ky, who no more deserve to be ranked with Benes and Masaryk than Governor Wallace of Alabama deserves to be compared with Robert E. Lee. It is a government whose perpetuation is not worth the los of a single human life.

(3) Standing firm in 1938 meant engaging, in order to defeat once and for all, the central threat of that time, Hitler's Germany. Fighting in Vietnam today, even if it brings total victory, does not at all engage what the United States considers the central foes—the Soviet Union and Communist China. Even if international communism were a single organism, to annihilate the Vietcong would be merely to remove a toenail from an elephant. To engage what we think is the source of our difficulties (Red China one day, Soviet Russia the next) would require nuclear war, and even Robert Strange McNamara doesn't seem up to that.

(4) There is an important difference between the historical context of Munich, 1938, and that of Vietnam, 1966. Munich was the culmination of a long line of surrenders and refusals to act: when Japan invaded China in 1931, when Mussolini invaded Ethiopia in 1935, when Hitler remilitarized the Rhineland in 1936, when Hitler and Mussolini supported the Franco attack on Republican Spain 1936-39, when Japan attacked China in 1937, when Hitler took Austria in the spring of 1938. The Vietnam crisis, on the other hand, is the culmination of a long series of events in which the West has on occasion held back (as in Czechoslovakia in 1948, or Hungary in 1956), but more often taken firm action, from the Truman Doctrine to the Berlin blockade, to the Korean conflict, to the Cuban blockade of 1962. So, withdrawing from Vietnam would not reinforce a pattern in the way that the Munich pact did. It would be another kind of line in that jagged graph which represents recent foreign policy.

(5) We have twenty years of cold-war history to test the proposition derived from the Munich analogy—that a firm stand in Vietnam is worth the huge loss of life, because it will persuade the Communists there must be no more uprisings elsewhere. But what effect did our refusal to allow the defeat of South Korea (1950-53), or our aid in suppressing the Huk rebellion in the Philippines (1947-55), or the suppression of guerrillas in Malaya (1948-60), have on the guerrilla warfare in South Vietnam which started around 1958 and became consolidated under the National Liberation Front in 1960? If our use of subversion and arms to overthrow Guatemala in 1954 showed the Communists in Latin America that we meant business, then how did it happen that Castro rebelled and won in 1959? Did our invasion of Cuba in 1961, our blockade in 1962, show other revolutionaries in Latin America that they must desist? Then how explain the Dominican uprising in 1965? And did our dispatch of Marines to Santo Domingo end the fighting of guerrillas in the mountains of Peru?

One touches the Munich analogy and it falls apart. This suggests something more fundamental: that American policy makers and their supporters simply do not understand either the nature of communism or the nature of the various uprisings that have taken place in the postwar world. They are not able to believe that hunger, homelessness, oppression are sufficient spurs to revolution, without outside instigation, just as Dixie governors could not believe that Negroes marching in the streets were not led by outside agitators.

So, communism and revolution require discussion. They are sensitive questions, which some in the protest movement hesitate to broach for fear of alienating allies. But they are basic to that inversion of morality which enables the United States to surround the dirty war in Vietnam with the righteous glow of the war against Hitler.

A key assumption in this inversion is that communism and Nazism are sufficiently identical to be treated alike. However, communism as a set of ideals has attracted good people—not racists or bullies or militarists—all over the world. One may argue that in Communist countries citizens had better affirm their allegiance to it, but that doesn't account for the fact that millions in France, Italy and Indonesia are Communist party members, that countless others all over the world have been inspired by Marxian ideals. And why should they not? These ideals include peace, brotherhood, racial equality, the classless society, the withering away of the state.

If Communists behave much better out of power than in it, that is a commentary not on their ideals but on weaknesses which they share with non-Communist wielders of power. If, presumably in pursuit of their ideals, they have resorted to brutal tactics, maintained suffocating bureaucracies and rigid dogmas, that makes them about as reprehensible as other nations, other social systems which, while boasting of the Judeo-Christian heritage, have fostered war, exploitation, colonialism and race hatred. We judge ourselves by our ideals; others by their actions. It is a great convenience.

The ultimate values of the Nazis, let us recall, included racism, elitism, militarism and war as ends in themselves. Unlike either the Communist nations or the capitalist democracies, there is here no ground for appeal to higher purposes. The ideological basis for coexistence between Communist and capitalist nations is the rough consensus of ultimate goals which they share. While war is held off, the citizens on both sides—it is to be hoped and indeed it is beginning to occur—will increasingly insist that their leaders live up to these values.

One of these professed values—which the United States is trying with difficulty to conceal by fragile arguments and feeble analogies—is the self-determination of peoples. Self-determination justifies the overthrow of entrenched oligarchies—whether foreign or domestic—in ways that will not lead to general war. China, Egypt, Indonesia, Algeria and Cuba are examples. Such revolutions tend to set up dictatorships, but they do so in the name of values which can be used to erode that same dictatorship. They therefore deserve as much general support and specific criticism as did the American revolutionaries, who set up a slave-holding government, but with a commitment to freedom which later led it, against its wishes, to abolitionism.

The easy use of the term "totalitarian" to cover both Nazis and Communists, or to equate the South Vietnamese regime with that of Ho Chi Minh, fails to make important distinctions, just as dogmatists of the Left sometimes fail to distinguish between Fascist states and capitalist democracies.

This view is ahistorical on two counts. First, it ignores the fact that, for the swift economic progress needed by new nations today, a Communist-led regime does an effective job (though it is not the only type of new government that can). In doing so, it raises educational and living standards and thus paves the way (as the USSR and Eastern Europe already show) for attacks from within on its own thought-control system. Second, this view forgets that the United States and Western Europe, now haughty in prosperity, with a fair degree of free expression, built their present status on the backs of either slaves or colonial people, and subjected their own laboring populations to several generations of misery before beginning to look like welfare states.

The perspective of history suggests that a united Vietnam under Ho Chi Minh is preferable to the elitist dictatorship of the South, just as Maoist China with all its faults is preferable to the rule of Chiang, and Castro's Cuba to Batista's. We do not have pure choices in the present, although we should never surrender those values which can shape the future. Right now, for Vietnam, a Communist government is probably the best avenue to that whole packet of human values which make up the common morality of mankind today: the preservation of human life, self-determination, economic security, the end of race and class oppression, that freedom of speech which an educated population begins to demand.

This is a conclusion which critics of government policy have hesitated to make. With some, it is because they simply don't believe it, but with others, it is because they don't want to rock the boat of "coalition." Yet the main obstacle to United States withdrawal is a fear that is real—that South Vietnam will then go Communist. If we fail to discuss this honestly, we leave untouched a major plank in the structure that supports U.S. action.

When the jump is made from real fears to false ones, we get something approaching lunacy in American international behavior. Richard Hofstadter, in The Paranoid Style in American Politics, writes of "the central preconception of the paranoid style — the existence of a vast, insidious, preternaturally effective international conspiratorial network designed to perpetrate acts of the most fiendish character."

Once, the center of the conspiracy was Russia. A political scientist doing strategic research for the government told me recently with complete calm that his institute decided not too long ago that they had been completely wrong about the premise which underlay much of American policy in the postwar period—the premise that Russia hoped to take over Western Europe by force. Yet now, with not a tremor of doubt, the whole kit and caboodle of the invading-hordes theory is transferred to China.

Paranoia starts from a base of facts, but then leaps wildly to an absurd conclusion. It is a fact that China is totalitarian in its limitation of free expression, is fierce in its expressions of hatred for the United States, that it crushed opposition in Tibet, and fought for a strip of territory on the Indian border. But let's consider India briefly: it crushed an uprising in Hyderabad, took over the state of Kerala, initiated attacks on the China border, took Goa by force, and is fierce in its insistence on Kashmir. Yet we do not accuse it of wanting to take over the world.

Of course, there is a difference. China is emotionally tied to and sometimes aids obstreperous rebellions all over the world. However, China is not the source of these rebellions. The problem is not that China wants to take over the world, but that various peoples want to take over their parts of the world, and without the courtesies that attend normal business transactions. What if the Negroes in Watts really rose up and tried to take over Los Angeles? Would we blame that on Castro?

Not only does paranoia lead the United States to see international conspiracy where there is a diversity of Communist nations based on indigenous Communist movements. It also confuses communism with a much broader movement of this century—the rising of hungry and harassed people in Asia, Africa, Latin America (and the American South). Hence we try to crush radicalism in one place (Greece, Iran, Guatemala, the Philippines, etc.) and apparently succeed, only to find a revolution—whether Communist or Socialist or nationalist or of indescribable character—springing up somewhere else. We surround the world with our navy, cover the sky with our planes, fling our money to the winds, and then a revolution takes place in Cuba, 90 miles from home. We see every rebellion everywhere as the result of some devilish plot concocted in Moscow or Peking, when what is really happening is that people everywhere want to eat and to be free, and will use desperate means and any one of a number of social systems to achieve their ends.

The other side makes the same mistake. The Russians face a revolt in Hungary or Poznan, and attribute it to bourgeois influence, or to American scheming. Stalin's paranoia led him to send scores of old Bolsheviks before the firing squad. The Chinese seem to be developing obsessions about the United States; but in their case we are doing our best to match their wildest accusations with reality. It would be paranoid for Peking to claim that the United States is surrounding China with military bases, occupying countries on its border, keeping hundreds of thousands of troops within striking distance, contemplating the bombing of its population—if it were not largely true.

A world-wide revolution is taking place, aiming to achieve the very values that all major countries, East and West, claim to uphold: self-determination, economic security, racial equality, freedom. It takes many forms—Castro's, Mao's, Nasser's, Sukarno's, Senghor's, Kenyatta's. That it does not realize all its aims from the start makes it hardly more imperfect than we were in 1776. The road to freedom is stony, but people are going to march along it. What we need to do is improve the road, not blow it up.

The United States Government has tried hard to cover its moral nakedness in Vietnam. But the signs of its failure grow by the day. Facts have a way of coming to light. Also, we have recently had certain experiences which make us less naive about governments while we become more hopeful about people: the civil rights movement, the student revolt, the rise of dissent inside the Communist countries, the emergence of fresh, brave spirits in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and in our own country.

It is not our job, as citizens, to point out the difficulties of our military position (this, when true, is quite evident), or to work out clever bases for negotiating (the negotiators, when they must, will find a way), or to dissemble what we know is true in order to build a coalition (coalitions grow naturally from what is common to a heterogeneous group, and require each element to represent its colors as honestly as possible to make the mosaic accurate and strong). As a sign of the strange “progress” the world has made, from now on all moral transgressions take the form of irony, because they are committed against officially proclaimed values. The job of citizens, in any society, any time, is simply to point this out.

RESEARCH: THE MIDAS TOUCH

Rep. Henry S. Reuss

Higher education has always been among our first national priorities. During the past twenty years, scientific research and development have also assumed a leading position in these priorities. Research and higher education share many goals; both are concerned with extending scholarship and developing the intellectual resources of the country. Indeed, science is most at home on the campus.

Today, not only growing affluence but the raising of educational sights have placed nearly 5 million students in the higher education system. And this number would be substantially higher if there were more scholarships, more teachers, more colleges and universities throughout the country.

Federal spending for research and development has now reached a huge $16 billion per year, having ascended a dizzy 20 per cent per year spiral in the past fifteen years. Public support has been won for this rapid growth and huge scale of expenditure because the money has bought benefits the public seemed to want—from ballistic missiles for defense to tiny transistors for hearing aids; from synchronous communications statellites to new materials for industry; from nuclear power plants to polio vaccines; from computers to radioisotopes in medical diagnosis and therapy.

Education has also reaped benefits from this accelerated spending. Research, once the province of the scholarly few, is now prized and sought by the many. Lush material rewards have been accompanied by esteem for scientists and for the institutions which foster them.

Out of the annual federal budget for research and development, higher education now gets $1.8 billion — some 15 per cent of its annual revenues from all sources. Several research-performing universities receive enough public money to cover 40 per cent or more of their entire operating budgets. Tens of thousands of scientists and graduate students in science are now assured the opportunity, money and excellent facilities for their work.

But this bonanza for education has not been pure gain. The institutions have paid for their research-based affluence.

Scientists and engineers of the highest talents and training are indispensable to productive research and development. They are also indispensable to maintaining and elevating the quantity and quality of higher education. They comprise a small community which cannot be made to grow rapidly. When too many are diverted to research, the price exacted is a shortage of teachers and a downgrading of the profession of teaching.

Short-run federal research needs can be satisfied by concentrating science money at a few large universities. Many excellent scientists are already there and others will join them. But as talent is drawn into elite pools, research and instruction elsewhere suffer. The top of the educational tree may flourish, but the roots wither.

Since the government's needs are overwhelmingly in the natural sciences, these get almost all the money. But colleges and universities must transmit knowledge and encourage scholarship in all fields of learning. If government tips the scales in favor of scientists over humanists or physics over history, the structure of higher education is threatened.

Just how serious are these damages? To educate the 5 million students now enrolled in junior colleges, colleges and universities, there are at present 324,000 teachers, including some 19,000 graduate assistants. There are too few to supply all the needs, yet half of the nation's colleges and universities report that some faculty positions have gone begging for two years or more. The shortages affect most severely the smaller colleges and universities; they are most acute in the natural sciences.

To a considerable extent federal research programs contribute to these shortages. In 1960, an estimated 124,000 scientists and engineers, with master's degrees or better, had been drawn off to federal research and development work outside educational institutions. Nor did the seduction of scientific manpower stop at the gates of colleges and universities. On the campuses, research that was financed mainly by the federal government claimed the full-time equivalent of 43,000 faculty personnel.

If later figures were available, they would undoubtedly show that more scientists and engineers of college teaching caliber had been diverted to federal research and development. Federal expenditures for these purposes more than doubled between 1960 and 1965, with corresponding claims on manpower. But even 167,000 is massive when compared with the present 324,000 teachers of all subjects now deployed throughout the higher education system.

The prospects for relief of present teacher shortages are bleak. By 1970, college enrollments are expected to rise to 7 million. If even present teaching standards are to be maintained for the 1970 student population, 90,000 teachers with doctoral degrees must be added to faculty rolls. Present trends indicate that only half that number will in fact be enlisted. If this happens, the unattractive alternatives will be to curtail enrollments or to watch the quality of instruction deteriorate.

Henry S. Reuss, Congressman from Wisconsin (Milwaukee) is a member of the Joint Economic Committee, as well as of the House Committees on Banking and Currency and on Government Operations. Representative Reuss is the author of The Critical Decade: An Economic Policy for America and the Free World (McGraw-Hill).

But scientists are not only neglecting undergraduate teaching; they are downgrading its value. Good teaching, they realize, will rarely confer the prestige, recognition and money which come from research. Teaching cannot be published, does not produce invitations to prestigious conferences, or often result in appointments to committees. In fact, good teaching is largely invisible, except to the fortunate student. As Dr. Alan Thorndike, senior physicist at Brookhaven National Laboratory, reminded the House Research and Technical Programs Subcommittee: "There is no Nobel Prize for teaching."

When teaching becomes a poor relation to research, the undergraduate suffers. Having hurdled the rising admission barriers which shortages of capacity, including teachers, make mandatory, he may find that the great professors he sought begrudge time spent on teaching undergraduates, and shift what they regard as a burden to ill-directed young assistants.

Testifying before the subcommittee, Dr. W. T. Lippincott, professor of chemistry at Ohio State University, said that government support of university research is "potentially the most powerful destructive force the higher education system in America has ever faced." He went on to say that the loss to students of "stimulation, guidance, and experience-inspired knowledge," which has traditionally been passed on to young people by research scholars, will affect the future supply of "dedicated teachers, competent scientists, engineers, scholars, and well-informed citizens."

According to Dr. Clark Kerr, president of the University of California:

> There seems to be a "point of no return" after which research, consulting, graduate instruction become so absorbing that faculty efforts can no longer be concentrated on undergraduate instruction as they once were. . . . How to escape the cruel paradox that a superior faculty results in an inferior concern for undergraduate teaching is one of our more pressing problems.

Whatever may be appropriate for institutions which specialize in graduate instruction, this depreciation of undergraduate teaching is a denial of the first obligation of higher education: to stimulate young people to think, to question, to seek answers for themselves. If this be the price of research, the cost is unacceptable.

Fifty-four universities, out of a total of more than 2,000 colleges and universities, presently get about 60 per cent of all federal money for research and science education. The concentration is geographic, too. Sixty per cent of federal science funds have gone to institutions in five states — California, Massachusetts, New York, Illinois and Maryland (District of Columbia).

Because of this extraordinary concentration, few colleges and small universities can offer the research opportunities which scientists naturally seek. As they lose many of their ablest professors and are unable to attract replacements, they necessarily increase the teaching load of the faculty who remain. As the teaching load goes up, time for research goes down. In the process, smaller institutions become even less attractive to prospective science faculty.

Are there clear benefits from the concentration of research to offset this progressive weakening of the smaller institutions? The federal government and the scientific community had hoped that if most of the money were given to a relatively few Ph.D.-granting institutions, the production of doctorates would significantly increase, and higher education in general would share the benefit. These hopes have not been realized.

The educational system, including the contract research centers which it manages, now gets six times as much federal science money per year as it received a decade ago—$1.8 billion for 1965, compared to a relatively modest $300 million in 1955. The number of science doctorates produced per year has gone up about 1.7 times—from 8,500 to 14,500—a meager return on the research investment, even if all the gains are attributed to that investment. And the cause-and-effect relationship is doubtful, since the number of non-science doctorates per year has gone up as fast as science doctorates.

Furthermore, there is no clear relationship between doctorate production at particular research-performing universities and the volume of federal science funds. For example, the University of California in 1964 produced 2.3 times as many doctorates as the University of Wisconsin, but received 3 times as much money; it produced twice as many doctorates as Purdue, but received more than 10 times as much money; it produced 2.8 times as many doctorates as Iowa State but, again, received some 11 times as much money.

Finally, the science Ph.D.s who do emerge today strongly prefer research to teaching. More than two-thirds of all new doctors of science in 1962 elected to take research jobs or post-doctoral fellowships that permitted research. The corresponding figure in the social sciences was 21 per cent; in the arts and professions, 7 per cent; in education, 6 per cent.

Federal funds for research go 98 per cent to the natural sciences and 2 per cent to everything else. Such a disproportionate allocation damages not only the neglected humanities and social sciences but the natural sciences as well. Neither science nor scientists can flourish if the other disciplines languish.

Killing science by cutting off research funds will not help higher education, but continuing present federal research policies will gravely damage both science and higher education. A better balance between research and education, combined with incentives to increase the flow of qualified scientists into teaching could save both.

The House Research and Technical Programs Subcommittee last October made the following recommendations for policy changes:*

(1) Weigh the priorities between teaching and research — in the White House and the Bureau of the Budget — before undertaking, continuing or expanding research programs having large scientific manpower needs.

(2) Encourage researchers to teach, by requiring that those who receive federal research awards and fellowships assume minimum teaching responsibilities.

(3) Institute science teaching fellowships which pay as much as research fellowships.

(4) Establish a Presidential award for outstanding undergraduate teachers.

(5) Modify the criteria for research awards to spread their contribution over a broadened list of institutions, in a wider area.

(6) Make more representative (by selecting younger members from more diverse institutions) the panels which judge the scientific merits of project applications.

(7) Expand the National Science Foundation's promising Science Development Program of "institutional grants" to colleges and universities, unrelated to specific "projects."

(8) Accept as an important national goal a massively increased support for the humanities and the social sciences.

---

*"Conflicts Between the Federal Research Programs and the Nation's Goals for Higher Education," H. Rept. 1158, 89th Cong., 1st sess., October 13, 1965.

The Merchant Marine

WILDERNESS OF TIGERS . . . . .

Howard Junker

Lately the sick and sinking American merchant marine has been snarling, clawing and backbiting like a wilderness of tigers, the cause being the formulation of a new federal maritime policy. The President is expected to present a new program to Congress this month.

There is every reason to expect that current policy, laid down by the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, should now be obsolete—times have changed. But government support of a tiny service industry that cannot face foreign competition without massive subsidy has attained the status of tradition. The vested interests—unions, operators, shipbuilders and the U.S. Navy—have so much at stake that rather than submit to reform they sometimes even assert that the merchant marine is shipshape. It all depends on motivation: why should the government keep a merchant marine afloat? The answer to that question determines the kind and size of crutch Uncle Sam should offer.

American seamen, who now enjoy the American standard of living, earn four times as much as foreign sailors. Building a ship in American yards costs twice as much and takes twice as long as it does abroad. To overcome these obstacles to international competition, the merchant marine is given several kinds of assistance. Fifteen liner operations, which run 300 deep-sea ships, receive 75c of their seaman's dollar from the government. The government will also pay up to 55 per cent of construction costs, give insurance on construction loans and mortgages, trade-in allowances for obsolete ships and certain forms of tax relief. In return, the lines must operate American-built, American-manned ships on regulated trade routes, subject to much government supervision and inspection; they are committed to return half of all profits above 10 per cent. In the past twenty years, federal subsidies have totaled about $2 billion, of which less than 10 per cent has been recaptured.

About 300 tankers, 100 unsubsidized liners, and 250 tramps survive because coastal shipping is reserved, as it has been since the War of 1812, to the American flag, and because cargo preference rules send all military cargo and 50 per cent of aid cargo in American bottoms. In all, the government pays $320 million in direct subsidy, $80 million above world rates in cargo preferences each year. And the merchant marine carries less than 10 per cent of America's foreign trade, only 30 per cent of its liner trade.

On October 4, 1965, an interagency task force, headed by Alan S. Boyd, Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation, and composed of representatives of nine departments and agencies, offered a basic outline of what a new maritime policy might be. In general, the Boyd report reflected the cost-conscious, incentive-minded, "the greater the subsidy the less the progress" attitudes of the controversial Maritime administrator, Nicholas Johnson.

Johnson graduated from the University of Texas Law School in 1958. Since then he has clerked for Hugo Black, taught law at Berkeley, and practiced in Washington with Dean Acheson's firm. He was named head of Marad in March, 1964, the assumption being that a fresh viewpoint was needed.

Johnson is a vivid talker and cocky. Though he has repeatedly insisted that he wants a stronger merchant marine with more ships, although he has repeatedly called for industry cooperation and suggestions, he has become, during his short term in office, the industry's whipping boy. The task force included representatives of Marad, the Federal Maritime Commission, the Bureau of the Budget, the Council of Economic Advisers and the Departments of State, Agriculture, Labor, Defense and Commerce; but blame for the whole thing has been laid on Johnson, who was not even a member.

Most shocking in the report was the suggestion that the government should support the merchant marine only to the extent that wartime needs might dictate. This perpetuates the traditional assumption that

---

Howard Junker is a free-lance writer.

a commercial fleet must be maintained as a ready auxiliary, but other considerations — the arguments from prestige, balance of payments, rate stabilization, trade leverage and retention of skills—have never been so summarily dismissed. The report envisioned a 1985 fleet of roughly today's size, but carrying twice today's tonnage because its ships would be larger, faster, automated and economically managed.

To achieve this leaner, more competitive merchant marine, the report recommended:

- Eliminating the subsidized passenger fleet. (These thirteen ships now cost $50 million a year—one-fourth of the operating subsidy.)
- Reducing seafaring jobs in the next twenty years by 40 per cent, from 47,000 to 27,000. (Most of these jobs would be among service personnel, such as stewards, who could find work ashore, but an automated engine room can cut crew size by 30 per cent.
- Allowing construction in foreign yards. (It is the Navy, which spends close to $3 billion a year—not private industry, which spends but $240 million—that maintains American yards. Only six of twenty-one yards are doing any private construction at all. Yet 68 per cent of the active merchant fleet is of wartime vintage.)
- Building five dry-bulk carriers a year—to be operated with subsidy—and thirty to forty instead of the current fifteen to seventeen general cargo ships a year. (The United States has no bulk carriers on order today, although 225 ships have been ordered for registry under the flags of Norway, Great Britain, Japan and Liberia.)
- Eliminating cargo preferences. Permitting flexible trade routes. Encouraging operation outside conference structures. Eliminating profit recapture.
- Encouraging the formation of a single maritime union. (Some ships are manned by a dozen different unions.)
- Encouraging maximum automation, reduced manning scales and efficient management.

Though the layman might find these suggestions progressive and of some promise, the industry was stunned. The President's Maritime Advisory Committee, representing the industry, labor and the public, rejected the report immediately as "contrary to law and executive policy." Admiral John M. Will, board chairman of American Export Isbrandtsen Lines, speaking for the subsidized liners, said the report "reveals an almost total lack of understanding of the problems involved, an absence of business sense and a stubborn adherence to preconceived but unproven ideas. . . ." (A few weeks later, Jakob Isbrandtsen, one of the few to have kind words for the report, suggested the elimination of cargo preferences—which would not affect liner operations—and the consolidation of all passenger ships into one line.)

Shipbuilders declared that the report was sabotage. The unions concurred, rejecting the plea for labor consolidation and adding, for good measure, a demand that the 50 per cent cargo preference rule be upped to 75 per cent with a 30 per cent requirement for all incoming oil shipments. Members of Congress, among them Warren G. Magnuson (D., Wash.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, called for an independent Federal Maritime Board to solve the problem. And as if to dissipate Congressional energy still further, the House Merchant Marine Committee set up a nine-man special subcommittee to study maritime education.

Nicholas Johnson and Boyd pleaded for a rational, unemotional evaluation of the report, though Johnson himself was not exactly contributing to a relaxed atmosphere. It seems that he adds little messages to his intra-agency recorded answering service. One of these, just after the report was issued, went, in part:

". . . [the Boyd report] represents the first time in thirty years that the Executive branch of our federal government has agreed upon the importance of the industry and the need for a new maritime policy. Secretary of Labor Wirtz is the only dissenting official. . . ."

The message went on to suggest that copies of the report could be obtained from "your supervisor." Obviously the message was not intended for the public, but the industry got hold of the telephone number, and calls—not felicitous—poured in.

(About this time a poster contest for high school students, sponsored by the maritime industry in conjunction with the government and run by Scholastic Magazine, was announced. The students are asked to develop the theme, "American Ships Chart America's Future." The prize poster will be displayed on all U.S. mail trucks and in all post offices during May, a date which will perhaps coincide with final Congressional deliberations on maritime policy.)

Quite apart from its possible need in time of war, the merchant marine is considered in many quarters to be a "vital part of our national posture." Sensing the prestige in having their own fleets, twenty-eight nations since the war have launched merchant marines. And arguments here for a strong merchant marine are often steeped in patriotic piety: Ship American. Build American. Keep America Strong and Working. The task force report refused to accept these exhortations as implying the need for a big, fat fleet. In fact, our exports of grain, for example, suffer because all this Americanism is expensive. Therefore the farm bloc, the State Department and the Department of Agriculture line up against Ship American. But the pro-merchant marine spokesmen insist that we are losing something called the battle of the high seas. The Russian fleet is sixth, and gaining fast; we have sunk to fourth. And our share of foreign trade has sunk from well over half to less than 10 per cent and so on and so forth.

In short, the tough-minded economies—"penny-pinching theorizing and double talk"—of the task force report just don't go down with the patriots who have something to lose if the so-called private industry is revamped and stripped of some of its protective padding. It would be "politically hazardous at best," ventured The Journal of Commerce, for any Congressman to support a maritime policy that was not in some way "expansive."

Last month the Maritime Advisory Committee produced its own version of the new policy. The MAC accepted the arguments from prestige and trade balance and therefore proposed spending $700 million per year, subsidizing six new lines, retaining the passenger fleet, capturing the "runaway" fleet and, by all means, Build American.

With industry and labor united in opposition to the austerities of the task-force report, construction may be the only substantive issue remaining for debate. H. Lee White, president of Marine Transport Lines, member of the MAC, followed "the second program" with a 75-page minority opinion. White concluded that Build American only forces the operator to subsidize the shipbuilder, that the operator must be permitted to build abroad. Marine Transport Lines, for example, owns twenty-six foreign-flag ships, twenty U. S.-flag vessels.

Meanwhile, as the war in Vietnam goes on, the merchant marine is needed as a military auxiliary. Until recently, the Military Sea Transportation Service (MSTS) was able to handle supplies to Vietnam—about 90 per cent of which go by sea—with little difficulty. On average in 1964, forty-five ships carried 250,000 tons a month. By last September, however, the number of ships and tonnage had doubled. In January about 1,200,000 tons will have to be carried.

Slight panic broke out in early November and MSTS called a series of special meetings to urge the commitment of more ships from private industry. So far MSTS has chartered some eighty ships and pulled seventy-five ships out of moth balls. Reactivating a ship takes a month and costs about $300,000. More than 600 were pulled during Korea, some 200 during Suez. About 950 ships remain in the reserve fleet, all ancient, though some are unused (on a par with a '50 Chevy that has run 15,000 miles).

Fifty ships were chartered by MSTS during the summer when the subsidized lines were hit by a strike. The unions did not interfere with shipments to Vietnam, so the deal worked well for all concerned. Some operators later wanted their ships back lest foreign flags steal their customers, but since the November SOS, MSTS has picked up seventy-five charters and the current crisis is manpower — enough engineers and skilled crewmen to handle the expanded fleet.

Occasionally, when United States ships were not available for military cargo, foreign vessels have been used. There have been instances, perhaps as many as half a dozen, in which sailors working foreign ships have refused to sail to Vietnam. Chinese, Greek, Indian and Mexican crews have been involved. These incidents have touched off bitter reactions from the unions.

After warning Secretary McNamara that the use of foreign ships to carry military cargo "violated the law, hampered our effort in South Vietnam, and exposed our country to repeated humiliation," Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union, sued the Secretary and the Department of Defense. The case is now pending in federal district court, District of Columbia.

Curran contends that federal maritime policy has not encouraged a strong merchant marine, that only American crews working American ships can be depended upon in crisis. He would like to use the stranding of military cargoes as a lever to reopen debate on the "flag of necessity" question. About 450 ships, mostly bulk carriers, are owned by American interests—oil and metals companies as well as independents—but registered under Panamanian, Liberian and Honduran flags to escape high American taxes and wages. These ships are committed to "come back" if called by the Department of Defense. The owners claim that the PanLibHon maneuver is the only way they can compete with totally foreign interests. The unions have tried to organize these "runaway" ships, to save the foreign crews from exploitation. After an attempted international boycott, the Supreme Court declared the unions had no jurisdiction over foreign crews, but the current crisis gives union leaders another chance to wave the flag.

As if the pressures of reform and "wartime" demand were not enough, the merchant marine is also in the midst of a technological revolution. Automation has not helped labor-management relations—the seagoing unions struck for seventy-seven days last year, the longshoremen were out thirty-three days. Taft-Hartley injunctions have been used eight times to stall labor disputes—but it could help the merchant marine become competitive. Wages account for about half of operating costs; port charges for about half of ocean freight rates. New methods of cargo handling alone can be helpful. Containerization — standardized boxes for general cargo — may work a miracle.

The new ships are larger and faster (tankers have pushed past 150,000 tons) and old, small ships are being jumboized in the shipyards. Assembly line methods — building "flights" of three to six ships at a time—could help cut construction costs. Adoption of gas-turbine engines similar to those used in jets might work. Surface-effect ships, using hydrofoils, may soon carry high-tariff cargo at 100 knots. The world's first nuclear merchant ship, Savannah, developed by Marad and the AEC, is now operating under charter to American Export Isbrandtsen. Further, the industry is seeking greater stability through diversification.

There are promises all along the line, but the bickering goes on and on. Somebody will be unhappy no matter what is done to and for the merchant marine. Everyone wants a stronger fleet, but what would that be, and how to obtain it? There is no question of the government's pulling out. It is only a question of what the government is willing to pay for.

In some respects, the problem is minuscule: only 40,000 men go to sea; only 50,000 work in shipyards, only 85,000 work as longshoremen. While the nation's total transportation bill runs to $126 billion, 20 per cent of the GNP, ocean transport costs only $1.4 billion. And the government puts up only $400 million. Yet the national interest is no easier to determine in the merchant marine microcosm than anywhere else where vested interests wrap themselves in the banners of national security. Ultimately, Nicholas Johnson and the others who demand value for the government dollar, who see that competition in the world market is essential and would be increased if available technology were exploited, if labor were less boisterous, if management were more efficient, will probably not prevail. Certainly not, if the tigers continue their senseless roaring.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

In Search of Edmund Wilson

EDMUND WILSON: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time. By Sherman Paul. University of Illinois Press. 237 pp. $5.75.

Frederick J. Hoffman

One of our most productive and most intelligent journalists, Edmund Wilson, has moved solidly through the 20th century, holding a mirror to its hopes, its treacheries and its follies. In Sherman Paul's spare, lean interpretation, Wilson comes to us largely through his published works. This is not a biography, but a search for a literary man in his literary results.

They are in some respects a disappointment. Paul has to give much space to mediocre performances like the novel, I Thought of Daisy (1929), and Wilson's plays of the 1920s, solely on the grounds that they yield evidence of Wilson's disposition toward his times. He therefore cannot legitimately judge whether the works were merely documents or works of art, or perhaps a little bit of each. Yet no one in our century has reacted so sensitively to contemporary history; and Paul may be forgiven for overstressing the evidence occasionally, if only because the total image is so engaging.

After having once met him, Zelda Fitzgerald is said to have described Wilson's face as "beautiful and bloodless." It was, and is, a serious, an intelligent face, and the mind behind it has always been inspired both by the memory of homes in the past and heroes in the present. In fact, Wilson seemed constantly to work in terms of two realities: that of the decisive mind imposing itself upon history, making society change and time move; and that of the rather less worthy and rather more mediocre life as he discovered it about him. Wilson tried to push an idealistic conception of our civilization, and occasionally —in his figures for Christian Gauss ("Civilization was his passion") and Norman Kemp Smith, he thought he had found the models for it. But generally his world is inhabited by little or inadequate persons, like the poetess Rita of I Thought of Daisy, and the falsely romantic Villagers of his early plays.

The great Wilson works are not literary, but personal extensions of history and biography. It has always seemed to me a little more than just that the 1920s should have closed out with the book Axel's Castle (1931), as the 1930s did with To the Finland Station (1940). The one summed up the essence of the "new literature" (though it is scarcely new now, as every schoolboy, at least in Berkeley, knows); the other communicated the excitement of history developing in a line toward direct action. Just what role Patriotic Gore (1962) will have by way of explaining Wilson's reaction to the events following the Second World War (he began writing it during the war), it is difficult to say. All these are major engagements with intellectual history. Axel's Castle is a remarkable product of sharp and sudden intelligence; and, though its conclusions are occasionally narrow-minded, its understanding of modern and even of contemporary literature is unusual and almost unique in its times. To the Finland Station is an act both of historiography and hero worship. Wilson's analyses of 19th-century historians and economists are fresh and extraordinarily intelligent; so that one reads the book for two purposes, to understand its subject and to understand its author. As for the latter, his idealistic views of the human intelligence, of the great, quiet, humble, but decisive mind that shapes society and reorders time are both early American and early 20th century in their nature.

He believed in human intelligence as perhaps no contemporary did; he practiced it also, more often than not, though he could be capable (in the preface to Patriotic Gore and elsewhere) of quibbling and of aimless wrath. To us, his contemporaries, his principal value lies in the many ways he has transferred the reality yielded by one discipline to the realities derived from others; he has been both a master synthesizer and a great dramatist of the meaning of present and recent past history. This reality it is the task of Sherman Paul to interpret to us. As in his other work (on Emerson, Thoreau and on Paul Rosenfeld), Paul has shown a remarkably vivid sense of the task before him, of its meaning and its dangers. There is no wasted space here, no attempt to inflate Wilson's value or to escalate his significance. If anything, the performance is a bit muted; one would like more facts, for example, more of the personal ambience that gave Wilson his very special role as a superior journalistic critic and integrator of our history.

The key phrase is "discordant encounters," the title of one of Wilson's earliest books (1926). This title, and his use of the human paradox in that volume, give us a sense of the curiously effective "dialectic" of contemporary history that Wilson provides in his work. Paul gives us an ample view of what the phrase means in Wilson's writings; from the beginning, there is a succession of awkward encounters between the ideal and the fumbling, awkward, even mean-spirited real. Wilson's writings sometimes take on the character of a disappointed romance with the ideal.

The Civil War is a turning point of sorts; and Wilson's acerbic treatment of its many aspects suggests a sense of reality that has gradually turned his idealism sour. Throughout his book Paul gives us a sense of the paradoxes, which began with the fact that Wilson as a boy in Red Bank, N. J., "felt the interior strain of the corrosive outside world," and the ambiguities deriving from the Jay Goulds being the Wilson neighbors. The very rich showed themselves disconcertingly irresponsible: and, as Paul says, something of the memory of those times returned to Wilson at the time of the First World War, and again later, during the years of "the Great Depression." He was always contrasting the irresponsibly privileged world with the intellectual hero. But in the Frederick J. Hoffman holds the chair of Distinguished Professor of English at the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee. His most recent book is The Mortal No: Death and the Modern Imagination (Princeton).

---

Winter in Vermont

Where is the green, the revolutionary?
What good can come of snow and slate?
Vermont or father what's my theme?
I eye the skin of a woodchuck
Left hanging on barbed wire.
A stream moves under a foot of ice
Like the last words of Henry Adams:
"My child keep me alive."

Stanley Moss

end (as we see again and again in the "discordant encounters" of Patriotic Gore), life did not offer up even so moderately complex or so easily comprehensible a set of evidence.

We are here presented with a man of great intelligence, engaging in a number of encounters with reality, as a journalist (in Vanity Fair, The New Republic, The New Yorker) and as a literary historian. Wilson's world was and is ours, the 20th century, in all its resplendence and its ambiguity. It is good to have the record given to us by so modest and so intelligent an interpreter as Sherman Paul.

To Die in New Mexico

TALES OF CIBOLA. By Ramón Sender. Translated by Florence Sender, Elinor Randall and Morse Manley. Las Américas Publishing Co. 383 pp. $5.

Oliver T. Myers

The end of the Spanish Civil War scattered over the world a whole generation of Spaniards, a near-perfect sampling of Spanish society. That generation of exiles is now almost gone, through death or absorption into the adopted culture or abandonment of exile and ideals. The exiles who are no longer refugees have succeeded in becoming naturalized at the cost of giving up something of their Spanishness. But some few could survive only by virtue of remaining Spaniards. A creative artist who draws on the common people of his homeland for inspiration is the one who loses the most by remaining abroad. A prominent Chilean novelist told me that if he spent more than a year or two away from home, his language, his thought, everything would be contaminated. A writer in exile shares the predicament of Antaeus held aloft by Hercules: his strength comes from the soil, yet he cannot touch it. Some writers adapt, changing their style or their language, or wind up writing for a tiny group of their fellows. Others continue to return to the soil through the spirit and find within themselves enough of the essence of national life, in this instance Spanishness, to thrive. Among the Spanish exiles, Ramón Sender is one of these.

After twenty-five years of exile, Sender is still one of Spain's best writers. In a sense, he represents a dead end. The younger school of novelists that sprang up after the war has taken off from a different starting point. Sender is continuing a tradition of the twenties and thirties. A new work of his gives one the feeling of reading a lost manuscript of a generation ago. Cela and Delibes, and the next younger group, such as Goytisolo, Matute, Aldecoa, are leading off into new directions, and it is from them that the novel of the future will emerge. Sender is the last of his line and gives us a glimpse of what Spain might have become had it not been for the war. (No postwar Sender has been published in Spain. Censorship is so arbitrary that a de luxe edition of Marx might be approved as too expensive for the masses—but that possibly a new edition of the Quixote might be turned down. Even Howard Fast now is printed in translation. See Libros nuevos for August, 1965).

The present collection contains six novellas and a short story from his Novelas ejemplares de Cíbola, plus two other tales. They are not about Spain; they are about Spanishness. The original title is suggestive not only of Cervantes but also of Unamuno and the medieval exempla. They are, in a broad sense, moral tales. They deal with faith and with death, but they are more reflective and less violent than much of his early work. The setting is the United States, but in the Spanish states of the Southwest, where the natives are Indians, Mexicans or New Mexicans, that is gringos who have become Hispanized. The outsiders are New Englanders or Germans or "An-

---

Oliver T. Myers teaches Spanish at the University of California (Davis). His articles and reviews have appeared in Hispanic Review, Modern Language Notes and other journals.

For 4 bucks you can live in Greenwich Village for a year!

Subscribe to The Village Voice and "Voila" you're in the Village. Not the Village that's bounded by 14th Street and two polluted rivers, but the Village that's a state of mind—alive, exciting, trendsetting. The Voice is read everywhere the worldly live. For $4 you get 52 weeks of grown up talk about art, music, books, politics. Feiffer cartoons; enlightening views of the Power Elite's dark side by Mary Perot Nichols; On, Off, and Off-Off B'way by Michael Smith; Andrew Sarris' reviews of movies "All America Will Flock To See;" Jonas Mekas on films they'll never hear about. And more. Make the big move to the Village. Subscribe now.

THE VILLAGE VOICE, Sheridan Square, New York 14, N.Y.
Okay. I'm convinced. I want the weekly newspaper that has become the house organ of the worldly people. Send me The Village Voice.
NAME________________
ADDRESS________________
CITY________ ZONE____ STATE______
$4/1YR. $7/2YRS. $10/3YRS. FOREIGN $5/1YR.
N 1/17

glo-Saxons" (the usual Spanish way of describing what ails us Americans). The outsiders are seen from the outside, and no matter how shrewd and pointed are the portrayals they are always external: only the Hispanos are probed beneath the surface. Somehow the non-Hispanized Americans remain caricatures; the sympathetic Americans are those who have settled psychologically into the life of the Southwest and accept its strangeness and violence.

The most perfectly realized figures in the collection are Father Zozobra and don Godofredo; the best told tale is that of Delgadina. But these are all Spanish characters and are moved by Spanish emotions. Delgadina's story is told against the background of folk ballad, in the ancient tradition of the Spanish Romance, lending a semi-legendary aura to the narrative; Sender has woven fragments of the ballad into the structure of the present as he did earlier in the Requiem for a Spanish Peasant and A Man's Place. Father Zozobra (the translation does not explain the significance of this nickname, which refers to his drunken staggering) failed as a martyr in the Orient and has now wound up as an alcoholic in a home for wayward priests. Purging his soul means immolating the flesh—alcoholic mortification does not suffice. It is his own soul that is his concern.

Godofredo, who entered the United States illegally as a wetback, cannot die until he recovers his identity. Death would not find him under his false name. The search for the real self also preoccupies John St. John, professor of Greek at a New England college, but what he finds is a grotesque parody of the Spanish male and this leads to his tragedy; he kills, senselessly, absurdly, in a blind fit of rage, jealousy, pride and pigheadedness, the Spanish emotions he has just discovered within himself. But it is difficult to believe fully in this person; Sender has not quite succeeded in convincing us. Father Zozobra and Godofredo are no less strange in their answers to life, but we believe in them because Sender knows them completely and has made us know them. One's soul is the only real thing in life, faith is the only road to salvation. The aim of life is learning how to die, that is to learn to live so that one may die as a man. This is Sender.

Ramón Sender is probably the most translated novelist of Spain today, one who has an immediate appeal to American readers, one whose style overcomes problems of translation. The present translations are adequate but not satisfactory. There are too many jarring notes, faults in style and errors that are not the author's. The reader will be slowed down at crucial points and will puzzle over minor obscurities that were crystal gems in the original. Spanish syntax comes through at times pointlessly, and some pages read like a literal first draft. What can we make of "more than one woman shrank to her navel," "Don't you mistreat them for me, because they have more lights than you have," "If you take them apart, neither marijuana nor wine do too much harm," "One of them had denounced a mine" (meaning staked a claim, a use documented in Webster's Third), "the guide lit a powerful reflector" (that is, spotlight)? A nonexistent Latin form Procustus, appears for Procrustes; Sender wrote Procusto, correct in Spanish usage. The Perfect Spouse is attributed to the wrong Fray Luis; the Spanish reader would know that it was not Granada but León. Interjections and slang are handled poorly; I've heard mequetrefe a lot more in Spanish than jackanapes in English. When someone exclaims, "The pest!," who would guess that what is meant is "damn" and not "he's a pill"? Sender wrote vientre (belly) and nalga (buttock), not the Victorian "abdominal region" and "most prominent part (of the pants)." Some critical omissions from the opening story, "Professor St. John Comes of Age," make less inevitable the gratuitous outburst of violence that marks the professor's "growing up." Sender is simply a better writer than may appear from these versions; he deserves more.

The Prisons of Apartheid

117 DAYS. By Ruth First. Stein and Day. 142 pp. $3.95.

NO EASY WALK TO FREEDOM. By Nelson Mandela. Edited by Ruth First. Basic Books. 189 pp. $4.95.

Hilda Kuper

It is easy to revile a country one does not love and in which one has not lived. Distance and strangeness contribute to freedom from responsibility. For many non-South Africans, South Africa provides a scapegoat on which to project righteous hatred of injustice without risk of involvement in action, or of rejection of childhood friends or members of the family; but for those who, over many long and troubled years, have had no other home, there is the anguish of ambivalent identification. Righteous hatred may be intensified, but no outside scapegoat is provided. The self alone can serve as sacrifice, and for that self-conscious self, the choice is hard—to suffer as immigrant or exile in a foreign land or to remain in danger of imprisonment, torture or death.

Ruth First, a South African-born white, and Nelson Mandela, son of a Tembu chief, committed themselves courageously and consistently to fight against apartheid; each became involved, through separate but interacting paths, in the liberation movement.

In South Africa, where a white minority monopolizes political power, dominates enterprises, controls education and backs its rules by physical force, color is the crucial identification. But it is always easy to oversimplify complexity into duality—to marshal black against white, and to interpret oppressed against oppressor in terms of racial opposition. The South African situation is not that simple; and from these two books the dialectic of the struggle emerges not as the fight between white and black but as the battle between those who affirm and those who deny racism, black or white, a struggle between the affirmation of human rights against the denial of a common humanity. In Africa the ultimate outcome of the struggle between black and white is numerically certain and predictable; the outcome of the deeper and more vital struggle, a struggle symbolized by the Firsts and the Mandelas, may continue even when the last white man has left the African continent. For this struggle has no fixed color line and no final index of victory. When one issue is won, others associated directly or indirectly with the principles it represents come to the fore and evoke action and counteraction. There is no utopia, only the striving toward it.

117 Days is the period Ruth First was kept in prison under the Ninety Days Act—an act passed by the

---

Hilda Kuper was born in South Africa and took degrees at Witwatersrand University and the London School of Economics. She is presently professor of Anthropology at the University of California. In addition to many books on anthropology she has written a novel, Bite of Hunger (Harcourt Brace & World).

(white) nationalist government under which virtually any person in the country may be imprisoned (euphemistically described as "detained") under no specific charge, no legal trial, no definite sentence. It does not even mean "ninety days;" at the moment of release the victim may be rearrested. It is a most powerful weapon of destruction, aimed at the spirit and heart of resistance. Locked alone in a cell, deprived of news or contact with the outside world, haunted by memories and imagination, the detainee is periodically subjected to the ordeal of interrogation. This may be supported by additional instruments of torture, and the actual tragic cases cited by Ruth First give proof that electric shock, beating and other acts of brutal violence take place in spite of public denial by apartheid officials.

The price of freedom is the betrayal of others. Some who knew little were detained as hostages; others, like Ruth First, were suspected of knowing "everything." After all, her husband, Joe Slovo, a prominent left-wing lawyer, had been equally if not more involved in public protest and public trials. And Joe could not be found. The police were armed with a full dossier of the Slovos' anti-apartheid activities. Ruth's greatest fear was that she should reveal more than the police already knew. Shortly before her arrest, an informer had led detectives to a house in Rivonia, a respectable white suburb of Johannesburg. A small meeting was in progress, and political figures long sought by the government were trapped with no escape. Numerous documents were also seized. The house was headquarters of the underground resistance. Shortly thereafter, Ruth First was arrested in her home.

With stark, almost documentary detail (a journalist by profession) she relates her own experiences and reaction: "For the first fifty-six days of my detention in solitary, I changed from a mainly vertical to a mainly horizontal creature. A black iron bedstead became my world." She marked days by sewing stitches on the lapel of her gown. She noted the pointless minutiae of prison routine, the characteristics of the warders, the sounds of people in cells. Her imprisonment became "an abandonment in protracted time."

She experienced a terrible need to speak to other human beings, and at the same time knew the danger if she responded to those who tried to make her speak. It is difficult to know one's "cracking point." The detectives promised that if she made her "statement," she would be "free." She agreed to speak, and tried to tell nothing. She evoked the exasperated comment: "It's a funny thing, isn't it . . . but every name you've given us is the name of someone who has left the country." She does not know why they released her at last. Perhaps by that time they had learned from others what they wanted to hear. "When they left me in my own house at last, I was convinced that it was not the end, and that they would come again," the author reports.

The book moves beyond the autobiographical to a hauntingly terrifying and yet sometimes tantalizingly incomplete account of many people, some referred to by name, others by initial, linked together in a tangled web of political events. The reader who is not familiar with the complexities may sometimes be bewildered and lost; even those who know it feel it as a Kafkaish nightmare.

In England now with her husband and children, Ruth First has edited the articles and speeches of Nelson Mandela, who is still in prison.

The Mandela volume spans ten crucial years, 1953-63. In this period of steadily mounting oppression and persecution Mandela led the nonviolent Defiance Campaign against unjust laws and founded the underground resistance movement, Umkonto we Sizwe (Spear of the Nation). The opening article, "No Easy Walk to Freedom," was Mandela's presidential speech to the African National Congress. Banned from attending public gatherings, he could not deliver the speech in person. The last article is his powerful and moving statement as "First Accused" in the Rivonia trial. Throughout, he appears as a man of courage and deep integrity, a tragic and noble figure.

He was trained as a lawyer and his profession provided daily evidence of the effects of apartheid on his people. In several moving passages he voices the African need, and demand, for land, education, security and equality. With penetrating insight he exposes the hypocrisy of government promises, rejects the tribalism of the Verwoerd regime, and analyzes the policy behind Bantustans as a "grim programme of mass evictions, political persecution, and police terror."

In 1956, the government initiated its notorious treason trial against Nelson Mandela and 156 others, among whom were the two Slovos. The trial ended after four and a half years, during which time there was the shooting at Sharpeville. Much of the record of the trial is the cross-examination of Mandela who, when the team of lawyers withdrew, was elected spokesman for his fellow prisoners. All were found "Not guilty and discharged," but acquittal did not mean freedom. Raids and humiliation persisted. Opposition groups, including the African National Congress were branded illegal; but an illegal leadership continued. Despite government mobilization of the army and police, a general strike was executed with some success. Mandela, in a detailed analysis reprinted here in full, shows how the strike marked a turning point in African political tactics. "Even up to the present day the question that is being asked with monotonous regularity up and down the country is this: Is it politically correct to continue preaching peace and nonviolence when dealing with a government whose barbaric practices have brought so much suffering and misery to Africans? With equal monotony the question is posed: Have we not closed a chapter on this question?" Shortly after, on South African Freedom Day, June 26, he concluded: "A Letter from Underground": "I will not leave South Africa, nor will I surrender. Only through hardship, sacrifice, and militant action can freedom be won. The struggle is my life.

In the new bi-monthly

DISSENT

A vivid and disturbing first-hand report:

The Destruction of Conscience in Vietnam!

by Marshall Sahlins

Prof. Sahlins, a distinguished anthropologist, visited Vietnam representing the university teach-in movement. His 27-page account describes how U.S. military-political tactics copy, or parody, those of the Communists.

•

In the Jan.-Feb./1966 issue of Dissent. Send 90c (includes postage) for your copy.

DISSENT, 509 Fifth Ave., New York 17

Name ....

Street ....

City ....

State .... Zip Code ....

(N)

I will continue fighting for freedom until the end of my days."

During a surprise appearance at the Addis Ababa conference in 1962, he delivered to the members of the Pan African Freedom Movement the speech, "A Land Ruled by the Gun." On his return he intensified his underground activities. But after seventeen months of hiding, the "Black Pimpernel" was caught, thrown into prison, and charged with inciting African workers to strike, and with leaving South Africa without a valid travel document. His speech at the trial, published under the heading "Black Man in a White Court," is both a scathing indictment of white domination and a clear restatement of his own nonracial values. ". . . in the course of this application I am frequently going to refer to the white man and the white people. I want at once to make it clear that I am no racialist, and I detest racialism, because I regard it as a barbaric thing, whether it comes from a black man or from a white man."

Mandela was found guilty. After he began serving his five-year prison sentence, police raided the house in Rivonia. Mandela was taken from his cell, and with the men arrested at the meeting, charged with sabotage and a conspiracy to overthrow the government by revolution. When Mandela opened the defense case he admitted that he was one of the persons who helped form Umkonto we Sizwe, but his impressive and sincere speech is not that of a man who enjoyed violence, but of one driven to violence as the last resort. "During my lifetime I have dedicated myself to this struggle of the African people. I have fought against white domination and I have fought against black domination. I have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society in which all persons live together in harmony and with equal opportunities. It is an ideal which I hope to live for and to achieve. But if need be, it is an ideal for which I am prepared to die." Of the nine accused, eight (six Africans, an Indian and a white) were found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment. Ruth First records: "They stood erect to hear the sentence and when it was passed they turned in a body to the packed court, smiled and waved their arms. . . . As he was driven away under heavy guard, Mandela gave the thumbs-up 'Afrika' salute of the African National Congress."

Within the border of the Republic of South Africa, resistance has been driven ever deeper underground. A few leaders wanted by the police are still alive and active, but overt opposition has been destroyed. Lawyers, teachers, ministers, factory workers, trade unionists, liberals and radicals have been exiled, banished, banned, imprisoned. Their voices cannot be heard, and they are prevented from hearing the voices of others. Books in which great men expressed noble ideals throughout the ages are prohibited; to publish the words of any person who is or has been banned is a criminal offense. Criticism is communism; thought is sabotage. South Africa has become a vast and terrifying prison.

117 Days and No Easy Walk to Freedom are powerful and dramatic books, voicing an eloquent and disturbing appeal to those who are outside South Africa to understand the nature and the tragedy of apartheid.

Stitches in a Wound

AFRICAN STORIES. By Doris Lessing. Simon & Schuster. 636 pp. $7.95.

Mary Ellmann

As political and social evidence, Doris Lessing's African Stories confirm in precise and painful detail, like stitches in a wound, the abuse of the native population of Southern Rhodesia by the white settlers of British descent. To bring these stories together for the first time, when they have been dispersed over many years of writing, has a retrospective effect, summing up Mrs. Lessing's permanent image of the colonials: as fat, white, motionless grubs absorbing nourishment from an immense and ceaseless black exertion beneath them. Helpless without African labor in every corner of their lives, the colonials, in managing to extort that labor, experience sensations of independence and power. They grow as reluctant to leave as to stay in Rhodesia. Their vanity and complacence are marred only by their terror of rebellion.

Yet to the American reader, even this explicit statement of racial injustice in the stories seems a fantastic version of the familiar. The defensive sophistries ("Their stomachs aren't like ours"), the repressive pseudo-legalities, the passive contempt ("What can you expect?") of the Rhodesian settler are those of the American segregationist. We recognize, as in the semantic shifts of a nightmare, that the cheeky native is the uppity nigger, the white kaffir is the nigger lover, the Afrikaaners are, for the British, the poor whites. And there are further reaches of similarity in the stories: it is as though our own national guilts had swirled, in erosive release, half around the world, to settle again in new but still too recognizable patterns. As the natives, those from whom the country has been taken, the Rhodesians (in "The Old Chief Mshlanga") are like the American Indians, while as the blacks, from whom labor has been taken, they reflect the American Negroes.

In describing the first, the taking of the country, the stories are disturbing for an American too in their evocation of a second pioneer period. Doris Lessing's work is an uninterrupted study of loneliness, but here it is particularly the isolation of a few white exiles, claiming vast strange land. By daylight the men hope to exploit its fertility, the women to remake tiny plots into nostalgic postcard pictures of Home. But at night both are intimidated by the same country they may eventually subdue. So, almost comically, in all the stories, the whites, who think of themselves as warders, live like prisoners. Huddled, nervous, wary of an alien vegetation and an alien skin, they are deprived, as they would be in jail, of the privacies and subtleties they enjoyed in tiny, crowded England. Even their adulteries, as in "Old John's Place," must be cramped and audible, the invariable third stage of the colonial get-together. The more widely their control spreads, the more tightly the masters restrict their own freedom. Mrs. Lessing dwells — as she says in her preface, with "bile"— upon their self-encasements: their two-roomed, tin-roofed brick houses (fending off all seasons), their barred windows (fending off robbery and murder by those whom they have robbed and beaten), their screens (fending off exotic diseases) and, always, outdoors, their hats (fending off that most un-English sun). Even the eyes of the men, the last aperture through which the black might approach the white, are squinted almost shut. The women nurse headaches in darkened rooms or take solitary, errandless walks. Relieved by Africans of all the household chores except introspection, they circumnavigate

---

Mary Ellmann is currently preparing a book about women novelists for Harcourt, Brace & World. Her articles on fiction have appeared in Commentary.

their geranium beds, asking themselves, "Who am I?"

There must be some gratification, then, for the Rhodesian nationalist in Mrs. Lessing's wry indictment of the white minority. But the nationalist is bound to want more than the moral degeneration of the colonialist; he is concerned with the restitution of native rights. For this purpose, the stories are more tortuous than explicit. Only one, "Hunger," is the sort of Marxist chronicle of the ideological rescue of the oppressed, which a politician might order from a writer. And such straight-faced hope is, for Mrs. Lessing, a literary accident. In general, her dramatic assumptions of naïveté do not produce her best stories. The observation of adult vagaries through little-white-girl eyes is skillful; though inevitably, after so many members of the wedding, its technique is somewhat obtrusive. And for Mrs. Lessing to think and speak as the primitive, in "Hunger" and "The Pig," is a waste. Her excellence is the ambivalence of the "civilized" (a word she dislikes), the analytic, even, in a high sense, the displaced mind, and to repress that in order to assume a simple, native consciousness is to fall into incredibility.

Mrs. Lessing is fond of her story "The Pig" because its style is not "feminine," but "straight, broad, direct." But this seems an envy, like Yeats's, of the spontaneous and instinctive by a writer who feels as much plagued as blessed by self-consciousness. The better stories are not those of the native, but those of the outsider, whose perceptions of the country, however sharp, are also oblique. The better subjects are two varieties of spectator: the resident, even from birth, of a country which never becomes quite his, and the new arrival. A paradigm of the second is "A Home for the Highland Cattle" in which an Englishwoman stands behind her curtains to overhear, with shock and envy and amusement, the houseboys' talk in the yard. The social, the placed, are outdoors, and indoors the individual longing to know and listening to understand.

For her first thirty years, while she thought of going to England, Doris Lessing seems to have listened to Southern Rhodesia as no other writer has been able to do. It remained, even after she had left it, all nature to her. As one associates her English work with flats and offices, one associates the African stories with swollen suns and moons, head-tall grass, and the secret constant stirring of animal

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

RUSSIA AT WAR

by Alexander Werth. 1,100 pp. Avon Publications. Paperback Edition, list price $1.65.

A classic of war reporting by the distinguished European correspondent of The Nation which was on the best seller list for weeks on first publication.

"... an extraordinary book, one of the most important books yet written about World War II and certainly the most important yet written about the Russian-German War."
—Orville Prescott, New York Times

"There is no book in any language with which to compare Alexander Werth's monumental but exceedingly readable and controversial history of the Nazi-Soviet war, that four-year struggle in the East which, in the words of Churchill, 'tore the guts out of the German Army.'"
—Joseph Barnes, Life

"The best book we probably shall ever have in English on Russia at war."
—William L. Shirer

"Monumental and absorbing ... an epic work that will fascinate the ordinary reader."
—Harry Schwartz, Saturday Review

"A valuable book which illuminates the behavior of Russia at war ... vivid ... dramatic."
—Merle Fainsod, Book Week

For your FREE copy of RUSSIA AT WAR, fill out the subscription coupon below and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of RUSSIA AT WAR.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $5
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....
1-17-66

life—her first novel about Africa was called The Grass Is Singing. Africa is for her not only a society in which the white people use their exile like a weapon against the black; but also a place, supporting both white and black, which endlessly enacts the conflict of forms, the effort of every living thing, at the cost of other living things, to achieve what is right for itself, its sustenance and continuation. Africa, not England, impressed the knowledge of necessary cruelty. In "Sunrise on the Veld" a boy watches battalions of ants carry off pink flesh bits of a screaming buck. Ants invade the metaphor of pubescent, ripening flesh, the pomegranate, in "Flavours of Exile." It is disconcerting, in fact, to come so repeatedly upon instances of anarchic hunger, the form of whose seeming formlessness is painful to trace, within stories of straightforward, even old-fashioned, organization. It is this preoccupation with a necessity, which in moral terms can seem a criminal chaos, that disrupts conventional literary form in The Golden Notebook.

The possibilities of human interventive pity are limited. In "A Letter from Home" a beetle impaled on a thorn wriggles free to fall on its back on the ground. A man impales it once more, fitting the thorn carefully back into the original puncture of the stomach, as he explains that in this way he rescues the beetle from the ants. But anger is irrelevant too. In "A Mild Attack of Locusts," after a swarm has destroyed a farm, the farmer compliments one locust on the strength of its legs and opens the door to let it fly off. In the face of natural cruelty, the stories insist upon a "resignation of knowledge," in much the way that the novel Retreat to Innocence insists upon a full knowledge of historical cruelty. So educated, the white settler is advised, at the least, to cultivate his own garden with "shrewd ironic patience." He works under an inhibitive weight, the recognition of a surrounding reluctance, which can be brushed (in "The Story of Two Dogs") with the tameness of love but which reverts easily to the wildness of killing. The settler's error, nonetheless, is the failure to honor the illusion of distinction between natural and human life. Irony lies in the simultaneous sense of illusion and the determination to maintain it. The settler who turns his gold mine into an ant heap, his African laborers into its scurrying ants, imitates a nature which, even without imitation, must always encroach upon human settlements, and must always, with each new season and new birth, be pressed back by the makeshift and surprisingly fragile devices of justice.

It seems an ironic grace in turn that, at the most inept moment of English relations with Southern Rhodesia, a writer who is English as well as Rhodesian should speak with so much talent to the point.

Robes of the Gods

For Stefan Hirsch, 1899-1964
(after his painting, "Robes of the Gods")

As the wind discovers itself through fields of thistle, buckwheat, great ragweed, like a carefree boy, blowing his whistle out of a seed, split, so the gods use us.
This painting,
garments racked on a line like gaudy, hung-up slabs of beef, knows this; the gods, a hum throughout, dress up in brave and bloody carcasses.
Still, sly
as they are, loving to lie low, showing off — a few of us their special finery — only when they will, they don the crowd for daily wear:
jeans, worsteds,
uniforms. But changes they propose here too, from shrill mad children, newly dipped, skipping in and out, designs-to-be,
to sots, hags, beggars,
patches stitched into a motley. And the fitting wardrobe inbetween, when, stript to nothing but a shiny skein, a complex network of taut veins,
lovers set off Mars
and Venus, wrapt in one another's arms; like a battlefield, in the rough and tumble of a naked bed, the lightning flashes then, rain, shuddering.
Attached to reels we cannot see, impulsive robes which, brooding, breed, we feel the tugging:
moods our own, yet struggled through us, rugged, violent.
And strange,
affecting wills that much as not resent,
and would resist, those powers filling them, resent with horror greedy blotches and the rips
the body must sustain that very moment wills are all knit up to forward them. By Jove, by God, by bowels and wounds that Jesus bound him in, what is this
most outrageous dress, this breath that we spin out, in which we're spun, this blundering flesh and blood by which we, living, die, that must at last be thrown away with us?
And yet at times, though days yearlong they seem to cast us off, cast into darkest corners of a suffocating closet, something stirs
as though we, nodding, had snagged us to a god passing; in a steadfast wind, like hides I once saw drying, golden-airy, in a Pisan sun, he takes us up.
Even as they, riot-
hearted, drag us, busy muck the highway, into bedlam, its engrossing frolics enough to crack our seams, a joy bursts forth that's nameless, whole, inexplicable.
And as they shine through us, like rags, like slubbered stuff the fire, taking, flourishes, we shine; through tears and blood we, whirling, shine.

Theodore Weiss

Nabokov As Novice

THE EYE. By Vladimir Nabokov. Trident Press/Phaedra Press. 114 pp. $4.50.

Stephen Koch

There aren't many surprises in The Eye, Nabokov's first novel (written in Russian in 1930), beyond the mild jolt of reading it as if it were new, now that its freshness and promise have been so thoroughly fulfilled. Though obviously germinal Nabokov, its faults are not those of the master but of the novice, and for that reason it hardly seems like Nabokov at all. The Eye—proud, elegant, unapologetic—forced one principally to appreciate the tenacious ingenuity with which Nabokov has developed his rather limited idea of fiction.

Thus far, Lolita and Pale Fire remain the most extraordinary books Nabokov has written, and with the exception of his Gogolesque study in surrealistic terror and comedy, Invitation to a Beheading (translated in 1959), they humiliatingly outdistance his other works. Nabokov is one of the few modern authors whose novels are all facets of an oeuvre, an extended literary project. But I doubt that he will be remembered for this project. Despite his great verbal gifts, his merely conventionally excellent works immediately reveal their trivial, antiquated forms. Finally, Nabokov's is a virtuoso, rather than original, genius. His greatness lies in certain spectacular manipulations of conventional, even reactionary, ideas.

All Nabokov's work is gripped by a tension between modernity and nostalgia; this seeker of the timeless must be located historically. In a now famous review of Nathalie Sarraute's Portrait d'un inconnu, Sartre named as a modern phenomenon a certain formal self-consciousness in Nabokov, Waugh and Sarraute herself, which adopts a wholly negative attitude toward such hoary, time-tested fictional concerns as psychology, the force of social convention, moral or thematic truth, and the like. Demoted from their eminence as the novel's subject, these became its techniques or, better, its devices, while the subject becomes fiction itself. Sartre is at least partly right: Nabokov's recurrent theme is self-consciousness, and not the homely process of self-examination so much as sensitivity to the implications of the narrative act—an awareness of what it means to re-create the world. The novel as art (understood as poetry, love, immortality, self-discovery) becomes the theme of the novel. It reflects on itself.

But formal self-awareness is nothing new, even in the novel, though the naturalistic tradition makes aesthetic naïveté seem, to some, a virtue. An entirely different problem complicates Nabokov's relation to his own time.

Nabokov has found in his own life the model for a literary convention—and an extremely conventional convention, at that—which governs all his activity. From his beginnings as a young Russian émigré, he has indulged the rigidly formulated, 19th-century romantic nostalgia that sees the poet as one at war with reality and his own time, who lives in exile, who speaks in a tongue too beautiful and too much his own for others to understand. This idea, lying at the heart of the 19th-century's pathos, is Nabokov's pretext for both his extraordinary wit and his "poetry"—those ingenious moments of lyric ecstasy in his books which we are to take as absolutely authentic transcendence. For Nabokov himself, this convention and fact have bisected each other with such horrible precision that one might expect his treatment of it to be painfully solemn. But strangely enough, he is almost never solemn; he overplays the formula in the name of comedy (flattening, for example, American social reality to make it seem even more intractable and Philistine than it is) while he undermines the lyric tendency with perversion, vulgarity, simple-mindedness. Though he still dreams of its overreaching ecstasy (and seems to attain it) Nabokov has shifted the romantic agony into the realm of wit.

Nabokov's major devices: his style; his propensity for allusion and metaphor; his inevitable bifurcation of the narrator are all devices for ambivalence. Even in The Eye, where they are behind not wit but a polished and extended joke, such devices are meant to dissolve the moralizing solemnity the "real" is supposed to invoke. Humiliated by the outraged husband of his mistress, a fumbling Russian émigré tries to shoot himself, wakes up in a hospital, and believes himself his own ghost. Within this ethereal liberation, free to think of himself as an object, he becomes fascinated by the mystery of another, flesh-and-blood man who turns out, of course, to be himself.

> Ever since the shot—the shot which, in my opinion, had been fatal—I had observed myself with curiosity instead of sympathy, and my painful past—before the shot—was now foreign to me. . . . In respect to myself, I was now an onlooker. My belief in the phantomatic nature of my existence entitled me to certain amusements.

But all this is Nabokov in theory alone. However conceived, fragmenting the narrator's identity must be upheld by a style to succeed. In place of a style, The Eye has a clean, graceful manner which contributes nothing to the book. The wit of the later works does serve a purpose; it bases itself on the more profound ambivalences being developed by turning on itself, becoming aware of itself as the work

---

Stephen Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

words

If words interest you, first buy a good dictionary. Then buy a good Roget.
We don't publish dictionaries.
We publish the BEST Roget. 1405 pp.

THE ORIGINAL
Roget's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases
Americanized for the first time.
Plain $6.95
Thumb Indexed $7.95
ST. MARTIN'S • New York

Philosophy of STYLE
by Herbert Spencer
The
by Allan Poe

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

SUMMERLANE CAMP

in the tradition of

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

•

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

•

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

of a poet who, in the name of beauty, is cheating reality with words.

The attitude toward words is the decisive issue in Nabokov's art: it underlies his romance, and it underlies his modernist irony. Nabokov the romantic nostalgist wants to re-create reality and evoke traditional beauty in the fumes of language. Nabokov the ironist and wit ("Lolita, light of my life, fire of my loins. My sin, my soul") uses words to laugh at themselves in recognition of how questionable this process is. But even drenched in wit, Nabokov finally insists upon recouping the losses the poet has suffered under modernism. Thus, Humbert does finally "share" an "immortality" with Dolly: he completes his creative act by renouncing her and freeing her for the realm of art—a realm which, even at this late date, Nabokov wants to exist in pathetic relation to facts. An absolutely standard, creakingly archaic pathos over the artist as outcast, the beloved as lost, stops the irony with a tragic overtone.

This entire convention is now so exhausted and suspect that Nabokov is forced to treat it as the pretext for wit. Yet, his commitment to it is that of an unflinching traditionalist. More than anything else, he wants its ecstasy to be real. The actual conflict in Nabokov is not between the poet and reality, but between the ironic novelist and the ecstatic poet. The latter, who is the hidden genius of all his work, must see his timeless vision as rendering temporal reality inauthentic. But the novelist who bases his art on a conflict between imagination and fact can never wholly discredit the durability of fact. Nabokov resolves this contradiction through a sly subversion. Reality is undermined with wit, and poetry triumphs.

Yet, such poetry claims to derive its value from a novelistic conflict that does not really exist. Nabokov is perfectly aware of this, and it doesn't trouble him in the least. True to the most advanced insights into the substitution of formal manipulations for mimetics, Nabokov feels no obligation to make his situation felt as life might be felt. "Art is free," he seems to say. "If my poetry is there, it's there." But the thrill of Lolita's Liebestod or the more abstract aesthetics of Pale Fire rather resembles the frisson of bumping into Napoleon in a waxworks. It is astoundingly convincing perhaps, but there is something vulgar in trying to make a lost, glorious past look so real.

Whereas Nabokov has been unable to resurrect the true grandeur of his convention, the aspiration to do so undoubtedly saves his work from the flashiness and vulgarity that repeatedly threatens it. On the other hand, his wit and the stunning ingenuity of his formal devices (particularly in Pale Fire) easily surpass those of any other novelist now writing in English. But his literary virtues gnaw at one another, undermine one another, and tend to become the vices of gratuitous verbal display and ersatz transcendence. Nabokov defends his own work on the basis of a narrow hedonism, the "aesthetic bliss" his work provides. But this is not enough for the great and antiquated form of human nobility he has adopted, which resolves itself beyond hedonism. Somewhere he is aware of this—perhaps it underlies the truculence of his public position and the extreme, virtually metaphysical importance he attaches to his work. The anti-novelist in him is willing to examine the romantic idea in the light of cruel irony. But the aristocratic émigré who lingers over Pushkin will not tolerate the slightest suspicion of its final value. Nabokov's "bliss" is not self-contained or serene. It is not even elevated. It is intensely hortatory, virulently nostalgic. The greatest traditionalist now writing in English stands on modern literature's shakiest ground.

THEATRE

Harold Clurman

MARAT/SADE

Everyone should be grateful to the Royal Shakespeare Company of London for bringing its production under Peter Brook's direction of Peter Weiss's The Persecution and Assassination of Marat as Performed by the Inmates of the Asylum of Charenton under the Direction of the Marquis de Sade to the Martin Beck Theatre. Whether or not you are going to like it, you ought to see it. For when all is said and done—and much is done and said through the hubbub of the performance—the production is a fascinating entertainment. For scrupulous care in make-up, for subtlety in costuming, for ingenuity in dealing with movement, for the feeling of novelty throughout, New York has not seen the like in a long time. We witness here what a well-organized repertory theatre of talented players and leaders can accomplish.

In last week's issue I observed how certain people, having seen a "shocking" play, remark first of all that it is "well written." In like manner, much of the talk during the intermission of Marat/Sade centered on Peter Brook's "use of space." It is indeed brilliant. So is Richard Peaslee's incidental music. Even more persuasively theatrical are the sound effects—for example, the employment of the wooden platforms as "drums," to be struck by whatever objects are available to the actors. Breughel, Bosch, Goya have provided models for the visual aspect of various figures. There is a memorable grouping in which the actors' faces alone are seen, their bodies being submerged beneath the stage floor. The impression is that of a heap of severed heads tossed helter-skelter on the ground. There is witty business to match the playfulness of the text, such as the pouring of red paint from a pail to indicate the shedding of the people's blood, changed to blue when the aristocrats' blood is spilled, and then to milky white when Marat finally succumbs to Corday's murderous knife.

More impressive perhaps than all this is the actors' zeal, their unrelenting concentration and byplay so that nothing on the stage is allowed to become static or to fall out of line. Even the musicians in the side boxes participate in pantomime. Voices are resonant, diction is admirable, though I could not always make out the words of the ensemble singing.

The kind of acting demanded, though physically strenuous, is of the simplest sort, requiring attitudes and postures rather than intimate emotional transfiguration. The well-managed trick for most of the cast is to show that the "actors" of the play they are presenting at Charenton are syphilitics, spastics, catatonics, schizophrenics, paranoiacs, manic depressives or otherwise debilitated persons, none of them consistently able to remember the script's lines or to keep within the confines of the author's (de Sade's) scenic scheme. The team work is exemplary.

Of the individuals in the excellent company, Ian Richardson as Marat, Patrick Magee as de Sade, Robert Lloyd as the fanatic Jacques Roux, John Steiner as an aristocrat afflicted with satyriasis, Susan Williamson as Marat's ever faithful mistress, Simonne Evrard, Michael Williams as the Herald (master of ceremonies) deserve special mention though my particular favorite, an actress of insidious attractiveness, is Glenda Jackson as Charlotte Corday.

Apart from noting "the use of space," the professionally oriented playgoer may speak of Brecht and "alienation" or of Artaud's "theatre of cruelty." The production is punctuated by frenzied paroxysms, as the text is replete with images of extreme violence. There is also—and this is not as noticeable in an English translation as it would be in the original German—a good deal of expressionist hysteria (abhorred by Brecht), a kind of roaring and macabre lyricism.

It should be noted in regard to influences, which though they have a certain interest do not affect the heart of the matter, that while many of Brecht's devices are employed—the most salient being the use of remote historical material to make topical points—certain elements in the production, almost baroque in their profusion and nerve-racking in their intended impact, are antithetical to Brecht. It should also be said, of a production in which the staging very nearly swallows the script, that Weiss's text might be produced with less emphasis on the hectic and bizarre, and that the insanity of the characters need not have been rendered with as much graphic distortion as Brook has employed. In that case although the results would not be quite so showy, we might more readily discern what Weiss had in mind.

What is certainly untrue, as some have intimated, is that there is no play, no meaning or message in Weiss's writing. Here we come to the question of the evening's real worth, of which discussion limited to its stage excitement is actually an evasion. (Do you go to the theatre to enjoy "the use of space"?) In Germany where it was first produced Marat/Sade was pre-eminently a political play. (To be sure it also reveals Weiss as a master of the theatrical medium, quite apart from Brook's contribution.) It is a particularly German political play though its author lives in Sweden and stresses his internationalism. There is a reference to the "Final Solution" (the Nazi extermination of the Jews), but the issues raised extend beyond such history. Even allusions to "wars whose weapons rapidly developed by servile scientists will become more and more deadly until they can with a flick of a finger tear a million of you to pieces" are not of the utmost moment here.

Marat/Sade is a debate within its author's spirit. The political issue which gave rise to it is the division of Germany (and the rest of Europe) into capitalist and Socialist camps. In this play Weiss stands between the two camps. He sees fascism beaten and capitalism still oppressively hypocritical. He sees an apparently victorious socialism lead to a crippling conformity. His skepticism turns to bitterness; anxiety to despair. Man is a destructive beast as Weiss's de Sade (who arrives at his sadism through masochism) says; the people still demand a revolution which will realize the everlasting dream of peace, plenty, freedom of conscience and expression.

Again and again, as the songs in Marat/Sade voicing this dream are turned into satires, Weiss mocks the idea that any political action can end oppression. All determined struggle in this direction, he seems to be saying, the promises of all social, cultural and religious institutions, end in betrayal. Remember that all the central characters in the play—including the most articulate, the ultraradical Marat and the mortified de Sade—are demented, their world a madhouse.

Weiss does not make the Marat/Sade duel a one-sided affair. He tosses and turns in indecision. The final lines of the play are Roux's outcry, "When will you learn to see, when will you learn to take sides?," an outcry stifled by the People's trancelike march and shouts. Yes, one must take sides but isn't there something futile, Weiss infers, in it all? To which, Weiss or Brook has appended an ironically facetious speech telling us that we can compose our own moral, draw our own conclusions, from the proceedings.

That I am not wholly mistaken in my interpretation I call Weiss himself (apart from his text) in evidence. He has recently announced that since the writing of Marat/Sade he has changed his attitude, he has decided to take sides: he has become a Socialist. But for the playgoer or the critic it is perhaps not initially imperative to declare oneself on the validity of Weiss's position in this play but simply to recognize that the play aims to illustrate the anguish of decision, the gravity of the human problem involved: that social change always entails the possibility of sanguinary upheaval—a price too terrible to pay in view of man's disposition to turn the most high-minded enterprises to mediocrity, and in the end to perpetuate injustice.

Yet I left the theatre unmoved, almost indifferent. (I was reminded of Tolstoy's quip about Andreyev: "He wants to frighten me, but I'm not scared.") I am moved by the "coolness" of the Berliner Ensemble in Brecht's Mother Courage. In like manner I am truly concerned about Galileo's dilemma in the same author's account of it. With Marat/Sade I am left only with a sense of an adult entertainment—surely a precious boon these days—rather than stirred by any vitalizing thought or feeling about the play's subject matter, ostensibly of crucial importance.

It is true that when Coulmier, the asylum's supervisor, jumps up to intervene—after Roux has shouted, "Once and for all the idea of glorious victories won by the glorious army must be wiped out. Neither side is glorious"—with the admonition, "This is outright pacifism. At this very moment our soldiers are laying down their lives for the freedom of the world and of our world," the audience applauds (and how delighted many of us are that it does) in recognition of the attack upon a contemporary parallel. Still, I venture to say that it is not really engaged in the play's theme, never truly disturbed by the cardinal question raised, or stimulated to search itself for an answer. LeRoi Jones's savagery (another sort of

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 1-17-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY ....

STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

"theatre of cruelty") appalls us. Marat/Sade converts all our political and intellectual concern into display, an artful fun house, a magnificent toy. It is distinguished decoration, first-class theatrical "salesmanship."

Whether or not this is due in part to the sort of brilliant direction Brook has given the play, the fact remains that most of the text, though cleverly or cutely phrased in deliberate doggerel or near verse, is trite. There are long passages popularizing primary existentialist pronouncements as understood in cafés, and often reduced, despite Germanic vehemence, to a facile pessimism very comforting at bottom to the presumably despised bourgeoisie.

Since Marat/Sade is a dramatization of political inconclusiveness or nihilism, a position which many smart folk nowadays equate with true wisdom, I shall set down my own sentiments in regard to the misgivings which the play enunciates.

Yes: the French Revolution was followed by Napoleon's autocracy, the hopes of the early Russian revolutionaries were mangled into Stalinism, the war against Hitler has brought Germany, France and Italy to various degrees of stultifying complacency. History offers no guarantees. If pressed hard enough, men will assert their livingness to the point of bloodshed to achieve what they deem to be a better life. Man moves and sometimes fights because he is man and wants to make a world according to his material and spiritual needs. This is an impulse, if you will, a fact of nature, to which I say "yea"—no matter how often history appears to negate man's efforts. One does not even have to believe in Progress to assent to and justify the never-ending struggle. As long as there are creatures on earth more sentient than computers, men will, because they must, make choices, and they will not be deterred by what wiseacres in the future may decide as to the sagacity of these choices. When asked, "Is life worth living?," Samuel Butler answered: "That is a question for a foetus not for a man." To despair because man's extreme efforts to modify conditions of social injury or physical misery frequently result in new humiliations is to be either an intellectual sissy or a moral coward.

The best compliment I can tender Marat/Sade is that it has provoked me to this declaration. And if anyone objects that in approaching the play in this manner I have exceeded the bounds of the "trade," that is, gone beyond the theatre, I must once again affirm that unless theatre and theatre criticism do this they both become paltry and inconsequential. "He knows no drama who only drama knows."

MUSIC

5-WEEK COURSE
CONCERTINA
— Amazing Results In Short Time —
Concertina Rented For Course
MATUSEWITCH ASSOCIATES
1697 Broadway (53rd) CI 7-0919

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS – Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 569 Hudson Street, New York 14. PSC 709

PERSONALS

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons. $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, [illegible] Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

UTOPIAN COMMUNITY being planned, inspired by Skinner's book, Walden Two. Write: Gerald Baker, Box 271, Cass Lake, Minnesota

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N. Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

FILMS

Robert Hatch

THE SPY WHO CAME IN FROM THE COLD

The Spy Who Came in From the Cold is endowed with the best thriller script since, let's say, The 39 Steps—John Le Carré in his own very different style being the peer of John Buchan at spider webs. Given half a chance, then, the picture is bound to rise out of the detergent bubbles of contemporary film traffic. It gets that half chance and is as good entertainment as you can find on the screen this month. The pity is that it wasn't given the production it deserved, in which case we might have had a film for the museum archives and the late, late shows of twenty years hence.

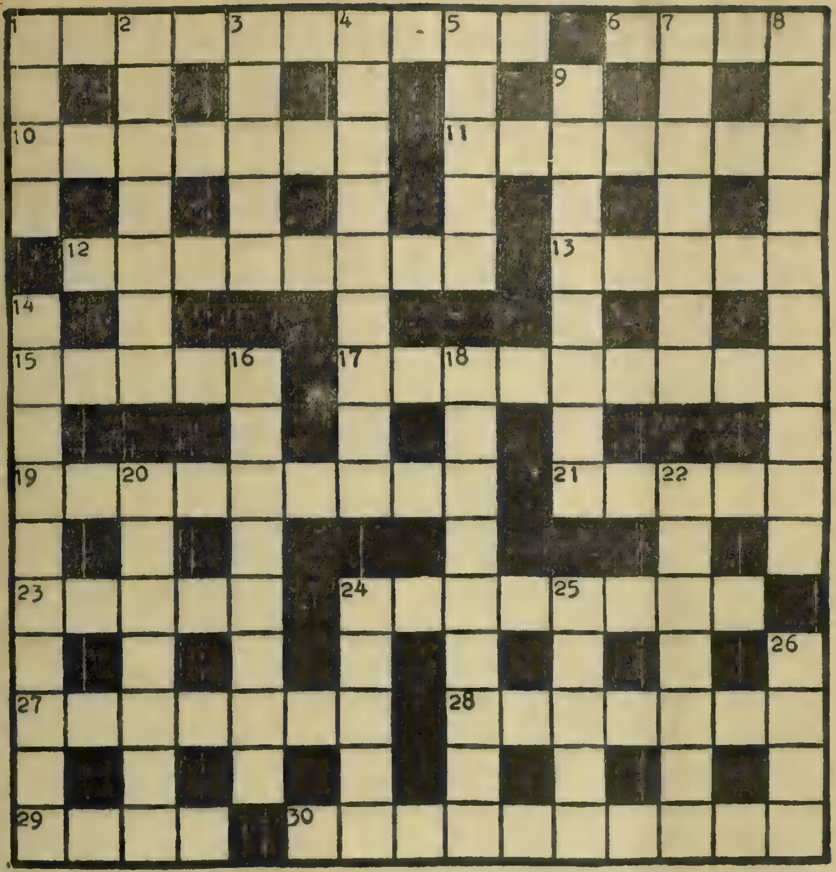
The story is a masterpiece of ironic heroics, of expectations frustrated, of red-herring disclosures. Much of this carries over to the screen, but a trouble is that director Martin Ritt has a defective sense of timing. His camera work — pseudo-naturalistic — is good, with a fine appreciation for the chill of bleak lighting. Such effects are routine in present-day cinema but they are here well done. What Ritt seems not to understand is the mechanics of tension. This is noticeable at the opening, where he keeps us hanging around Checkpoint Charlie until the suspense slides out from under the scene and the clap of violence comes as anticlimax. Time and again, the air leaks out of his carefully pumped up situations; it is a bad fault in a spy yarn because it allows you the distraction to wonder about plausibility and even Le Carré's sophisticated espionage won't stand too much cold logic.

Then the casting is not as good as it should have been, considering that the book pivoted its suspense primarily on character. Richard Burton, the spy of the title, is at the center of almost every scene, and he cannot develop enough individuality to keep interesting. He can look sodden, resentful, suspicious, remorseful, but he can play no changes on these flat statements. Also, he is physically the wrong man for the job: Alec Leamas, the spy, was not an ex-athlete gone to seed, but more a lawyer's clerk with too much on his conscience. Alec Guinness, maybe, or Donald Pleasence. Claire Bloom, as his girl friend in the spiritualist library, lacks the spinster desperation that makes the character's impetuosity both convincing and poignant.

Oskar Werner as the Jewish East German interrogator and zealot is first rate—inventive, surprising, so substantial that his fate matters. On the other hand, Peter Van Eyck's conception of the blond Nazi beast is a waxworks absurdity. The Spy Who is an uneven achievement, aiming for implacability but skittering off too frequently to the safety of movie platitudes. It is still worth seeing for its triple-cross clockwork—a machinery that requires alert attention. The key to staying with it is never to assume that Alec Leamas understands the game he is playing.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1136

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Would a fast shuffle with this extra ace be cause to increase irritation? (10)
6 and 23 across Order something from the back stove, perhaps. (9)
10 It's beautiful being given a dowry of stone! (7)
11, 24 down and 27 across You don't sit in front of the counter if you do take a position! (5,2,3,2,7)
12 Are they in the middle of flight, or is one of them after? (8)
13 The Carpenter had to ask the Walrus. (5)
15 Certain features might be difficult to see in one, but a guest loses it. (5)
17 and 26 down Picks up and carries the catcher, by which the bag is held safely. (8, 5)
19 Changed one's habit, getting set right. (9)
21 It's a crime to find it ran so poorly! (5)
23 See 6 across.
24 They are responsible for a comedown during 12. (8)
27 See 11 across.
28 Throws things out after the fire. (7)
29 Killed a great number, as some might say. (4)
30 Pinchers so out of shape as to be applicable to the officially objectionable. (10)

DOWN:

1 Decry. (4)
2 One wouldn't expect to find an early settler in this. (7)
3 Endangered, but not with resentment over the clue. (5)
4 Specialists in bloomers, perhaps.
5 Charges, with certain work. (5)
7 Relating to the finish? (Aspiring savants hope to.) (7)
8 Keeping down and decreasing things all over again? (10)
9 Not well placed in a ray falling over the shoulders. (8)
14 Obvious haystacks are made, but not contracted for. (10)
16 Gives another term. (8)
18 Such things as the clepsydra might have some stories to tell! (3-6)
20 A substitute for ivory? (7)
22 Nick, when old, or mar even when new. (7)
24 See 11 across.
25 The Irish at first could be belonging to them. (5)
26 See 17 across.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1135

ACROSS: 1 Cavalier poets; 10 Hated; 11 Tediously; 12 Potpourri; 13 Dates; 14 Serial number; 19 Inexactitude; 22 Throb; 24 Spearhead; 25 Indecorum; 26 Ovine; 27 Reincarnation. DOWN: 2 Astute; 3 Andromeda; 4 Interdict; 5 Radii; 6 Ovid; 7 Test tube; 8 Chaps; 9 Eyesore; 15 Letter man; 16 Underfoot; 17 Pigtail; 18 Begrudge; 20 Benito; 21 Adler; 23 Bacon; 24 Syria.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

BOOK COLLECTORS
Seeking unusual items for your collections!
We notify when our worldwide contacts make notable finds. All fields A to Izzard.
BOOK LANDOE
6631 Hollywood Blvd.
Hollywood, Calif. 90028

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

HISTORY AFIELD
Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
Postpaid $2, check, money order or cash
B. F. Johnson
BOX 2306, SAN DIEGO, CALIF. 92112

Fun to Read!
Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.
THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

BRUCE PAYNE, ORGANIZER OF YALE TENURE PROTEST, SAYS IN THE CURRENT ISSUE OF THE ACTIVIST:

"SNCC's approach to history strikes me as wildly schizophrenic. Their passion for reading and talking about southern history is equal to their opponents' passion for exaggerating it. On the other hand, they are sympathetic to HOWARD ZINN's attack on the 'tyranny of history,' SNCC—if it has a single attitude toward history—sees it as being of value only if it is politically useful. History, if it is not useful, must be altered. But to alter history is to admit that it is not, in fact, useful: it is to recognize that our past accuses us. The psychological reaction of 'double-think' then becomes necessary: we change our history while insisting—and believing—that it could never have been otherwise."

SUBSCRIBE NOW TO AMERICA'S ONLY INDEPENDENT STUDENT JOURNAL OF POLITICS AND OPINION

THE ACTIVIST, 1 year (5 issues) @ $3
SPECIAL STUDENT RATE, 1 year @ $2

Name ____________
Address ____________
City ____________
State ____________ ZIP ________

Mail to:
THE ACTIVIST
27½ West College Street
Oberlin, Ohio 44074

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

amples are Gen. Abdul Haris Nasution in Indonesia and Gen. Joseph Mobutu in the Congo, who have given short shrift to Communists in their countries.

Although the Kuss emissaries are temperamentally inclined toward the hard sell, they are models of discretion when U.S. interests seem to require it. Or at least they try. Consider the arms race in the Middle East, where the Arab countries hate one another only less than they hate the Israelis. President Nasser in Egypt has supersonic fighters, so King Faisal of Saudi Arabia had to have them. He flashed his credit card and got $400 million worth of airplanes provided by the British, and Hawk antiaircraft missiles of American make. Then there is the current deal involving 100 Patton tanks for King Hussein of Jordan. This had to be a hush-hush affair, because in 1965 we secretly supplied a quantity of the same tanks to Israel, via West Germany. The secrecy did not last long in either deal. In the case of Jordan, it fell open when the State Department's U.S. Information Agency ran an article in a regional magazine for Arab readers boasting that Uncle Sam, ever the friend of Islam, was supplying tanks that would give the Jordanian army "greater mobility and fire power." The Israeli Ambassador made a point of calling on Secretary Rusk, and Mrs. Golda Meier was soon assuring the Knesset that the Israeli army would be getting additional tanks from somewhere to meet the Arab threat.

One also remembers the Pakistan-India war, fought with U.S. equipment on both sides, though both had pledged to use it only against the Communists. But these little difficulties do not faze Mr. Kuss in the slightest. He is not only offering still newer and better weapons but training "a new breed of engineer-diplomats" to distribute them, all in the interest of peace. Drew Pearson reports that a delegation of U.S. Senators touring Asia reached the different conclusion that "U.S. arms supplied to once-neutral nations are breeding war." Now that Congress is in session again, would not this sort of thing be a valid topic for debate in the Senate?

The Quick and the Dead

Lal Bahadur Shastri died much like Abraham Lincoln, at the height of his popularity and when a longer life, by all indications, would not have given him greater historical stature. He was a remarkable human being and an even more remarkable politician—one who had mastered the art of compromise and was seemingly unable to make enemies. Death struck him down only a few hours after the accomplishment of an act of rare statesmanship, in which he rose above the pressures of domestic politics and achieved a measure of reconciliation with a nation only recently at war with his own. The best tribute that could be paid to him would be the lasting peace which he so ardently desired and which India so desperately needs.

In the January 9 London Observer, during the closing days of Shastri's life, Edward Crankshaw discussed the Soviet Union's new role as peacemaker in Asia and showed how ludicrous the simplistic view of history can be, especially when it is based on the principle that the more things change, the more they are the same. If there was one axiom in the 19th-century British view of international relations, it was that the Russians must never be allowed to approach the plains of India. Yet it was on Russian soil that Shastri of India and Ayub Khan of Pakistan were brought together, and the mediator was none other than Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin of the Soviet Union. Whitehall looked on approvingly, perhaps a little envious that it had not seized the opportunity itself, but glad that the fighting between the heirs to the subcontinent was over for the time being and, one may hope, for as far as man can see into the future. And beyond India, what any 19th-century British statesman would have regarded as an eternal enmity between Russia and Persia, Russia and Turkey, is simultaneously in process of dissolution. The czars, the minstrels of empire led by Rudyard Kipling, Benjamin Disraeli and Lord Curzon not only lacked the gift of prophecy; reality has turned out to be almost the complete opposite of what they foresaw.

If time confounded these would-be seers, they were at least spared humiliation while they still strutted on the world stage. America's statesmen have not even that consolation. The Soviet Union is involved in Southeast Asia only in the comfortable role of a supplier of arms and friend to small nations, while the United States is embroiled in a bloody, ignominious war which is dissipating all the credit it earned through occasional acts of magnanimity in the past. Both the Soviet Union and the United States fear the emergence of China as a major military and industrial power. But the Soviet Union, though engaged in ideological conflict with China, shows not the slightest intention of using its military strength against its erstwhile Marxist partner, while the United States has already gone so far along that perilous path that it may never be able to retrace its steps. If they can still learn from current history, Dean Rusk and his colleagues should ponder what has happened in Tashkent. It is not napalm and nuclear power that win diplomatic victories, but intelligence and patience—and the ability to profit by an opponent's folly.

Now the Germans

Dollars are sweet, and in the decades after World War II the United States had no buddies more cloying than Japan and Germany. But the friendship bombing of Vietnam, and the therapeutic burning of its villages, appear to be more than even our plump ex-enemies can take with equanimity. The opposition of Japanese artists, intellectuals and students has been evident for some months [see statement in The Nation June 14, 1965]; and now Germany adds its voice to the international chorus of protests.

The German critics of Uncle Sam, it must be admitted, have had some trouble making themselves heard; the Bonn establishment still finds its bread buttered on the State Department side. On November 26, all West German newspapers received a statement signed by some 200 writers and teachers, including (to cite names that will be most readily identified by American readers) Günther Anders, Ernst Bloch, Heinrich Böll, Rolf Hochhuth, Uwe Johnson, Robert Jungk, Erich Kastner and Peter Weiss. After declaring the struggle in Vietnam a civil war and deploring American participation as morally unjustified and threatening a much wider conflict, the signers dissociated themselves from any moral or financial support given the war by the German Federal Government, welcomed the call of France and the Third World countries for a settlement on the basis of the Geneva Agreement and joined hands with the "5,000 American university professors and teachers who have asked for an immediate halt to the war and the neutralization of all Vietnam."

No West German paper published this statement (though an appeal to warm-hearted Germans to buy replicas of Berlin's Freedom Bell, the proceeds to go to the families of Americans killed in Vietnam, was widely publicized). Then on December 15, Der Spiegel, a magazine whose independent line has consistently pricked the complacency of West German officialdom, broke the silence and printed the entire text. It followed this a week later with a report on the widespread suppression of the manifesto. A colorful detail in the official blackout was the offer of the West Berlin police to arrest a cabaret satirist named Neuss (he had referred to South Vietnam General Ky's hero worship of Hitler) for "insulting the Occupying Power." Said Power had at least the good sense to oppose this fawning nonsense. The imperfect suppression of the statement has thus become a scandal in West Germany and, as always happens with defective censorship, the affair is kicking up more attention than the protestors could otherwise have expected.

If, as now seems probable, the Johnson Administration is trying to negotiate its way off the escalator, one reason may be that the multilingual protest of humanity is at last being heard on the banks of the Pedernales.

Citizen Diplomacy

Clemenceau's saying that war is too important to be left to the generals can now be extended to the diplomats, especially when the chief U.S. diplomat is as uninspired and uninspiring as Dean Rusk. It may have been this fact of modern life that impelled Staughton Lynd, Thomas Hayden and Herbert Aptheker to tresspass on the sacred preserves of the State Department and journey to North Vietnam to see for themselves.

Nor is this the only venture of its kind; it is merely the most conspicuous and defiant. Last summer Sanford Gottlieb, political action director of SANE and organizer of the spectacular November "march" on Washington, conferred with leaders of the South Vietnam National Liberation Front, and he is reported to be leaving shortly—if he has not already left—for a second exchange of views. The locale in this case is Algiers, which is not part of the State Department's proscribed territory; no Apthekers are involved, and SANE reports to the Department on the results. As a practical matter, however, it is hard to distinguish between the Lynd-Hayden-Aptheker reconnaissance and that of Gottlieb. Donald Keys, SANE's program director, says that the current mission will be "mainly to try to judge the temperature as to any openings for negotiations that we could discern, and help interpret the American viewpoint and attitude." These two objectives were certainly in the foreground of the Lynd expedition.

Lynd and his colleagues, reporting on their return that they had found nothing to indicate that the United States had made any direct approaches to North Vietnam, elicited from the White House and the State Department the information that shortly after Christmas Eve a message had been handed to a North Vietnamese diplomat by an American embassy official and had been accepted, but that no reply had so far been received. This enabled Bill Moyers to tell the press that the self-appointed emissaries were "totally uninformed," but it also enabled him to release information which makes the Washington "peace offensive" look better, and which could not very well have been revealed without some such excuse. In Hanoi, Lynd made a speech which called U.S. policy "inhuman, unlawful and anti-democratic"—a characterization with which some millions of Americans would agree—but he also made it clear that this was a minority view even among intellectuals that the U.S. labor, as represented by the AFL-CIO, strongly supported President Johnson's policy on Vietnam. Dispelling the ludicrous Marxist illusion that the working people of America are eager to cast off their chains and make common cause with their comrades abroad was alone worth the trip and should be regarded as a service both to the United States and to the cause of peace.

For these accomplishments, Lynd, Aptheker and Hayden may be indicted for two synthetic crimes: violation of the 1799 Logan Act, a statute as antiquated as a colonial butter churn; or the more modern prohibition against travel without a validated passport. Referring to the idiotic statute, the Toronto Globe and Mail, one of the best newspapers in this hemisphere, headed an editorial: "They were right to go, will they be welcome home?" "Persecution of Prof. Lynd by the U.S. Government," the paper says, "would only convince many of its critics that for all its pious declarations, Washington has no real desire to negotiate."

In this connection, the attitude of Yale University toward a minor but conspicuous faculty member has so far been altogether praiseworthy. Without mentioning Mr. Lynd by name, President Brewster laid down the principle that "the long-run charge which this university bears from its own tradition makes it unthinkable that we should penalize a faculty member for his political position." The government of the United States could well afford to follow the same rule.

Civil Service Unionism

How To Avert Another Strike . . . Timothy J. Cooney

A major civil service union finally has gone out on strike and completely tied up New York City. It was bound to happen in time. During the past two years such lesser unions as the ferrymen, the welfare workers and the motor vehicle operators have struck, and for the past decade the giants — the Transport Workers, the sanitation men and even the police—have been threatening to do so. The promise of disaster came still closer when the teachers staged their work stoppage, and it was fulfilled when for twelve days the TWU threw its picket lines across the public transportation of the country's busiest city. For almost two weeks, angry citizens, politicians and editorial writers deplored and condemned and offered impossible solutions. The strike was at last settled, but the problem of such strikes was not solved, and no workable solution is possible until the unique phenomenon of present-day civil service unionism is understood.

Until a few years ago, the average civil servant in New York City, and no doubt elsewhere, did not believe he had the right to strike. He was prevented from striking by his own convictions and not by laws or injunctions. Balanced against his relatively low wages and his inability to bargain collectively was the fact that he had job security and was not subject to depression or recession cycles. This seemed like a fair deal to him.

In recent years, however, there has been a marked change of attitude. The younger civil servant is a different breed from those who remember the hard times of the depression. Just having a job is not enough. The old and ineffective civil service associations have become aggressive civil service unions, modeled after industrial unions and led by militant and salaried union leaders. The parallel goes right down to the picket line. Like other unionists the new civil servant not only wants higher wages and shorter hours but now believes that laws, reason and public will to the contrary, he has the moral right to strike in order to win his demands. He does not accept or acknowledge any distinction between himself and workers in the private sector. Since he threatens to strike and actually does strike with impunity—in New York the law against strikes by civil servants has seldom been enforced —he is proved right in practice if not in theory.

There is, of course, a fundamental difference between industrial unions and civil service unions: it rests in the substantive difference between the respective employers and their relationship to the economy. Underlying all labor negotiations in the private sector is an unspoken premise that labor and management understand and accept. Labor cannot demand more than business can give without going out of business. As a corollary, and at the risk of moving onto metaphysical ground, a fair wage might be defined as one that business can pay and still make some profit. Obviously, this definition does not apply to the public sector. Government is a nonprofit operation and it cannot go out of business.

The problem, and it is at the heart of the matter, is that in New York City today no agreed upon rationale whatsoever underlies civil service bargaining. Thus there is no objective standard for determining whether the TWU's demands, or demands by similar unions, are justified or unjustified. In his last few years of office Mayor Robert Wagner gave up trying. Increasingly, he agreed to higher and higher wages because crippling strikes were threatened, not because he or anyone else believed that a wage demand was fair or justified. The results have been startling. In 1958 the city's expense budget was under $2 billion; today it is well above $4 billion, and by the end of this fiscal year the city expects to be a half billion in debt. At least 70 per cent of the increase since 1958 has gone into higher wages.

The transit workers and other civil service unionists have had, in a sense, their own internal rationale. At the end of every contract period they demand more money because, since their last contract, other civil service unions have gotten more. There is no end in sight and the future looks grim. Michael J. Quill has always used the threat of a strike to win his demands, and when at last he struck, his men were obviously ready. Other union leaders had better be willing to outdo Mr. Quill if they want to hold the loyalty of their membership.

When Quill said, on his way to jail, that the "second team" of negotiators would be tougher than the first, he was hinting at one of his own problems and the problem of every civil service union leader in New York City. In the militant, if irrational, world of civil service unionism a legion of Young Turks is ready to jump to the fore and develop an impassioned argument along the following lines: We have been sold out; other unions have gotten nice fat contracts for their men; if we strike and stop vital service City Hall will find the money quickly enough; nothing is going to happen to us if we do strike; the public be damned.

Whatever the shortcomings of this argument in terms of truth and civic virtue, there is no doubt that it works, and if a union leader wants to remain a union leader he is well advised to make this speech before one of his juniors makes it. The day he becomes concerned about the city's problems is the day he finds himself an ex-leader.

In short, civil service unionism in New York City has become a runaway engine driven on by competition among unions; civil servants who are willing to strike and won't recognize any laws or arguments to the contrary; and militant union leaders who, for their own protection, must demand more and more and be willing to go to jail to win their demands. This engine has neither a brake nor a governor, and it recognizes no speed limit.

Is there any way out? I believe there is, but my solution is far short of what an angry public may demand. Its only virtue is that

---

Timothy J. Cooney, an occasional Nation contributor, was formerly on the staff of New York City's Commission on Human Rights, and more recently served as assistant to the city's Labor Commissioner, and as an assistant to former Mayor Robert Wagner. He is presently executive secretary to the New York Council Against Poverty.

it may work—where solutions arising from the demands of an angry public will not. From the analysis made above, I start with the following assumptions: No punitive legislation or compulsory procedure that distinguishes between civil service unions and other unions is going to succeed, because the unions won't accept or acknowledge the distinction.

Right or wrong, like it or not, civil service unionists consider themselves full-fledged American unionists with all of the rights and privileges of other unionists. In this, they are being no more than realistic, since a qualified unionism, which usually means that the members may shout but may not strike, lacks the power to force a showdown that gives unionism its meaning. In any case, there are just too many unionized civil servants to argue with. Cracking down on them will only strengthen them; jailing their leaders will only rally them; penalizing them or calling out the National Guard will only raise other issues that must be settled before they will go back to work.

Central to my solution is the creation of an independent authority that would recommend wages, hours and fringe benefits for all of New York City's civil servants. This authority would be directed by three distinguished citizens appointed by the mayor to long terms (thus separating them from political maneuvering). They would hold public hearings at which union leaders and all interested parties could speak. They would command the services of a professional staff of researchers, investigators, program planners and analysts. These specialists would be competent to analyze and evaluate such factors as the qualifications for specific jobs, comparable salaries for similar jobs in government and private industry, the New York City cost of living index, etc.

If this authority were as capable and independent as it could be, it would give the city what it now desperately needs—a rational foundation for the discussion of civil service wages. Even if the authority recommended substantial increases for some classes of civil servants, I believe that the mayor and the general public would accept these recommendations rather than risk a retreat to the anarchy that now exists.

In the beginning the civil service unions would probably neither accept the concept of the authority nor its recommendations. Union leaders would, no doubt, add to their standard speech the expletive, "The authority be damned."

The mayor and the public may be severely tested. Yet the recent blackout and the subway and bus strike have proved that New Yorkers are capable of taking much. If they felt that the authority's recommendations were fair, they might well endure the inconvenience that a strike would bring and support a mayor who stood by those recommendations. Thus the solution I offer does not promise that there will be no more strikes—given civil service unionism as it exists today, I can envision no solution that can offer such a promise—but after a testing period I believe that such an authority would greatly reduce the likelihood of walkouts.

I make this prediction because I feel that an authority—always assuming that it proved capable and independent — might ease much of the anxiety and bitterness that have driven civil servants to their present position. The average civil servant can live on what he earns, but he cannot live with the thought that others have gotten more. Furthermore, since no one has ever offered him a definition of a fair wage based on any criteria he could accept, it is little wonder he assumed that he was being shortchanged. For as long as he can remember, no budget director or director of personnel has ever voluntarily proposed that he get a raise. He was the forgotten man and it was always a struggle. The only answer to the "politicians" and an apathetic public has seemed to be a militant, industrial-type union that was willing to go on strike.

An authority would ease much of the civil servant's anxiety by sharing it. Regardless of the size of his union or how powerful it is; regardless of who is in City Hall or what the public thinks or doesn't think; even regardless or whether or not he strikes, the authority would be "worrying" about his wages and hours. If they were not fair, the authority would speak with a voice that the mayor and the public would have to heed.

There is one final reason for believing that an authority would be accepted by civil servants. Civil service unionism may have become an irrational force, but civil servants, individually, are no more irrational than the next man. When one speaks to them in private it is at once apparent that they too want a solution, for they too are New Yorkers and they are not unaware of the potential disasters that loom ahead. The subway men will suffer as much as anyone if the police or firemen or hospital workers go out. An authority would in no way restrict their freedom as unionists, but it would offer them an honorable alternative to the present situation.

Latin American Land Reform

ENEMIES OF PROMISE . . .

William C. Thiesenhusen

"We will shape the future through the principles of our Alliance," declared President Johnson last summer in reaffirming his support for the Alliance for Progress, "or we will find it swallowed up in violence that is bred of desperations."

But the fact remains that the nations of Latin America have made only halting progress toward recasting their social and economic structures since 1961 when, at the signing of the Charter of Punta del Este, they promised vigorous reform. It has been nearly three years since ex-President Juscelino Kubitschek of Brazil and Colombian ex-President Alberto Lleras placed the preponderance of blame for the sluggishness of the Alianza on its U.S. administration and Latin America's "poor showing" respectively. The time seems ripe for frank discussion of South America's slow headway, particularly in the matter of agricultural reform.

That change will come—with or without the Alliance for Progress—scarcely needs documentation. Experience the world over is that when people are relegated to the economic margins of their own society—which without them becomes steadily more affluent—they will attempt to rectify a situation they perceive as unjust, and will resort to violence if their claims are unheard. In the southern half of the Western Hemisphere a traditional "have and have not" situation is steadily exacerbated as population growth (which will triple the population in the next thirty-five years) adds to the ranks of the disenchanted more rapidly than to those of privilege. It becomes explosive as better communication makes the lower classes painfully conscious of their plight. Mere scale threatens not only riot but revolution.

Those observers who pass off latter-day violence in Latin America as being politically motivated, or more specifically "Communist-inspired," miss the central issue—a well-perceived breach between those who possess and dispense privilege and power and those who have neither. Instead of moving toward equality of opportunity, the gap separating rich and poor is growing. The farm labor force in Chile, for example, making up about 87 per cent of those engaged in agriculture, earns only about one-third of the income generated by that sector of the economy. The top 1 per cent of the agricultural population now receives 25 per cent of the agricultural income. Campesinos earn an average net cash income of about $150 a year, a sum inadequate to provide their families with the essentials of life. The vast majority of Chilean agricultural workers have suffered a decline in purchasing power of about one-third over a five-year period because the legislature has failed to raise minimum salaries to compensate for the falling value of the peso. Some agriculturists find ways to evade even the legal minimum. Powerless to organize—the government prohibits agricultural unions except in very special instances—workers have, until lately, fallen into resignation. Even though the Christian Democratic government of Eduardo Frei, which took office in November, 1964, has promised to change the discriminatory labor codes, landlords can be expected to continue informally to discourage agricultural unions.

A 1961 report notes that throughout Latin America farm owners receive incomes twenty to forty times larger than the wages of farm workers. Later research, like that of the Inter-American Committee for Agricultural Development (ICAD), shows the differences to be even greater. In the rich cacao plantation area of Bahia, Brazil, the average gross farm income of several large estate owners was 100 times larger than the average annual cash income of a small but typical group of workers interviewed in 1963. If the situation were similar in the United States, a farm hand who cleared $2,000 a year would be working for a proprietor whose gross annual cash farm income was $200,000.

These extremes are not peculiar to Latin America's countryside (although income disparities are usually more marked there); they exist in the city as well. And they are found not only in Chile and Brazil but throughout most of Latin America. Changing the situation by peaceful means is one goal of the Alliance. As a step toward evolutionary progress, some recent commentators have suggested a revision of our two-class stereotype of Latin American society. They note the existence of a substantial middle class, if one judges by occupations normally so identified: white-collar workers, professionals, government workers, small business entrepreneurs, et al.

But the middle group in Latin America, as Philip W. Quigg (drawing on research by Claudio Véliz) has noted, "arose in potential conflict with the industrial worker and the urbanized proletariat." Instead of feeling identity with the working group, most middle elements seem to identify with a privileged upper class. Therefore, the middle stratum has not seriously urged structural reforms which would tend to draw the lower class into the greater society. Allied with the upper class, it favors the status quo.

By imitation, Latin American middle and upper groups (with some exceptions) have taken over the consumptionist attitude of the United States middle class—without the long period of savings and investment that preceded the phenomenon in North America. Generally, they seem intent upon improving their own condition without dividing the pie with those below them, and without realizing that the entire pie might be larger in the long run if they did.

Chile's governments were led by the middle group from 1938 to 1952, but Federico Gil, Latin American scholar, has observed of this era: "At no time . . . did the leadership of the temporarily allied government parties attempt any program involving the partition, the expropriation or even the taxation of the landed estates."

Now the informal middle- and upper-class coalition in Latin America—the group "in power" today

---

William C. Thiesenhusen is an assistant professor of agricultural economics at the University of Wisconsin. He recently spent eighteen months in Chile, studying agrarian reform projects.

in most of Latin America—feels Alliance for Progress pressure to bring about basic land and tax reforms. Countries requesting aid must move toward fulfillment of the Alliance stipulation that reform be in progress. On the one hand, then, the upper-middle group faces the dissatisfaction of the downtrodden which is increasingly being translated into political leverage; on the other, it is threatened with loss of its own prestige and economic power. An appropriate description of upper--middle-group response to this situation is well expressed by Tancredi in Giuseppe di Lampedusa's The Leopard: "If we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change."

Four years of the Alliance for Progress have opened superficial chinks in the façade of society, but the old foundation stones remain in place. Of course, there are rays of hope. The Social Christian parties, speaking loudly for peaceful but effective reform, are gathering adherents and even power in some Latin countries. Some reforms have been enacted by Latin American parliaments. But we should not be unduly optimistic, despite the fact that since 1960, thirteen agrarian reform laws have been passed in the Central and South American countries that are part of the Alliance for Progress.

The passage of legislation meets a basic Alliance requirement. A quick reading of the complicated laws seems to show each country sincere in its desire for land reform. But often the legislators, themselves members of the privileged classes, have built interminable delays into the law's application. Sometimes the agrarian reform legislation cannot stand by itself—a set of enabling acts must also be passed before anything can be done. The effectiveness of the entire document may then hinge on several of these—or even on a constitutional amendment—not apt to pass a conservative congress.

Expropriation of land for reform purposes is sometimes contingent on demonstrating that present use is inefficient; that is a fluid concept, as hard to define as it is to measure. Land condemnation may become subject to innumerable judicial proceedings and the matter passed from court to court without ever being resolved—or, what is more serious, without anyone's expecting a resolution. And even if the law becomes workable, there is usually no provision for deferred payment in case of expropriation, so land reform must depend again on a recalcitrant congress to vote operating funds. Without a deferred-payment clause, no Latin country, regardless of the generosity of its parliament, can proceed very far with land reform; by definition, the national budget of an underdeveloped country is limited, and land prices are often high.

The slim budget usually allotted to agricultural redistribution implies that few families will be granted land. This number is frequently reduced further because administrators make it a practice to design programs with high costs per family unit—one, that is, which provides settlers with houses, sheds access roads, electricity, redesigned irrigation systems, etc., immediately upon arrival at the colony. In Chile, the reform agency's expenditures for this overhead capital ran above $2,000 per family settled during the pre-Frei government.

To be sure, social and economic overhead capital are important in a country where the rural areas are devoid of many basic facilities. But too little thought has been given to providing colonists with only their rudimentary needs, with equipment of lower priority to be supplied over time through colonist initiative and the earnings of his farm operation. This would spread funds across a larger program or make sums available to improve the productivity on the new farms. A recent United Nations publication shows that the cost of land plus installation varies from an average of $17,000 per family settled in some Argentine projects, to a low of $3,000 to $4,000 in Guatemala and Ecuador.

Where in addition, and as frequently happens, the program is administered by a long-established bureaucratic structure that has been rechristened "agrarian reform agency" merely to meet Alliance terminology, progress is bound to be lethargic. (In Mexico, Bolivia and Cuba, revolutions have been a short cut across such delays, but at a high social—and apparently also economic—cost.) Most accomplishments under recent agrarian reform laws fall far short of announced goals. Under the Center-Right coalition that governed Chile until late 1964, between 10,000 and 12,700 campesinos were to be established on their own farms. But in two years of "reform" (1963 and 1964), only about 1,100 were settled. In Colombia, only 1,400 were settled in three years and 16,500 were given titles to lands in the public domain which they already occupied. The records of some other countries—like Panama, Paraguay and Brazil—are even less impressive. Only in Venezuela, where income from oil has made high settlement costs easier to pay, is real progress evident. Land owned by Pérez Jiménez and his cronies went into the public domain after the dictator's demise, and was available for reform use.

But before becoming self-righteous about the "Tancredi attitude" of the Latin Americans, we must recognize that the U.S. attitude toward the Alliance for Progress also supplies some brakes.

The Charter of Punta del Este is a convincing document, and the United States, as an author and signer, declares itself on the side of reform. But a statement of principle is seldom enough to solve a foreign-policy problem, and in complex situations other, even stronger, criteria may produce a different or even opposite effect. Thus our liberal Alliance statements make up only a part of the "bag of tools" our diplomats use for dealing with any given situation in Latin America. Another, often overriding, element is the tendency of U.S. policy makers to view foreign relations in the context of the East-West struggle. Indeed, agrarian reform becomes meshed into our policy of containment, not only because all major foreign relations are thus involved but also because land has long been a rallying point for the Left in Latin America. When it evaluates its policy toward Latin America in East-West terms, the United States is reluctant to support any program that coincides with the position of the "populists."

This attitude is the more sweeping because we tend to see the Left as a monolithic group: parties which for internal political reasons must form coalitions with the far Left are considered fully as "Red" as Chinese-style Communists. In some areas of the world our powers of discrimination have sharpened with the Russian-U.S. détente, but in Latin America (perhaps because we fear another Cuba or because we have always misunderstood Latin American politics), our classifications are still largely black or white.

At the level where decisions are made, this creates real difficulty. Since each foreign-policy problem must be solved on a case-by-case basis, issues like agrarian reform are shortchanged because of their leftist associations, with persuasive local arguments losing out to global strategy. To the U.S. policy makers, such decisions may seem perfectly logical, but Latin Americans see our support for the solution of their pressing domestic problems as equivocal at best.

Because of its concern with the spread of communism, the United States has a built-in aversion to groups seeking domestic reform, and makes common cause with the most conservative, often even militaristic, forces in Latin America. But there are other reasons why the United States finds the Left repugnant. The stated economic development program of leftist groups usually includes, in addition to agricultural reform, expropriation of at least some of the industrial assets now owned by United States private investors. A desire to nationalize the means of production is rooted in the Left's economic analysis, as is a growing sense of nationalism. But nationalization through expropriation would tend to make the short-run business climate less favorable for American investment. Without much doubt, U.S. aid would shrink accordingly.

Prof. Robert F. Smith reports that although the Alliance for Progress Charter underplays the role of private investment in Latin America, subsequent interpretations have rejuvenated "dollar diplomacy." The Clay Committee's 1963 report on the Alliance for Progress asserts the primacy of public investment and private enterprise, proclaiming nationalization alien to economic development. The Joint Economic Committee of the U.S. Congress seems to take the same line. In 1962, its subcommittee on Inter-American Economic Relationships gave some attention to the need for social reforms, but two years later the basic theme of its report was that the success of the Alliance depends on creating a good climate for business. It denounced any expropriation of private property, even for agrarian reform. Thus, the need to attract venture capital south of the border has been made a central focus of the Alliance. This goal, admittedly important, conflicts with agrarian reconstruction in several ways, and to date reform has lost out at most confrontations.

Our alliance with the Right has a long history in Latin America and is not easily forgotten there—particularly since it is constantly reinforced because the rightists, being the best educated and the most often in power, have the best opportunity to hobnob with our diplomats. Furthermore, contacts between U.S. diplomats and U.S. businessmen are frequent in these countries, if only because of the common language.

The assumption that we habitually support the Right has been fortified recently by the affair of the Dominican Republic. Many Latin Americans say that our action there confirms what they have always known—the United States is a power "dedicated to throttling any revolutionary movement of whatever center-to-left stripe." The recent controversial House resolution, which deemed unilateral intervention "proper" in any country of the Western Hemisphere that was suspected of creeping communism, brought loud and all but unanimous protests from the parliaments of Latin America.

Other problems further complicate the situation. Although our present "official" policy on agrarian reform appears liberal enough, those who carry it out are often holdovers from a former age to whom "reformist" ideas are untried, unproved and unattractive. Thus, preoccupation with the East-West power balance, the threat of expropriation, and policy-making inertia combine to make U.S. backing of agrarian reform considerably less wholehearted than one might expect from a review of those clauses of the Alliance Charter that treat of the subject.

This does not imply that the problems are in themselves easy to solve—it is hard to imagine a situation more complex. But a frank and continuing discussion of the inherent difficulties and possible solutions is in order between statesmen and the public in the United States and Latin America.

Having assessed the lukewarm support that agrarian reform seems to elicit, one instinctively looks for some alternative means to solve the depressing social and economic problems of rural workers in countries south of the Rio Grande. Some see the farm-to-city migration in Latin America as a near repetition of the movement that has taken place in the United States. Here, often in response to higher wages in town, the migration has reduced farm population from more than half of the populace in the mid-19th century to a scant 6.8 per cent in 1964. The process has not yet gone that far in Latin America. Whereas fifteen years ago rural population represented 60 per cent of the total, today rural and urban percentages are about equal. Moreover, the population is swelling and, in absolute terms, the number of people on farms is growing. It might be implied, though, from the experience of developed countries, that eventually the farm problem in Latin America will solve itself as country people move into the cities.

A closer look at the situation shows that only the process of the two farm-to-city migrations is similar; the character of the phenomenon is different. In the boom years of the U.S. move to the city, the promise of jobs was not a mirage. But an extremely large number of peasants in Latin America move to the city out of desperation; they are utterly unequipped for urban employment and life. Upon arrival, they often live in belts of poverty around major urban centers described by one observer as "showing human life at levels of degradation far worse than one finds in the average rural slum." There are few jobs because industry is growing slowly. And a job requires skills that the campesino “fresh off the farm” is unlikely to have. The education of farm laborers in Latin America is far below that of agricultural workers in the United States, even in the twenties or thirties.

A Venezuelan official summed up the situation recently. He claimed that half of Caracas’ 1.3 million people live in shacks, schools fill up as fast as they are built, and 80,000 people come on the labor market each year to compete with the more than 500,000 Venezuelans who can’t find jobs even now.

His statement fails to mention another large group of underemployed. In addition to those who move cityward of their own volition, others are forced off the farms by labor-saving machinery. Landlords may find mechanization prestigious or a hedge against inflation. More important, the proprietor’s social problems with labor can be partially averted as scarce capital is substituted for bountiful labor. Some Latin governments have encouraged this tendency by equating modernization of agriculture with mechanization, and giving import duty and/or exchange rate “breaks” to those who bring agricultural machinery into the country.

There is another point of difference in the population shifts of the two hemispheres. Agriculture in the United States has been immensely productive—so productive that farm surpluses have grown during the exodus to the cities. In Latin America, however, food supply has not even been able to keep up with population growth. In 1964, the Inter-American Development Bank reported that population in Latin America is growing at a rate of 2.7 to 2.8 per cent annually, yet total farm production has averaged only a 1.6 per cent growth over the past five years. When farmers leave the land (where they at least scrape out a minimum sustenance) they spend the few pennies they earn to buy food, thus inflating the demands on an insufficient supply. Scarcity of food seems to be one of the basic causes for chronic inflation in many Latin American countries.

Economists in most underdeveloped countries doubt that industry can absorb workers even at the rate of natural population increase. Each job created implies a huge investment of capital. Scarce machinery for industrialization is expensive and often must be imported. Foreign exchange is not available for the purpose, since much of the country’s scarce credit must be used to bring in food not produced by a lagging agriculture. Besides, industrial markets in Latin American countries are limited and will remain relatively so, despite common-market plans for widening outlets. And goods manufactured in developed countries usually have a cost advantage on the world market. Under these conditions, industrialization will necessarily proceed slowly in Latin America.

For the immediate future, development emphasis in Latin America should be given to improving the agricultural sector by making it more productive; and by employing more people in the countryside —or, at least, not attempting to drain any more from country to city. Developing agriculture will undoubtedly be followed in due time by industrial progress. As Gunnar Myrdal has put it, “any realistic agricultural planning program [for underdeveloped countries] must count on a tremendous increase in the labor force in agriculture.”

The basic question about agrarian reform still remains to be answered. Why can’t cropping patterns be intensified without agrarian reform and, in the wake of more efficient resource use, provide farm employment for more people? In Chile, as in other Latin American countries, we have little evidence that the large estate-small holding complex is productive. Chile has a Mediterranean climate and some good soil and water resources, yet agricultural yield seems far below potential. Great Britain, a country with about equal farming area and a far less salubrious climate, reports farm output three or four times higher than Chile.

Land in Latin America is frequently held for prestige purposes or, again, as a hedge against inflation, rather than as a factor of production. One study has noted that in the central zone of Chile, its area of greatest agricultural potential, nearly half the land is devoted to natural pasture. Improved pasture could handle three or four times the number of animals, and even greater production would be possible if this land were planted to more intensive annual crops. Prof. Peter Dorner’s studies and those of his students in Chile have noted that increases in productivity per acre of at least between 15 and 20 per cent are possible in the short run and could free, by reducing imports, millions of dollars a year for the Chilean economy.

Perhaps land could be taxed, thus forcing landlords to produce more to meet this overhead expense. Yet over the years, landlords in Latin America have successfully evaded taxation or, more frequently, legislated against realistic valuations and fair tax rates. (Prof. John Strasma reports that this may be changing, at least in Chile, where all real estate has just been revalued.)

In addition to producing less, patterns of farming that are extensive and nondiversified are likely to use less labor than desirable. In fact, as previously asserted, capital is often substituted for labor. There is little question that, with land reform, more people would be productively employed in the country. At least it would be some time before the beneficiaries of reform could amass labor-saving capital. What is doubtful is that productivity would really rise under reform; it might well drop still further—at least for a considerable period—as the organization of farming changed.

Of one matter we can be fairly certain: if land reform is defined narrowly as merely splitting up underutilized land and turning it over to campesinos, total production on these lands will probably not rise much closer to its potential than it has under the present hacienda system. To be successful, reform must be "integral," in that credit and technical assistance must be supplied. If the formerly landless are deserted after receiving their piece of land, there is no reason to expect that, with little or no previous management experience, they will turn overnight into productive entrepreneurs. Speaking of this task and the one of effecting a reform in the first place, Prof. T. Lynn Smith has called bringing about a wide distribution of land ownership "child's play in comparison with . . . developing the necessary managerial skills on the part of the heads of families whose only roles previously have been the limited ones of the agricultural laborer."

If the Latin American countries are not willing to devote considerable resources and planning to agriculture, once rights over the land are redistributed, the only concrete result of reform may be that the campesinos who participate in the reform will themselves eat better. (Admittedly, that is very necessary.) Concurrent with reform, new landowners should probably be made to shoulder realistic tax schedules and/or land-amortization payments to encourage production and to siphon off some of their profits to help pay for general economic development.

Whatever the economic alternatives of reform, it is doubtful that economists will be consulted in the early stages of the matter. A country's decision to engage in, or refrain from, reform, as Doreen Warriner has noted, is usually political. But to economists and other social scientists will fall the difficult job of making reform work.

As for the U.S. role in this process, what we especially need is a foreign policy flexible enough to distinguish between the pressing domestic problems confronting Latin America and the East-West and private business issues, precisely where such distinctions are hard to make; we need somehow to dissociate the genuine desire for vital reforms from our natural reaction to anti-Americanism and our instinctive aversion to leftist attacks on our foreign policy and our economic system. Perhaps we need a different policy for varying kinds of leftist groups. To repeat: there must be more serious and documented discussion of this complex issue.

The current world policy-making situation, suggests Walter Lippmann, "is a vicious circle in which dogmatic communism and dogmatic anti-communism incite and exasperate each other." The way out, he suggests, is by "fostering the ascendancy of national interests over global ideology."

Agrarian reform in Latin America is a case in point.

Peace for Vietnam

THE GOP's NETTLE of SUCCESS

Karl H. Purnell

If President Johnson has reaped a harvest of protest among Americans who deplore his war policy in Vietnam, it is not from any effort by the national leaders of the Republican Party. Not only do Republicans blandly accept the White House commitment of American soldiers to Vietnam, they are even rushing desperately into the President's arms with declarations of approval. It is true that some of the leaders, such as Richard Nixon and Senator Everett Dirksen, find him excessively prudent; they join with the war hawks in demanding escalation. However, the basic GOP position is one of approval of the President's policies.

Republican Minority Leader Gerald Ford has further blunted the possibility of a more feasible party position by demanding, of all things, a formal declaration of war by the Congress. Lest anyone be surprised that these particular Republicans should be so unanimous in their hawklike position, it should be remembered that they are the same men who put Barry Goldwater's nomination across in the San Francisco Cow Palace. One cannot question their consistency.

At the same time, there is serious doubt as to their political sagacity. Nixon, the old pro, apparently felt in his bones the political jackpot awaiting the Republicans when he stated recently that Vietnam could be the major issue in the 1968 elections. Yet Nixon, like his peers, seems to have forgotten that Goldwater lost the 1964 election in part by advocating the hawk position. Furthermore, Dwight Eisenhower won the 1952 election by promising negotiations and peace in Korea, not by undertaking to bomb north of the 38th Parallel. Certainly, Senator Dirksen might remember that Democratic bungling of foreign policy was standard Republican campaign fodder against Wilson and Roosevelt.

Since they are hurt by internal dissension and lack any good domestic issues, it is surprising that these Republican leaders should shun the only apparent issue which might bring them victory in 1968, and which is entirely consistent with the Republican position of the past forty-five years. Admittedly, Republican spokesmen would have to be astute in defining their opposition to the Administration. There is no political advantage to be gained by demanding immediate withdrawal or by urging negotiations that would leave South Vietnam to the whim of a vindictive National Liberation Front.

Nevertheless, the range of practical and responsible alternatives is impressive. A strong stand against further escalation, particularly the bombing of urban centers, could do much for the GOP's tarnished image. A program for nonmilitary victory in Southeast Asia by use of substantial economic aid would be a most seductive alternative to the bombs-and-guns technique now being employed with so little success. Republicans also stand to gain by emphasizing the possibility of free elections in South Vietnam as a means for obtaining negotiations.

---

Karl H. Purnell is a Republican member of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives and publisher of The Union County Journal of Lewisburg, Pa. He was a member of Governor Scranton's campaign staff in 1964.

These and other alternatives exist. The strategic and moral dilemma raised by the prospect of fighting hordes of Asians on their own terrain, where our air and naval might is of little effect, constitutes the best chance the Republicans have had in fourteen years for obtaining a national majority. And, if alternatives to the present military abyss contain a political opportunity for the GOP, the incredible manner in which the present Administration has conducted its operations in Vietnam is a sure-fire issue on which alert Republicans could stage a popular comeback.

The shifts in policy, the evasiveness of the Administration, the lack of candor in explaining to the American people what is happening in Vietnam constitute fair game for an opposition party. Republican spokesmen could have a field day excoriating the President and his advisers for the statements they have made about Vietnam in the past two years.

After all, it was John F. Kennedy who stated on the floor of the Senate in 1954 that if the American people were to go to war for the fourth time in this century, "particularly a war which we now realize would threaten the survival of civilization, they had a right to inquire in detail into the nature of the struggle and the possible alternatives." The details on this subject that have been forthcoming from the Administration lately are both sparse and misleading.

For example, in 1962, Secretary McNamara said after visiting Vietnam: "Every quantitative measurement we have shows we're winning this war." In the spring of 1963, Americans were again treated to false hopes when he authorized the announcement that: ". . . we have turned the corner in Vietnam." Now, the Defense Secretary estimates, perhaps with less myopia and more candor, that it will be a "long war."

The question of negotiations has been subject to the same kind of high-level chicanery. On July 13, 1965, President Johnson told a press conference: "I must say that candor compels me to tell you that there has not been the slightest indication that the other side is interested in negotiations or in unconditional discussions." As one commentator wrote later, "Candor did not compel the White House, however, to give a very accurate account of U Thant's message about the peace feelers." The whole sad story of Administration offers to discuss a solution in Vietnam is an issue in itself which could be exposed for public discussion to the advantage of the Republican Party.

Even Representative Ford recognized that. In a statement appearing in a recent Republican National Committee monthly magazine, he suggested that Johnson's actions in connection with the peace feelers "ought to make the American people a little dubious about freedom of information and the right to know as far as their government is concerned."

The shifts in what the White House is and is not prepared to do make interesting, if frustrating, reading. Dean Rusk at the beginning of 1965, decried the idea of negotiations. Yet in July, Johnson vowed that unconditional negotiations would be acceptable. In 1964, the White House was unwilling to recognize the Vietcong in any talks, but by spring of last year they were welcoming them to a bargaining table. The whole question of why our troops are in Vietnam at all should be subjected to closer scrutiny. According to Rusk, "Our task remains, therefore, that which President Johnson has often stated—namely to assist our friends in South Vietnam to repel the aggressor against them and at the same time to keep open every possibility of a peaceful settlement." What does the Secretary mean by "assist our friends"? Are American boys really dying by the hundreds in order to keep South Vietnamese villagers free from Vietcong rule? Or does Mr. Rusk really mean that the United States is attempting to stop Communist expansion 50 miles from the border of China?

Long Island Press: Ben Roth

Furthermore, just how far is the United States willing to go in assisting its friends? In 1964, this meant supplying them with arms and advice. A few months later it meant defending strategic bases with our own troops. Finally, it came to mean search-fix-and-destroy missions by U.S. Marines pitted against the Vietcong army. Does assisting friends mean that next we are to fight China on the Asian mainland? Of this last prospect, President Eisenhower said in 1961, "no man could be more bitterly opposed to getting the United States involved in a hot war in that region than I am."

Republican spokesmen who were willing to ask questions about the policy statements being made by Administration officials might well be surprised by the reaction they would get from the American people. An honest and candid dialogue on the issue of Vietnam has been demanded of the Democratic Administration by a large and responsible segment of the American people. That this has not been forthcoming is an unparalleled opportunity for a GOP strategy that would be both politically useful and patriotic in the right sense of the word. Messrs. Ford, Nixon, et al., get close to the issue every so often. But their obsession with more bombs and their fear of dealing with the vital questions have prevented them from attaining the role of responsible minority leaders by advocating a policy for peace and suggesting an end to secrecy.

Perhaps the final irony in all this is that the most promising Republican heroes of 1964 became the disappointing mutes of 1965. The Scrantons, Rockefellers, Romneys, Percys and others have steered safely clear of this most vital issue of the '60s. Once again their reluctance has allowed the Old Guard to step into the limelight, thus dimming the hopes of progressive, thoughtful Republicans throughout the country. The war in Vietnam is likely to continue for a long time. The Johnson Administration will, if present and past tactics continue, be the legitimate target for responsible criticism. If the Republicans realize in time the potential of the opportunity that waits to be seized, there may yet be a serious struggle for the White House in 1968. As yet, this prospect is unlikely.

Strip-Mine Morality

THE LANDSCAPING OF HELL . . . . Wendell Berry

"No!" interrupted the doctor. "There is no peace and no rest in the development of material interests. They have their law, and their justice. But it is founded on expediency, and is inhuman; it is without rectitude, without the continuity and the force that can be found only in moral principle."
Joseph Conrad, Nostromo

I have had quite a bit of trouble with this. I know what it means. Our homes are being destroyed . . . our wildlife destroyed, our peace destroyed . . . our dead rooted out of the grave.
Elder Dan Gibson of Fisty, Ky., at a hearing on new strip-mine regulations

Port Royal, Ky.

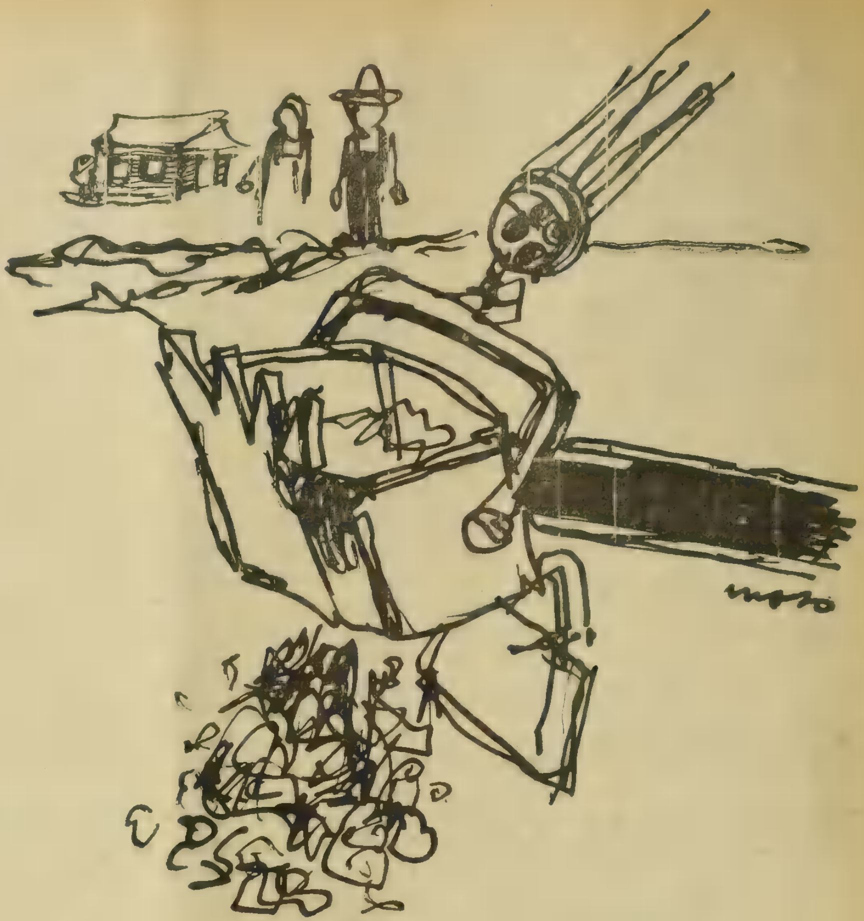
At Frankfort, Ky., last August 25 and October 4 and 5, there was a hearing on three new strip-mine regulations proposed by the Strip Mining and Reclamation Division of the Kentucky Department of Natural Resources. These new regulations were later adopted and put into effect, and now even stricter measures are pending before the present session of the state legislature. And so there begins to be some evidence that the state government has at last undertaken a serious interest in one of the state's most urgent problems. But since they face a powerful and determined opposition, the supporters of Governor Breathitt's new legislation might do well to consider the attitude and the morality displayed by the mining companies at the hearings of last August and October.

The proposed rules, as was made clear, were based on the careful research of trained men. Their purpose was to control—if not stop, then at least reduce—the erosion and water pollution that have so far been the inevitable by-products of strip mining. The gist of much of the testimony of the division's expert witnesses was that the authors of the regulations had striven toward a maximum leniency. For instance, the table of standards that would regulate contour stripping of the steep slopes of East Kentucky was based upon a safety factor of one, which would assure control only under ideal conditions—the lowest possible safety factor. "To recommend a factor lower than one," a University of Kentucky professor of Civil Engineering testified, "is to recommend failure." It was also stated, without contradiction by the coal companies, that of the 112 coal operations in East Kentucky all but twenty-two were at present working within the proposed limits as to extent of cut and degree of slope—which suggests that the regulations are lenient indeed.

But in spite of the minimal nature of the proposals, the opposition of the coal companies was inflexible and absolute. The company lawyers in their rebuttal made it clear that they would not be satisfied except by the defeat of even the least attempt to establish not only stricter controls but any controls whatsoever. They displayed no disposition to compromise, and no interest in discovering less destructive ways of mining. (Their witnesses indicated that the companies spend little or nothing on experimentation which might lead to less wasteful methods of extraction and reclamation.) The testimony of the expert witnesses who appeared in behalf of the companies was peculiarly clouded and disordered by the assumptions and intentions of the company lawyers, and by the testimony of several coal operators who also appeared as witnesses.

Wendell Berry is a poet, now living in Kentucky. His latest collection of poems is The Broken Ground (Harcourt, Brace & World).

There was a very obvious intent to use scientific evidence to prove that the best method of mining is the one that is most profitable, and that the best method of reclamation is the one that is cheapest. There was much yielding to the temptation to present theory and opinion as fact, and to look upon the failure to discover a remedy as proof that there is no remedy.



The testimony of one after another of the company witnesses turned on the same two arguments: (1) Any regulation that would reduce profit would be wrong; (2) control is impossible, in any case, because of the diversity of mining conditions ("every job is different"). I believe that most, if not all, of the scientists who testified for the coal companies repeated the second argument, as if ignorant or oblivious of the moral and legal—and scientific — implications. One of them, F. A. Braley of Pittsburgh, a former member of the Ohio River Valley Sanitation Commission, testified that there is not much that can be done about acid water from the mines ("a very minor factor as far as water pollution is concerned"): "Best thing to do is pay for the fish that you kill and forget about it." This was pronounced with an oracular glee unaccountable in a scientist. And one of the engineers admitted that he had got his figures, in connection with an alternative proposal which would favor the coal operators, from the coal operators.

Instead of the proposed maximums of a solid bench* width of 60 feet on a slope of 30 degrees, the operators almost unanimously asked for a solid bench of 175 feet on a slope of 35 degrees. At least one of them suggested regulations that, under cross-examination, proved to be not only more lenient than the ones proposed, but more lenient than the ones already in effect.

There was in the statements and questions of the coal company attorneys, and in the testimony of the operators, the unmistakable implication that anything can be justified by profit; that a man may own the land in the same sense in which he would own a piece of furniture or a suit of clothes; it is his to exploit, misuse or destroy altogether should he decide that to do so would be economically feasible. The question of the morality of any practice, for these men, has been completely replaced by the question of its profitability: if it makes money it is good; if it makes money for them they are doomed and eager to defend it. Evident in the testimony of some was the assumption that the steep mountain sides, now being ruined on an almost unbelievable scale and at great speed, are good for nothing else.

In short, the strategy of the coal companies was simply to ignore or redefine the issue. The issue, so far as the division was concerned, was to determine how much control there should be. The coal companies hardly bothered to deal with that question. The issue they persisted in raising and speaking to was whether or not there should be any control at all.

At the close of the hearing one of the company lawyers rose to offer the "assurance" that, though the operators are working for profit, they do not wish to do so at the expense of the public welfare, or the welfare of their neighbors. They're concerned about the economic factor, he said, because they operate on a narrow margin of profit. There are a lot of irresponsible people in the coal business, he admitted, but he predicted reassuringly that those irresponsibiles will bring about their own failure. He did not explain this process; presumably they will be dealt with by the same just and unerring Fate that so effectively deletes irresponsibility from the legal profession.

If the formalities and quibblings of the hearing room tended to diminish the urgency of the strip-mining problem, if the rebuttal of the coal companies seemed to imply that the issue of control was extremely debatable and surrounded by doubts, one had only to travel for a few hours on the back roads of East Kentucky to acquire a knowledge that would show the coal companies' self-justifications to be not only arrogant but vicious—and the division's proposals to be mild.

Standing at the edge of the bench of a new strip mine on the mountain in back of the coal camp of Hardburley, one can look down into a narrow cove at a house which might reasonably serve as model and emblem of the predicament of the whole region. As mountain houses go, this is an exceptionally good one. It has been well cared for. There is a neat grassy yard with a hedge fence, and a garden. The slope above it has been planted in young pines—undoubtedly with the help of the federal reforestation program. One can see, even from the height of the mine bench, that a man has taken a proud stand there, has put into the place the long and dear investment of his attention and love and work and hope; that because of the expenditure of himself there he has come to be in that place what he would not have come to be in any other place on earth. And one cannot stand there looking down without some sense of the great value, the great human potential—beyond profit making and productivity, and all our other fashionable and belittling sociological measures—of that man's response to the demands and attractions of that place.

---

* The "solid bench" is the horizontal plane of the cut in the mountainside.

But overhanging the house on three sides is the spoil bank of the mine. When I was there—in dry weather, soon after the cut had been opened—the spoil was already beginning to slide. The rest of the story is sorrowfully predictable. As soon as the winter rains have soaked the ground, great masses of muddy spoil will begin to flow down the slope toward the house, destroying the timber and all the life of the mountainside as it comes. Since there is no natural law that protects the plantings and buildings of men, it is probable that the descending spoil will eventually destroy the stand of young pines, the garden, the yard and the house itself. Or if the slide stops short of the house, the acid water from the opened coal seam will get into the well and make it unfit to use. It will pollute and kill the stream in the crease of the cove; where it once ran clear and glittering over the rocks it will begin to slide over a residue of mine filth, yellow, greasy-looking, stinking, utterly dead. Waters farther down will be polluted in their turn. And following the pollution will come the rubble and mud, filling up the stream beds, increasing the hazard of floods, destroying the health and the beauty of whole valleys. If the man of the house is not forced to move out of the danger of the sliding spoil, if in spite of all he chooses to stay, then he will live in a place as ugly and desolate as a city dump — the place, his life in relation to it, his hopes, his work, all as utterly destroyed as if bombed. And what then will his dreams be, and his hopes? How will he live then without a bitterness that will corrode and destroy him—and that none might dare hope would destroy only him?

Or one might drive up the valley road along Clear Creek at the foot of the same mountain—feeling the quietness and pleasantness of the pretty valley, and then coming aware of the presence in the tributary coves of the gray looming masses of spoil; coming aware that one is entering a doomed place—to see the story's end, not in prediction, but in fact: a house literally swept from the mountainside by a flow of mud and rubble from a spoil bank. And below the house, seeing the sterile earth and rock and splintered timber already cramming in to choke the little stream that runs there, one realizes that through its comely valley Clear Creek already runs as dead as a sewer.

Or one can travel the Little Shepherd Trail, recently built along the backbone of Pine Mountain to attract tourists to see the natural beauty of Kentucky. But even there if one wishes to specialize in natural beauty one dare not look to the east, for on that side, paralleling the Trail for many miles, the most prominent feature of the scenery is a huge strip-mine scar in the side of Big Black Mountain. After one looks to the east the mountains to the west will seem to stand precariously in the same storm light that surrounds the bison and the whooping crane. To look east is to receive the poison of a doom that one did not expect at all to come upon in the woods.

Most of the mineral rights in the Kentucky mountains were bought up sixty or so years ago, long before present mining practices had become imaginable, for as little as $1 an acre. If the price were all that was objectionable in those transactions, that alone would be cause to suspect any good intentions ever professed by the coal companies. But that is far from all.

Most of these purchases were legalized by deeds which conveyed, in addition to the ownership of the mineral, the right to build such roads, tipples, pit openings, etc., as would be necessary to remove the mineral from the property. The Kentucky courts—for reasons that may safely be left to the imagination—have until now held that this right implies the right to strip mine a person's farm or tract of timber without further payment. In other words, the surface rights on a piece of property, the mineral rights of which are held by a coal company, are now virtually worthless. At any time it pleases, the company may overturn the surface and whatever is on it—timber, croplands, buildings, roads, graveyards — without paying compensation or damages. And the point is not that this is legally possible, but that it is being done. Now, in the mountains of East Kentucky, it is common practice. The following complaint, printed in The Hazard Herald on September 30, is not unique, but typical:

> . . . they brought a scraper and pushed red dog from the road over into my garden and yard. When I got after them about this, they promised to get the red dog off my property and to replace my fence. My fence and fence posts are still lying flat on the ground where they left them. . . . One of their bulldozer operators unloaded his bulldozer right in the edge of my yard, drove it over a weeping willow tree that was about fifteen feet tall, breaking the tree off level with the ground. The men . . . told me that this . . . operator had been shell shocked in the war so he didn't know any better. So one cannot help wondering if all of these men have been shell shocked as none of them seems to have any respect for the other man's property. Next, the culvert at Jack's Branch was stopped up, by mud, rocks, and trees . . . and flooded my barn, my pig pen, washed away a large stack of lumber, and washed out my chicken lot.
>
> You can call their representative about all of this, and he tells you he has nothing to do with it. . . . Finally I managed to get a couple of calls through to this operator, but he practically makes fun of me for trying to get him to take care of the damage he has done to my property. I wonder what this man would do if someone treated him in the way he has treated me.

When the hearing was being held at Frankfort, a number of boulders (as large, it was estimated, as 60 tons) were allowed to roll off the bench of a strip mine into the vicinity of homes; three families were forced to move out for a time to avoid the danger. No warning had been given. (An officer of the company whose mine this was, testifying in Frankfort, said that it was "possible" that such incidents might have taken place, but he could not "remember" that any had.) At about the same time similar boulders were rolled across a county road at a time when a school bus might have been passing, again without any warning to anybody. One afternoon a housewife discovered, only by accident, that a blast was to be set off in a strip mine immediately above a road which a school bus would soon be traveling, and was able to call the principal in time for the children to be kept at school until the danger had passed.

The mining companies, then, have made it abundantly clear that they will destroy anything, they will stop at nothing, so long as the result can be inked in black on their accounting sheets. They have been abetted by the mischief and greed of local officials, by public indifference, by state paralysis, by federal cross-purposes and confusion. Against them there has been only a local organization of small landowners, The Appalachian Group to Save the Land and the People, headed by Leroy Martin of Hazard.

It has become plain that if there is to remain any hope at all for the region, strip mining, at least in its present methods, will have to be stopped. Otherwise, all the federal dollars devoted to the region's poor will have the same effect as rain pouring on an uprooted plant. To recover good hope and economic health the people need to have their land whole under their feet. And much of their land, seemingly beyond the reach of the bemused and fumbling powers that might have saved it, has already been destroyed.

To destroy a forest or an ecology or a species is an act of greater seriousness than we have perhaps yet grasped, and it is perhaps of graver consequence. But given even a comparatively short time, these destructions will mend. The forest will grow back, the natural balances will be restored, the ecological gap left by the destroyed species will be filled by another species. But to destroy the earth itself is to destroy all the possibilities of the earth, among them the possibility of recovery. The land destroyed by strip mining is destroyed forever; it will never again be what it was; it will never be what it would have become if let alone. Such destruction — which can now be accomplished on a vast scale by a few men in a short time—makes man a parasite upon the source of his life; it implicates him in the death of the earth, the destruction of his meanings. Those men who send the bulldozer blades into the mountainsides bear the awesome burden of responsibility for an act that no one can fully comprehend, much less justify.

And though violence to the earth must seem in the long view to be the gravest of their offenses, one is no less troubled by their violence to justice. For do not all our rights have as their ultimate expression and meaning the right of a man to be secure in his own home? When this right is no longer defended by any power greater than himself, his days begin to come to him by accident, in default of whatever caprice of power may next require his life. When the possessions and households of citizens are no longer honored by the acts, as well as the principles, of their government, then the concentration camp ceases to be one of the possibilities of human nature and becomes one of its likelihoods.

The new strip-mine legislation that Governor Breathitt is asking the 1966 legislature to pass would, according to the Louisville Courier-Journal, "come close to making the coal companies leave the land in the shape they found it." It would require that, in mining operations on steep slopes, the overburden be piled back in the cut, rather than pushed down the mountainside; it would promote an interstate strip-mining compact to create uniform controls among the states; it would stop damage to private property, and in other ways limit the surface destruction.

Today, before the enactment, and enforcement, of this legislation, some skepticism is still in order, but one must be encouraged by the apparent willingness of the Governor to risk measures based on an honest evaluation of the need. The new bills, if they are not so strict as some might have liked, are nevertheless more strict than might have been expected. They are too strict, they too willingly risk a bitter fight and the making of powerful enemies, to be merely a gesture. And so, in a state where political conflicts tend to be purely political, these bills give reason to begin to hope.

What is particularly hopeful about them is that they seem to be an effort by the state to pre-empt its own political and moral ground. If they are passed and enforced, we may be spared the necessity of a federal solution. And that—in a time when the federal government is often not only the ultimate authority but also the most immediate—is a most pleasing prospect.

No one, I think, welcomes the intervention of federal power in the affairs of a state, except as a last resort. That seems the crudest of solutions. It is not a moral solution at all. In being forced to do what is right, men lose the dignity of being right. The right itself is debased as an aim and incentive.

A state solution to the strip-mining problem is, of course, less desirable than a personal solution. One wishes that the persons who own the mineral rights and run the mines had taken for themselves the prerogative of responsible and just behavior. If they had been willing to govern themselves strictly enough, it seems unlikely that they would now face the prospect of being strictly governed. But a state solution is, by the same token, more desirable than a federal one. The closer to home the correction is made, the better it is—the more moral it is.

Mining interests will, as a matter of course, bitterly oppose the new laws. They can be expected to argue, as they have before, that further controls will seriously impair the coal economy, and that to impair the coal economy will be to impair the economy of the state. Their moral poverty is shown by the fact that this, their principal argument, has already been publicly discredited. It is now generally known that, while their profits are enormous, their contribution to the state's economy is small. Their property taxes, for instance, are notoriously low, and Kentucky has not imposed a severance tax. That in the last three-quarters of a century coal worth billions of dollars has been mined in East Kentucky, with the result that the region is now a "depressed area," ought to testify sufficiently to the real nature of the coal industry's contribution to the state's economy.

Another danger, not so much to the passage of the legislation as to its ultimate effectiveness and meaning, may lie in the idea of "control." There is a possibility that the legislation can have its fullest meaning only as an intermediate step, leading toward a law that will abolish strip mining altogether. Nagging at the hope aroused by the Governor's bills is the fear that the idea of controlled destruction may be as much a rationalization, as potentially a delusion, as the idea of limited war.

Still another danger is the possibility that the proposed laws will be looked on simply as a local solution to a local problem. Their importance seems to me to be much greater than that. They represent what may be the most advanced effort on the part of a state to deal with the problem of strip mining. But more significantly, they are part of an effort, still young and faltering, to correct our abuses of the earth. They are part of an awareness that the earth belongs not only to us but to our children. They take a stand against a crippling and peculiarly modern discrepancy between power and principle, the predicament of men whose use of the most powerful machines is governed by a morality that would be barely adequate to the use of a team of mules. The strip-mine issue brings to light only one of many monstrous possibilities created by the selfish use of principle—which is to say, contempt for principle—and by a moral climate in which a man can be, without discomfort to his conscience, only a coal operator, or only a doctor or only a general.

In attempting to control the local activities of a few men, Governor Breathitt and his supporters have become, in fact if not by intention, the opponents of a widespread and widely respected set of attitudes toward life and toward the earth: the assumptions, inherited from the frontier, that the natural world is an enemy to be conquered and exploited, and that its riches are inexhaustible; the identification of economic license with political freedom, and the corollary that a free man is somehow morally obligated to get rich, his worth directly proportionate to his wealth; the willingness to be subsidized by posterity, to become rich at the world's expense.

LETTERS

(Continued from inside front cover)

Siglo XXI. There is hope, then, that there will be a Spanish edition of Pedro Martinez. And if The Children of Sánchez created an uproar, Pedro Martinez may produce an earthquake.

M. Tejada

Adequate counsel

New York City

Dear Sirs: I sympathize with Margaret A. Fellows' defense of the memory of Emanuel Bloch, attorney for Julius and Ethel Rosenberg (letters column, The Nation, Dec. 27). It usually serves no purpose to slur anyone's memory, especially of one who, like Bloch, went through so much agony in a fight against overwhelming odds.

However, Fred J. Cook, in his review of Invitation to an Inquest makes a valid point; as the trial minutes in the Rosenberg case show, Gold was not cross-examined. It is incredible to any attorney versed in the trial of criminal cases that this should have occurred. Contrary to what Miss Fellows states, cross-examination of a witness does not depend on whether you have evidence which will contradict the testimony given by the witness. The purpose of cross-examination is to attack the witness' credibility. Since Gold left the stand without being cross-examined, the jury was permitted to believe that Gold's story was true. . . .

Although we cannot undo the Rosenberg result, we must understand that every defendant needs adequate counsel, not any counsel. This understanding is of prime importance today in view of the trend to provide indigent defendants with counsel paid by government. Such counsel should be experienced, independent, and possessed of the necessary determination to fight for their clients. Otherwise, we shall continue to witness the conviction and punishment of innocent people.

Samuel B. Waterman
Attorney at Law

Right to petition

New York City

Dear Sirs: Your readers might be interested to know of the difficulties I have encountered in trying to circulate the Freedom House petition, which supports the American commitment in Vietnam, at the New School for Social Research where I am a part-time student. . . . The New School just plain forbids me to collect signatures for this petition in its lobby, although analogous privileges plus the use of meeting rooms are generously bestowed upon the New School Radical Union and the New School Committee to End the War in Vietnam. . . . Currently I am pinning my hopes on the Civil Liberties Union, which has kindly interested itself in this matter, to restore the New School to the path of righteousness.

Jules Sandock

BARBARA POWERS

She Married a Sky Spy . . . . David Cort

The celebrated case of the U-2 pilot, Francis Gary Powers, shot down near Sverdlovsk in the Urals, could certainly not be closed until we heard what Powers' divorced wife had to say. This critical lacuna has now been filled by a paperback called Spy Wife, by Barbara Gay Moore Powers and W. W. Diehl (Pyramid, 60c).

Absurd, ignominious and barely readable though this true confession is, it also gives us some backdoor information, which we must appreciate, about the style of the Central Intelligence Agency, and the people it hires, not to speak of their families. From a moderately pretty and commonplace Georgia girl we ought to be able to read the truth, if we learn how to read her.

And so, what sort of girl is Barbara? She is the product of a representative Georgia family. Her mother, who is a matron in the Milledgeville mental hospital, has had four husbands: #1 disappeared, #2 died of a heart attack, #3 an alcoholic, was committed to the asylum, #4 also an alcoholic and also committed, was released. When the U-2 case broke, it meant to her primarily that her son-in-law was a $30,000-a-year man; she began spending on that scale, and got violent about it. Later, the family followed its magic formula by committing Barbara for alcoholism. However Barbara, who can type 160 words a minute, is not stupid and was out in five weeks. Her problem was not only alcohol; it was, she said, that her mother could outdrink her. Barbara looks on liquor as high style; her mother is more Georgian about it.

Powers, whom Barbara married while he was an Air Force lieutenant, apparently had no problems. Originally a shy farm boy, he was accomplished in archery, skin diving, tennis, bowling, hunting and speleology—a natural athlete. If we can believe Barbara, he never told her — after he joined Lockheed, fronting for the CIA—what he was doing. Eventually he offered her the cover story of "weather reconnaissance." This fact tells a good deal about both his taciturnity and his conjugal love.

Barbara's character comes out in her memoir style: of her wedding night, "Lordy, but how that Ridge Runner of mine could make love!"; after a miscarriage, "Gary was demanding my body within four days"; of the Parthenon, "its 48 [there are 46] great columns are thrilling to behold," and other dutiful tourist raptures. The Russians allowed her three hours alone with Powers in his cell. She says that under the pretense of holding hands they scribbled coded CIA messages on each other's palms. (This sounds preposterous, but how could anyone invent such nonsense?) A moment later, she says, she was naked ("stark," naturally) and they brought it off three times in the allotted three hours, doubtless scribbling code meanwhile on each other's anatomies. Back in the United States, the CIA's main line of interrogation was to determine that she was sure the man she had seen was Powers.

A good deal of Spy Wife is given to repleading her case at the divorce, and in a few years these passages will bore even Barbara. They may interest her mother's town of Milledgeville, where the bystanders included the late Flannery O'Connor whose fictional version of that society is in no way contradicted here.

At the end Barbara says that her secondary aim, after defending her fair name, is to expose "the highly questionable machinations" of the CIA. In support of this aim, she cites The Nation several times. The impression does come through that the CIA habitually acts with dreamy extravagance and summary haste. On May 6, 1960, five days after Powers' capture, two CIA men appeared at his wife's trailer in Adana, Turkey, at 5 A.M. and bundled her off (with a broken leg) to America. The CIA supplied the U-2 group with the "best houses" in Adana, described by Barbara as hovels, then with 50-foot house trailers. The group was forbidden to associate with other Americans, and thus entertained one another at unending cocktail parties. A C-47 was always available to fly the wives all over the Eastern world. Powers, when caught, was equipped with a poison needle in a silver dollar in case he felt like committing suicide. (He isn't the type.) When Powers was released, the CIA hid him out, first at the CIA-staffed Ashford Farms near Bellevue, Md., for twenty-four days, then whisked him with Barbara over the countryside in convoy, telling them to duck to the floor when passing through villages. At Powers' divorce, a CIA man was in court to nod permission to Powers to answer questions.

The CIA's every action breathes decision but not thought. What it needs is somebody who can think second or third thoughts.

Beyond this, one may wonder whether America typically produces espionage types who are not also automatic security risks. The college wild men, the check bouncers, the remittance men have not been accepted and tamed here, as they have in England. Actors and public relations men might be suitable for some CIA functions, but in America they prefer their careers. Perhaps a promising CIA crop is now being nurtured in the beatniks, after they calm down, or rev up. Perhaps the CIA should be taken over bodily by the high-pressure news magazines, with special assignments for True and Playboy. I wish I could solve the agency's personnel problem, but I doubt that espionage is a national talent.

Of course, Powers was not a spy; he was a mechanic and, so saying, James Donovan was able to negotiate the exchange of one true spy, Rudolph Abel, for three Americans, including Powers. Donovan flew home with Powers on February 10, 1962, and has this to say: "Powers was a special type. People at home had been critical of his performance. . . . Yet in charity, suppose you wished to recruit an American to sail a shaky espionage glider over hostile Russia. . . . Powers was a man who, for adequate pay, would do it, and as he passed over Minsk, would calmly reach for a salami sandwich."

Aside from the fact that the sandwich was Spam, pimiento and tuna fish, many men would settle for that much of an apostrophe.

David Cort is a frequent Nation contributor.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Pathology of Undevelopment

THE FERMENT OF REALISM: American Literature, 1884-1919. By Warner Berthoff. The Free Press. 330 pp. $5.95.

Sherman Paul

This book, the first in a seven-volume history of American literature, is a remarkable essay in literary history. It has what Mr. Berthoff, in discussing the literature of argument, considers the classic qualities of the arts: "original perception, compositional intelligence, and concordant style." Its intellectual performance is sustained and will delight those who, already moderately informed about the literature and history of the period, take pleasure in discrimination and judgment and elegant formulation. From Henry James, the most complete and accomplished writer of the period, Mr. Berthoff has learned the requisites of art and criticism, and while he tests for the one, he practices the other, showing himself to be, as he says of James, "exactly discriminating in judgment [and] steadily perceptive in defining the virtue and limitation of individual cases."

His book surmounts most of the difficulties (and tediousness) of this loose genre by being literary history in a precise sense. Artfully composed of individual cases, it is a history of formal achievement or, better, a celebration of the moments in our history of artistic mastery. Mr. Berthoff characterizes writers and defines their artistic (formal and moral) success and failure. In reassessing the work of Twain's last years he indicates his rule: ". . . there is little point in making false claims for the writings conveying it [the spectacle of Twain's compassion and anguish]. They belong, surely, to the tortuous natural history of the American spirit but not to the creative record of American literature."

The literary moments are few—that is the lesson of this history and, if treated as rigorously, probably of the remainder of our history. The landscape is as bleak as that surveyed by Van Wyck Brooks, only the reason is to be found less in the pressures of a hostile environment than in deficiencies of craftsmanship and moral insight. Berthoff is as concerned as Brooks with the failure of American writers, but where Brooks inveighed in their behalf and gave them a usable past and a sense of the literary life, Mr. Berthoff instructs them in the requirements of high literature and sets before them, when our history permits, the masters who, for him as for Eliot in the essay on tradition and the individual talent, are permanently available teachers. (This, incidentally, is a principle guiding his sense of continuities.) His judgment of most of the period is contained in a remark on the literary nationalism of magazines like The Seven Arts and the pre-twenties Dial which, he notes, did not speak "so clearly for new standards of judgment and performance" as their European counterparts: "It is an appealing faith, but it was not one by which writers were likely to get their proper practical education and come into their mature growth."

Like many critics before him, Berthoff is troubled by this conspicuous problem of nurture. He says of Ellen Glasgow, for example, that "what once seemed an exemplary career in the service of a steadily maturing art now presents itself as one more monotonous case history in the pathology of American undevelopment"; of Willa Cather, that "she matured late and hardened early, in the American fashion"; of Frost, that he cherished his personal and technical individuality at the expense of "another kind of development that can best be described as imaginative and moral." His touchstone of the middlebrow writer, a new phenomenon then, is a "thoroughly parasitic" regard for craft, an "underprovided" imagination. His summary judgment of such critics as Babbitt, More and Brownell is that none of their work "contributed much to the effort of the significant artists and writers of the period. . . ." Mr. Berthoff does not look to any special virtue of the American soil, as the literary nationalists did, for the necessary nourishment, and his endorsement of expatriation, formally completing the argument and design of his book, is an endorsement of education. The young writers—as if having come to the conclusion of this book—seek out the masters and critics who can teach them their craft. (In his previous book, The Example of Melville, Mr. Berthoff pursues this end.)

Mr. Berthoff's judgments are strict and tend to depress the desire one has to read the many books his own genuine gusto for literature has led him to read. One assents to a comment made in connection with James: "The demands the few greatly creative writers make on our attention, and the rewards they offer, are so remarkable and so continuous that their lesser contemporaries are lucky to be commemorated at all." By using the lesser contemporaries as foils, Mr. Berthoff commemorates them. By assigning places, he adds to their ranks: Howells, for compromising his themes; Herrick, for his condescension and irritation ("peculiar disorders of the dispossessed superior man of modern times"); Norris, for a style which, he says, "is as if Cole Porter had written novels"; Wharton, for punishing her characters. Given a higher place than that usually accorded them are Lafcadio Hearn, "a maker of verbal shapes and forms," in whose writing "we sense his hold upon a wider literary culture and also a more discriminating feeling for style than in almost any other American of his time"; Sarah Jewett, whose The Country of the Pointed Firs "marks the crystallization of the broad undifferentiated impulse toward realism in America into the durable forms of an objectively valid art"; Henry Adams, whose Esther "Howells, for all his rumination about 'moral complicity,' could not have written . . . in a hundred years"; Stephen Crane, for his "irresistible authority" as a visionary writer; Dreiser, for introducing "a new seriousness and authenticity into American realism"; Robinson, for having "the foremost talent in American poetry between Whitman and Eliot." Those already securely placed re-earn their places under critical scrutiny: Twain, James, Frost. And—it is the most notable and original thing about the book—writers of the literature of argument are judged by the same literary standards and given the prominent place their achievements deserve: Veblen, William James, Henry Adams. (Dewey, "a remarkably careless writer," is not rated highly.)

Sherman Paul is professor of English at the University of Illinois. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press).

One might feel that the concentration on literary essentials rather than historical circumstances results in a lack of thickness. But there is considerable history here, not only in the opening chapter (the least notable) but everywhere, because the close treatment of themes opens into history in the most sensitive way. The discussion of Dreiser's "middle-placed floaters" (Lester Kane in Jennie Gerhardt) is an exemplary case in point. Then, the wide education needed by the critic who sets about placing secures those relevancies that give depth to the book. The present is a constant dimension. "Churchill," we are told, "could tell his conventional story as efficiently as could, say, James Gould Cozzens a generation later, and with a distinctly pleasanter wit"; history, H.R. Trevor-Roper notwithstanding, should be written in the grand manner. Yeats measures Frost, as the great Europeans measure their American contemporaries. Henry Brewster is introduced to prefigure the present sensibility. Twain is linked with another "artist-performer," Charlie Chaplin; Poe keeps appearing in the discussions of Bierce, Hearn and Crane; and other threads of continuity are suggested — most brilliantly in the case of Emerson and William James, and in the treatment of Robinson's wordiness. Mr. Berthoff speaks of his "piecemeal chronicle," but provides all the unity he needs when, in passing, he mentions "that passion for interior truthfulness which since Emerson and Poe has remained the central formal motive in all our practice of the arts."

The only large flaw in the book is the brief final chapter, which seems to me too sweeping and unsupported in its judgments. The period did not come to an end so simply. Expatriation was, of course, sometimes undertaken for the purposes of art education but, more often, as a repudiation of politics. There were "schools" at home: "291," Others, The Dial. It is not just to say that the "best prospective members [of a national school] abruptly turned away," for some stayed, poets like Crane and Williams, critics like Rosenfeld and Wilson, who even at home learned from the masters. And it is unfair, as also in the case of Babbitt and More, to consider criticism in a way so restricted that its role in creating intellectual situations (from which artists benefit) counts for nothing. Perhaps the volume that follows will modify these judgments—judgments which in no way detract from my belief that Mr. Berthoff is one of the few historians of our literature who have thoroughly and finely possessed it.

The Knack of Doing Double Duty

THE OLD GLORY. By Robert Lowell. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 194 pp. $4.95.

Alexander Laing

This trilogy of short plays, spotted across two centuries, is a speculation upon the harshness with which representative Americans behave under stress. There is no other unifying resemblance between the protagonists. Governor John Endecott, in the 1630s, asserts the force of the state. Robin, a fictional Deerfield youth, carries in 1775 only the power of his cudgel. Captain Amasa Delano resorts, in 1800, to the armaments of his private ship. Their behavior is symbolically unified by the use of flags at the climaxes and through a deepening ambivalence of motive.

Robert Brustein's preface, adapted from his review of the original production a year ago, claims that The Old Glory "heralds the arrival not just of a brilliant new dramatist but of one who may very well come to revolutionize the American theater." It would be a glory indeed if, in the pattern of Marlowe or Molière, a poet could reinvigorate our vacuous stage. Jonathan Miller abets this hope when he refers in a separate note to Robert Lowell's "rich proposals" during rehearsals, "all pointing the way to some unprecedented reward of new drama." But Miller, British director of the New York production, admits that the "grand design" was "seriously damaged" when the first play had to be jettisoned before the opening night. This play, Endecott and the Red Cross, presumably is now printed with the benefit of many doctorings in rehearsal to which Miller alludes. It still has structural flaws that pose

---

Alexander Laing conducts seminars at Dartmouth College in modern poetry and in the literature of voyages. His poetry has been published in The Nation, The New Yorker, The Atlantic Monthly and other periodicals. He is the author, most recently, of American Sail (Dutton), and is currently at work on a history of exploration in the Pacific.

CURRENT
905 Madison Avenue, New York 10021

Here's my dollar for your three-month special introductory offer.

Name ....

Street ....

City .... State .... Zip ....
N-1

If your wide ranging interests outrun your reading time, Current is the magazine for you.

Each month Current gives you the essence of news and ideas extracted from more than 600 major newspapers, magazines, books, professional journals—even radio and television scripts! Current gives order, shape and form to this overwhelming mass of communication, offering the best thinking on major issues in a format that provides a balanced view.

The scope of Current is the scope of involved people everyhere. From Foreign Policy to Farm Policy, Education to Economic Aid, Science to Segregation, Current is the one publication that can give you perspective on every vital issue.

"Unique coverage of contemporary ideas and issues," says John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. "Indispensable to a busy man," says Paul G. Hoffman, Managing Director, United Nations Special Fund.

Because we're sure you'll agree, we make this special offer: Try Current for 3 months for only $1. Simply fill in the coupon above, mail it with a dollar bill. See how easy it is to keep current.

If you can't read everything read Current a mournful question: does a poet who may revolutionize our theatre assume that a work which he has not yet made playable is good enough to be read? Is he returning us toward the condition he might amend, an admitted distinction between workable theatre and dramatic verse?

For 2,000 years, poetry was the normal utterance of playwrights. Old verse plays have persisted as the surest staples of the commercial theatre, even while new ones of the last century or two have been relegated more and more often to the condescension of closet audiences. We know that a deft versifier with a good sense of dramaturgy (Maxwell Anderson) can meet the competition of Broadway; a fine poet (Robinson Jeffers) can give new voice to the supplied structure of a play already famous. The question now is whether we can hope to see again the artist who creates as poet and playwright both, who—rather than restate a greatness provided—can by his own invention raise traditional material to a loftier dramatic utterance, in a new shape. Can we have this hope of Lowell? Miller cut his curtain raiser because it has "too many scenes of ritual festivity with long passages of contemplative recitative." To put it candidly, Governor Endecott displays his mind to the audience by addressing a series of stooges. One of them, Elder Palfrey, belatedly objects:

> You are talking statecraft. This is over my head.

Exactly. The line itself is the playwright's on-stage apology for having committed much too much contemplative recitative, the dismal sin of plays done for the academic "poet's theatre."

The retention of a free audience, even in the Theatre of the Absurd, requires a continuous perceptible alteration—in the relationship between players, or within a single player who, like Prometheus or Krapp, is pitted alone against circumstance. An admiring director's difficulty with Lowell's first play evidently proceeded from the manner in which it merely shuttles back and forth between two static conditions: soliloquy and choreography.

Endecott and the Red Cross takes its name from one of Nathaniel Hawthorne's Twice-Told Tales; its content comes mainly from another, "The Maypole at Merrymount" and from Thomas Morton's chaotic New English Canaan of 1637. Morton was the proprietor of a gaily pagan settlement which lasted only as long as you might think in the back yard of New England puritanism. Hawthorne's Governor Endecott closely defines his independence from Archbishop Laud by cutting only the red cross of the state church out of England's flag, then calls for a flourish "in honor of the ensign of New England" as he waves the remainder. Lowell's Endecott cuts down the entire flag, kicks it, and at once orders the murder of his inoffensive Indian captives—a hint, in collapsed time, that full independence will foster a cruel contempt for old legal safeguards.

This first play, derived from three overlapping sources, gave Lowell his freest chance to create his own dramatic structure; yet in this it is notably weak. His dramatic inventiveness operates to far better effect in the second play, My Kinsman, Major Molineux, based upon the provided, finely dramatic structure of Hawthorne's single narrative. Hawthorne carefully underplays the drama and enhances the mystery as Robin, aged 18, enters Boston by ferry in the evening, seeking the preferment that an affluent uncle can bestow within a system of privilege. His inquiries are met by truculence and mockery until the reason emerges in a lurid climax. The Bostonians themselves were seeking out Robin's Tory kinsman, who suddenly is drawn around a corner, tarred and feathered. As the mob jeers its anguished victim, in both story and play, Robin emerges from his horror to laugh loudest of all.

Holding closely to details of Hawthorne's main dramatic movement, Lowell admirably displays the dramatist's knack of making them do double duty. There is a hint of Charon in the ferryman who vanishes early out of Hawthorne's tale; Lowell brings him back at the climax to act as Charon in fact. Robin is given, in the play, a younger brother who experiences the bafflements with a difference. The boys' talk, far better managed than Endecott's harangues at his audience-surrogates, replaces much of Hawthorne's narration. There are evocative new symbols such as the proliferating rattlesnake flag. Hawthorne's last inference is strengthened: that the young seeker of privilege will be able, in the new order, to rise by native wit.

On paper, this is emphatically the best drama of the three.

The structure of Lowell's third play is taken more selectively from another single original, Herman Melville's morose novella, Benito Cereno, which lately has been sequestered by some of its academic explicators in weird shoals of guff. Its chief oddity, a clutter of redundant legal documentation embedded near the end, can be explained simply enough. A superbly talented writer, in the sharp decline of his fortunes, was hacking for Putnam's Magazine when he wrote it, at $5 a page. He wearily padded out his third magazine installment by copying word for word, with necessary minor changes, a large part of the 20 pages of depositions with which Amasa Delano sought to validate the peculiar story he told in Chapter XVIII of his 1817 Narrative.

Robert Lowell concludes his play in time to ignore all of this, and uses the action in Melville sparingly. Again a contrapuntal character, John Perkins, is newly invented to develop the protagonist's qualities. Much of the dialogue has no relation to anything in the source. The playwright is beginning to free himself. The manner and the reason deserve attention because the sense of Hawthorne's stories can translate directly into a sympathetic contemporary relevance, whereas Melville's is a pattern of splendors and crudities adding up to a moral disaster. I see no evidence that Lowell, in amending its inferences, went back on this occasion to the primary source for dramatic verities that Melville reversed.

The historic Captain Delano, visiting a disabled Spanish ship at a remote anchorage, was puzzled by her captain's reticence. As Delano pushed off, Don Benito leaped down into the boat to reveal that he had been the intimidated captive of his Negro "body servant," Muri. (In the original account, Melville combined Muri the "body-servant" and Babo the ringleader of the revolt, into a single character, further developed by Lowell.) Captain Delano dispatched his mate with a boarding party to retake the slave ship from the slaves who had risen under Babo. In maritime law, the ship and surviving slaves now belonged, on shares, to the American crew. Delano nevertheless gave her back to Don Benito, who then sought to cheat his benefactors of even the small fee asked for their services and their wounds. An upright Spanish judge frustrated him.

Melville turns the scoundrelly slaver, Don Benito, into a gentle figure of pathos. He makes the heroic slaves into crafty beasts. His kindest image is animalistic: a woman like a doe with her fawn at breast, its hands "two paws." The ship's defenders' "red tongues lolled, wolf-like, from their black mouths. But the pale sailors' teeth were set." When this was written the Dred Scott case was creeping to a climax. Lowell gives his Delano some of Melville's less virulent phrases concerning Negroes. The stage business is rich in new invention, but the vigor of Melville's appalling tale is lost. Don Benito's dramatic leap becomes a limp speech:

> Don't you understand? He has been holding a knife at my back.

The mate and some seamen were severely wounded, in the primary account, by Negroes who fought with "desperate courage." Lowell gives us a stylized mowing down of Negroes by whites. The prototype of Babo in the prior versions was tried and hanged ashore. Lowell's Delano shoots his Babo six times with an anachronistic revolver.

This third play, while inferior in several respects to the fully successful second one, is more complex and original; the moral point, stressed by Delano and inverted by Melville, dwindles to a wry inference.

A comment, finally, is due upon the praise directed toward Lowell for his Jamesian sense of the past, as well as for the poetry of his lines. Here the frequent anachronisms, which I suppose are intended, present a problem. Few readers will care that Samuel Colt has not yet been born when Delano (who in the real fight killed nobody) slaughters Babo with a six-shooter. More will sense a false note in "a beautiful but dumb English actress . . . looked like a 'moron.'" Lowell seems in his mixed idiom to be trying to generalize time. He succeeds rather more in fragmenting it. It seems to me that a sense of the past is achieved not through mannerisms (Wouldst thou?) but from a flawless validity of idiom. I find the times of Aristophanes more believable in the rowdy 20th-century idiom of Dudley Fitts's version of The Birds than in any of the austere translations: it creates a time wholly consistent within itself. Lowell ranges from passages of lofty symbolic poetry with an antique flavor—odd in a rough seaman's mouth—to bits of our current slang. His seagoing neighbors could have saved him from such howlers as "sealing spears" and hogsheads of water in a whaleboat. Such lapses, singly, matter no more than stout Cortez on the wrong mountain. When there are too many, as there are here, they nick away at the suspension of disbelief.

On the hopeful side, the very variations within the trilogy indicate a restless experimentation which may culminate in a single major work, of poetry and drama both, if the poet can abandon the unsuccessful parts of his experiment as he proceeds.

To Keep the Pot Boiling

LETTERS FROM JACK LONDON. Edited by King Hendricks and Irving Shepard. The Odyssey Press. 502 pp. $10.

Franklin Walker

This year will see the fiftieth anniversary of Jack London's death in Glen Ellen, as well as the ninetieth anniversary of his birth in San Francisco. Of the fifty volumes he produced during his short writing career, which spanned less than two decades, perhaps a dozen are available to the American buyer in hard-cover and paper editions. In the United States, no complete edition of his writings, popular or scholarly, has appeared, although three such editions have come out in Russia; and in England, The Bodley Head is currently bringing out an admirable series of reprints under the editorship of Arthur Calder-Marshall. While London is available to American readers who wish to survey all of his writing only through libraries and a markedly inflated second-hand book market, he continues to be translated and published abroad more extensively than most American and British writers, past or present. The Index Translationum, compiled by the United Nations, has consistently indicated the great vogue of London in such widely differing cultures as Rumania, Sweden and Italy.

Though, since his death he has not had as many readers in America as he has deserved, his life has continued to form the basis for myth, to provide the substance with which to create a folk-hero. The admirably developed Jack London State Park at Glen Ellen is one of the most popular excursion spots in California. In Oakland, Jack London Square, created beside the water front from which Jack used to sail his boats, has become the heart of the city's restaurant business, with neither businessman nor tourist caring a whit whether Jack was a juvenile delinquent or a Marxist who signed his letters with a rubber stamp: "Yours for Revolution." Quite correctly they see him as a rebel with stamina, an Alger boy who made good, a spirited adventurer whose life was as exciting as his books. Both to the popular reader and to the scholar (who has long neglected London) Letters from Jack London tells more about the man and the writer than anything which has appeared since London's autobiographical novel, Martin Eden, and his "alcoholic memoirs," John Barleycorn.

King Hendricks of Utah State University, and Irving Shepard, literary executor of the London estate, have selected approximately 400 letters from the more than 2,000 which are extant in libraries and private hands throughout the country as most representative of London's personality and growth. The great bulk of the letters are taken from the extensive London collection at the Huntington Library. With minor reservations, the choice of letters for the volume has been judicious and the result truly representative. Scholars familiar with the London correspondence will recognize that the heart of many of the major items in the collection—the letters to Mabel Apple-

---

Franklin Walker is professor of English at Mills College. He is the author of Frank Norris: A Biography (Russell and Russell) and Jack London and the Klondike, to be published by The Huntington Library.

I WANT TO KNOW
How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out
If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______
STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

garth, Cloudesley Johns, Anna Strunsky and George Sterling—were included by Charmian London in her biography, The Book of Jack London (1921). However, Hendricks and Shepard have not only supplied the full texts of these letters, and restored Charmian London's censorship of an important letter to Mabel Applegarth ("if I were a woman I would prostitute myself to all men but that I would succeed"); but they have arranged the letters chronologically, have faithfully retained the original spellings and punctuation (except for obvious typographical errors), and have provided a working modicum of informative rather than interpretive footnotes. Even more to the point, they have drawn from the complete file of the Cloudesley Johns letters, recently purchased by the Huntington Library, from the letters to Anna Strunsky which she generously gave to the library before her death, and from the very important correspondence with George P. Brett of The Macmillan Company. Valuable additions are the letters to George Sterling, used only sparingly by Charmian London, in which London is more relaxed and outspoken than in most of his letters (note, for instance, his glee at being able to bring George a gift from the Solomons of "a clitoris, dried with appurtenances attached and strung on a string for an ear ornament"), his exchange of letters with Sinclair Lewis about buying plots from the latter, and his previously unpublished letters to Bessie London, his first wife, and to his daughter Joan (who later was to write the best biography which has appeared about her father). And there are a host of miscellaneous letters reflecting almost every aspect of London's personality.

As a whole the collection supports the editors' claim of creating "a fairly accurate image of London, his intellectual and physical vigor, his impetuousness, his dreams and doubts and frustrations." For orientation, the reader is supplied with brief chronologies in each of the four sections: "Early Years" (when London was learning to write after returning from the Klondike); "Rise to Fame" (which saw the publication of both The Call of the Wild and The Sea-Wolf, in addition to adventures in England and Korea); "The Years of the Snark" (principally concerned with London's voyage to the South Seas); and "The Years of the Beauty Ranch" (during which London developed his huge ranch in The Valley of the Moon, saw his elaborate "Wolf House" burn down, and deteriorated physically and as a writer). Most valuable of all aids to the reader, at least to the scholar, is the excellent index which lists not only recipients of letters but references to events, writings and persons within the letters. There are some excellent, informal illustrations. Unfortunately the publishers have not done full justice to the material; the type is good but the binding gives symptoms of breaking easily at the spine and the dust jacket would disgrace a box of Crackerjack.

Among the letters, the later ones often present a very discouraging picture of London in his more bellicose and less happy days. The letters to his divorced wife, Bessie Maddern London, in particular, do nothing to endear the writer to posterity; his repeated use of such epithets to her as a "mere jealous sexually-offended, unmotherly, peasant-minded female" is discouraging, to say the least. And in his letters to his daughter, Joan, though it is evident that he craves her respect and love, he is so given to blustering at her that it is a wonder she even considered visiting him at his Beauty Ranch.

The London that comes through as most interesting, and most attractive, is the younger London talking about his youth, about his adventures, about his reading enthusiasms, and about his writing methods. Among his many activities, there is less stress on his socialism than one would expect, although he mentions this interest occasionally and not infrequently writes to some stranger who has inquired about "the Cause." Perhaps the most telling comments on his attitudes as a Socialist appear in a letter to George Sterling, who had asked him, a month after London's The War of the Classes appeared, if he would back financially a Socialist paper which Sterling and a friend wished to start. "It's this way, George: I feel that I have done and am doing a pretty fair share of work for the Revolution. I guess my lectures alone before socialist organizations have netted the Cause a few hundred dollars, and my wounded feelings from the personal abuse of the Capitalist papers ought to be rated at several hundred more. There is not a day passes that I am not reading up on socialism and filing socialist clippings and notes. The amount of work that I in a year contribute to the cause of socialism would earn me a whole lot of money if spent in writing fiction for the market."

As for the writings of Karl Marx, he refers as often to those of Robert Browning, whose dramatic force and optimistic philosophy appealed to him very much as a young man, just as Kipling rather than Hardy was the model for his early writings. He even planned to write a novel to be called "The Flight of the Duchess"; though it was to be laid in contemporary California, he confided to Anna Strunsky that it would have "a similar motive to Browning's," presumably referring to the latter's "The Last Duchess."

Although the first letter in the collection was written in 1898 when London was 22, just back from a highly important winter in the Klondike, there is much in the correspondence that reflects both the misery and the adventure of his childhood and early youth. To Mabel Applegarth, who undeservedly became the prototype for Ruth Morse in Martin Eden, he complained bitterly that he had gone without food when he was hungry and had worked since he was 10 to help support the family: "Meat, I was that hungry for it I once opened a girl's basket and stole a piece of meat—a little piece the size of my two fingers. . . . In those days, like Esau, I would have literally sold my birthright for a mess of pottage, a piece of meat." In another mood he confided to Cloudesley Johns his joy at getting away from home and going on his own. "When I was just sixteen I broke loose and went off on my own hook. Took unto myself a mistress of the same age, lived a life of wildest risk in which I made more money in one week than I do in a year now, and then, to escape the inevitable downward drift, broke away from everything and went to sea." And to the editor of The Youth's Companion he explained in detail just where the Tales of the Fish Patrol were true, just where they were fiction.

The references to his early life are but foretastes of the drama and enthusiasm with which he always greeted experience, including reading and writing books, during his 20s. Almost as soon as he started publishing he struck up an acquaintance (through correspondence) with another writer his own age, Cloudesley Johns, and with Johns he discussed in detail his reading interests, his writing efforts and his contacts with those around him. In these letters he rarely becomes tiresome, practically never strident or blustering. Equally revealing are his letters to Anna Strunsky, a student he met at Stanford shortly before he married Bessie Maddern. It is quite possible that he might have married Anna Strunsky if she had not been Jewish. As it was, he wrote letters to her which show more idealism and a deeper emotional response than his letters to any other woman; he, in fact, collaborated with her in producing The Kempton-Wace Letters, in which Anna treated love poetically, while Jack treated it "scientifically."

His fairly quick financial success always seemed to him something of a miracle and the living standard it made possible was sometimes accepted as an aspect of a game, at other times as a dream which might vanish overnight. To Anna Strunsky he confided: "I dined yesterday, on canvasback and terrapin, with champagne sparkling and all manner of wonderful drinks I had never before tasted warming my heart and brain, and I remembered the sordid orgies and carouses of my youth. We were ill-clad, ill-mannered beasts, and the drink was cheap and poor and nauseating. And then I dreamed dreams, and pulled myself out of the slime to canvasback and terrapin and champagne, and learned that it was solely a difference of degree which art introduced into the fermenting."

Though he made more and more money, he spent it faster than he made it. It was not that he was extravagant or profligate; a surprising amount of his earnings went to helping others. He was almost inordinately generous with the people he liked. Typical is his account to Johns of his running expenses when he was just beginning to sell stories. "Christmas is just past. Further, a friend has taken up writing with seven children and an undeveloped ability, which said friend I have been helping to finance. Another, both ankles broken badly some time since. Then my mother . . . got back in her debts and I have just finished straightening her out. . . . And my Mammie Jennie (Negro foster mother) came down upon me . . . for delinquent taxes. Furthermore, within a week I expect my wife to be confined."

The story of London's success as a writer is told most fully in his correspondence with George P. Brett of The Macmillan Company. Brett saw his possibilities early in London's career, and by sympathetic advice and treatment, kept him with Macmillan for the rest of his life, except for a short period when London, to his quick regret, turned to another publisher. It is unfortunate that Brett's letters to London have not been included in this collection, for they show him dealing with London with kindness, good sense and helpfulness, comparable to those displayed by Maxwell Perkins in working with Wolfe and Fitzgerald. There is space here for only one excerpt from London's many letters to Brett. "Of course my hope, once I get on my feet, is not to write prolifically, but to turn out one book, and a good book, a year. Even as it is, I am not a prolific writer. I write very slowly. The reason I have turned out so much is because I have worked constantly, day in and day out, without taking a rest. Once I am in a position, where I do not have to depend upon each day's work to keep the pot boiling for the next day, where I do not have to dissipate my energies on all kinds of hack, where I can slowly and deliberately ponder and shape the best that is in me, then, at that time, I am confident that I shall do big work."

In Defense of Nationality

THE WESTERN HERO: In History and Legend. By Kent Ladd Steckmesser. University of Oklahoma Press. 281 pp. $5.95.

Robert Alan Aurthur

At this very instant a dozen writers of TV Westerns are sitting in Nate-'n-Al's delicatessen in Beverly Hills who should never read The Western Hero: In History and Legend. It is difficult enough grinding out those endless episodes without learning from Dr. Steckmesser that your profitable dreams have little basis in fact. Nor is it a book for the tender-minded among us who need the legends, indeed profess to live by them, and are soothed by the thought of a time in our recent history, to which so many would like to return, when men were pure, issues simple, and freedom easily attainable by those willing to take direct action.

For example, Dwight D. Eisenhower, himself somewhat of a legend, is quoted as follows by Dr. Steckmesser from a speech delivered in November, 1953: "I was raised in a little town . . . called Abilene, Kansas. We had as our Marshal a man named Wild Bill Hickok. Now that town had a code and I was raised as a boy to prize that code. It was: Meet anyone face to face with whom you disagree. You could not sneak up on him from behind, or do any damage to him, without suffering the penalty of an enraged citizenry. If you met him face to face and took the same risks as he did, you could get away with almost anything, as long as the bullet was in front."

It is surely a coincidence and not a deliberate thrust at our former President that James Butler ("Wild Bill") Hickok is one of the four Western archetypes chosen by Dr. Steckmesser to be studied in depth. Nowhere can the differences between fact and legend be more clearly drawn than in the case of "Wild Bill."

According to Dr. Steckmesser, the truth about Hickok as Marshal of Abilene was that he was a well-known boozer, womanizer, and suspected grafter who operated mainly as a gambler from the Alamo saloon. He did shoot a lot of people, some of them known bad men and some innocents, but these acts of violence were usually against other drunks and gamblers whom Hickok shot first and investigated afterward. There is not a single recorded instance of "Wild Bill" (or any other Western "hero," for that matter) ever dueling another gunman in empty, dusty streets as a result of

---

Robert Alan Aurthur's name has been attached as writer, editor or producer to many of the best TV shows of the last decade. He is currently adapting The Sailor Who Fell From Grace With the Sea for the screen.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 1-24-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

challenge. In fact, it's possible that the only time Hickok was challenged, by the notorious Texas desperado, John Wesley Hardin, "Wild Bill" talked his way out over a bottle of champagne.

The author marks the beginning of the Hickok legend at Rock Creek, Neb., in 1858, when at age 21, James Butler (not yet "Wild Bill") was employed by a freighting firm as a teamster and station attendant. A man named McCanles, owed money by the freight company, came one day with two companions (all unarmed) and his 12-year-old son to press the station agent, Horace Wellman, for payment. Dr. Steckmesser, in his extraordinarily well annotated and impressively documented book, describes the scene that followed:

> As McCanles stood outside the station demanding Wellman's appearance, Hickok fired from behind a curtain in the station and killed him with a single rifle bullet in the heart. When Woods and Gordon [McCanles's friends] ran up to the cabin, Hickok again fired and wounded both of them. Woods fell near the station, where Wellman came out and crushed his skull with a hoe. Gordon ran along the Creek until "Doc" Brink, the station stocktender, caught up with him and ended his misery with a shotgun blast. Young Monroe McCanles raced back to the McCanles ranch three miles away and sobbed out his story.

So much for ". . . (meeting) him face to face and (taking) the same risks. . . ." As for an "enraged citizenry," Hickok, Wellman and Brink were acquitted on pleas of self-defense in a trial overseen by a justice of the peace who later as county treasurer was arrested for embezzlement. Young Monroe was not allowed to testify.

The distortion of the McCanles affair was begun immediately by Hickok himself who attempted a partial justification by falsely claiming McCanles to be a Confederate conspirator. After the Civil War the incident, Dr. Steckmesser tells us, ". . . was later resurrected by Hickok biographers to become one of the most celebrated exploits in Western legend." Subsequent accounts identified McCanles as the leader of a gang of ten fully-armed desperadoes whom "Wild Bill" dispatched single-handed.

Hickok might never have become the prototype of Western virtue and heroism if he had not been selected by a writer for Harper's magazine, George Ward Nichols, as the subject of an article that would, according to Dr. Steckmesser, ". . . create a character who would fascinate Eastern readers . . . [as well as] create a type-figure of the frontiersman." In attaining his ends Nichols shamelessly distorted facts, made up stories with little or no basis, and thus created a myth that, while fulfilling all the needs of 19th-century romantic literature, bears little resemblance to the real Hickok. Interestingly enough, Nichols himself accompanied his article with this note: "My object here has been to make a slight record of one who is one of the best—perhaps the very best—example of a class who more than any other encountered perils and privations in defense of our nationality."

Unable to find such a real-life paragon, Nichols made him up. Other writers, among them Henry M. Stanley and George Armstrong Custer, later took up the legend and thrust it beyond any reality, a process furthered by dozens of dime novels and biographies—right up to our own time of motion pictures and television. Writing about Hickok was a side line for General Custer who perpetuated his own legend by writing mainly of himself, a self-serving pastime not limited to generals of that era.

One is tempted to deal with Dr. Steckmesser's book in the simple terms of an "exposé," but that would be doing the work a grave disservice. The Western legend is too secure and too deeply ingrained in our national cultural dream to be shaken by any one book, in any case. What Dr. Steckmesser, a historian now teaching at Los Angeles State College, has done is taken Hickok, "The Gunfighter

THREE PRESIDENTS

Andrew Jackson

I want to be a white horse!
I want to be a white horse on the green mountains!
A horse that runs over wooden bridges, and sleeps
In abandoned barns . . .

Theodore Roosevelt

When I was President I ate crackers with Calvin Coolidge.
I crushed snails with my bare teeth.
I slept in my underwear in the White House.
I ate the Cubans with a straw, and Lenin dreamt of me every night.
I wore down a forest of willow trees.
I ground the snow, and sold it.
The mountains of Texas shall heal our cornfields,
Overrun by the yellow race.
As for me, I want to be a stone. Yes!
I want to be a stone laid down thousands of years ago,
A stone with invisible cracks! Holding up the edge of the house!
I want to be a stone that gets up and runs around at night,
And lets the bedroom fall, that leaps into the water
Carrying the thief down with him.

John F. Kennedy

I want to be a stream of water falling.
I want to be water falling from high in the mountains,
Water that dissolves everything,
That is never drunk, falling from ledge to ledge, glass to glass.
I want the air around me to be invisible, resilient,
Able to flow past rocks.
I will carry the boulders with me to the valley.
Then ascending I will fall through space again:
Glittering in the sun, like the crystal in sideboards,
Goblets of the old life, before it was ruined by the Church.
And when I ascend the third time, I will fall forever,
Missing the earth entirely.

Robert Bly

and Civilizer"; Kit Carson, "The Mountainman"; Billy the Kid, "The Outlaw"; and George Armstrong Custer, "The Great Soldier-Martyr" and juxtaposed facts against legend. He has, it seems to me, chosen brilliantly. In each case the subject did operate in an area where heroism was in fact necessary for survival; in each case the subject satisfied a need for legend on the part of lesser folk, mostly Easterners, who looked longingly to the frontier for fun and profit, yet feared its dangers; and in each case the subject did lead a violent and colorful life.

One may lament the fact that we need these legends, but, then, what's good enough for Dwight Eisenhower should be acceptable for the rest of us, I suppose. On the other hand, as a one-time weaver of Western legend myself — in the film Warlock from Oakley Hall's novel of the same title — I much prefer Dr. Steckmesser's ego-driven, publicity-minded, three-dimensional George Custer to Hollywood's paper-thin Errol Flynn. And the real Billy the Kid, a punk, Frank Nitti-like enforcer serving one side of an economic range war à la the later Capones and O'Banions, is far more interesting than the saintly Robin Hood he has become, pure and blameless — and bloodless.

Yet legend and myth will always be with us. We have just seen, and are seeing John F. Kennedy become a legend before our very eyes; and who dares tell your local Birchers that their hero was a colorless little man distinguished only by the fact that he allowed himself, as legend has it, to be done in by Chinese Reds?

In Magic, Science and Religion Malinowski writes:

> Myth fulfills in primitive culture an indispensable function: it expresses, enhances, and codifies belief; it safeguards and enforces morality; it vouches for the efficiency of ritual and contains practical rules for the guidance of man. Myth is thus a vital ingredient of human civilization; it is not an idle tale, but a hard-worked active force; it is not an intellectual explanation or an artistic imagery, but a pragmatic charter of primitive faith and moral wisdom.

Dr. Steckmesser obviously takes his legends where he finds them and deals with them in a splendid, tough-minded way. His book should be placed in front of every television set as an antidote. It will do the job.

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

The FBI Nobody Knows

by Fred J. Cook. 414 pp. Pyramid Books.
Paperback Edition.

A portion of this important book first appeared in The Nation (October 18, 1958), as a special feature and attracted nationwide attention and the highest praise. Now it has been rewritten and enlarged with much new material.

" . . . an effective and powerful document. . . . "
—Mark DeWolfe Howe, New York Review of Books

"Fred Cook must be credited with a courageous as well as an illuminating book. Let those who dispute his charges refute them if they can."
—Alan Barth, New York Herald Tribune

"A devastating case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its veteran director, J. Edgar Hoover."
—San Francisco Chronicle

"J. Edgar Hoover won't like this book . . . well-documented . . . likely to cause plenty of furor."
—Publisher's Weekly

THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS has the unique distinction of being the central point in the plot of Rex Stout's latest Nero Wolfe who-dun-it, THE DOORBELL RANG.

For your FREE copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $5
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ____________________

ADDRESS ____________________

CITY ____________ STATE ________ ZIP No. ______

1-24-66

Films from the Vietcong

Peter Gessner

Some half-dozen films produced by the National Liberation Front of Vietnam are making their way around the country, shown for the most part in poor screening conditions to limited audiences. According to recent reports in the New York press, at least one film has been shown to local high school audiences, drawing indignant protests from suburban parents. Despite the difficulties imposed by a sound track loaded with hyperbole and slogans (the English narrations have all the literary grace of a pamphlet), and despite the deteriorated physical condition of the films which makes many of these screenings little more than mysterious lantern shows, the very existence of these films merits attention.

As a record of the face of the war in Vietnam, and even more as an indication of what the film makers want "us" to know about them, the NLF films are a humbling experience to the viewer. In one (dated 1965), there is a brief sequence in a Vietcong-held village where, during a lull in the fighting, a Western-style ballet is performed within a ring of watching guerrillas. Even the hardened view which says that such things don't happen spontaneously, that they are arranged for the visiting camera, must cope with the fact that these people, the Vietcong, engaged in a brutalizing struggle, have thought it important to include dance in the midst of footage of a vicious guerrilla war.

If this instance indicates that the Vietcong's vision of itself in some sense includes an awareness of the human implications of the kind of war it is forced to fight, its interpretation of events in the United States appears to be filtered through the prism of ideology. For example, one is saddened by repeated references throughout these films to the "progressive American peoples" linked to shots of domestic anti-war demonstrations. Rather than realistically assessing the size and shape of current anti-war sentiment in this country, the film makers seem to have chosen to plug in the appropriate ideological platitude. It may be that, as James Cameron put it in his recent series of articles in The New York Times, "too many officials speak an English or French that was actually learned in slogans"; one also suspects that the twenty-year heritage of civil war brings with it a certain hardening of thought, an impatience with the niceties of language and distinction-making.

Once the narration is peeled away, and the images themselves are allowed to live for what they are, the texture of life in Vietnam forces its way through. Another film contains an extended sequence about captured equipment which begins as an apparent ode to self-sufficiency, only to move in a quite unexpected direction. From neatly stacked piles of guns and machinery, the camera turns to people making candleholders from what seem to be spent shells, to still others cutting jeep tires into sandal patterns. For a moment, the gulf between these people and a civilization which, even in peacetime, has managed to institutionalize the notion that things wear out, seems to loom larger than any logistical speculations about how the Vietcong supply themselves.

Of the six or so films now making the rounds, only one seems to go beyond the momentary revelatory glimpse to create a more whole impact. It was produced, probably by the NLF or a militant wing of the Buddhists, sometime after 1963 (there is no more precise internal evidence), and deals with the wave of demonstrations which followed the Diem government's suppression of the Buddhists.

It begins with what is a prologue of almost abstract battle footage: a montage of swooping planes, machine-gun rattles and barbed wire, not unlike Lewis Milestone's All Quiet on the Western Front. Abruptly, we are swept into a slow processional of Buddhist priests going out into the streets of Saigon to demonstrate for what, to Americans, would seem to be the most basic of liberties—the freedom to worship. Great bales of barbed wire are unrolled in front of them by soldiers; the younger priests, whose faces strangely recall those of the early civil rights workers in the American South, quietly place their hands around the wire as the soldiers begin to try to cordon them off. A tear-gas grenade lunges across the street, streaming white smoke like some kind of mythic Oriental paper beast.

The Diem soldiers, in camouflaged battle dress and holding shields which resemble the tops of garbage cans and which they seem to use to ward off objects thrown at them by the crowd, begin to move against the priests; at this point, the film takes on the qualities of an ominous pageant play. Oddly incongruous Western symphonic music replaces the English narrator (who, with good sense, has kept quiet throughout most of the demonstration sequence), and an unpredictable concordance of sound and image occurs: stock movie music joined with startling images raises the film to an entirely new level, toward a totality of emotion quite difficult to describe precisely. It is one of those rare moments in motion pictures when one plus one equals three. (Something of the sort happens in Luis Buñuel's Land Without Bread, a 1932 documentary of an impoverished region in Spain, in which Brahms's Fourth Symphony is used throughout the film not as a handy contrast but rather in an almost architectural way to provide a vaulting, an unattainable ceiling of emotion which hovers over the sordid level of human action.) Generally, the NLF film makers do not employ music in such ways: the music in other films is of an indeterminate martial nature, used conventionally to fill in behind the narrator.

The Buddhist film, in many ways the most successful of the NLF group, seems to have received less circulation than what is perhaps the most widely seen but unfortunately the least interesting of the lot. This picture, dated 1965 and bearing the title "Foreign Correspondents Visit the National Liberation Front" (at any rate, something like that), records Humanité correspondents Wilfred Burchette and Madeleine Riffaud eating and singing with happy peasants. The film is almost completely uninformative and comes close to being embarrassing — Mlle. Riffaud is more than effusive in her desire to kiss and fondle young Vietcong guerrillas. The quality of the print is mercifully poor and a good portion of all this is practically invisible.

In addition to these films of the war in the South, there is one from the North which depicts recent preparations for air defense. It has an untranslated Vietnamese narration, and does not appear to have been widely seen in this country. The film seems to have been made in 1965, after the start of bombings in the North. Perhaps half the footage deals with preparatory and actual antiaircraft drills, ranging from heavy guns to small arms. An extended and well-put-together sequence begins with telephoto shots of what appear to be United States swept-wing jets returning again and again over an indeterminate target. Small-arms fire is put up from the ground with what seems to be pathetic intensity, but Chris Koch, formerly of WBAI-FM radio, witnessed such drills by students during his recent trip to North Vietnam and, upon returning home, called the Department of Defense to inquire whether small-arms fire could bring down an airplane. He was reportedly told: "Hell yes! During World War II we used to do that all the time." Evidently, massed gunfire forms a kind of super-shotgun spread which can imperil fuel supply tanks, rockets, or other vulnerable parts.

---

Peter Gessner is a free-lance film editor and camera assistant; he was a member of the crew that made Nothing But a Man.

What comes through from this film, and indeed from all the NLF films, despite their monothematic crudeness and technical imperfection, is something of the brute level at which the Vietnamese people, North and South, seem prepared to resist an increasingly destructive and degrading war. The master image might be one of a wounded, angry fox facing the striking force of a mailed fist.

Although the NLF movies draw unexpectedly large audiences (mostly students) wherever they are shown, their net effect is ambiguous at best. They seldom exploit the motion picture as a particular form of communication, nor do they explore the special qualities that set it off from pamphlets or slide shows. The films do not achieve a sense of the camera's own participation in events, a sense present in the footage of volunteer cameramen for the Spanish Republic (To Die in Madrid). Judged by the standards we apply to works of art, or even against the more vague measure of some kind of immediacy of feeling, the work is crude and conventional. One responds with something of the suspicion Trotsky felt, perhaps unjustly, for the work of the poet Mayakovsky: "[he] shouts too often where one should speak: and so his cry, where cry is needed, sounds inadequate."

Reports from some of the Vietnam teach-ins have indicated that one of the principal difficulties in raising discussion with students is that cold-war structures of thought have so conditioned people that they do not think of Vietnam in terms of the aspirations, indifferences, antipathies of its people, but rather as a "plot"—vast numbers being manipulated. This writer and a small group of independent film makers—a loosely federated cooperative with no political or aesthetic manifestoes to proclaim—have undertaken to produce a film whose subject will be the very nature of this dilemma (the project has received the support of various organizations, including the Artists and Writers Committee to End the War, and Students for a Democratic Society).

The film is to be directed at those who have remained indifferent to the war or actually support the Administration's policies in Vietnam. It is not to be a work of "propaganda," which seems useless now, but a film which sets out an encounter with all that we know about the war and the American response to it. Selections from the NLF films discussed above will be combined with domestic newsreel sources and extensive shooting in this country. The film will juxtapose footage from Vietnam with official policy statements; it will seek interviews with those in power, with returning soldiers, and perhaps with former French colonials; it will attempt to find and elucidate the visual correlatives in this country which underlie and support the American response to the war. It will attempt to do all this without making ex cathedra statements of its own; rather, it will seek to embody a complex of thought and feeling in the language of film. The film project has received support and offers of advisory assistance from several independent film makers, including Hilary Harris and Leo Hurwitz. In addition, an offer of an original music score has been made by Morton Feldman and other contemporary composers.

MUSIC

Benjamin Boretz

The current New York concert season has been remarkable chiefly for the number of events that have sharply revealed the deep separation in our musical "two cultures," between the public musical life and the state of the musical culture it supposedly represents. At first glance, the observation seems paradoxical: this has been the season in which the activity of music's "inner" world, represented mainly by the many contemporary-music performance groups, has become an established "presence" on the New York scene, partly through its steady increase, but even more because of the secure base it has found within the university community. At the same time, too, the "big" musical world has made some conspicuous gestures toward 20th-century music, most notably those connected with Leonard Bernstein's return to the Philharmonic after a year's absence. But it was, precisely, the contrast with the reality and stability of a seriously functioning new-music world that most clearly exposed the emptiness and naïveté underlying these gestures.

It was possible, for example, for William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony to play in Carnegie Hall the first all-Schoenberg orchestral program ever given in New York (regarding which The New York Times, whose music section perhaps represents still a third musical culture, ran the extraordinary headline, "Steinberg Leads Modern Works"). But this kind of event seems almost a cliché to anyone in the least acquainted with the other domain, or even with conventional European orchestra and opera-house activity, and it comes long after both the publication and recording of complete Schoenberg editions have been begun. Furthermore, the quality of execution, which was in fact on

COMMENTARY*
* WORLD'S BEST ?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
TRIAL 8-MONTH Subscription $3.87 (Reg. $8./year)
Outside USA—add $1.
COMMENTARY, NA-2
165 East 56 St., N.Y., N.Y.
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name
Address
City/State
New Subscribers Only

SUMMERLANE CAMP
in the tradition of
The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill
The Gorky Colony
Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.
Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19
BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

the level usually associated with first performances of new works, could hardly have seemed tolerable to anyone familiar with the incomparably superior standard available no farther away than the little Recital Hall next door, or the nearest Columbia recording.

A considerably more spectacular, or at least maudlin, gesture has been Leonard Bernstein's publicly expressed anxiety over the state of the symphony in the 20th century, and the pessimistic conclusions about the present and future of orchestral composition (though not orchestral performance) to be inferred from it. The basis for his reflections is being presented in a comprehensive survey, over a few Philharmonic seasons, entitled "Symphonic Forms in the Twentieth Century." Out of this will presumably come the judgment that the orchestra, far from being annihilated by the poverty of 20th-century symphonic writing, is relieved of its unbecoming and painful responsibility to represent the musical present, and now enters a glorious twilight as a museum of comfortable sounds.

PERSONALS

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons. $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

INTERESTED IN FUNERAL REFORM?

WHAT ARE NEEDS AT THE TIME OF DEATH?

Consider membership in a memorial society.

For dependable information, write

CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION
Room 400 N, 59 East Van Buren St.
Chicago, Illinois 60605

PUBLICATION

BRUCE PAYNE, ORGANIZER OF YALE TENURE PROTEST, SAYS IN THE CURRENT ISSUE OF THE ACTIVIST:

"SNCC's approach to history strikes me as wildly schizophrenic. Their passion for reading and talking about southern history is equal to their opponents' passion for exaggerating it. On the other hand, they are sympathetic to HOWARD ZINN's attack on the 'tyranny of history,' SNCC—if it has a single attitude toward history—sees it as being of value only if it is politically useful. History, if it is not useful, must be altered. But to alter history is to admit that it is not in fact, useful: it is to recognize that our past accuses us. The psychological reaction of 'double-think' then becomes necessary: we change our history while insisting—and believing—that it could never have been otherwise."

SUBSCRIBE NOW TO AMERICA'S ONLY INDEPENDENT STUDENT JOURNAL OF POLITICS AND OPINION

THE ACTIVIST, 1 year (5 issues) @ $3
SPECIAL STUDENT RATE, 1 year @ $2

Name ______________________
Address ____________________
City _______________________
State ____________ ZIP ________

Mail to:

THE ACTIVIST
27½ West College Street
Oberlin, Ohio 44074

It is an obvious absurdity, of course, to equate the condition of 20th-century orchestral composition with that of "the symphony." For not only has the idea of the symphony lost any real force as a formal distinction in modern orchestral music but it appears only rarely as a designate in the orchestral works of the major 20th-century composers. Those who have cultivated it have been, for the most part, relatively minor figures with little influence on the development of a contemporary orchestral approach. But having set up such an equation, Mr. Bernstein in his programs appears to exclude such infrequent works as do in fact represent serious thought about the contemporary possibilities of symphonic form. Stravinsky is unmentioned in the Philharmonic program book's note on the series, and such primary figures as Schoenberg, Hindemith, Sessions and Carter are mentioned only as future possibilities.

What does emerge in Mr. Bernstein's series is rather more Mahler than he usually performs on three consecutive weeks, and a festival of such antediluvian cream puffs as the complete works of Sibelius, and docile monsters by Vaughan Williams, Nielsen, Prokofiev and Shostakovich, along with a few prewar and recent American works.

The programs I have heard so far included the tiny chamber-music Webern symphony next to the Mahler Seventh, and Ives's least interesting but easiest symphony, his Third, along with the demanding Mahler Ninth, which was in fact played with impressive restraint and control. But the naive attempt to smooth Webern's carefully isolated pitch events into Schubertian phrases, and the painful technical problems encountered, especially by the Philharmonic's horn player, were in vivid contrast to the standards of interpretation and execution that have become routine for the performance of this work in the chamber-music domain.

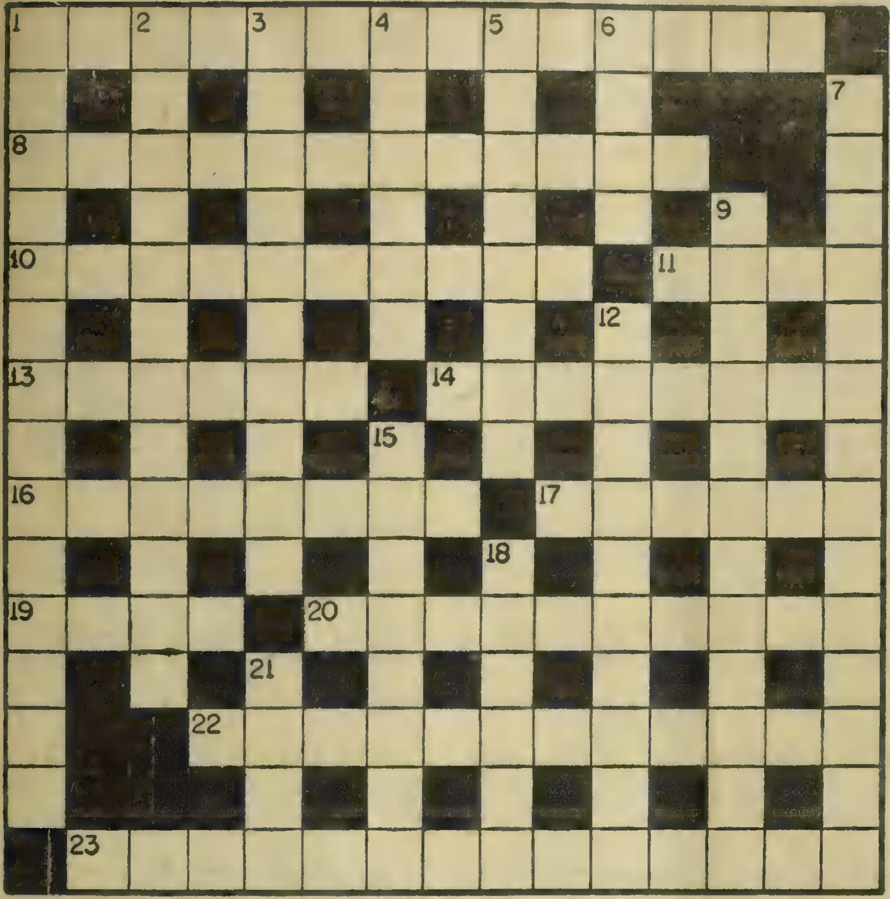
Yet one remembers when, with no publicity at all, the Philharmonic was actually the principal source for first hearings of advanced music—Wozzeck had its first American performance here under Mitropolous, who also performed all the major orchestral works of Schoenberg long before they were available on records. And when one recalls that the Philharmonic's own Chamber Ensemble, which in many ways anticipated the recent new-music groups, was still functioning in the early fifties, it appears that the present total discontinuity in the musical world is actually a product of the last ten years, a bizarre corollary both of the phenomenal popular success of concert music in America and the vitality of our compositional activity.

In the new-music area itself this season, interest has focused on the work of the new Rockefeller-supported group in residence at Rutgers, under the direction of Arthur Weisberg. Predictably, given the known superiority of most of the players, and Weisberg's customary conductorial approach, the performances have generally been reliable; but the problem of establishing an individuality in an already crowded field can be seen in the ambiguity of the group's programing. Thus, even the titles of its two New York series display uncertainty; the Hunter College concerts are being presented as "The Twentieth Century: The First Sixty-Five Years," which surely represents the ultimate in noncommitment, while the idea of calling the Carnegie Recital Hall programs "From Hindemith to Stockhausen" (which, strictly applied, would exclude Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Bartok, et al., as well as anyone under 38) seems particularly obtuse for an American ensemble.

But obtuseness, apparently, has been the order of the season: it was last fall that the death of Varèse was considered newsworthy enough only for the deepest inside pages of our newspapers, while the Ford Foundation's orchestral program (see The Nation, November 15, 1965) was proclaimed widely as the salvation of American musical culture. And in December, the New York Critics' Circle finally disbanded on the grounds that the major critics could not spare time from "important" concert activity to hear any new works, and that new music was in any case being played in such quantity as to make further encouragement by the Critics' Circle Awards unnecessary. In short, this season has been a time when one wondered whether a serious musician could any longer pretend to recognize in the public world of music some significant aspect of his own concerns.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1137

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Mother's rather confused by the lot, best arranged to keep the coffee hot! (7,7)
8 Was Godiva barely one? (12)
10 Even the best matches wouldn't be marked by it! (10)
11 The sullen part of British ardor. (4)
13 Shed a modified type of 6 down? (4-2)
14 Prose, or prosaic? (8)
16 and 21 down One might, with provocation, give a certain amount of lift to a superior story, or at least expose it. (5,3,4)
17 Get a boat-wreck before getting in? (6)
19 Oil one's speech, by the sound of it. (4)
20 Such oration shouldn't be dear to us, and yet it is rightly so. (4,6)
22 Certain people thought it was an answer to "how're ya gonna get 'em down on the farm." (12)
23 Self-assurance? Ready for anything! (What a racket!) (10,4)

DOWN:

1 Not one of the "Tropics"—according to a much older traveler, en route. (3,7,4)
2 One can tell when one is making them. (12)
3 One might consider them a nuisance when the religious leader travels around a spot in 9. (10)
4 Did one used to get all wound up in writing? (6)
5 An obvious unit of musical sound. (8)
6 It might be camp, but not in the modern version. (4)
7 If this takes the cake, it might be photogenic in a domestic way. (8,6)
9 To get to the bottom of it, one might look for two versions of a bull's point of attack. (5,7)
12 The last reward one might expect. (5,5)
15 Made a "Callooh! Callay!" (8)
18 How to make the grade as an established criminal, or make light of it. (6)
21 See 16 across.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1136

ACROSS: 1 Exacerbate; 6 and 23 Rearrange; 10 Peridot; 11, 24 down and 27 across Stand up and be counted; 12 Landings; 13 Twice; 15 Visor; 17 and 26 Shoulder strap; 19 Redressed; 21 Arson; 24 Aviators; 28 Ejector; 29 Slew; 30 Censorship. DOWN: 1 Espy; 2 Arrears; 3 Ended; 4 Botanists; 5 Tasks; 7 Endwise; 8 Repressing; 9 Mantilla; 14 Overtricks; 16 Reelects; 18 Old-timers; 20 Denture; 22 Scratch; 25 Their.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

HISTORY AFIELD

Don't miss history's pleasant aspect:
AFIELD, actual or armchair
PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts.
Hardcover, 200 graphic pages
Postpaid $2, check, money order or cash
B. F. Johnson
Box 2306, SAN DIEGO, CALIF. 92112

Fun to Read!

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

"21 Ways to Save on Your Phone Bill." Send $1 to American Telephone Consumers Council, 1133-G Broadway, N.Y.C. 10010.

BOOK COLLECTORS

Seeking unusual items for your collections!
We notify when our worldwide contacts make notable finds. All fields A to Izzard.
BOOK LANDOE
6631 Hollywood Blvd.
Hollywood, Calif. 90028

The SECOND BOOK of
THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES
74 Selected Brainteasers
from these columns
For postpaid copy send $1.50 to
Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway
Greenbelt, Md.
(Enclose $2.25, and both FIRST and SECOND books will be sent!)

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

fatal to him. So we may be sure that Ky, and his counterparts elsewhere in Asia, are not putting their trust in Lodge, Rusk, Humphrey or other visitors. They are taking care of themselves by all the means open to them, and these are by no means negligible.

Have the events in Korea in 1953 been so soon forgotten? When General Eisenhower set about making peace in Korea, Syngman Rhee took matters into his own hands. One of his threats, reported by Gen. Mark Clark to Washington, was to launch a South Korean drive northward, but this proved to be beyond his powers. Instead, he tried to wreck the armistice by releasing 25,000 North Korean prisoners of war who, according to the truce agreement, were to be repatriated. This might easily have resulted in a renewal of the war; fortunately the North Koreans had had enough by that time and let Rhee get away with it. There is no assurance, in a similar situation, that the North Vietnamese would be equally obliging.

South Vietnam warlords must be thinking hard about what to do if peace really seems to be breaking out in their domain. They have a number of options, such as setting up an ostensibly neutralist government, asking us to get out, and then making the best deal they can with Hanoi. This might not be the worst outcome for the people of Vietnam, but it is not the only possibility, nor the likeliest one. These mercenaries have connections and an infinite capacity for maneuver and murder. According to Senator Young, the CIA opposes a settlement in Vietnam. Presumably the CIA plotters would not care to go it alone in blocking peace moves, but they might have valuable suggestions for their friends in the South Vietnamese government. The South Vietnamese operators also have friends in the growing U.S. expeditionary force, with its array of generals. The potential for mischief is there, and it is a factor tending to tie our hands diplomatically—in Vietnam, in Korea, in Taiwan and elsewhere. Anyone who still has confidence in American policy in Southeast Asia should consider how we have violated the first rule of diplomacy, which is to retain freedom of choice in a changing situation. Unless we can free ourselves of entangling alliances there, peace may be a long way off.

The AMM Decision

The Vietnam war is costly not only in money and human lives (including Vietnam lives—they are human too) but because it obscures the preparations for nuclear war. Whether the climactic catastrophe can be averted may be decided in the next few weeks by a Presidential decision on the anti-missile missile. We have a prototype of sorts, and so have the Russians. By all indications neither is much good yet, but further research and experimentation may result in improvements. That question has been decided: no one in authority, or in an advisory capacity, is opposed to continuing R&D. The matter for decision is whether to put the AMM into production while striving to make it more effective. If the President so decides, the nuclear missile race moves into a new and greatly expanded spiral.

The present situation in this dizzy technology is that a single incoming warhead, proceeding on its original, unaltered ballistic course, can perhaps be destroyed by a nuclear-tipped AMM. But this is very elementary stuff for the scientists and engineers laboring in the doomsday vineyard. The attacker will more likely rely on a missile which, as it approaches its target, will release a flock of decoys, perhaps balloons, to confuse the acquisition and interception radars. The defender counters this trickery with a duplex AMM system, first exploding a high-altitude (250-400 miles) warhead in the incoming warhead's path, and then if it still keeps coming intercepting in the last few seconds with an extremely high-velocity warhead ("Sprint" in the U.S. model), timed to explode in the atmosphere. The advantage of this low-altitude counterfire is that the balloon decoys are slowed up by the atmosphere and the warhead can presumably be distinguished in time. The disadvantage is that the populace must be sheltered, since if the enemy's missile doesn't kill them the fallout from the friendly missile will.

Balloon decoys are, however, already obsolescent. The attacker has many other choices. If he has enough thrust in his rocket, he can equip it to carry and release decoys heavy enough to be indistinguishable from the warhead. Or it may be more efficient to divide the available payload among several warheads, perhaps of different calibers, to be released in different trajectories near the target. Or the missile (or missiles) may be designed to shift from a ballistic course and fool the defensive radar. Or the missile can carry countermeasure equipment to confuse or paralyze the countermissile. Or—a brute-force method—enough missiles can be launched to pour down on the defense until no AMMs are left. Still another technique is to deliver the warhead in a ramjet type of aircraft at an altitude so low that ground radar cannot detect it.

The attacker certainly seems to have the better of it, but in this game no one admits defeat. The Joint Chiefs of Staff are insistent on spending $20 billion on an AMM system, the primary purpose of which will be to defend U.S. missiles in their silos. If they can't have $20 billion, they will accept $8 billion on account for a less complex system. Later, if they get the money, they will try to give "protection" to fifty to seventy major population centers.

On the shelter front, Dr. Edward Teller and his colleague Dr. Eugene P. Wigner advocate quick action. Wigner wants an even bigger shelter system than Teller. He estimates that a nation-wide system of 8-foot concrete pipes could be constructed in seven years, using 8.5 per cent of the nation's construction capacity. The cost is estimated at $38 billion. Interconnection of the tunnels, it is said, would enable families to be reunited, but it seems more likely that the reunion would take place in the next world rather than in this one, where epidemics, floods, plagues of insects and other calamities would bring early death to survivors.

The most sensible suggestion emanated in November from a high-level panel headed by Dr. Jerome B. Wiesner and Roswell L. Gilpatric. They pointed out that the "vertical proliferation" of new weapons systems and the correlated shelter construction would "destabilize" the present deterrence balance. They questioned whether sufficient thought had been given to the political consequences of the deployment of anti-missile systems and proposed a three-year moratorium to assess the situation. R&D would continue. It is hard to see what the country, as distinguished from the military-industrial complex, could lose by such an arrangement.

A Case of Civilized Penology

The federal prison system comprises thirty-one institutions. One of the largest is the penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga. When it was built at the turn of the century, education in prisons was practically unknown. Wardens, in self-righteous agreement with the more or less law-abiding majority, frowned on "coddling" their charges. Prison education had its beginnings when chaplains found that between a third and half of the prisoners to whom they gave Bibles could not read. Some of the chaplains began teaching reading and writing, at first for purely religious reasons. In less than sixty years, the system thus introduced has grown to the point where at Atlanta more than 1,700 of the 2,200 inmates are participating in studies that range from accredited high school programs and apprentice training in prison occupations to subjects like radio-TV servicing and architectural drafting. Other federal prisons offer more or less similar opportunities, but at Atlanta a course in computer programing, sponsored by the General Electric Company, is as unique as it is up-to-date.

No less than 96 per cent of the men and women committed to federal prisons are school dropouts. Experience with the GE-Atlanta course emphasizes again that many youngsters do badly in school not because they are uneducable but because what they are taught, or the way in which it is taught, makes no sense to them. When the computer course was announced, some 300 men applied or inquired about it. The first thought was to consider only high school graduates, but this was reduced to a 10th-grade education when it became evident that otherwise some of the most promising candidates would be barred. Additional screening reduced the number of applicants to thirty-seven; on the basis of standardized aptitude tests, twenty-three were finally chosen.

Running until May, the course totals 120 hours over a period of forty weeks; the content is generally similar to the computer course for GE employees and customers. It is given by the company at no cost to the inmates or the Federal Bureau of Prisons and may be extended to provide time on the large computer at the GE Atlanta office. Eventually the prison personnel records, inventories, training schedules and maintenance may be computerized, with inmates doing the work and at the same time fitting themselves for outside jobs.

Under the best conditions, the waste of human resources borne by society and imprisoned individuals is sad enough. "During their long periods of confinement," one prison official remarked, "inmates will devise ingenious crafts and hobbies in order to keep their hands and minds occupied. They will spend weeks, months, even years, in problem-solving; the smallest detail receives their absolute attention and concentration." No doubt many a prisoner has saved his sanity in this way, but it may have little value when he faces the normal and abnormal difficulties of the outside world. Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach expressed his delight that Atlanta inmates would now have an opportunity to be trained in a fast-developing profession, and said that the Department of Justice wanted every federal prisoner to learn skills that would be useful and profitable to him after his release. If the Great Society is more than a slogan, the work General Electric has begun at Atlanta should serve as an example elsewhere.

India's First Lady

The election of Mrs. Indira Gandhi as Prime Minister of India will doubtless be greeted with editorial surprise and politely wide-eyed comment in various sectors of the press. But it should occasion no astonishment.

That women make notably strong and able rulers is well attested by Elizabeth I and Catherine the Great, to name only two; in our own time the late Queen Salote ruled her small land of Tonga for many years with great dignity. And the time has long passed since the intellectual equality of the sexes was a subject for debate.

The only aspect of this event which might raise an eyebrow is the fact that the East, where women have traditionally been held to subordinate roles, has produced the only contemporary female chiefs of state. (Mrs. Gandhi was preceded by Mrs. Bandaranaike of Ceylon, who inherited the leadership from her murdered husband.) The West has yet to offer leadership to any woman — and it will be some time yet before the United States, for one, is ready to accept the idea of Madam President.

Mrs. Gandhi is, both by inheritance and training, the logical choice for chief executive of a nation which is not only the world's second largest but also a land of incomparable moral importance to the peace of the world, and which stands as a great countering force to the nerve-racking confrontations between the United States, China and the USSR. We wish her well and hope that she can display, in the cause of peace, ability inherited from her father, Jawaharlal Nehru. And the surname she bears will be a constant reminder to the world of our era's most eloquent spokesman for the brotherhood of peoples.

Algeria

BRAKES ON REVOLUTION . . . Schofield Coryell

Paris

The June overthrow of Ben Bella—who was widely regarded throughout Africa and the Third World as an authentic spokesman of principled anti-imperialism and independent socialism—both prevented the Afro-Asian Conference from being held in Algiers and highlighted the fundamental conflicts (army against people, the new bourgeoisie against democratic socialism, Right against Left) that are raging throughout Africa and Asia today.

Despite the new regime's continuing links with China and the Soviet Union, the single most obvious result of the coup d'état in the field of foreign policy has been the spectacular reconciliation between Algeria and French business interests and the French Government, which had (privately) been viewing the leftward trend of the Ben Bella regime with profound misgivings. Under Boumedienne, there is no longer any talk in official Algerian circles about further nationalization of remaining French property, and spokesmen of the new regime are encouraging foreign private-capital investment by offering guarantees against the danger of future expropriation. The French press, by and large, has been enthusiastic about the new regime's abandonment of Ben Bella's "doctrinaire socialism," while the Algerian press has reverberated with the glories of Franco-Algerian friendship, coupled with venomous attacks on the French Left for its alleged inability to understand present-day Algerian reality.

The coup d'état seems also to have brought about a marked improvement in relations between Algeria and the United States. The sharp attacks on "American imperialism" that filled the press in Ben Bella's time have been considerably toned down, and American officials in Algiers, including those of the USIS, are no longer kept at arm's length. There is talk of greatly increased U.S. aid—which up to now has been confined to (very substantial) surplus wheat shipments.

The improvement in relations with the Western powers would be more encouraging if it were not accompanied by a press campaign against "foreign interference" that borders on xenophobia, and by a much colder attitude toward the various European anti-Fascist and liberation movements, based in Algiers, which operated freely and with full support under Ben Bella. One of the new regime's first acts was to suppress, by Presidential decree, the Institute for Friendship among Peoples, whose function was to mobilize support for the liberation movements of the Continent. The Spanish anti-Fascists operating from Algiers headquarters have been told officially to abstain from further political activity, if they wish to continue enjoying the right of exile.

In line with its turn to the right in foreign policy, the new regime has already given evidence that domestically the move toward socialism will be slowed down if not actually reversed. It was symptomatic that the first concrete act of the Boumedienne regime was to transfer administration of the medical school from the Ministry of Health to the Ministry of Education. The real meaning of this measure, hailed in the press as a "return to democratic norms," is that medical students are no longer, as under Ben Bella, regarded as servants of the state and the people, to be sent upon graduation to the countryside or wherever else their services are most urgently needed. From now on the practice of medicine as a money-making business will be the rule. Recently, doctors have been meeting to prepare for the reopening of private medical offices, banned by the previous regime. The anti-Socialist bias of the new regime is generally enveloped in a smoke screen of comforting words about the "irreversibility of the Socialist option." The precaution is necessary in a country where the center of gravity is far to the left, and capitalism is a dirty word because generally identified with the violence and injustice of colonial domination.

If we cast a brief glance backward, it is significant that, just two days before the coup d'état of June 19, the FLN Political Bureau had published throughout the nation a series of radical and long-awaited decisions: expropriation of the holdings of 8,000 Algerian landlords (all the French-owned land had already been expropriated); the spread of the system of workers' management throughout the economy, in industry as well as agriculture; stringent price controls, etc. Widely circulated and well-founded rumors had it that prominent leftists were to be promoted all along the line to posts of highest influence. (For example, the famous Communist journalist, Henri Alleg, was to be appointed editor in chief of the official Algerian News Agency.) Apartment buildings of the big cities were to be nationalized and rents drastically reduced, and indeed a wave of nationalization was to end the persisting conflict between the private sector and the Socialist sector. All these plans have been brutally interrupted by the coup d'état, despite the fact that most of the men now in power were present in the government of Ben Bella, and paying lip service to his Socialist ideals.

Since the coup d'état, the Socialist sector of the economy—which embraces most of the productive land, but only about 20 per cent of the industry—has been coming under considerable criticism in the official press, which uses the weaknesses and inefficiencies of the collectivized firms (inevitable in view of the chaotic conditions left by the war and the shortage of technicians) as an argument against further extension of Socialist methods and techniques. At the same time, wages have been cut in certain socialized enterprises, and needed funds have been systematically withheld. At the same time the regime has been cautiously emphasizing the virtues and necessity of private business—without, of course, explicitly rejecting the concept of a Socialist future. Some collectivized firms—notably the big paint firm of Norcolor—have been returned to their former owners. In his interview with the French illustrated weekly, Nouvel Observateur, Boumedienne justified these restorations on the ground that the earlier confiscations had been "hasty" and "unfair."

---

Schofield Coryell is an American journalist now writing from Paris for Africa Today (New York), Mainstream (New Delhi) and Agence France-Press.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

As for land reform, Minister of Information Boumaza (Minister of Economy under Ben Bella) announced at a press conference in September that the matter must first be studied carefully. "We must not fall into the trap of hasty improvisation." Later, Boumedienne stated that measures in this field would be taken "next year." The fact is that nationalization of the big Algerian estates in the interests of the landless peasants is long overdue; the only obstacle to its execution is the influence of the landlord class on the post-Ben Bella regime.

The drive to slow down—if not reverse—the trend to socialism runs directly counter to the political desires and sentiments of the vast majority of Algerian people who sincerely (though vaguely) believe in a kind of humanist socialism in which the products of collective labor would be shared equitably among the producers themselves, who would own and dominate the economy. It is true that the present anti-Socialist trend is popular with a large number of the Algerian officials, petty functionaries and shopkeepers, as well as with the few capitalists and the feudal landlords: in short, with all those for whom independence from France meant essentially a chance to expand their own privileges. It is in their interest that the army—a military caste created since independence—has taken over control, and their reactions of joy and relief when the coup d'état took place showed that they knew it.

But the regime lives and moves in an atmosphere of general passive hostility. It has been said that the two things the average Algerian detests most are military despotism and religious fanaticism—and in the eyes of the general population the present government represents both. While most Algerians—especially the agricultural workers—consider themselves Moslems, and cling to their religion, they are not ready to sacrifice their economic interests in the name of Islam, as the present rulers would apparently have them do.

Boumedienne's administration has been meeting considerable resistance from the General Union of Algerian Workers (UGTA). At its annual conference, held shortly after the coup d'état, the Algiers section of the UGTA emphasized the need to expand the Socialist sector, and vowed to continue working toward the Socialist goals defined in the Algiers FLN Charter adopted in April, 1964, as the "blueprint for the Algerian path to socialism." The national UGTA president, Mouloud Oumeziane, referred, in guarded tones, to the army's seizure of power as "an event which, to be frank, surprised us." The final resolutions openly criticized "parachuted" agents of the regime, who had been sent into the unions to replace the elected representatives of the workers.

The trade union weekly—Revolution et Travail—has been seized several times, since June 19, for its occasional guarded resistance to the new conservative trend, but the editors have managed to circulate several issues voicing sharp criticism. The repression is not total. Even more significant than such verbal criticism are the numerous strikes that have been spreading, in both the Socialist and the private sector, against reductions in salaries, arbitrary firings, especially of old workers and trade union militants, and (a particularly widespread complaint) against nonpayment of salaries and the accumulation of months of back pay.

Another source of constant worry to the regime is the intellectual youth and especially the National Union of Algerian Students. This organization sponsored spirited demonstrations against the coup d'état, causing Boumedienne to impose a virtual military occupation over the big cities in June, and thus creating a situation in which it was impossible to convene the Afro-Asian Conference. Since then, despite efforts by the regime, the vast majority of politically active students has remained hostile or uncooperative. No more than a quarter of the National Union's executive committee has expressed its loyalty to the regime; the others are in various degrees of opposition, as the circulation of illegal student tracts eloquently testifies.

At the end of July, scarcely a month after the coup d'état, an Organization of Popular Resistance announced its emergence through a widely circulated manifesto denouncing the "stranglers of the Republic," reaffirming a militant faith in socialism, and calling upon the population to form clandestine groups to resist the military regime. While demanding the liberation of Ben Bella and drawing an essentially positive picture of his achievements, the manifesto also admits the weaknesses of the previous government—especially its failure to develop a new Socialist-oriented vanguard party from the nationalist and heterogeneous National Liberation Front which organized the armed struggle during the revolution. The manifesto was signed by Hocine Zahaouane, a youthful leftist member of the FLN Political Bureau under Ben Bella, and chairman of the FLN Orientation Commission before the coup d'état, then a stronghold of the Left. The nucleus of this clandestine organization—whose announced aim is to resume the process of evolution from a nationalist to a Socialist revolution—is made up of left-wing intellectuals, partisans (like Zahaouane himself) of a specifically Algerian brand of socialism, based on the concept of workers' control and management of the economy; with them are elements from the essentially pro-Soviet Algerian Communist Party, and political figures strongly influenced by Trotskyism.

Boumedienne lost no time cracking down on this first evidence of organized opposition. Already, several of the principal ringleaders are in prison: Zahaouane, Harj Ali, former chairman of the Algerian Communist Party, and Mohammed Harbi, often described as a Trotskyite, former adviser to Ben Bella and one of the principal architects of the Algerian Charter. Other well-known figures arrested are youth leaders like Boualem Makkouf, former secretary of the FLN Youth, and Houari Muffok, president of the National Union of Algerian Students.

In an effort to create the impression that the opposition is foreign-inspired, the government-controlled press has focused attention on the arrests of a number of French leftists living and working in Algeria since independence. Accused of collusion with the clandestine opposition, these people were imprisoned and severely tortured, according to reports given to the Paris press by some who were later released. A far worse fate awaits the thousands of Algerian leftists now in the hands of Boumedienne's special police, who have been using against the opposition the identical methods of physical and mental torment—electricity, water, etc.—that were once used by the French colonialists against the Algerian nationalists. No one knows the exact number of arrests, and none of those imprisoned for political reasons has as yet been brought to trial. There is still no news concerning the whereabouts or condition of Ben Bella, on whose behalf a group of French intellectuals — those who also signed the famous manifesto against the Algerian war—have issued a humanitarian appeal. [See editorial, "French Conscience," The Nation, October 4, 1965.]

Thus, in Algeria, an unpopular, conservative military dictatorship is momentarily in power. The freedom and untrammeled discussion that prevailed under the previous regime have given way to an atmosphere of mutual fear and mistrust; spies of the military are omnipresent. But it can be realistically hoped that the liberty-loving Algerian people—war weary after a seven-year armed struggle against colonial domination—will find a way to restore their democratic rights and create a society in the image of their own earnest desire for social justice and human freedom.

MURDER IN TUSKEGEE

Day of Wrath in the Model Town

Arnold S. Kaufman

Tuskegee, Ala.

This city is widely regarded as a model Southern community. More than 80 per cent Negro, it is the home of famed Tuskegee Institute. Under the leadership of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), headed by Prof. Charles Gomillion, Negroes in the city and the county constituted a majority of registered voters before passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. They combined with white moderates to elect a biracial city council composed of two Negroes and four whites.

Tuskegee has a biracial police force; Negroes work in City Hall, and stores in the downtown area are integrated. The two races meet socially, the Veterans Administration hospital and the Tuskegee Institute staff are totally integrated, and there is token integration of the public school system. The town's officials generally call Negroes by their last name, prefaced with the appropriate title of respect.

Yet, were a more militant Booker T. Washington to return today to the institution he founded, he might reasonably amend his famed Atlanta address, saying: "Drop down your buckets where you are, but wear a bulletproof vest." For the murder of civil rights worker Samuel Younge, Jr., has generated explosive racial tension. How did it happen that the town that was supposed to provide a beacon for all black-belt communities to follow is today ablaze with racial hatred?

The short reply is that the much admired racial amity has been mostly surface and precarious, to a very considerable extent the product of good public relations and bad sociology. For the "progress" achieved has left almost unimpaired the white man's economic and social prerogatives, the black man's nagging sense of indignity. The killing of Younge and its aftermath have made it clear that Tuskegee is yet another instance of tokenism in search of stability. But the short reply requires elaboration, and connection with the specific events of recent days. (See also review by Marvin M. Karpatkin of Robert Penn Warren's Who Speaks for the Negro?, page 134 of this issue.)

Younge was shot to death at about 11:45 P.M. on January 3, after a dispute about use of the men's room at a Standard Oil gas station in town. A 22-year-old student at Tuskegee Institute, a Navy veteran who had been aboard one of the ships that supported the Bay of Pigs adventure, he had most recently been very active in the struggle for civil rights. He was a leader of the local student civil rights group, the Tuskegee Institute Advancement League (TIAL), and a SNCC worker. He had spent the day of his murder on a voter-registration drive among the less affluent Negroes of Macon County, where Tuskegee is located. At one point, a knife is reported to have been pulled by the local registrar —a rather infirm old man who resented the uppity ways of Younge and his TIAL associates. But that was not an unheard-of gesture in this model Southern community.

---

Arnold S. Kaufman, associate professor of philosophy at Michigan University, is spending a year at Tuskegee Institute. He was one of the founders of the teach-in movement.

The Younge family is one of the largest, oldest and most respected in Tuskegee's Negro community. Thus the ramifications of the murder reach more deeply into the city than civil rights killings normally do. It is one thing to knock off an "outsider," quite another to kill a young man related by blood, marriage or friendship to almost every prominent Negro in the area. More than a few persons who had before limited their fight for human freedom to talk and infrequent trips to the ballot box are suddenly to be found linking their hands with young student activists, singing freedom songs during mass protest meetings, and participating in protest marches to the center of Tuskegee. The reaction of one influential former moderate and long-time friend of the bereaved family is instructive. Enraged by the murder, he told me that he had lost all faith in democracy, the present city council and the TCA—in that order. He was sorry he had voted in the municipal election for TCA candidates instead of for the more militant slate of an opposition group.

As nearly as one can presently determine, the death that produced this reaction occurred in the following way. About 11 P.M. Younge told some friends whom he dropped at Freedom House, the local headquarters for younger civil rights activists, that he was going out for cigarettes. He drove his Volkswagen to the Standard station, the only one in town open at that time of night. He tried to use the men's room, but was denied permission by an attendant, Marvin Segrest. A 67-year-old native of Shorter, a tiny town several miles away, Segrest's segregationist sentiments are well known to local civil rights workers. An argument developed, and Segrest pulled a gun. Younge ran as Segrest fired a single shot and missed. The young activist then, according to some reports, went to the police station to report what had happened. If this is what he did, the officers in charge did not respond. Younge came back, presumably to get his car. About ten minutes had elapsed; Segrest was still there, gun in hand. The argument resumed. Segrest is alleged to have fired one more shot, hitting the student in the temple. The police were notified. After searching the premises for a while, one officer reported to Younge's parents, who had earlier been informed of the shooting. He reassured them, saying that the report could not be true, since their son was nowhere to be found. More than thirty minutes after this initial search, a cab driver closing up his stand for the night, discovered Younge's body in an alley that separated his stand from the town bus terminal. At the other side of the terminal is the gas station. Segrest was arrested, charged with first-degree murder, and is being held in jail without bond. He admits that the gun with which the murder was presumably committed is his, and that he fired it at the youth.

If one considers Tuskegee to be a model community that has made steady progress toward racial reconciliation rooted in mutual respect and acceptance, it is difficult to explain the intense reaction to Younge's death—an intensity that is only weakly suggested by the four civil rights marches that have already occurred (as of Sunday, January 9). In point of fact, the events of the past year make it abundantly clear that Tuskegee has been living a lie—a lie made all the more dangerous by the apparent control that Negroes have secured over the political agencies of the community. This is not primarily the fault of TCA, nor of its leader, Charles Gomillion; they have displayed immense courage, dedication and resourcefulness in achieving what has been achieved. Nor is it primarily the fault of the white moderates with whom the Gomillion group has cooperated, for within the framework of their political vision they have tried earnestly and in good faith to achieve racial reconciliation. The fault lies in the self-deceptive nature of the vision that guides both groups, and in the external pressure that constrains that vision from moving from status to contract. I do not even speak of that further movement to a genuine fellowship of equals in which race is what in morality it should be—an aesthetic datum of no greater importance than the difference between the white bark of the birch and the dark bark of the oak.

TIAL was organized in February, 1965. Until that time students at Tuskegee Institute had more or less conformed to the pattern so skillfully promoted by Booker T. Washington and those who followed him. Prudent quiescence crossed with genuine indifference had produced the self-limiting and ambitious person so devastatingly portrayed in the opening pages of Ralph Ellison's The Invisible Man. But, quite inevitably, the winds of racial change began to penetrate even the protected environment at Tuskegee.

Younge belonged to TIAL, almost from its inception. He had his baptism of protest when the Tuskegee students decided to demonstrate in cooperation with SNCC in Montgomery. Younge was put in charge of raising funds to finance that march, and managed to produce $1,200 within two days. But the demonstration itself was chaotic. It featured an impromptu debate between the leader of TIAL and Al Lingo, the Alabama Director of Public Safety, about the nature of totalitarianism. It also featured one of the strangest lockouts in the history of human protest—the decision by the only nearby Negro church to close its doors to the demonstrators. The consequences of this lockout were more physical than spiritual, as in segregated Montgomery no other rest-room facilities were readily accessible to the protestors gathered at the state capitol. The protest also engendered internal disputes so rancorous that after the demonstration TIAL was reduced to a nucleus of about twelve persons. Younge was one of the twelve.

Enormous hostility was directed toward the members of TIAL by the administrators, faculty and students of Tuskegee Institute, as well as by the TCA and other community leaders. Nevertheless, though members had violated a number of paternalistic regulations, no action was ever taken against them by the Institute's administration.

During April and May, TIAL devoted itself to voter registration. Its first major success came, however, when it succeeded, through picketing, in so reducing the business of the local A&P that a Negro was employed there for the first time in recent history. Unfortunately, this did not represent a net addition to the A&P's Negro personnel in that part of Alabama, for the man employed in Tuskegee had already been on the company's payroll in nearby Auburn. That was TIAL's first encounter with the means by which those they fought managed to diminish apparent success through clever ruse.

On Commencement Day at Tuskegee Institute, while Martin Luther King was speaking to the assembled graduates, TIAL won its second victory by integrating the local municipal swimming pool. Ten persons, one of them white, gained entrance. That was the last day in 1965 that anyone swam in that pool. For on the following day garbage was thrown into the pool, and despite repeated promises from local officials, white and Negro, the pool was not readied for use again before the time came to close it in the fall. That was TIAL's second encounter with what it reasonably viewed as official duplicity—and this time Negro council members seemed to be participating.

But the major project of the year was the attempt to integrate three local white churches. During this endeavor, a few white men attacked and injured three demonstrators—two white, one Negro. The injured Negro youth was Wendell Paris, Younge's good friend. Paris had tried to protect Younge, who had only one kidney, from their assailants.

The beatings generated more distrust of local officials. As on all other occasions, the leaders of TIAL had carefully informed police of their protest plans and had requested protection. Whether accidentally or not, and many TIAL members think not, no policeman was in the vicinity when the violence occurred. The attackers were arrested, but only after much procrastination, because—as one influential white businessman put it—"We cannot go out and treat these people like common criminals. These are respectable citizens." The grand jury—which despite Negro preponderance in the population, and despite very large numbers of Negro professional people at the institute, the institute hospital and the Veterans Administration hospital, contained only two Negroes of eighteen jurymen—refused even to indict the "respectable" attackers.

In short, the local whites, often with the cooperation of Negroes who undoubtedly are sincerely convinced that they act in the interests of racial reconciliation, have managed to cling to their basic social and economic prerogatives. Though there has been progress, patterns of segregation persist. There is only token integration in the schools, no white-operated restaurant within the city is open on an integrated basis,* the local movie theatre is still shut, housing is rigidly segregated.

But what has had an even more profound impact on the members of TIAL, as well as on many others in the community, is the way in which victory has been repeatedly transformed into defeat by what has appeared to be the deceit of Negroes as well as whites. Whether or not the suspicion is justified, its prevalence has important bearing on the decline of this model Southern community into a scene of violence and tension.

Through all these developments, Samuel Younge, Jr., was active and highly visible. There are responsible members of the Tuskegee Institute community who say that he was long ago marked for punishment by local Klan members. The Klan is active in Macon County, and during the church demonstrations of the previous summer, the Younge home was constantly guarded by fellow townsmen. Nevertheless, he and his Tuskegee friends used to take chances; for as George Ware, the first leader of TIAL, told me: "Despite all that has happened, these guys really couldn't believe that any of their white fellow townsmen were murderous."

Perhaps this remark gives the most important clue to the present temper of Tuskegee. For a long time the struggle there for civil rights had been carried on within what seemed to both militants and nonmilitants to be a tacitly accepted framework of rules which prevented really serious harm to anyone. The bullet in Younge's temple ended these complacent assumptions, and the reaction has been bitter.

Another factor in today's tensions is local politics. In the last Tuskegee election, two of the three major groups were the TCA and the Non-Partisan League. The TCA's basic policy is gradual assumption of municipal power, always taking care to preserve the biracial character of local government. Dr. Gomillion believes, first, that Tuskegee has the obligation to provide a model for other Southern communities, especially black-belt communities. The key, he says, to successful reconciliation of the races is to allay the white man's fear that he will suffer the tyranny he has perpetrated. Second, Dr. Gomillion thinks that the immoderate whites who previously held municipal power were bent on a policy of rule or ruin—that they would have wrecked the city financially had not the Negro majority elected a white majority to council leadership. Finally, he feels that it is tremendously important for Negroes to succeed once they do begin to participate in decision making, and that a period in the minority can serve both to avoid responsibility for failure and to give Negroes the experience they need for success.

---

*Since this was written one restaurant has apparently been opened to Negroes.

Whether he is right or wrong, Dr. Gomillion impresses one as a man of strong conviction, great integrity and faultless courage. Few of his opponents deny that he possesses these qualities.

Certainly Dr. Paul Puryear, also a Tuskegee Institute professor and leader of the Non-Partisan League, does not deny it. Acknowledging the historic achievements of Dr. Gomillion and his organization, Dr. Puryear and his group nevertheless opposed the TCA slate in the last city elections—and were soundly beaten. A Northerner and a relative newcomer to Tuskegee, Dr. Puryear sees an essential difference between the two groups. Where the TCA strives primarily for racial reconciliation, even at the expense both of genuine competence in government and of release from a system of deference that degrades the human spirit, the League demands that the most competent persons in the community be elected and appointed to public office, and that the system of deference be dismantled as rapidly as it is politically feasible to do so. His two aims are inextricably connected, for the possible pace of change is very much a function of the competence and dedication of those who hold office.

Dr. Puryear is especially eager to discredit one of the myths that many hold about recent Tuskegee history—that his group put forward a wholly Negro slate of candidates, and that it in fact wants to replace whites with Negroes. Actually one of the League's candidates for council was a white man. Puryear insists that in Tuskegee it is reasonable to suppose that a preponderance of competent persons is likely to be found within the Tuskegee Institute staff and the staff of the veterans hospital, both of which are predominantly Negro, rather than in the white business community. It is also likely that a commitment to dismantling the system of deference will be deeper among Negroes than among whites.

But Puryear and those who side with him emphatically favor a multi-racial society based on genuine equality. Nor are they indifferent to the problems of racial reconciliation in the short run. Puryear deplores the use of force, and would do everything in his power to avert violence—short of selling out the ideals for which the whole political struggle is undertaken in the first place. Moreover, he believes that in the short and long run the most effective way to forestall violence in a community that is, after all, more than 80 per cent Negro is to provide genuine relief from the indignities of a system based on segregation and to provide constructive channels for the pent-up energies this system has generated.

Puryear regards the view that Negroes in Tuskegee lack the experience to insure success in municipal government as a "classic expression of self-hate." For, as he put it before the murder: "How can we learn from those who have demonstrated their incompetence?" His judgment in this regard has been reinforced by the circumstances and consequences of Younge's death.

Puryear also has an educational motive for the policies he favors. He believes that in the long run the quality of Tuskegee Institute is going to be determined largely by the quality of the local community in which it is embedded. And he is certain that the quality of that community will be what it should be only when every Negro is "free to be himself." Finally, he opposed the TCA on the ground that its program is responsive primarily to the aspirations of middle-class Negroes, and coincidentally to the white middle class, and not to the poor and very poor who are the bulk of the Negro population in Tuskegee and in Macon County generally.

How do the students in TIAL react to this political conflict among their elders? Shortly before his death, I interviewed Younge and his friend and co-leader Paris. The dialogue is of special interest because it constitutes as much of Younge's political last will and testament as we are likely to get. (Unfortunately, I did not distinguish between the remarks of the two students, but as there was absolutely no disagreement between them, the interview may, I believe, be taken as faithful to Younge's position.)

Like Puryear, Younge opposed the view that Tuskegee is a model community. He claimed that in a town in which a prominent white moderate twice called him and Paris "nigger" in the privacy of his office, "the Tuskegee image was being carried too far." He and Paris described the effort and frustration that TIAL had encountered the previous summer. They claimed that, nevertheless, they were prepared to work with segregationists, provided it was politically effective to do so. Younge said that TIAL had originally tried to cooperate with TCA, but had been rebuffed and, in some instances, suffered wicked verbal attack.

He argued that the test of political effectiveness was whether genuine equality and freedom is promoted. He mentioned that Tuskegee can be a model community only when everyone in it is free and equal. And, echoing Puryear, he claimed Tuskegee could achieve these aims only by electing "the most qualified people" to public office. He did not deny that TCA had made substantial contributions to the goals sought, but claimed that much had been left undone that should and could have been done.

A segregationist, to Younge, was any white man who, through acts of commission or omission, tended to support the prevailing racial patterns. And an Uncle Tom he explicitly defined as any Negro who helps white men implement their segregationist theories. He described one prominent TCA leader as "the biggest Uncle Tom in the South," but said of another, "he will do what he can." Thus neither TIAL leader viewed the TCA as either monolithic or irrevocably "segregationist." Indeed, they both expressed admiration for the past achievements of Dr. Gomillion and of Mrs. Beulah Johnson, another prominent TCA leader who is one of TIAL's most energetic detractors. Mrs. Johnson, they said, "used to be the most militant person in town, but now she defends white moderates."

Again—and this is particularly poignant — they deplored the incompetence of the local police force, but singled out one officer for special praise as a "pretty just man." They both regretted that the police had had so little experience and training.

In discussing the Tuskegee Institute community, Younge complained that TIAL did not get much support from students, who tended to be preoccupied with the pursuit of conventional careers. He looked forward to the day when what he described as the institute's "totalitarian administration" would establish a bill of rights for students, and would create an environment of genuine academic freedom in all respects. He specifically called for elimination of "segregationists on the Institute's Board of Trustees."

Though both young men express respect for Dr. Puryear and the other leaders of the Non-Partisan League, they also felt that perhaps these men "just want power." In general, their attitude toward Negro members of older generations ranged from the flat claim that they are Uncle Toms to cautious respect mingled with skepticism about their motives. They were convinced that, in the long run, substantial changes would be achieved not through faith in the good will of others, but through the persistent application of pressure. Yet they were essentially optimistic about the prospect for progressive change, about their own ability to marshal the pressure. "Some people are listening," said Younge. Today, as a result of his death, almost everyone in the Tuskegee community is listening.

The morning after the killing, two meetings and a march were held. About 2,500 persons participated in the march. On the day of the funeral, civil rights activity was suspended, but from Wednesday, January 5, through Saturday, January 8, three additional marches and two more general meetings have taken place.

Tuskegee Institute president, Luther Foster, called the meeting that was held on Thursday, January 6. Almost every member of the staff and student body must have been jammed into Logan Hall to hear him proclaim the freedom of staff, students and citizens to involve themselves as they desire in civil rights activity; and to state his "expectation that people will so involve themselves."

It was not the first time Dr. Foster has said such things, nor had this freedom been effectively denied any member of the Tuskegee community in the preceding year. But the utterance of those words on that occasion was nevertheless an event of considerable symbolic significance for the Negro in America. For here, in the school founded by the acknowledged leader of American Negroes for a quarter of a century, Dr. Foster completed the break with the Booker T. Washington philosophy and tradition that has been in process since Rosa Parks decided to stay put in a Montgomery bus some 30 miles away and more than ten years ago. And Wendell Paris made things explicit on the following evening when, referring to a campus statue of Washington which depicts him lifting a veil from a huddled slave, he declaimed: "We got this statue out here of that man who's supposed to be lifting up the veil. Man, he's putting it back on!"

It was Washington who proclaimed, in his Atlanta Exposition address of 1895: "In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress." It was Washington who in his autobiography had declared that "there is something in human nature which we cannot blot out, which makes one man, in the end, recognize and reward merit in another, regardless of color or race. . . . The time will come," Washington assured his fellow black men, "when the Negro will be accorded all the political rights which his ability, character, and material possessions entitle him to." He was certain that these "will be accorded to the Negro by the Southern white people themselves [without] outside or artificial forcing."

That things did not work out quite that way members of the institute faculty who possessed Ph.D.s discovered when they were denied the franchise on the basis of literacy requirements. The TCA was organized and it secured those voting rights through some "artificial forcing." But its zeal and success did not produce a general effort to rethink Washington's philosophy, or to dismantle the institutional structure he had so confidently imposed on Tuskegee Institute, and which had been so long accepted by almost all American Negroes. The explicit endorsement and encouragement of student militancy by Washington's current successor, Dr. Foster, was thus significant far beyond its local meaning. For in his mild and graceful manner, Dr. Foster was expressing his conviction that the cause of civil rights required a great deal of "artificial forcing"—and that he expected every Negro in the Tuskegee community to participate.

President Foster's talk preceded speeches by the president of the Student Council, Gwen Patton, and by Dr. Puryear, who spoke on behalf of the Ad Hoc Committee for Justice in Macon County—a group organized by some faculty members only two days earlier. Both speakers voiced a series of demands. Puryear's proposals, which included a municipal public accommodations law stronger and more comprehensive than federal laws on that subject, were adopted without dissent by the overflow audience. Miss Patton's proposals were greeted with an almost unanimous endorsement. And, in a letter to President Johnson, Miss Patton said: "Sir, to be honest with you, the students of Tuskegee Institute are not planning to follow the course of nonviolence if justice is not done in this case." Whether her statement was intended as threat or prediction, and whether or not it is prophetic of student action, Miss Patton was undoubtedly voicing the passions of the moment. The emotional pitch was such that even this sentiment was approved in the school founded by Booker T. Washington.

The virtual unanimity of this meeting was shattered in a mass assembly held the next evening. Another student march, the third, had been staged that Friday morning, and the meeting was called by Miss Patton to determine the wishes of the student community, to reinforce their determination to act, and to announce plans.

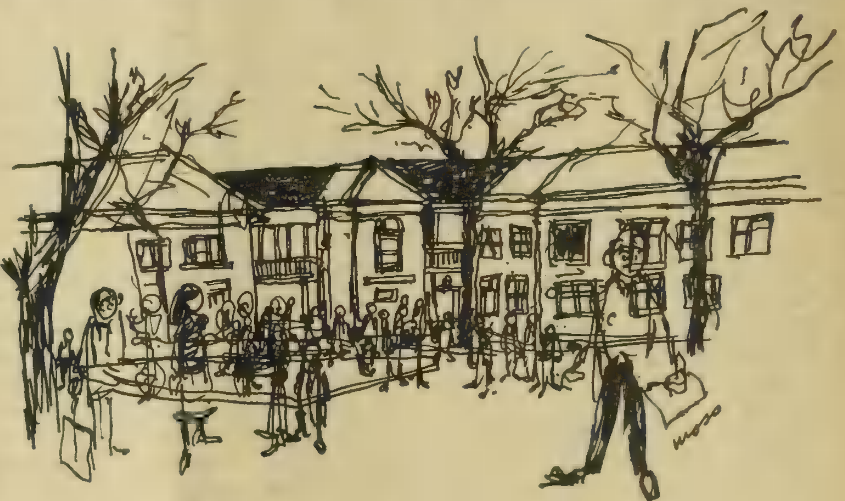
Dr. Foster again spoke first. In a clear effort to slow the pace of student protest he described the things that had been achieved. He announced that a large number of federal agents were in Tuskegee, that investigators from Alabama Attorney General Richmond Flower's office were also there, that officials of the Federal Conciliation Service had met twice with large and representative groups, that the city council had offered to call a special session to consider informally Dr. Puryear's proposed ordinance, and to give the proposals "genuine and serious" consideration at the next general meeting on Tuesday. He also announced that the federal government had instituted suit against the two "private clubs" in town, a move intended to force them into desegregating their dining rooms. Finally, he told the audience that local officials had informed him of "grave dangers" that would attend any marching on Saturday, though he emphasized that he made the announcement only to provide information relevant to plans for further action.

Though Dr. Foster did not prohibit demonstrations and tried on all occasions to make sure that any that did occur should receive the fullest possible protection, it is clear that he was trying to discourage the students from marching into town the next day. Given what he had been told, and his responsibilities as president, he would have been derelict in his duty had he not cautioned the students. The signs of danger to which he referred were reports of cars full of white men with rifles, phoned threats to various people, threats voiced directly to police, at least two instances in which local whites in cars apparently tried to run demonstrators down—without being arrested—and so on. To his caution, Gwen Patton responded: "Ain't no guns or rifles gonna turn us around. We realize the danger, but Sammy Younge did it by himself. So what difference does it make whether it's one or a million?" Her speech was followed by a vote favoring another march.

Still, some opposition was voiced on this occasion. One student expressed a view that is certainly held by many others—that the first march was justified, but that the others have only "riled people up." This statement was greeted by some catcalls. But when the Dean of Students, Dr. Bert Phillips, complained that "the rudeness tonight is certainly not civil, and if we're going to have civil rights then we have to be civil right down the line," there was much applause.

George Ware, who had led the demonstrations of the previous summer, reminded the students of how often they had relied on promises, only to be frustrated in their legitimate expectations. He said that if they backed down, they would be responsible for the next death.

Perhaps the most dramatic speech of the evening was given by James Forman, executive secretary of SNCC. He asked when the terror was going to be stopped. He said that he knew his own days were numbered, but that he had to go on. And he challenged the students: "What do you live for? That's the basic question, baby." Then, describing the many luxuries that can be bought in our consumer paradise, he asked: "Is that enough? Is that enough? Or are you going to take the education you get and give it back to the people?" Forman ended with his favorite quote from Frederick Douglass: "A man who won't agitate for his rights, don't need no rights." Applause was thunderous.



The role that SNCC has played in the demonstrations to date is another bone of controversy. Many people here distrust the SNCC leaders and deplore the fact that TIAL has worked so closely with SNCC over the past year. Younge was not the only member of SNCC among the TIAL leadership, and the presence of the organization on campus is viewed by many as proof that its leaders are pulling the strings. As far as I can tell, that is not so. The various decisions made by the students have met with the overwhelming approval of the students present. It is true that debate has been something less than full and free, but in the excitement of the moment, the demand for more representative discussion has been rather weak. Moreover, despite the ominous predictions, a strong case can be made that the march of Saturday was the most useful and significant of all.

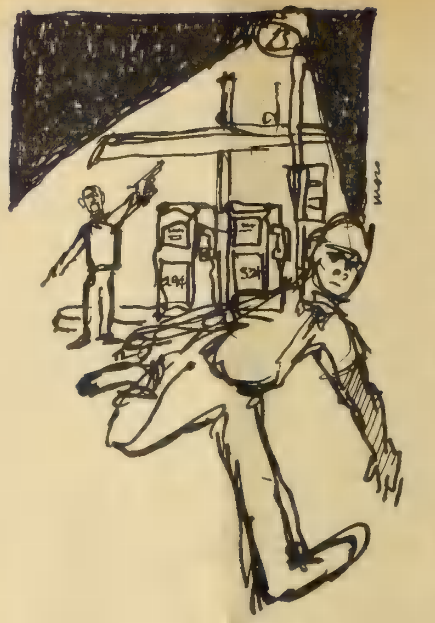
The tension was very high that morning; students admitted that they were scared. Though there must have been 1,500 of them in the hall the evening before, only 250 to 300 were present at the start of the march. The town seemed quiet. The day before, state troopers had joined the city and county police, but they were nowhere to be seen as the march began. The local police had meanwhile concentrated at a spot about a quarter-mile from the campus which the students and faculty would have to pass. When the demonstrators reached them, the police blocked their progress and announced that they would not be permitted to march into town because they lacked a parade permit. The students had not been warned that this would occur, nor indeed were the officers of the institute to whom I talked so notified. Angered, the marchers moved into the center of the highway and sat down. There they remained for about an hour and a half, while their number almost doubled.

The reason given for the barricade was undoubtedly not the real one. It is more likely that the city fathers had decided that all of this "disorderly process" had gone far enough, that a mob had gained control, that the time had come for life to return to normal. It was a typical miscalculation. First, there had been little disorder on the campus, and none at all during the demonstrations. Second, as far as I could tell by sampling my own students, those who participated were among the best and most responsible of the undergraduates. Third, normalcy was precisely what these students were determined to fight, at whatever risk. Eventually the students voted to proceed against the police barrier. They locked arms and began to press. Everyone heaved a sigh when the police gave way.

The students marched to the center of town, and seated themselves in front of the businesses of the white moderate leadership of the community. Many local people, most of them rural Negroes, were induced to cross the street and sit with them. The faces of some of these older people were studies in mingled fear and determination. For more than a few it was the first time they had ever participated in a demonstration, and their own courage must have amazed them.

The only thing that sullied the protest was a harangue by one SNCC worker who, among other things, insisted on the basis of no evidence whatever that Younge's murder had been planned in the chambers of the City Council. I believe many of the demonstrators found this demagogy repugnant. They feel that with so much truth and justice on their side, there is not even tactical justification for lies. They deplore the fact that anyone should think it necessary to begin again the process of degradation from which they allegedly want to rescue those they claim to help. But this incident was unique. No one else from on or off the campus broke the unspoken discipline of the marches. After about an hour and many songs, the marchers rose quietly, and in orderly fashion returned to the campus.

I said that this march was the most important and useful of all. I think so because the students who participated, all of whom genuinely believed that they were marching into danger, seemed to be saying to their elders: "Look, we are not a hard core—we are almost a quarter of the total student body. We haven't been manipulated into marching—we march because we want to. We know there is danger, and we're scared, but this time we are determined to do whatever is required to show that we mean business. We are not prepared to accept the indignities you have understandably accepted. We want our freedom—and your freedom—and we want it now. We won't give up until we have won every bit of freedom that is ours by right of birth in this country, supposed to be free and democratic." The older folk may shudder, but I would guess that the majority of them are proud of and inspired by these young people.



If demonstrations continue—and the students seem determined to persist—protection will be difficult, for reasons that dramatically illustrate the need for new federal legislation. The city of Tuskegee has fourteen policemen, supplemented by a county force of four men. All have been working long and exhausting hours. It is a strain that they cannot reasonably be expected to endure indefinitely. The state provided some men during the week of demonstrations, but the community accepted this assistance only on condition that the state police be subject to the authority of local officers. Tuskegee may not be a model community, but no one—except a few Klansmen—wants George Wallace's finest running the show.

The obvious alternative is to turn to the federal government for assistance, but as Attorney General Katzenbach interprets existing statutes, he will not recommend federal intervention until the state has demonstrated that it cannot control the situation. Moreover, the City Council and the officers of Tuskegee Institute know full well that should they initiate efforts to bypass the state's law-enforcement agencies, the state can retaliate in an indefinitely large number of ways that affect education, welfare, the poverty program, technical police assistance, and so on. Because the federal government continues to insist on the myth of reliable state law enforcement in all the states of the union, a relatively progressive black-belt community is caught between the devil and his principal Southern agent.

How the City Council will deal with the situation that has developed is not yet clear. There is some talk of deputizing local citizens, some talk of borrowing police from surrounding communities. Governor Wallace, striving mightily to postpone the day on which justice can be secured in Alabama, has just recommended that all elected county officials be retained in office three years beyond the expiration date of their terms. And one of the three members appointed by Wallace to the board charged with deciding who appears on the panel from which the grand jury will be drawn is the proprietor of the Standard Oil station whose attendant denied Samuel Younge, Jr., use of restroom facilities. The ironies of Alabama justice are endless.

Meanwhile, the City Council, and other municipal agencies in Tuskegee, are under pressure from another direction. They must deal with proposals that were first put forward by student government, TIAL, the Ad Hoc Committee for Justice in Macon County, and then endorsed—in a series of meetings called by President Foster to improve communication among the various factions involved—by a representative group of institute staff and townspeople. These demands include a sweeping public accommodations law, improvement of police services, discharge of the present Public Safety Commissioner, review of existing fire protection, correction of the present imbalance in the hiring of Negroes, complete integration of the schools, reopening of all recreational facilities (including the swimming pool) on an integrated basis, and a program of municipal public housing. The students have pledged that they will continue to demonstrate until their demands are substantially satisfied. They argue that, in light of recent history, faith in promises is not possible.

The council has already responded to the demand for enactment of a comprehensive public accommodations law. They have met informally with the Ad Hoc Committee, and have promised formal consideration of the proposed legislation. Whether they will respond quickly and fully enough to slow the pace of protest remains to be seen. What seems clear is that the council is now at last willing to consider steps which have long been ignored, postponed or flatly rejected. Perhaps Tuskegee will yet become a model Southern community.

The myth that it ever was such a model arose primarily from the desire of many people of good will, North and South, to believe it. Their self-deception is quite understandable. The contrast between Tuskegee and Hayneville is as great as that between pre-revolutionary France and France in the Middle Ages. Tuskegee has made substantial progress in some areas; in others, it lags behind even certain other black-belt communities. Nearby Auburn, for example, is no black man's paradise, but a Negro can dine publicly with a white friend in a white-owned restaurant.

The extreme bitterness of the reaction to Younge's death, and the prevailing sense of outrage at conditions in the city, are in part due to the very gap between rhetoric and reality. The progress that has been made, and the public relations use to which this progress has been put, have generated expectations that are greater than those existing in most Southern communities. The murder of Younge accelerated the process of dealing with the resulting frustrations. But it would have happened eventually anyway, for when the gap between claims and facts is great, exacerbation becomes so intense, and incidents so likely, that something is bound to precipitate action.

Drugs on Campus: Turned On & Tuned Out

Mervin B. Freedman and Harvey Powelson

Within the last five years the ingestion of various drugs has become widespread on the American campus. Until recently, drugs were used almost exclusively by those clearly out of step with conventional American life. Prior to 1960, also, the taking of drugs implied physiological addiction, heroin being the substance most used. An exception was marijuana. Certain groups in Los Angeles and New York, many of them actors and writers, smoked pot without deleterious physiological effects or interference with their professional activities. However, marijuana was very rarely found on college campuses.

Physiologically addictive drugs are still almost unknown on campus, but there are now few colleges and universities where marijuana and the new psychedelic drugs, chiefly LSD, are not consumed. On even the most provincial of campuses a student who has flipped out as a result of taking LSD is likely to turn up at the counseling center, or a few students may be expelled for smoking pot in a dormitory. This is not to say that the proportion of students who take drugs is high. Most college students are conventional and dutiful, and are unlikely to contravene acceptable standards of behavior in so serious a way. But on campuses where cosmopolitan students congregate — large city campuses or prestigious small liberal arts colleges — the proportion of students who experiment with pot or LSD may run as high as 10 per cent. This is not a large proportion, but the total numbers are considerable. In a student body of 15,000, for example, but 2 per cent is 300 students — a figure not easily ignored. And the number of drug takers is growing.

It is difficult to fashion a serious case against smoking marijuana except that a user will find himself in serious trouble if he is caught by the police. The effects on society at large, were pot smoking to be as ubiquitous as the consumption of alcohol, are unknown, but within the current limits of use, there is little evidence that marijuana damages the individuals who smoke it. However, once a student has stepped over the line and finds that nothing terrible has happened, it is easy to fall into the illusion that there are no dangers at all. Occasionally a person of somewhat precarious emotional stability may be thrown into a panic state or even a psychosis as a result of smoking pot, but this seldom happens. Similarly, there is little basis for asserting that pot smoking is often a prelude to self-destructive or socially damaging acts. No data exist, for example, to demonstrate that marijuana contributes significantly to an individual's criminal tendencies.

Perhaps the most serious charge that may be made against pot is that it is psychologically damaging. Since it is officially banned, its use reinforces rebellious and anti-social tendencies. Individuals who smoke pot regularly—as opposed to those who experiment with it on one or a few occasions—are likely to scoff at such a remark. Divorced as they are from traditional American culture and society, they are hardly frightened by the prospect of further alienation. Indeed, they are apt to welcome it.

The consistent pot smokers are for the most part graduate students in the arts, philosophy, the humanities and, to some extent, in the social sciences. The rebellion they express in many ways, pot smoking among them, stems from their disillusion with American life and values. They oppose American intervention in Vietnam; they are angered by the lot of Negroes and other disadvantaged minority groups. And they are militant. Aside from enjoying pot's intrinsic satisfactions — relaxation, heightened sensibility, etc. — these students get pleasure from sharing a rebellious, illegal activity. The more rebellious or "anti" the movement, the greater the likelihood that pot smokers will be drawn to it. On the other hand, the use of marijuana is rare in the Peace Corps and Poverty Corps. Even though these workers may oppose traditional policies and politics, their activities are more a gesture of social affirmation than of protest.

On any cosmopolitan campus today or in any large city, a student can easily buy marijuana or a psychedelic drug. About eighty psychedelic or consciousness-expanding substances have been identified in the Western world—morning glory seeds, peyote, psyilocybin, are among the more prominent—but LSD, the most powerful, has preempted the field. Because of its shadowy status, it has often been easier to obtain than the clearly illegal marijuana. Revisions of federal drug laws will alter the status of LSD, but at least in the near future there is little likelihood that pot or acid will be in short supply. Connections, sometimes students, often ex-students, are easy to find. The going rate is $5 for an LSD capsule. And for many users one capsule is good for two "trips." You dissolve it in a glass of water and drink half the glass each time.

Mervin B. Freedman is chairman of the Psychology Department at San Francisco State College. Harvey Powelson is director of the Department of Psychiatry at Cowell Memorial Hospital, University of California.

Although the takers of marijuana and LSD overlap, these drugs have assumed quite different meanings for the students who ingest them. Pot smoking is likely to be a relaxing, convivial affair. On occasion, one may in the course of smoking marijuana undergo profound experiences, mystical or self-revelatory, but few pot enthusiasts would claim that it initiated one into life's mysteries. Devotees of LSD, on the other hand, have surrounded the ingestion of this substance with a mystique, with cults, with rituals. Some students claim that LSD experiences provide deep insights. They have seen themselves with a clear eye, stripped of the usual defenses and artifices which ordinarily hedge perception. A better self, an ideal self, may be envisioned. New powers are made available to them; intense mystical or religious experiences occur.

However, not all ingestions of LSD result in revelatory trips. Sometimes nothing happens. Other times, reaction may be limited to minor perceptual distortion. The setting in which LSD is taken considerably influences the effect. For some students an LSD trip is a profound personal experience; for others it becomes a religion, a way of life. These two kinds of LSD enthusiasm—the profound personal experience versus the way of life—tend to divide on the frequency of dosage. Students for whom LSD has not become a way of life probably have experienced only a few LSD trips—three or four perhaps, spaced at intervals of several months. LSD experience is likely to contribute to their alienation. They see so very clearly the falsity of the material values that dominate Western society; they have experienced true love—they know what the word love means; they have reconciled the conflicts which plague Western man, and so on. And these experiences have spurred them on to rebel all the more vehemently against conventional American life and politics.

When LSD becomes a religion or a way of life, students take it more frequently—once a week perhaps, or even more often. And when this occurs, a student is likely to leave school. A number of large universities now have groups or cults of LSD devotees who live in the vicinity. Most of the members are ex-students. These people are turned on to their inner world, their internal experience. The external world is tuned out. They do little of anything except observe. They are great nature lovers. They will journey to places of unusual natural beauty, turn on with LSD, and look. They work spasmodically, when funds are needed, but otherwise are inactive. The preoccupations of most people—educational, professional, political—are "games" to them. There is the "Vietnam-administration game," the "student-administration game," the "Hitler-Jewish game," the "McCarthy-ADA game," and the like. Their living conditions often become squalid. The truth has been revealed to them. They are in tune with infinity, and anyone who is hung up on involvement with experiences or activities of the external world is dismissed as a square.

Communication between these votaries of LSD and squares is limited. Because so much of what occurs during an LSD trip is nonverbal, little can be reported. And "what the word cannot say, the mind cannot know." LSD enthusiasts talk of religious conversions, the awakening of artistic creativity, the reconciliation of opposites. The main change to be observed in such individuals, however, is that they have given up doing anything. The aspiring painter talks of the heightening of his aesthetic sensibilities and skills, but he has stopped painting. The graduate student who withdrew from writing his dissertation in philosophy talks of the wondrous philosophical theories he has evolved. But nothing is written. It seems that the world of fantasy has become far more compelling than the world of involvement with external things. Indeed, fantasy is substituted for reality. If one has dreamed the idea of a great novel, the work of actually writing it becomes a drag.

Much has been made of the psychological perils of LSD. They are real enough. In San Francisco or New York one could doubtless track down a hundred or more cases of people who had been rendered psychotic as a result of a dose of LSD. Each student health service, psychiatric clinic, emergency service of a general hospital, would yield a number of such cases. Most of these episodes are of short duration. For each instance of an individual's flipping out, there are several of panic reaction to an LSD experience. Tranquilizers will terminate the physiological effects of LSD in such instances. Most of these reactions occur when LSD is taken in unfavorable settings—alone in a room or in somewhat uncongenial company. Probably more serious is the impairment of judgment that may accompany an LSD trip. It is often difficult to determine the duration of the experience. Individuals whose customary judgment is still somewhat impaired may be driving cars, teaching classes, or making decisions about important family matters.

The long-range physiological results of such a powerful stress reaction as an LSD experience are unknown. Evidence seems to be mounting that repeated ingestions of LSD may have permanent or enduring adverse effects. The semidazed quality displayed by some individuals who are on LSD a good part of the time may be physiological in origin, at least in part. It is unlikely that one or several ingestions of LSD will have enduring physiological effects, but definitive data on this score are not yet at hand.

It is in quietism, however, that the chief danger of LSD lies. An affluent and complex society can easily afford small groups of people whose chief commitment is to their internal processes and their fantasy worlds. But what if there were many such? It is ironic that the military establishments of both Russia and the United States, the very groups that epitomize all that the devotees of consciousness expansion most oppose, are experimenting with LSD—as a weapon, of course. A population that is turned on will make no trouble. It will be easy prey for the conqueror. LSD zealots ignore the realities of power—unlike Mahatma Gandhi or William Blake, mystics who were committed to the human and social struggle.

LSD is unquestionably of potential value in various forms of psychotherapy. It may be used, for example, to shatter the habitual modes of reaction of people with strong fixations—alcoholics, recidivist criminals, compulsives, and others—so that they may evolve new ways of coping with the world and of living with themselves. And undoubtedly psychedelic experiences have entailed for some people profound personal insights and mystical and spiritual experiences. These powers are to be taken seriously.

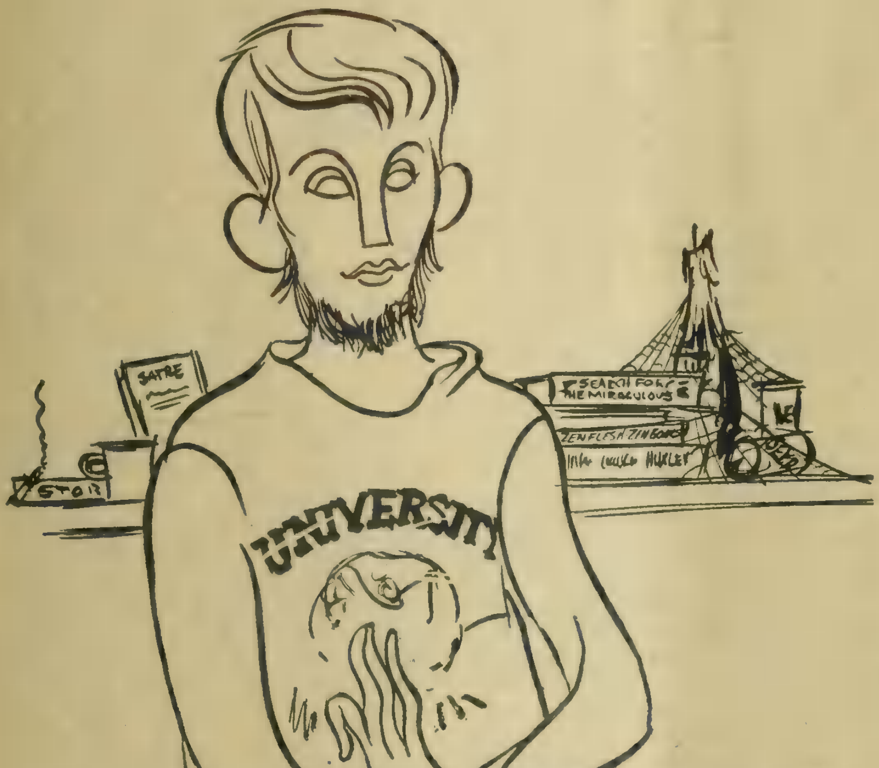
It is more difficult to take LSD seriously as a religion or a way of life. The notion that in 3 to 6 hours one may painlessly attain to the wisdom that Buddha achieved over a period of years seems ludicrous. The LSD grab bag of philosophy compounded out of Zen, Fromm, existentialism, Aldous Huxley, Jung, et al., is an unlikely guide to action in a complex society. The description of a person as "He's loving" (the ultimate compliment), as if somehow one could touch this entity of love, is right out of adolescent fantasy. Above all, the absence of a tragic sense makes LSD as a religion or way of life no more applicable to the richness of human experience than any other simplistic religion.

Yet the phenomenon of psychedelic experience as a religion or way of life should not be written off. What attracts several hundreds of the brightest and most aware of American youth to psychedelic experience and makes zealots of them? Why are many thousands of other youths eager to undergo this experience? The answers are, of course, many and varied. Transcendentalism and the search for utopia are hardly new to American life. There is, however, an urgency to the quest by many young people for new values that deserves the most serious regard.

The brightest and most sensitive of college youth are examining the values of the Western world, and are finding them wanting. There is an upsurge of interest in introspection and in the life of the emotions. There is great concern with people rather than with things. Questions of ethics and morality are on their minds as perhaps never before in American life—not since the Civil War, at any rate. And their education is not meeting these interests. The things that are most important to many young Americans are not being discussed in academic life. The sterile formalism of much American higher education can hardly hold a candle to the psychedelic experience.

Similarly, many youths are turning away in disgust from American society. Injustices that were once accepted lightly—the situation of the Negro, for example—are now a source of pain. A war in Vietnam of most ambiguous morality cannot be easily tolerated. A society which expends enormous wealth on orbiting space ships, the occupants of which can talk to each other only by recourse to locker-room banter, seems almost unendurable.

The interest of many students in drug experience may not be dismissed simply as a sign of delinquency, rebelliousness or psychological pathology. It represents a search for a new way of life. It indicates needs and desires that American society and education do not now meet or fill. There is a quality of naïveté in this quest by students. Wholeness, joy, wisdom or love are not likely to emerge from a few hours that are spent under the influence of a chemical. The interest in drug experience informs us, however, that American society and education are doing little to contribute to the richness of life that students sense can be theirs.



Ventura County

THE BARBARIAN CONQUEST

. . . Jack D. Forbes

When did the Barbarians finally conquer Ventura County, California? It is difficult to select a precise date, for the victory was won only after many years of subversion and infiltration. The invasion commenced as a mere dribble in the 1850s, and the size, beauty and natural resources of the county, as well as its Mexican-Indian heritage, forestalled immediate success. Nevertheless, by 1900, the Barbarians largely dominated the commercial life of the county, and only the presence of vast wide-open spaces stood in their path. The 1920s and 1930s saw their power grow, and finally the "great rush" of the post-World War II era gave them their triumph.

Ventura County, along with much of Southern California, is today part of the Barbarian Empire—and probably will be forever, since a region which has once been under Barbarian rule seldom successfully rebels or is capable of recovery. Pockmarked Appalachia stands as an example.

Who are these modern-day Barbarians? The dictionary says that a barbarian is "one whose state of culture is between savagery and civilization . . . any rude, brutal, or uncultured person. . . ." "Barbaric" characteristics are "wildly splendid or showy." This, indeed, is our modern invader. He is anti-cultural, anti-intellectual and anti-conservationist. He is rude and noisy, he is addicted to "wildly splendid and showy" consumption, he cuts down ancient oak trees and replaces them with cement and asphalt, he tears down historical monuments to make room for prefabricated hamburger stands, he destroys beaches to construct parking lots and freeways, he cuts up mountain sides to make a buck (and gets a divvy of the disaster money when the houses slide down the hill). In short, our Barbarian Empire is ruled by men and women whose tastes are crude and whose ethic is simplicity indeed: let's make money.

The destruction of Ventura County is a significant story, since Ventura serves as an example of what happened in other sections of the Empire. Certainly life was not perfect before the Barbarians came. Many Mexicans and Indians were careless of their heritage, a few were wasteful with natural resources, others were willing to prey upon the less fortunate; but their vices were offset by the then abundance of resources and by the basically non-exploitive nature of their pastoral life. Unlettered as they were, these paisanos possessed a sense of balance, a sense of dignity, a sense of agrarian contentment that the typical Barbarian lacks. And most important of all, money did not rule their lives.

The change began with the coming of the Anglo-Americans. I don't mean to imply that the terms "Anglo-American" and "Barbarian" are synonymous—it is merely that the Anglo introduced money hunger into California on a large scale for the first time. After that, many Mexicans were capable of being reduced to barbarism by the newcomer's example, while many Anglos have always resisted the disease of plutomania.

The conquest of Ventura County proceeded gradually. First, the more well-to-do Mexican landowners became infected; they squandered their patrimony and Anglo speculators and carpetbagging lawyers moved in to take over the land. The "Dons" were children when it came to playing the game of barbarism—and inevitably lost to the experts. But the county was large enough to absorb the newcomers, and with the promoters and fast-buck artists came schoolteachers and other useful people who built homes and tried, in their quiet way, to live a simple, satisfactory life. Nevertheless, the seeds of disaster were already spouting: the bears were slaughtered and totally exterminated, other forms of wild life were decimated, many natural resources were reduced, and the native Chumash Indians were driven from their ancient homes by developers who had no use for even the labor of the Red man.

The big change, however, came with oil. The populace rejoiced when oil was repeatedly discovered in different sections of the county—when the drilling rigs went up, and the ground became covered with seepage. What a landscape! Oil rigs in every direction, the trees all down, the brush removed, pipes running hither and thither—and a crop of money. This money was to make Ventura a metropolitan mecca of wealth and, perhaps, culture. But the oil was pumped, money was made, yet culture never came. The new millionaires did not live in the oil fields, and they spent their money elsewhere. Ventura got the derricks and the tank farms; other places, presumably, got culture.

But it wasn't all bad. People who were concerned with things other than money found refuge on their farms and orchards, or in quiet, out of the way corners and oak-covered glens. They built schools, grew crops, wrote books, developed a small museum, and some of them planted trees along roads, created parks, and tried to preserve historical monuments (such of them as

(Continued on page 140)

Jack D. Forbes is a native of Southern California now teaching history at the University of Nevada.

Killing Them Definitively

111 DAYS IN STANLEYVILLE. By David Reed. Harper & Row. 279 pp. $4.95.

OUT OF THE JAWS OF THE LION. By Homer E. Dowdy. Harper & Row. 254 pp. $3.95.

Paul F. Semonin

The death of the American missionary Dr. Paul Carlson erased from most people's minds any doubts about the motives of the American intervention at Stanleyville in late 1964. Most observers felt the Belgian paratroops plucked the white hostages out of the hands of a "rabble of dazed, ignorant savages." Few people gave any thought to the comment by British missionary Herbert Jenkinson, who operated the Leco bookstore in Stanleyville: "I don't think (the massacre) would have happened if the paras hadn't intervened. When they fired, the rebels hated us. Until then they had respected me as a missionary."

Was the sole purpose of the intervention "humanitarian"? The question seems as futile as asking who killed Kennedy. And the books published to date on the Congo intervention offer less consolation to those with doubts than do studies of the assassination. 111 Days in Stanleyville, by Reader's Digest roving editor David Reed, provides a blow-by-blow account of the hostages' ordeal but is wholly lacking in any original interpretation of the affair. Out of the Jaws of the Lion by Homer E. Dowdy, which focuses on the Protestant missionaries in the Stanleyville area, consists primarily of eulogic stories of their deaths. Dowdy, who has also reported on missionary work in Vietnam, flew to the Congo at the behest of Rev. Ralph B. Odman, general secretary of the Unevangelized Field Mission. For all their diligent research, neither Reed nor Dowdy saw fit to discuss Jenkinson's reservations about the intervention, quoted above.

Both authors bear out the truth of the African proverb which says, "The foreigner only sees what he knows." They lean heavily on the personal drama of the white hostages, selecting their anecdotes carefully to illustrate the harrowing experiences of whites who venture innocently onto the "dark continent." By dramatizing such atrocities, they reinforce the century-old prejudices of the white man toward the Congolese "savages" leading one to conclude that the Congolese simply aren't ready to govern themselves. Reed makes a nominal effort to point out legitimate grievances of the Congolese rebels, while portraying their "uncivilized" rebellion as canceling out any justice in their revolt.

Had Reed or Dowdy wished to expose the fraud of the "humanitarian" rescue, they had only to pick up a Belgian newspaper. The Dutch Catholic journal De Standardt reported the following interviews with paras at Saventhem airport after their return from the Congo:

> The numerous stories of the evacuation were always the same. The soldiers said they had found the rebels in closets and drawers in the houses and that the rebels allowed themselves to be killed there. "I saw one who was reading a book," said a para. "I shot. He continued to read, until I killed him definitivement." During the evacuation, told another, "I entered an empty house. Only the toilet door was locked. I said to my companion: That's not right and I emptied my gun into the door. Then we looked through the house. When we passed the toilet again, I saw blood flowing under the door, I was right to think something was wrong."

Another para told a correspondent from the Belgian publication Special: "When I saw the white bodies, it was too much for me. I fired, as much as I could, on all the blacks I saw."

The Belgian paras, according to the State Department, were "under orders to use force only in their own defense or in the defense of foreign and Congolese civilians." Yet J. Anthony Lukas of The New York Times estimated that some 3,000 Congolese were killed in Stanleyville on the two days following the drop, a period when, according to every report, the rebels had fled into the bush. How many of those shot down indiscriminately by the paras were civilians? No one knows. In Stanleyville when the stench was too great and there was danger of an epidemic, the dead were buried in mass graves under the supervision of a UN sanitation official.

On two occasions, at Albertville and Uvira, the rebels were bombed and strafed after they allowed whites to leave. They felt that the presence of the white hostages at Stanleyville had prevented the air attacks, which along with continuing massacres by white mercenaries, had taken a heavy toll among their own civilian population. Reed casually quotes a mercenary at Kindu: "I should imagine in Kindu we must have shot three thousand people. I'll be honest with you: most of them unnecessarily." He discreetly omits an eyewitness account of the Kindu massacre given by an English mercenary, Geoff Munn (published in the French weekly, le Nouvel Observateur). Munn later deserted the mercenary force because he was sick of killing.

> We charged on the town. The blacks tried to reach the other bank of the river. Few of them made it. We mowed them down by the dozens in our descent. Suddenly, we found ourselves in the midst of them. They didn't fight back at all. We killed, killed, killed. Finally at nightfall when we were sure there was no one left alive, we tried to settle down. We stumbled over the bodies. Exhausted, some of us slept among the corpses.

On another occasion the rebels sabotaged a truck belonging to the mercenaries on the road to Stanleyville. The mercenaries were ordered to destroy the nearest village in retaliation. Again Munn, who was there, is quoted:

> We arrived at the village before nightfall. The women were coming and going unsuspectingly, carrying water. The children played in the dust, laughing and calling to each other. We stopped a moment in the brush, watching. Then came the order to open fire. The machine guns and our new Belgian rifles opened up. The women shrieked, they fell. The kids stopped, flipped over like rabbits by the bullets. We charged, continuing to fire. A few of us put cans of gasoline against the huts and set them afire with matches. Others threw phosphorous grenades which turned the victims into human torches impossible to extinguish. The moans, shrieks and cries of the blacks begged for mercy. Amidst all of that the unbelievable yells of the commandos: obviously, they loved it. At last, away from the village, the silence. Far off the cries of the wounded and those of the tropical birds, hardly discernible, settled in the warm, humid night.

Paul F. Semonin received his M.A. at the University of Ghana and spent an additional year in French-speaking West Africa under a Ford Foundation fellowship.

As Munn points out, the orders to destroy the village were familiar ones. "We had done nothing else since our departure farther South; destroying innocent villages of small farmers who didn't give a damn for the war." The orders of mercenary leader Major Michael Hoare were to shoot all the blacks on the spot. "Even if you see men, women and children running toward you, even if they beg you on their knees, don't hesitate, shoot. Not to wound, to kill." The logic of Hoare's campaign was simple: "To western ears this may sound brutal and insensible but after a campaign of three months here, I know it's the only solution. There isn't any compromise. The political solution will only come when the rebels have been destroyed."

Reed compares the mercenaries to "gunfighters in the American wild West" or condottieri, the hired soldiers who fought in Renaissance Europe. They are pictured essentially as men of adventure, cold, heartless creatures, perhaps, but in no way politically motivated. Both Reed and Dowdy try to dissociate their ruthlessness from American policy. Reed notes that the State Department went out of its way to prevent Americans from serving in the mercenary army. He also claims the United States refused to allow the mercenaries to ride on the C-130E transport planes because it was felt this would be damaging to the "American image" in Africa. He does not explain why, then, six white South Africans were hired to fly American T-28 fighter planes.

Reed and Dowdy's versions of the campaign on Stanleyville distort the United States role in the hiring of the mercenaries. Both claim Tshombe hired the mercenaries after moderate African countries refused to send troops to the Congo. In fact, G. Mennen Williams, Under Secretary of State for African Affairs, pressured Tshombe to make an appeal for African troops after the latter had secretly hired the mercenaries. J. Anthony Lukas reported on August 25 that the U.S. Government "hoped (Tshombe's appeal) would at least provide diplomatic cover for the mercenary operation and at best, if necessary, limit the number of mercenaries needed." Tshombe's call for African troops came in the last paragraph of a communiqué issued on August 17, 1964: "We will gratefully accept all aid which friendly African countries would agree to put at our disposal." The first plane load of mercenaries arrived only a week later on August 23. Major Hoare, who had been in Leopoldville since mid-July, later told of the day he signed his contract with Tshombe's government: "I returned to M. Tshombe several days later, on Saturday afternoon. It was five o'clock. He had just come from a press conference where he declared he had no intention of hiring mercenaries." Lukas pointed out that "Both Belgium and the U.S. Governments are known to have participated in the planning for the force. The two governments are reported to have agreed at talks in Brussels last month that some sort of mercenary force would have to be organized to supplement the Congolese Army, which has virtually collapsed in the face of the rebel assault."

The United States Embassy in Leopoldville, so Reed says, urged Washington for months to send U.S. troops to "rescue the hostages." Averell Harriman held several meetings in September and October with General Earle G. Wheeler, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to discuss such an operation. At Harriman's request, Wheeler's aides drew up contingency plans for sending U.S. forces to Stanleyville. Reed offers no clear explanation of why the intervention was delayed. He fails to note the chief reason, which was the lack of ground support from the mercenaries and government troops who were then still hundreds of miles south of Stanleyville. Another factor militating against the intervention then was President Johnson's campaign for re-election.

On November 8, two days after the fall of Kindu and following Johnson's victory, Prime Minister Spaak came to Washington to discuss the Congo situation. According to Reed, "Harriman had for some time favored the idea of sending American troops to Stanleyville, if necessary, to rescue the hostages. Now Spaak proposed that the two countries intervene jointly, if diplomatic moves should fail." These diplomatic efforts to negotiate the release of the hostages never offered any assurance to the rebels that their own civilian populations would be protected from massacre. They were, therefore, little more than a moral embellishment of the military plans. On November 11, five days before the announcement of Carlson's execution, several American officers met in Brussels with their Belgian counterparts to draw up plans for the intervention. Monday, November 23, was set as the tentative date for the operation.

On November 22, two days before the actual drop, Belgian Colonel Frederic Van de Walle, who was then in direct command of the mercenary-led columns at Lubutu, flew back to Kamina air base in a small plane to confer with Belgian and U.S. officers in charge of the operation. Contrary to press reports the mercenaries were not racing toward Stanleyville to save the whites. They spent three days at Lubutu, only four hours' straight drive on good roads from Stanleyville, waiting for the Belgian paras to be moved from Ascension Island to Kamina, prior to the drop on Stanleyville. On his arrival in Kamina, Van de Walle asked that the operation be delayed one day until November 24 so that the Congolese army and mercenaries could arrive simultaneously with the paras. He then returned to Lubutu at 4:30 P.M. on November 23 and instructed the mercenary-led columns to move out for Stanleyville as the paras would be jumping at 6 o'clock the following morning.

Reed's detailed account of the military planning behind the "humanitarian rescue" shows that the drop of the paras on Stanleyville was part of a comprehensive military design, not simply a spur-of-the-moment decision aimed solely at saving white hostages. Effectively, the paras opened Stanleyville up to the mercenaries and the Congolese army. The strong resistance by the rebels at Stanleyville, following the departure of the paras on November 27, showed how difficult it would have been for the mercenaries to take the town without the intervention of the paras. Only after relentless air attacks against the rebel positions were the mercenaries able to take the left bank of the town. Of course, these air attacks were precisely what the presence of the white hostages had prevented. The hostages, therefore, were simply moved from the path of the attack force. To give the action humanitarian motives, except in this limited sense, is to ignore the paras' killing of defenseless Congolese civilians and their explicit orders to seek out rebel leaders—in other words, to deny the whole logic of the campaign.

Stripped of its humanitarian pretense, the Stanleyville operation resembles other U.S. military interventions aimed at preventing so-called "Communist take-overs." After Chou En-lai's visit to the continent, Africa became the focal point of Chinese influence. Our aid to Tshombe went to stop the alleged Communist penetration of the Congo. Washington claimed the Congolese rebellion was supported by Chinese diplomatic officials in neighboring Burundi and Congo-Brazzaville. Dowdy follows suit by describing rebel leader Gaston Soumialot as a man "who had read the communist manuals and followed them line upon line." These arguments seem hollow in the light of Reed's revelations of life in the People's Republic during the rebel occupation of Stanleyville. One learns, for example, that Gaston Soumialot is a Catholic who attended Mass regularly. Shortly after his arrival in Stanleyville on August 28, he asked the dean of the Stanleyville Cathedral, Father Paul Van Vereertbrugghen, to celebrate a Requiem Mass for everyone who had died during the rebellion, Europeans and Congolese army troops included. Rebel leader Christophe Gbenye, too, was a Catholic. Soon after he arrived in Stanleyville on September 5, another service was held in the Cathedral, a Te Deum or Hymn of Thanksgiving, to mark the founding of the People's Republic. Of the top four rebel leaders, only Nicholas Olenga was not a Catholic. However, his wife did seek out a Protestant missionary teacher for the Olenga children during the rebel occupation of Stanleyville.

In contrast to the Chinese "agents," the missionaries in the Congo evoke only the purity of the white man's intention. Dr. Paul Carlson was, as Time put it, a symbol of all the white men "who want nothing from Africa but a chance to help," who "out of a strong Christian faith and a sense of common humanity, had gone to the Congo to treat the sick." Al Larson of the Evangelical Church of the Upper Congo told the Simbas, "We are not involved in politics. We are here to preach the Gospel. That's all." Dowdy saw the Catholic Church as the "humanizing oil of the colonial machinery." The word "humanitarian" clearly has a special meaning in these circumstances.

From their inception the missionaries worked closely with the colonial administration in efforts to provide the Congolese with a suitable ethical outlook. The Catholic missions received direct subsidies, tax relief and exemption from customs duties. In return they gave the Africans a rudimentary education to equip them for their role as manual laborers on the colonial plantations and in the mines. The aims of missionary work were outlined in a book published in 1949 by J. Roussel, a doctor of Philosophy and Theology and professor at the scholastic school of the Sheut Missions. "Respect, docility, sincere and loyal collaboration are the greatest virtues one must inculcate in our black brothers, the ideal colonial spirit." Such paternalism was part of the general Belgian policy of education in the Congo, a policy which prohibited higher education or professional training for the Congolese for the express purpose of discouraging the formation of an elite with nationalist ideas. The tame, half-educated Congolese were precisely what plantation and mine owners wanted for laborers. Mr. Roussel's remarks to Belgian employers include what he called the "conditions for a good repression," aimed at avoiding a servile discipline and violence. "The repression must be effectual. It will be so if it is infrequent and as by accident. It should be moderate, prudent, executed with calm and dignity, but always with energy. The one who punishes must be respected, and to a certain extent loved. . . . The repression must be accepted as a necessary remedy. The laborer should submit to it willingly. 'To conquer is not to convince.' It is not necessary to prepare rebels and rebellions."

Once the rebellion came, the missionaries accepted their new hardships philosophically. As Rev. Ralph B. Odman says, "There is no safe way to do missionary work and missionary deaths will yet be necessary to com-

Beyond the Cold War
Marshall D. Shulman

Although the conflicts and tensions of the Cold War are still evident, the language and ideas associated with this post-war period are over. An eminent authority on the Soviet Union and a former Special Assistant to the Secretary of State outlines the changes in US-USSR relations and indicates the new perspective from which we must view all future international policies.

"A sound, well-balanced compendium of enlightened liberal thinking about what American policy now should be... exceptionally skillful" — Frederick C. Barghoorn.

cloth $3.75; paper $1.25

Letters from the Paris Peace Conference
Charles Seymour

Perceptive letters from young Charles Seymour, who later became president of Yale, record the historically crucial days of peace negotiations after World War I and offer insights into the personalities involved. $7.50

publishers of
The Vinland Map and the Tartar Relation $20.00

available through your bookstore
Yale University Press
New Haven and London
in Canada: McGill University Press

plete world evangelization." Presumably missionaries will continue to provide Washington with a ready-made excuse for intervention in Africa. No one can exonerate the Simbas for their atrocities, nor for their weaknesses as political leaders. But they clearly face a wolf in sheep's clothing when they deal with the missionary. One can sympathize with Gaston Soumialot, therefore, when he asks David Grinwis, the U.S. vice consul in Stanleyville: "When do you think people have the right to revolt?"

The Importance of Mythology

The author of the following review is an Africanist who has asked that his name not be used. — The Editors

This is the first endeavor to set down in detail the story of the attempted overthrow of Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia five years ago. Aside from this book,* we have only perfunctory accounts, most describing the attempt as a palace revolt, powered by jealousy and ambition and frustration. But Richard Greenfield believes that the leaders of the abortive coup wanted "to reform and remold the whole system and motivation of government." He adds that their act awakened a new political consciousness in feudal Ethiopia; the martyrs and their cause have created a new national myth, potentially as powerful as the old familiar national myth that traces the royal line of Haile Selassie to Solomon's seduction of Sheba.

Greenfield, a geographer, was Dean of Students at the University College of Addis Ababa during the coup. In that role, he, like the Ethiopian students, stood on the periphery of the events. Since then, he has interviewed many young, educated Ethiopians and examined many documents smuggled from the country. His careful study of this information—not, as the book jacket implies, his eyewitness evidence—provided most of the material for the key sections of this book.

Greenfield treats the coup on two levels. First there is a scholarly account — a convincing one — of the causes, events and aftermath of the crisis of December, 1960. Then the book embellishes the scholarly account with an interpretation of the events, an interpretation based mainly, I think, on the view that young, educated Ethiopians now have of the crisis. In short, Greenfield gives us the mythology of the crisis as well as its history.

The coup's three leaders—Greenfield calls them martyrs now—were Girmamé Neway, the governor of Jijigga sub-province; his older brother, Gen. Mengistu Neway, commander of the Imperial Guard; and Lt. Col. Workneh Gebeyehu, the head of the Ethiopian secret service. In Greenfield's view, the mind and heart and soul of the coup, the revolutionary who worked his will on the others, was Girmamé, 36 years old at the time, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, an M.A. from Columbia University. Greenfield has examined Girmamé's meager writings, including his thesis on land policy in Kenya, and talked to many friends of Girmamé to uncover clues about the make-up of the revolutionary. He describes Girmamé as an admirer of the American Revolution, a reader of left-wing literature, and a Pan-Africanist. Greenfield says Girmamé never—as charged later—turned Communist. His head was filled with the slogans of independence and freedom bandied about by the new African nationalists, and he compared these ideals with the autocracy and stagnation of Ethiopia. On his return to Ethiopia, he tried, as a governor, to reform feudal land ownership and encourage economic development but was thwarted by the traditional feudal families running the government. Unlike most angry young men in Ethiopia, he had a powerful brother. He turned to revolution.

He organized a small Council of the Revolution in 1960. The members intended to bide their time and plan a coup carefully. But word leaked out and rumors spread, forcing the plotters to act ahead of time. They moved on the night of Tuesday, December 13, while the Emperor was on a state visit to Brazil. During the night, the plotters summoned many ministers and other dignitaries to the palace on various pretexts, including a lie that the Empress was dying. These officials were given the choice of joining the coup or remaining under arrest. By Wednesday afternoon, the Imperial Guard's armored cars and troops controlled Addis Ababa, and the Crown Prince, named the new chief of state, broadcast on behalf of the rebel government.

But a counterrevolutionary force, headed by Maj. Gen. Merid Mangasha, chief of staff of the armed forces, began to form. He moved regular army troops toward the city. Haile Selassie, informed of the coup, left Brazil and headed back to Ethiopia. The Council of the Revolution, convinced that the army would eventually support the coup, waited patiently. The wait meant a loss of momentum.

By Thursday afternoon, the Council of the Revolution decided it must battle the advancing army troops. The clash lasted for more than a day. Many Ethiopians were killed, far more than the 324 officially announced by the government. The army, aided by air force bombers, defeated the Imperial Guard. By Friday evening, the coup's leaders fled from the palace. Before they did, Girmamé grabbed a machine gun and gunned down a roomful of arrested dignitaries so "that Ethiopia should never be the same again." The Emperor entered Addis Ababa the next day. On the same day, Workneh, surrounded by soldiers, put a gun in his mouth and blew his head off. A week later, government forces found the Neway brothers. Girmamé shot Mengistu and then killed himself. Mengistu lived and stood trial. He was convicted and then hung on March 30, 1961.

Ethiopia: A New Political History.* By Richard Greenfield. Frederick A. Praeger. 515 pp. $10.

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________

ADDRESS ____________

CITY ____________

STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

Greenfield reports the coup failed for a variety of reasons. Most important, Girmamé deluded himself into believing it would receive support from the masses. He counted on a political consciousness that did not exist. Most of the miscalculations by the plotters stemmed from this delusion. For example, Greenfield points out that the revolutionary proclamations, with their talk of economic development and living standards, could appeal only to people who had awareness of the world outside Ethiopia. It would have been far better, Greenfield notes, for the rebels to have stirred the masses by accusing Haile Selassie of being a secret Roman Catholic.

But the rebels kept hands off Haile Selassie—their second error. Greenfield points out that all government in Ethiopia today depends on the person of the Emperor. The rebels had to kill him or arrest him or neutralize him in some way. Instead, they acted as if he would calmly accept revolution and stay in Brazil. In the same way, the rebels ignored the Ethiopian Christian Church, which orders the daily life of almost all Ethiopians. They never arrested the patriarch of the church, and he later issued proclamations on behalf of the counterrevolutionaries. The rebels did not even mention God in their own proclamations.

In a foolish miscalculation, the rebels failed to arrest General Mangasha and other top military officers. For some reason, Mengistu felt certain that Mangasha would join the rebels. Girmamé counted on the young officers of the army and air force feeling the same revolutionary fervor that he did. Nothing like this happened, and Mangasha used the military forces to crush the coup. The rebels also had so much confidence in the success of their mission that they hesitated until too late to take any step that might cause bloodshed. This hesitation gave Mangasha the time he needed to organize a counterrevolutionary force.

Greenfield accuses the United States of playing a major role, though not a decisive one, in the crushing of the coup. Brig. Gen. Chester de Gaure, head of the U.S. military mission, advised Mangasha on the operation that recaptured Addis Ababa from the rebels. Ethiopian pilots, according to Greenfield, took off to bomb the rebels only after "an American captain climbed into a cockpit commenting that they dare not do likewise." Greenfield discounts the rumor that all the planes were piloted by Americans, but he reports that "many people in Ethiopia believe so to this day." Actually, any American piloting would have been of extreme significance; Mangasha has said that "at least 75 per cent of the battle against the abortive coup d'etat was won by the air force."

Greenfield also discusses the role of U.S. Ambassador Arthur Richards, who acted as an intermediary between the rebels and the counterrevolutionaries. Some foreign news accounts have said the air force intended to support the rebels until Richards persuaded them to do otherwise. Greenfield neither accepts nor rejects this version, but says: "The resentment felt by many Ethiopians over what they see as the role of the United States in the events of December 1960 could one day be a political factor of some importance—especially if a pattern in any way similar were to be permitted to occur again."

For Greenfield, the significance of the attempted coup is the crystallization of "a cause [that] had not only been defined within an Ethiopian context but also had acquired its martyrs." He reports that a series of conspiracies and crises have shaken Ethiopia since December, 1960, and he is optimistic about young Ethiopians fulfilling the dreams of Girmamé Neway. Greenfield bases his hope on seeing "the gloom and despair on the faces

"A really impressive and magnificent selection of contributors... Many of the outstanding names of the century are here."
—RALPH McGILL, Book Week

100 YEARS OF THE NATION

Edited by Henry M. Christman

Introduction by CAREY McWILLIAMS

A generous selection of memorable prose and poetry that appeared in the pages of The Nation during the last century, now in a handsome Centennial Anthology published by The Macmillan Company. $7.95

Partial list of contributors:

Theodore Dreiser
H. L. Mencken • John Dos Passos
Bertolt Brecht • James Agee
Henry James • Bertrand Russell
Sherwood Anderson
Leon Trotsky • André Malraux
Thomas Mann • Robert Lowell
Wallace Stevens • Robert Frost
Norman Thomas • Harold J. Laski
I. F. Stone • William James
William Carlos Williams
William Butler Yeats
Ezra Pound • G. D. H. Cole
Fred J. Cook • Edmund Wilson
Oswald Garrison Villard
William Dean Howells
Francis Parkman
Robert C. Benchley
Benedetto Croce
William O. Douglas
Heywood Broun

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014
Please send me____copies of 100 YEARS OF THE NATION @ $7.95. I enclose check for $______
NAME____________________
ADDRESS____________________
CITY__________STATE______ZIP CODE______ of leaders of yet another generation of young Ethiopians slowly changing into resolution."

Greenfield's account is an exciting one, surely the most reliable we have of the coup, but it is marred and dulled in several ways. First, as Greenfield himself puts it, "the truth is always hard to discover beneath the network of intrigue, deceit and secrecy which has typified Ethiopia for so long," and it's impossible to check the accuracy of the details in his narrative and conclusions. Moreover, his attempt to present both history and mythology confuses the story; at times it's not clear whether something happened or whether Ethiopians only believe it happened.

The book also is marred by the naïveté that Greenfield displays about Africa and its young elite. He continually throws in asides about the democratic fervor of African nationalists outside Ethiopia and about the anger of educated, young Ethiopians toward the privileges of the ruling class. In this, Greenfield takes on the delusions of his hero, Girmamé. The truth is that most African leaders have about as much fervor for democracy as does Haile Selassie; and most angry young Africans, including Ethiopians, lose their anger as soon as they are permitted to partake of some of the privileges. This does not mean that Greenfield is wrong about coming revolution in Ethiopia. But it does mean that democracy is unlikely to succeed the rule of the Emperor and that most angry young men will join the revolution only if rebellious military commanders lead them by the nose.

Finally, the book is dulled by Greenfield's attempt to relate the coup to 3,000 years of Ethiopian history. He probably was forced to do this because the book was commissioned as a volume in the "Praeger Library of African Affairs" series; to fit, the book had to seem like a comprehensive study of Ethiopia. The first half is a disorganized, surveyish glance at pre-1960 Ethiopia, written without grace. One should start the book on page 269.

Despite these blemishes, the book is important and will figure in the future of Ethiopia. The Ethiopian Government already has shown its distress by trying to persuade the British and American publishers to withdraw the book or at least tone it down. Copies are sure to be smuggled into Ethiopia soon and passed among the young elite, perhaps among frustrated militarists as well. While reporting the mythology of the coup, the book will have a part in perpetuating it.

HOW IT WAS

WHO SPEAKS FOR THE NEGRO? By Robert Penn Warren. Random House. 454 pp. $5.95.

Marvin M. Karpatkin

Robert Penn Warren does not answer the question posed by the title of his book. Nor does he presume to. The question is almost rhetorical, as the content of the book demonstrates. Who Speaks for the Negro? is much more accurately a book about various spokesmen for the Negro. At the same time, it adds up to a comprehensive and frequently penetrating study of Negro leadership and the civil rights movement (mostly South but also North).

The dominant motif, sounded early in the book, is that everything which is happening in race relations bears witness to the burial of Sambo:

> . . . the supine, grateful, humble, irresponsible, unmanly, banjo-picking, servile, grinning, slack-jawed, docile, dependent, slow-witted, humorous, child-loving, childlike, watermelon-stealing, spiritual-singing, blamelessly fornicating, happy-go-lucky, hedonistic, faithful black servitor who sometimes might step out of character long enough to utter folk wisdom or bury the family silver to save it from the Yankees.

The format is a lengthy series of tape-recorded interviews, liberally interspersed with Warren's commentary, sometimes tangential, almost always relevant. It would be hard to find any significant omissions. Not unexpectedly, the long chapter, "The Big Brass," consists of interviews with the well-known national leadership: Adam Clayton Powell, Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young, James Forman, James Farmer, Martin Luther King, Wyatt Walker, Bayard Rustin and the late Malcolm X. Warren also interviews, in a chapter called "Leadership from the Periphery," writers James Baldwin and Ralph Ellison, bank president John Henry Wheeler, Carl T. Rowan, then USIA director, U.S. Court of Appeals Judge William H. Hastie, and Dr. Kenneth B. Clark.

Mississippi during the summer of 1964—where he first encounters the burial of Sambo—receives special attention. In addition to interviews with SNCC's Bob Moses, and Aaron Henry and Charles Evers of the NAACP, Warren gives his observations of meetings and other confrontations, as well as his evaluation of the 1964 summer project and the effectiveness of the voter-registration campaign.

A few provoking quotations by Warren are used to stimulate his interviewees to start talking. They are artfully selected so as to cause moral dilemmas—value conflicts—in those who are questioned. He recalls Myrdal's proposition that the situation today would have been vastly different if the defeated slaveholders after the Civil War had been financially compensated. He quotes the young W.E.B. DuBois (The Souls of Black Folk) on the "two-ness" of the American Negro: "two souls, two thoughts, two unreconciled strivings, two warring ideals in one dark body. . . ." And he frequently returns to Kenneth Clark's critical evaluation of nonviolence. "The natural reaction to injustice, oppression and humiliation are bitterness and resentment. . . . It would seem, then, that any demand that the victims of oppression be required to love those who oppress them places an additional and probably intolerable psychological burden upon those victims."

Although only the Clark quotation is of immediate practical relevance, all three of them produce the calculated effect. Everybody talks into Mr. Warren's tape recorder; and in the course of commenting on Myrdal, DuBois and Kenneth Clark, a great deal is told about the speaker and about the part of the movement with which he is identified.

The other interviewees refused to let Professor Warren limit them to his three arbitrary dilemmas. Thus James Farmer does not brood about the DuBois "psychic split." He sees no problem of hyphenation. He articulates a position of almost classical cultural pluralism, "unity through diversity," when he tells Warren that for him there is no dilemma of duality.

Similarly, Martin Luther King, while recognizing the possible effectiveness of the Myrdal notion of compensation to the slaveholders, sees it within the context of "the tragedy of the whole system of slavery." (One may recall the neglected words of Lincoln's Second Inaugural. School children are taught to memorize, "With malice toward none; with charity for all. . . ." But the same Lincoln, in the same speech, cautioned that dispensation

---

Marvin M. Karpatkin is an attorney closely associated with the civil rights movement. He has served as a volunteer with the American Jewish Congress, the ACLU and CORE, and in Mississippi with the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee.

of charity might have to wait "until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword. . . .")

Curiously enough, though Kenneth Clark's critique of King's nonviolence comes up in many interviews, when he interviews Clark, Warren doesn't even raise it. But Warren does maneuver Clark into an evaluation of John Brown, a very un-King-like figure, perhaps in an attempt to challenge Clark's rejection of nonviolence. Clark does not get caught in Warren's snare. His view of Brown as a madman and a murderer does not compel him to abandon his conviction that it is a delusion to regard love and nonviolence as the panaceas which will produce great social change. Clark sums it up: "I personally recoil from bloodshed, because I think it is just another form of human idiocy [but] the fact still remains that major social changes toward social justice in human history, have almost always come if not always through irrational and questionable methods." It is nevertheless one of the small faults of the book that after playing back to us the many interviews which defend King and criticize Clark (including Ralph Ellison, Aaron Henry, Dr. Felton Clark of Southern University, and King himself), Warren chose either not to question Clark on this topic, or to omit this portion of the tape.

Some of the interviews reveal only the predictable. Adam Clayton Powell emerges as a self-crowned king of the ghetto. (The biographical note provided Warren by Powell's staff recalls as one of the turning points of his life, when the young Crown Prince was forced to vacate a college dormitory which he shared with a white roommate, notwithstanding the fact that "we had drunk out of the same bottle and slept with the same women. . . .") But interviews with others provide hitherto unseen glimpses into character and personality: Whitney Young, executive director of the Urban League, is much given to self-quotations, references to his own writings and speeches, and there is almost an implicit assumption that he and the Urban League are one.

In striking contrast, the sessions with James Farmer, Martin Luther King and Roy Wilkins reflect continuing tension among themselves and their constituencies, tensions of which they are very much aware. James Forman, on the other hand, comes across

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

RUSSIA AT WAR

by Alexander Werth. 1,100 pp. Avon Publications.
Paperback Edition, list price $1.65.

A classic of war reporting by the distinguished European correspondent of The Nation which was on the best seller list for weeks on first publication.

> " . . . an extraordinary book, one of the most important books yet written about World War II and certainly the most important yet written about the Russian-German War."
> —Orville Prescott, New York Times

> "There is no book in any language with which to compare Alexander Werth's monumental but exceedingly readable and controversial history of the Nazi-Soviet war, that four-year struggle in the East which, in the words of Churchill, 'tore the guts out of the German Army.' "
> —Joseph Barnes, Life

> "The best book we probably shall ever have in English on Russia at war."
> —William L. Shirer

> "Monumental and absorbing . . . an epic work that will fascinate the ordinary reader."
> —Harry Schwartz, Saturday Review

> "A valuable book which illuminates the behavior of Russia at war . . . vivid . . . dramatic."
> —Merle Fainsod, Book Week

For your FREE copy of RUSSIA AT WAR, fill out the subscription coupon below and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of RUSSIA AT WAR.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $5
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ____________________

ADDRESS ____________________

CITY __________ STATE __________ ZIP No. __________

1-31-66

as reflecting with great fidelity the militance and impatience of SNCC. Warren is not very comfortable with Forman and SNCC, but he does try to appraise them fairly, concluding, perhaps with some condescension (of age, not of race) that Forman must be regarded as a "combat officer" in the war, and therefore his "absoluteness" can be excused.

Warren's final series of interviews is with selected young people in the movement. It is not clear if Warren intends this as some kind of juxtaposition of rank and file with leadership, or of fathers with sons, or if he intends to suggest that nobody "speaks" for the Negro, at least the young Negro. But regardless of commentary, the texts of some of these tapes are uncommonly eloquent.

Few in the movement, young or old, have been through as much as SNCC worker Stokeley Carmichael. He was born in Trinidad, reared partly in Harlem, partly in lower-middle-class East Bronx, the only Negro family among Italians, Jews and Irish. He had been involved with street gangs and narcotics; responded to the attractions of the middle-class intellectuals and radicals at Bronx High School of Science; and was graduated from Howard, majoring in philosophy. When he describes how he was lionized by white liberal friends, Carmichael at times sounds like a Negro Holden Caulfield.

But he is beyond Holden. In addition to sensing and describing the outside world with the same kind of youthful lucidity and anti-hypocrisy, Carmichael is also trying to change it. Here is his personal account of a lunch-counter sit-in:

> I can go on freedom rides, with people around me, and I can say, "Oh, yes, nothing is going to happen to me, it will be the guy next to me." But when you get alone, and you're sitting on that stool by yourself, and somebody's behind you, and you hear the knife clicking, hot coffee being poured down your back, and you're alone, you really begin to feel, "Why am I here, when is it going to end?" But just before that first punch, just before you get hit, that little period there just before, when tensions are building and you can't control your stomach, and it's jumping, you start thinking over and over again, "You know, maybe this is the way it is, when you're really alone."

There are other very sharp images, particularly the sessions with Bob Moses, Lolis Elie (CORE lawyer in New Orleans), Malcolm X and Judge Hastie. But the principal value of the book is that it is an authentic collection of primary material. Through the devices and format employed, Warren has in fact produced a representative anthology of the involved Negro leader talking about himself and his people.

Some errors were perhaps unavoidable. Norman Hill's resignation from CORE was not because he favored the 1964 election moratorium on demonstrations and "repudiated" Farmer in favor of the "responsible King-Wilkins-Young line"; it was for much more profound reasons of social and political orientation. Also, CORE is not the Committee but the Congress of Racial Equality. And the American Jewish Congress, notwithstanding its position on the Jewish community's outer perimeter of civil rights involvement, can hardly be called "ultra-liberal" because it filed an amicus brief in support of the NAACP. Moreover, one can understand Mr. Warren's geniality to a fellow Southerner, but if he were interested in thoughtful Jewish comment on Jewish-Negro relations North and South, he should not have confined himself to Harry Golden's cracker barrel.

There is also a surprising stodginess and lack of felicity where it would not be expected; moreover, Mr. Warren can't resist some occasional pompousness. In his preface he relates a conversation in which he was asked why he thought his interviewees would tell him the truth. He answered: "Even a lie is a kind of truth."

But these are small points. The book's outstanding virtue, for now and in future years, is that it has with eloquent fidelity recorded the Negro voice telling how it was in the revolutionary years 1964-65.

The Uneasy Silence

Paul Cowan

At the time, the 1964 Mississippi Summer Project seemed likely to provide the same kind of goad to the imagination of the present generation as the Spanish Civil War had to the generation of Hemingway and Malraux. It was an experience that provided all the materials for first-rate literature. A marvelous assortment of people—from Wall Street lawyers to Mississippi sharecroppers— shared unceasing dangers in a physically lovely setting: a state rich in a diversity of clashing traditions.

The people who had chosen to go South that summer were as literate and sensitive a group of Americans as one could hope to find. Most were college educated, and many had majored in the humanities. Their passion for human rights was primarily aesthetic: they were far more at home with words than with direct, brutalizing experience. It was the ideal setting for a novel of self-discovery, but no important long piece of fiction or short story has yet been published about the Mississippi summer.

There have been a handful of nonfiction books about the project. The collection of Letters From Mississippi, edited by Elizabeth Sutherland, splices together bits of the letters that a variety of volunteers sent home. As a montage, it has a powerful effect and it will probably provide important material to future historians interested in the mid-1960s. But it is an instant book—designed for quick propaganda. So is the large, thin paperback volume, Mississippi Black Paper, a collection of affidavits which describe some of the atrocities that are part of daily life in the Magnolia State. These books were produced to serve a practical purpose. They set out to make real to readers in the North the ugliness of segregation, and the bravery of the people who try to combat it, with the aim of raising money and attracting support. For that reason they do not unearth the conflicts within the movement, personal and political, that still trouble many of the people who worked in Mississippi. It is just these conflicts that would have to be explored in any piece of serious fiction.

The single, full-length book that has been written by a Northern volunteer, Freedom Summer by Sally Belfrage, though well written is also a piece of partisan journalism. Miss Belfrage had gone to Mississippi with the intention of writing a book, and for this purpose she was lucky to be stationed in Greenwood, one of the toughest and most important towns in the state. Its external features she describes very well—the life in the freedom house there, the few frustrating contacts with local white people and the many satisfying friendships with local Negroes, the bizarre trips to the courthouse and the barbaric days in jail. She is able, moreover, to evoke the odd double vision that afflicts an outsider in Mississippi when ordinary suburban experiences like a drive in the country or a trip to the laundromat are transformed into a nightmarish skein of security precautions and constant danger. But the tensions she creates in the book are the most obvious ones, between the bad white Mississippians and the good civil rights workers. She does not probe very deeply beneath the surface of relationships inside the movement, where more complicated emotions lie.

---

Paul Cowan spent three months working in Maryland and Mississippi with the civil rights movement. He has published articles in The Village Voice, Dissent, Esquire, the Chicago Sun-Times, Current and Mosaic.

For many of the people who went to Mississippi the most terrifying (and yet moving) days of the summer came during the orientation session at Oxford, Ohio, before they had actually gone South. The news that three civil rights workers had been missing for days from a jail in Neshoba County literally carried a direct threat of death to the several hundred students who would have to face the same species of sheriff and local redneck within a week. The best section of the Letters From Mississippi is devoted to this period, and so is a vivid chapter of Miss Belfrage's book.

Most of the writers allow the atmosphere of increasing terror to reveal itself through straight narrative description, without rhetorical flourishes. Their writing is focused—as it must be—on the words and the bearing of Bob Moses, the quiet, introverted Negro whose three lonely years in Mississippi had made possible the present migration of volunteers. Already his patience, thoroughness and bravery were legendary (I carried in my head all week a mental picture of Bob, dressed in blue overalls and a white T-shirt, speaking calmly and carefully of hell). As he tried to transform the raw fact of death into a set of concepts with which the volunteers could deal, his words unearthed for us layers of bravery and belief that we had never known we possessed.

His final speech to the volunteers is quoted at length by almost everyone who describes the occasion. Not only did it remind us of the reasons we had decided to go to Mississippi; it established a tone, a mood, which we hoped would guide us throughout the summer. He talked about how, when you spend all your time fighting evil, you become preoccupied with it and terribly weary. When your work causes other men to die you are forced to wonder about it. But in history, he said, no dominant group has ever been

WOMEN STRIKE FOR PEACE invites every woman of conscience . . . every woman who cares deeply . . . every worried mother . . . to give one day for a peaceful world.

FEBRUARY 9th, join the Mothers' March on Capitol Hill for a

CEASE FIRE in VIETNAM

Thousands of determined women voters would make a strong impact on Congress. For the sake of your own children . . . for the sake of all children . . . join us to:

MARCH for an end to the killing.

LOBBY for the U.S. to clearly offer the National Liberation Front equal negotiating status.

PLEDGE the American women's voice and vote only to those Congressmen who work for a peaceful settlement in Asia.

MEET to hear from Senators and Representatives.

DEMAND an end to dangerous military escalation.

Please spread the word. Charter buses, planes or trains. Drive or walk, but join the March — 11:30 A.M. — February 9th — starting at Union Station in Washington, D. C.

● For the special New York train, use coupon below. ●

WOMEN STRIKE FOR PEACE, 151 E. 50 St., New York 10022

I want to join women from all over the U.S.A. for the February 9th MOTHERS' MARCH ON CAPITOL HILL FOR A CEASE FIRE IN VIETNAM

Send me .... round trip train tickets for "THE DOVE SPECIAL" at $10 each. Check for $.................... is enclosed.
(Train leaves Penn. Station 7:30 A.M., returns before 9 P.M.
Bring lunch, we'll have posters, dove symbols, etc.)

I'd like to contribute $.................... to enable more women to go.

Please send me more information: ☐

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

privileged (that was the word he used) to give up its position without demanding that the oppressed render sacrifices. There may be more people killed this summer, he said, but that won't in any way deter us from what we are trying to do. Negroes who have challenged authority in Mississippi have always been harassed or killed. And we are trying to change that, not succumb to it. We're going to do the job we have to do.

The day after Moses' speech the volunteers scattered to local projects throughout Mississippi. The work they began — registering voters, teaching freedom schools, organizing community centers—turned out to be slow, sometimes grubby, often boring. It rarely reflected the exhilaration one felt after hearing a talk like Bob's or joining hands and singing We Shall Overcome. There were incessant difficult little decisions to make which could not be resolved by good will or shimmering faith. Should a group of civil rights organizers call for a voting rights demonstration in a dangerous town, thereby risking wide-scale arrests which might endanger local people and jeopardize some of the less spectacular programs that were under way? If a Negro man and a white girl were attracted to each other, should they take the risk of being seen together in public? Such questions called into play deeply ingrained cultural and political attitudes of everyone involved in the project. Often they produced conflicts that could never again be ignored.

But they are not sufficiently explored in either Miss Belfrage's book or the Letters. In all the writing there seems an unwillingness to be entirely honest. There were lies told in Mississippi; ugly uses were made of political or cultural power; as many unpleasant relationships as happy ones developed within each project; some people with good ideas or sensitive plans were ignored because they were white, or newcomers; some others who did their jobs sloppily retained authority because they were black or because they had frequently been beaten. In the books such matters are rarely discussed. It is as if this movement is still too fragile, and too special, to bear the truth.

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

SUMMERLANE CAMP

in the tradition of

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

In Vicksburg where I worked we faced this same choice between expedience and truth. Our problem had to do with journalism and not with literature, but it does suggest some of the reasons why civil rights workers have chosen not to risk the sort of complex writing that their experience deserves.

Toward the end of the summer we had founded a newspaper, The Vicksburg Citizens Appeal, which we hoped would survive as the first publication in the state to retain a balance between civil rights news and news of the Negro community. To raise money, and to get free publicity, we decided to distribute the first edition of the paper at the Democratic convention in Atlantic City where the predominantly Negro Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party would be challenging the legality of the white Mississippi delegation.

Some of us had gone to the MFDP state convention in Jackson where the delegates to Atlantic City were chosen. We had assumed that each delegate would be chosen democratically, by nominations from the floor, speeches and open balloting. But quickly we learned that most of the slate had actually been drawn up in the days before the convention by MFDP and SNCC organizers who wanted to make sure that as few middle-class Negroes as possible would be selected. When one man got up to criticize the arrangement he was silenced by the kind of strong-arm parliamentary tactics that FDP organizers would call "immoral" when they didn't get what they wanted in Atlantic City.

In Vicksburg we argued for days about whether we should print the truth in the Citizens Appeal. A good newspaper would. "But there couldn't have been any fighting at that first meeting, in front of the TV cameras and the national press," we were told by a SNCC worker we all admired. "Besides, the poor people have taken all the risks over the last few years. The professional class has always sold them out." That seemed to us nonsense. After all, we hadn't come to Mississippi in order to spread the kind of undemocratic techniques that we objected to when they were used by politicians back home. The misuse of power is always disguised by some sort of noble end. But if we printed the story, and it was read by the FDP's opponents in Atlantic City, the challenge might be a little less likely to succeed. Besides, we only possessed the information because we were civil rights workers—if we had been journalists no one would have confided in us. We wrote what amounted to a public relations man's description of the Jackson convention, and published it in the paper as news.

As it turned out the challenge failed. A controversy developed between moderates and radicals within the movement; and an atmosphere of name calling and organizational disruption that made constructive work inside Mississippi almost impossible.

Although neither side told the truth about the dispute, for months afterward everyone discussed it—the convention challenge and its ideological ramifications became equated with the summer project. Apart from the book of Letters and Freedom Summer, most of what was written about Mississippi—what passed for analysis or description—was in fact dull partisan polemic.

People who worked in Mississippi still seem to be maintaining the same kind of uneasy silence as we had enforced upon ourselves in Vicksburg. I know for myself that when I begin writing about the summer a vague, nagging commitment to the movement intervenes between myself and my material. For several months I shared dangers with people who continue to live in acute peril. Having retreated to the comforts of the North, what right have I to turn out a book which may, in part, seem to criticize them? This question becomes doubly painful when I realize that any ambiguous situation I choose to explore might provide the movement's enemies with additional weapons.

But a man cannot possibly produce a truthful account if he imagines a friend from the movement reading his manuscript over one shoulder, and Evans and Novak peering over the other. The best he can achieve is the kind of high-level partisan propaganda that Letters From Mississippi and Freedom Summer now represent. It would be a tragedy if an experience as rich and complex as the Mississippi Summer Project should yield no more than that.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

MEDIA-MIX

In line with its more businesslike approach in its new house on West 41st Street (see Howard Junker: "The Underground Renaissance," The Nation, December 27) the Film-Makers' Cinematheque has advanced from the one-night stand to a full-week's run, once a month, of a program thought suitable for the "larger, general" audience. "Expanded cinema," alternately known as "psychedelic theatre," is the organization's post-Warhol preoccupation and Hubbub, the first attraction selected for an extended run, is described as follows in the program notes:

> A multi-channel media-mix of films, tape, oscilloscope, stroboscope, kinetic and live images. Effects, from one channel through a twelve-channel mix, is explored in six integrated movements, each hybridizing a set of media.

All systems were go on the afternoon of the press screening. At stage left and right were two prismatic five-sided wheels that twinkled varicolored lights at the audience. At stage center a small screen which I took to be the oscilloscope registered in pulsating graph the volume, pitch and quality of the sound coming simultaneously or variously from several loud speakers. Neither of these devices interfered appreciably with the projected film material, and the latter was even humane in that when the sound passed the pain threshold, as it did frequently, watching the dancing lines seemed to give a measure of relief.

Also on the forestage sat or knelt a gentleman in kimono who, from time to time, rose and lighted a joss stick—at least I believe that's what he was doing with his Zippo, for I thought I smelled incense. In front of the oscilloscope was a small electric sign spelling NOW, or occasionally OW or NO. This is the enigmatic motto of USCO, the producing group.

The program opened with a vigorous, and I assume sardonic, rendering of Land of Hope and Glory, at the conclusion of which three large stylized Japanese chrysanthemums (a Zen reference?) faded from the screen and some exceedingly pale Pacific battle footage was run at exceedingly high speed.

Following this was a sequence which, media-mix or no, was another example of the underground cliché: rapid and fragmentary projection of advertisements, TV shots, people with their mouths open, rock'n'roll entertainers, large military equipment, street crowds, etc., all accompanied by a boiler-room sound track made up from bursts of music and snippets of speech. The "expansion" consists in projecting several of these scissor satires simultaneously.

A segment of the psychedelia that seemed to me to make a more severe point was subtitled "Highfreethrusafeway," wherein a film that tracked along highway-lane markings and caught road signs on the wing was overlaid with subliminal suggestions of human anatomy and accompanied by the sound of a woman's voice crying out in ejaculative monosyllables. It is true that Americans have some difficulty distinguishing between sex and tourism, and once you got the point of the sequence some meager fun was to be derived from the surprising number of road signs that took on double meanings.

Then came "Y"—the motorcycle interlude that is as obligatory in the underground cinema as was a gun duel in a Hoot Gibson Western. This one—note the title—was a split-screen arrangement whereby the same footage was projected in duplicate, one segment being a second or two behind the other. The camera was apparently held by someone riding postilion and the subject matter was 20 miles or so of road with occasional views of the back of the driver's helmet. The disconcerting effect of the visual displacement is amusing for a minute or two; after that, I doubt that the chase to nowhere would seem rewarding to anyone not enrolled in a cycle club. Also on view was a syncopated nature sequence that devolved into a kaleidoscope of spinning and otherwise gyrating lights, and further adventures with the flash-card, sound-stutter media-mix.

USCO, an anonymous group, collects this material from various contributors and assembles it at a church in Garnerville, N. Y., according to socio-philosophical guidelines supplied by the writings of the Canadian communications mystic, Marshall McLuhan. This all sounds very dedicated, but why is that chap squatting there in his kimono and gazing out at the audience? If he is supposed to be our guide through an LSD-type experience, he must be kidding. Why is the sound track turned up so high that content is lost in pain? How often are the new film makers going to discover that disconnected and fragmented speech, particularly from the mouths of teachers, politicians and preachers, automatically takes on satiric overtones? What artistic principle or entertainment novelty inheres in the quarter-second blink (burlesque discovered it thirty years ago)? How much longer must we pretend that collection equals comment?

The film avant-garde declares with a good deal of belligerence that it is using film as an art in itself (the technique is the content), and implies that if you don't get it you are somehow wanting and probably middle class. But its spokesmen are noticeably shy about defining their aims more specifically, and what one sees is spontaneous doodling and prankishness. I will readily admit that an enterprise like Hubbub supplies a kick at the sensory level: it dazzles and benumbs and hypnotizes; it hurts a little and it bores a lot—but that sounds to me more like the description of a habit than of an art.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 1-31-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

Ventura

(Continued from page 128)

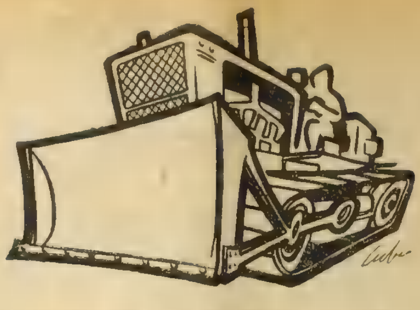
were left). Their hopes, however, are now largely gone. Oil did not win a total victory, because oil was not found everywhere. But the last battle, the battle against "development," was a clean sweep, because human beings, thanks to the Barbarian and the bulldozer, can live anywhere!

The Barbarians who finally conquered Ventura County thrive upon numbers—of dollars and of people. They saw that masses of humanity were overrunning the neighboring San Fernando Valley. They saw land values soaring, and knew that people trying to escape from congestion and smog could be lured ever onward into new areas, which in turn could be made so congested and ugly as to produce a perpetual, hopeless search for a decent place to live. Now there would be no limits to the city, no limit to speculative opportunity. The city would leap forward in all directions, destroying as it went, but making money and more money for those who could ride the wave. Land speculators and fast-buck developers were not alone in seeing the cash dividends of urban sprawl; a whole host of money-minded people moved in.



Now it has happened: the oaks are going, the orchards are going, the farms are going, the historical sites are going (and are unmarked); the hillsides are going, the beach front is going, privacy is going, beauty is going—and their flight can only be mourned. Once gone, they are gone forever!

And what has come in their place—creeping up on us gradually so that we did not notice at first? Cement and asphalt, glaring neons, treeless parking lots, ugly buildings, cheap, flimsy housing tracts with built-in slums, smog (oh yes, we have it now although the "boosters" must officially deny it until the last lot is sold) and, most important of all perhaps, corruption of values.

For the Barbarian Empire cripples all values. "Realism" and "practicality" (meaning the quickest way to get rich) become the basis for ethics. Try to preserve a historical landmark? You're getting in the way of "progress." Try to preserve an old place name? We can't be bothered with sentimentality. Try to preserve a rustic park? Asphalt's easier to maintain. Try to get a historical marker erected? Who cares about the past? (The only time the Barbarian is interested in history, or in beauty, is when he can charge admission to see it.)

The Barbarians have captured the city and county governments, and in the hallowed halls of the courthouse ring out the catchwords of their breed: We cannot interfere with a man's right to make money—even if it means a gravel pit as (someone else's) neighbor, even if it means placing houses in the path of an already adopted freeway route (what an idea: a builder can build 92 houses, sell them, then the freeway tears them out, and the builder can sell 92 more houses!), even if it means cracked-slab homes on shifting mucky soil, even if it means commercial developments in the midst of residences, even if it means tremendous future expense for the taxpayer.

Of course, there are a few contractors building good homes, a few developers planning decent commercial centers—but they are too few, and too late. The bad will drive out the good, the cheap will drive out the expensive, and the synthetic, mass-produced, hamburger-stand culture of the Barbarians will continue to triumph.

What else is there to believe? By the year 2000 (probably before) every inch of Ventura County (excepting only the National Forest if, indeed, it still exists by then) will be covered. What then? Even if one decided to take a bulldozer and push away all of the cement and asphalt, crummy houses and cheap stores, where would one push it? No, there is a better, a Barbarian solution. When all the beauty of Ventura County is gone, when all the easy profits have been made, when all the houses and stores are old, when the smog cuts off the sun, then, just as in Los Angeles, we can let the Negroes move in—and everyone else can move on to greener pastures. That is, if there are any pastures left.

PUBLICATIONS

HISTORY AFIELD

Don't miss history's pleasant aspect: AFIELD, actual or armchair PANORAMAS, local maps, concise facts. Hardcover, 200 graphic pages Postpaid $2, check, money order or cash

B. F. Johnson
Box 2306, SAN DIEGO, CALIF. 92112

BOOK COLLECTORS

Seeking unusual items for your collections!

We notify when our worldwide contacts make notable finds. All fields A to Izzard.

BOOK LANDOE
6631 Hollywood Blvd.
Hollywood, Calif. 90028

Fun to Read!

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

Advertise Your Needs
In The Nation

FREEZE AT DEATH. Reanimate in Future (Hopefully), non-profit (Newsletter—$2.00 year). L. E. S., 2011 N Street, N. W. Washington, D.C.

BRUCE PAYNE, ORGANIZER OF YALE TENURE PROTEST, SAYS IN THE CURRENT ISSUE OF THE ACTIVIST:

"SNCC's approach to history strikes me as wildly schizophrenic. Their passion for reading and talking about southern history is equal to their opponents' passion for exaggerating it. On the other hand, they are sympathetic to HOWARD ZINN's attack on the 'tyranny of history,' SNCC—if it has a single attitude toward history—sees it as being of value only if it is politically useful. History, if it is not useful, must be altered. But to alter history is to admit that it is not, in fact, useful; it is to recognize that our past accuses us. The psychological reaction of 'double-think' then becomes necessary: we change our history while insisting—and believing—that it could never have been otherwise."

SUBSCRIBE NOW TO AMERICA'S ONLY INDEPENDENT STUDENT JOURNAL OF POLITICS AND OPINION

THE ACTIVIST, 1 year (5 issues) @ $3
SPECIAL STUDENT RATE, 1 year @ $2

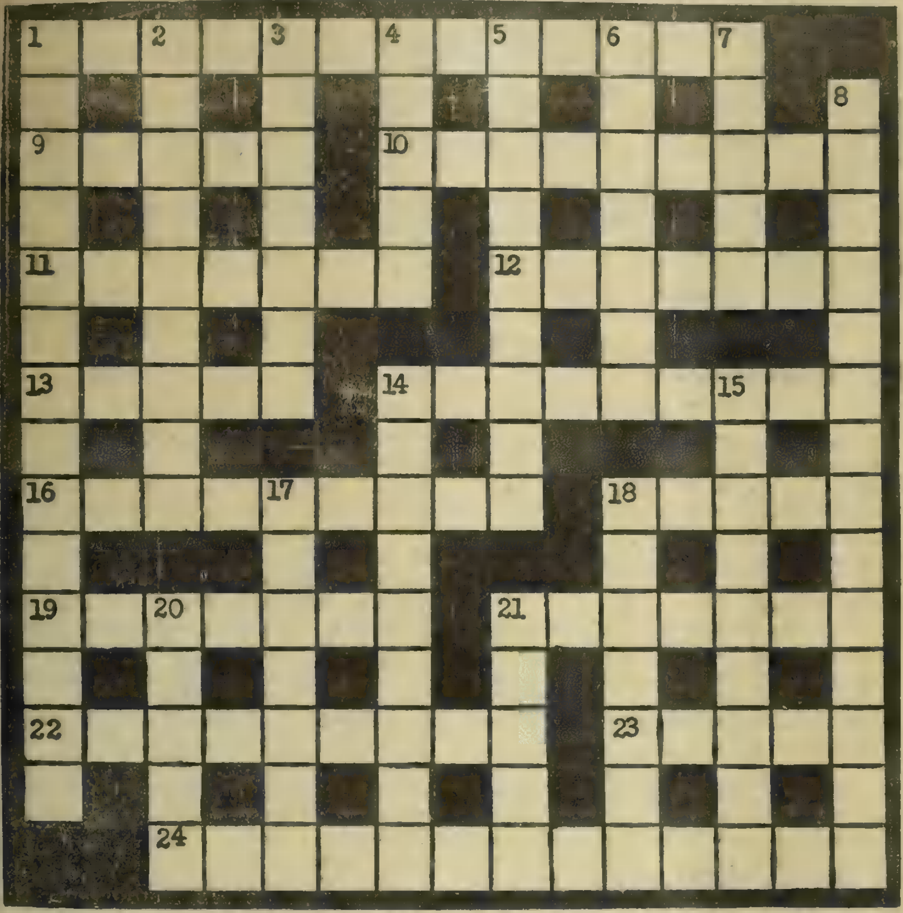
Name ______
Address ______
City ______
State ______ ZIP ______

Mail to:

THE ACTIVIST
27½ West College Street
Oberlin, Ohio 44074

Crossword Puzzle No. 1138

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Does proper use of their adhesive insure a good bond? (7,6)
9 This takes the cake? Quite the opposite! (5)
10 The cut of a lady shows what might be associated with circumstance has a gloomy expression. (9)
11 Not exactly a daily occurrence for that which sounds chivalrous. (7)
12 Reduces to average. (7)
13 Evidently an absence of seconds in the corners. (5)
14 Levi, for example? (9)
16 Method turning out to be descriptive of the poor stranger? (9)
18 And go with this habit for energetic action? (3-2)
19 Bill might be, with a decent sort. (7)
21 Not Hera, obviously — somebody else! (7)
22 Like the story of Ichabod Crane?
23 Used as a comparison for fitness?
24 Serializes the court server's equipment — remunerative, but illegal. (7,6)

DOWN:

1 If your activity far outstrips your efficacy, you may be — though perhaps responsible for some early habits. (8,6)
2 Showy head of 10. (9)
3 Gets an "E," but denies it. (7)
4 Poesy found in the military service.
5 With very little change, it would be time to bring the building material. (9)
6 See 7 down
7 and 6 Might it be in 2/4 time, presto—though less than full volume? (5,7)
8 I have finished, as an example, making the gift without blemish. (7,7)
14 Homer should justify getting past this, certainly! (5,4)
15 A woman might try to, with transformation, though fired some time ago. (9)
17 Black to white, not many moves. (7)
18 March might be associated with this state (though some have less pleasant feelings about it.) (7)
20 Too far gone to show even an element of it? (5)
21 Bring a boat around by the gulf.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1137

ACROSS: 1 Thermos bottles; 8 Equestrienne; 10 Inequality; 11 Dour; 13 Lean-to; 14 Unpoetic; 16 and 21 Raise the roof; 17 Obtain; 19 Tung; 20 Free speech; 22 Collectivize; 23 Confidence game. DOWN: 1 The Miller's Tale; 2 Enumerations; 3 Mosquitoes; 4 Scroll; 5 Overtone; 6 Tent; 7 American cheese; 9 South America; 12 Booby prize; 15 Chortled; 18 Beacon.

PUBLICATIONS

THE LAST MINORITY

Discriminated against by the armed forces and the civil service, regarded as criminals by the law, America's millions of homosexual men and women form a minority in trouble. Who speaks for this maligned and misunderstood group?

TANGENTS, a monthly of fact and opinion, literature and criticism.

Let us send you two sample issues.
Just mail $1 to: 3473½ Cahuenga Blvd., Hollywood, Calif., 90028

To Oppose War Is Not Enough, We Need Creative Alternatives

THE FRIENDLY WORLD

welcomes subscriptions for people of all ages, in all countries. $5 yr.; $8 for 2 yrs. Includes "1966 World Holiday Calendar" featuring Hans Christian Andersen paper cuttings. THE FRIENDLY WORLD, GPO Box 1004, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11202.

A R T

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

PERSONALS

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons. $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, [illegible] Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

PUBLISHER'S EDITOR — writer, analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. French-English. Box No. 580, c/o The Nation.

INTERESTED IN FUNERAL REFORM?

WHAT ARE NEEDS AT THE TIME OF DEATH?

Consider membership in a memorial society.

For dependable information, write

CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION
Room 400 N, 59 East Van Buren St.
Chicago, Illinois 60605

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words): 3-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (min.)

The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by [illegible] Publication Printers Corp., [illegible] Y. C.

it was a routine accident. The bomber was being refueled, a procedure which is carried on by American military aircraft about every four minutes somewhere in the world. The B-52s which have been punishing the Vietcong, for instance, must be refueled on their round trip between Guam and Vietnam. The bomber was on what the Air Force calls "semi-alert," probably making a simulated run on a target, and it had to carry a load of real bombs because war might break out while it was thus practicing and in that case it would be dispatched to its real target. Such practice runs with H-bombs are also made routinely on American cities. San Francisco is said to have been practice-bombed 400 times, and there is no reason to believe that it is a preferred target. The danger is slight, however, since the bombs are not armed unless they are actually to be dropped in anger.

Thus the Air Force, over the seven seas and most of the continents, carries out its mission in preparation for The Day. It kills a good many airmen. A single small item on an inside page of The New York Times, (January 26) told of the crash of an SR-71 "superspy" plane near Roy, N.M., killing one test pilot employed by Lockheed and injuring another. At Denison, Tex., an F-102 Air Force jet crashed and burned, killing the pilot, and a Navy test pilot was killed when his jet fighter crashed in Narragansett Bay.

"Highly reliable" sources revealed (also in the Times) that American nuclear bomber flights over Spain had been indefinitely suspended. A U.S. embassy spokesman in Madrid did not deny the report, but all he would say was: "It is not in the national interest to discuss the movement of nuclear armament." If it were not heretical even to suggest such a thing, one might question whether the movement itself is really in the national interest.

Good for Dodd

Sen. Thomas J. Dodd, as chairman of the special insurance subcommittee of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee, has uncovered a major financial scandal which has gone virtually unnoticed in the press. The American Trial Lawyers Association, however, picked up the story in the December-January issue of its magazine, Trial. High-risk automobile insurance companies sell liability coverage to persons with substandard driving records, to elderly drivers (who are often summarily discarded by the regular insurers after a single accident, however slight), to students, Negroes, Orientals, et al. Since 1960, fifty-four of these companies, doing business in nineteen states, have become insolvent, leaving $300 million in unpaid claims for more than 200,000 badly injured persons and more than a million motorists with worthless liability policies. The manslaughter and maiming on the nation's highways thus receives an added dimension of suffering.

According to Senator Dodd, of the fifty-four bankrupt companies, at least twenty-three failed because of incompetence and careless management practices, flagrant abuses and outright fraud accounted for another twenty. In some cases funds were misappropriated, records relating to company assets were falsified, grossly excessive fees and commissions were paid under management contracts, loss reserves were juggled, fictitious reinsurance arrangements were set up, capital and surplus were inadequate for the policies written, and commission agreements were made with agencies controlled by the same principals who owned the companies. The situation seems to be as bad, if on a smaller scale, as the fraudulent practices which disgraced the life insurance companies early in the century.

State regulation does not always protect the public. In Minnesota, the state insurance commissioner is among seventeen persons indicted by a federal grand jury in connection with allegedly fraudulent operations. Senator Dodd has warned the insurance executives that unless state insurance commissioners remedy the abuses which have become prevalent in this sector of the industry, the federal government will have to step in to regulate the industry.

The Lost Report

Where is the special Pentagon study of the draft that President Johnson promised to release months ago—nine months ago, to be exact? We have become accustomed to hedging, obfuscations, delays and secrecy in trying to get a straight answer out of the Administration on a topic that affects every young man as automatically as the arrival of his 18th birthday. To these the Administration now seems bent upon adding broken promises and falsehoods.

On April 18, 1964, President Johnson called a press conference and announced that he was directing the Defense Department to make a one-year study of the possibility of ending the draft within a decade. The report would be made public at the end of that year. Just why another study was needed was not clear, since a study initiated by President Kennedy had been going for several months; but it was commonly assumed that Johnson was merely acting to spoil a truly objective study proposed in Congress by Senator Keating and others. Spoil it he did, just when it was beginning to get considerable support.

And that—except for the usual number of Pentagon leaks—is the last heard of Johnson's big idea, touted at the time as "the most complete study of the draft ever to be made." April, 1965, the deadline, rolled around, and nothing was heard. Came summer and fall, and the step-up in the Vietnam war, and the silence became deeper.

Recently, we called Harold Wool, the man in the Pentagon closest to the secret study, and asked him what was holding up Johnson's Great Revelation. "Well, in a nutshell," said Wool, "the study was largely completed by last summer, but the Vietnam outlook changed it, and now the basic study must be revised. Quite likely, however, the Secretary [McNamara] will have something to say about the study in the near future." He would release it? No, just have something to say about it. Curiously, he could not have his say last spring; he had to wait until the nation was perilously deep in war and the draft took on a deeper patina of patriotism. Wool went on, "The study categorically states that the draft will probably be needed throughout the decade, even if our needs remained no higher than they were before Vietnam."

Everyone already knew that the Pentagon, being in the business of procuring men, would fashion its study to no other conclusion, but it will still be interesting to see how this conclusion is justified—when President Johnson consents to keep his word and release the report.

A much better explanation for the close-security status of the study was given to us last month by a high official in the Selective Service office in Washington. "You must remember," he said, "that this is a campaign year and the draft is one of the most unpopular institutions in the country. Whatever the study says, it could give the President political trouble."

Tower Against War

As the actively expressed opposition to America's aggressive presence in Vietnam enters its second year, the contrast between the leaden monotony of the official position and the ingenious devices whereby its critics make their views known becomes more marked. On a recent Sunday, Dean Rusk appeared before the cameras of Meet the Press to repeat once more that we are in South Vietnam to help a democratic nation repel a foreign invasion, and that we shall remove ourselves, bag and baggage, helicopters and napalm, as soon as we can be assured that the people of that brave little nation can vote in peace and security for the government of their choice. It is stultifying, after so many months, to hear the same quarter-truths uttered in the same tones of official piety.

Meanwhile, the Artists Protest Committee of Los Angeles has issued a call to the artists of the world to contribute works for display on a Tower Against the War which is to be erected at the intersection of Sunset and La Cienega Boulevards. Contributions, not over 2 feet square or ¾-inch thick, may be constructed of any weather-resistant substance, but the contributors are warned that what they send cannot be protected against possible vandalism. The appeal is printed in English, German, Italian and Spanish for distribution throughout the Western world. Inquiries may be addressed to 530 N. La Cienega Blvd.

And on the 20th of this month, a group of novelists, poets and critics will gather at Town Hall in New York to read from their own works at what is styled as a Read-in for Peace in Vietnam.

It is natural enough that artists and writers should be more inventive propagandists than foundation heads turned administration spokesmen, but the very nature of the two positions gives an advantage to the protesters. It is far easier to find new and vivid ways of saying that life is precious than it is to ring changes on the proposition that peace and freedom can be the fruits of devastation. Life proliferates variety; death is always the same.

Nigeria: Coup on a Tightrope . . . . . . V. L. Allen

The attempted military coup d'état in Nigeria and the subsequent military take-over of power has surprised politicians and newspaper editors in Britain and the United States. For them, Nigeria portrayed an African prototype for political democracy: stable under the rule of law; free, with elections, opposition parties and an unrestrained trade union movement. It was the Western hope for Africa.

People see what they want to see and the uncritical observers of Nigeria saw only a façade. Social democrats in Britain wanted a measure against which to condemn Ghana with its one-party state. The mere bones of a democratic constitution in Nigeria were enough for that. The industrialists wanted to disparage the attempts at central planning and at achieving some degree of economic equality in Tanzania, Ghana, Mali and Guinea. The unrestrained freedom to invest and make profits in Nigeria led them to eulogize all its institutions. Whenever irregularities were discovered they were ignored, or rejected or damned for having their origin in subversive quarters. Nothing was accepted which stained the model of political democracy.

A military take-over, however, cannot be ignored. That is more than a stain; it is a blot. But the mechanism for selecting, for sifting evidence to satisfy inflexible hypotheses, still works. The cause, our public opinion formulators echo almost with one voice, is tribalism. It is resentment by Ibo officers at political domination by the Northern Hausas. No mention of economic and social injustices; little mention of political corruption. Occasionally a trickle of criticism of the Nigerian Government is permitted but none about its assassinated leader, Sir Abubaka Tafawa Balewa. In any case, behind the criticism is an implication much sought after by some Conservatives: this proves that Africans are really not fit to govern themselves.

The Western reverence for Nigeria, the praise of its institutions has been, by and large, a successful public relations hoax. The image we have had foisted on us is one that many Nigerians themselves reject.

The Nigerian constitution provides for free and fair elections but there has been no election in Nigeria which has not been marked by large-scale intimidation, by the use of what are, in effect, private armies. In the federal election in

---

V. L. Allen, who is in the School of Economic Studies at the University of Leeds, has recently returned from a trip to Nigeria.

December, 1964, and the Western Region election in October, 1965, the parties in power used their control of administration to stifle opposition. Opposition candidates were prevented from taking out nomination papers by corrupt returning officers; ballot papers were manipulated to favor the party in power; candidates and their supporters were arrested and imprisoned on trumped-up charges. In the Northern and Western Regions there were arson and murder. Traders and cocoa farmers who refused to give public support to the government had their licenses withdrawn. I saw many of the victims myself when I was in Jos Prison in Northern Nigeria. It was filled to overflowing with political prisoners, not one of whom was charged with a political offense. It is not necessary to repeat the allegations made about the rigging of the Western Region election, for the riots and protests, the burnings and the killings, estimated by one source at 1,500, are testimony enough.

A truthful glance at the situation would have told anyone that effective parliamentary opposition was not tolerated. The only party capable of providing political opposition in Nigeria up until 1962 was the Action Group, led by Chief Awolowo. It was crushed partly for this very reason and its leaders were imprisoned. In 1962, Action Group was the government in the Western Region, strongly in opposition in the Eastern Region and the only vestige of opposition in the north. In the federal government it opposed the alliance between the National Convention of Nigerian Citizens (NCNC) and the Northern Peoples' Congress (N.P.C.). Although Action Group originated as a Yoruba party, it had supporters from the other main tribes. Its general secretary, S. G. Ikoku, was an Ibo; its vice president, Anthony Enahoro, came from Benin. Another leader, J. S. Tarka, was a Tiv from the Northern Region. Confounding prediction, the party changed after years of office in the Western Region from orthodox conservatism to democratic socialism; thus it threatened not only political opposition but economic vested interests as well, and this was a much more serious matter. NCNC, in alliance with a small conservative section of Action Group led by Chief Samuel Akintola, became the main executors of Action Group. They initiated the charges of treason against Awolowo and his officials. The party of Sir Abubaka Tafawa Balewa stood by and watched the breakup of the party, satisfied that the job was being done, giving encouragement where it was needed.

The leaders of Action Group were imprisoned and Chief S. Akintola became Prime Minister of the Western Region with a rump of NCNC and Action Group politicians who were so uncertain and unreliable in their support that each had to be given a government post to retain his allegiance. Elsewhere the Action Group opposition was stifled. Its funds were either confiscated or frozen. In Nigeria, no political parties obtain finances from the mass of their supporters; if they had to rely on that source they would be penniless. So only those parties with access to government revenue can maintain continuously operating organizations. Action Group, cut off from this source, was no match for NCNC and the N.P.C. But it had support among the ordinary people in the Western Region and Lagos and it was this which Chief Akintola and his political rump, now called the Nigerian National Democratic Party, tried to destroy in last October's election The uprising against the rigged election result indicates that he failed.

A fuller description of the attempt to destroy Action Group would reveal clearly the shallowness of the claim that Nigeria, until today, was democratic. Of course Nigeria did not have a preventive detention act like Ghana and Tanzania but it did not need one. Any and every troublesome politician was arrested on one charge or another, such as harboring tax defaulters, loitering with intent, consorting with thieves. And magistrates were always willing to convict, since the rewards for positive support were high. The newspapers were muzzled by a press bill that was introduced late in 1964. Since then, one editor or another has been awaiting trial for sedition. Nor has the right of assembly been respected; in Lagos and the Western Region it has been almost continuously suspended since 1962. In any event, the police are ruthless with assemblies, even when they consist of protesting school children. They use tear gas and truncheons as a prelude to investigating the reason for a gathering.

This picture of political intimidation is superimposed on a setting of gross economic inequality and corruption. Independence has meant for most Nigerians a transfer of power from a white minority to a black minority, a substitution of black capitalists for white ones. It has removed little of the exploitation of the colonialist days; just added another dimension to it.

The average annual per capita income in Nigeria is about $100 and most Nigerians have considerably less. About 98 per cent of the population of 55 million is engaged in farming, subsistence farming, for the most part, and is largely untouched by economic developments. The standard of living of these and others who live by selling cash crops has fallen since the 1950s, for their money incomes have remained relatively stable while prices have risen. The remaining 2 per cent of the people is engaged in industry, mainly as day laborers, with incomes ranging from $11 to $28 a month. Labor is plentiful and therefore cheap. Capital is scarce and expensive; real estate is expensive. Houses in the European sector of Lagos cost more than houses in the West End of London. In the Lagos working-class suburbs Nigerians can make ends meet only if they sublet all but one of their rooms.

Because most of the capital is foreign-owned, with an increasing amount going into American hands, Nigerians can get access to the fruits of economic exploitation only if they control the distribution of contracts, licenses and the purchase of commodities for government consumption. And the only Nigerians with such access are politicians and civil servants. Consequently, large sums of money pass into their hands in return for favors. Politicians also control their own emoluments. Some get car allowances of up to $224 a month. The general strike in 1964 was for a maximum monthly wage of $47.04. In the three years 1960-1963, the government paid out $12,291,706 in car allowances to a few thousand politicians and civil servants. The cost to the federal government of granting the strikers their demands for three years would have been less than that. Senior employees in the public service, both expatriate and Nigerian, receive what are called children's separate domicile allowances to enable them to send their children away to school. In the same three years this concession cost the federal government $3,409,742. I could go on listing examples of gross inequity. The corruption, once it is started at the top, inevitably spreads down. No person can expect to get a job unless he is prepared to "dash" the person controlling its allocation. It is a common assumption in Lagos that if a girl wants a clerical job she must offer more than money.

Corruption is a talking point among the ordinary workers in Nigeria. I was offered countless illustrations without prompting in Lagos. It is a source of discontent. The economic inequalities are resented. Nigerian workers are an articulate lot and they know what they are struggling against.

Beneath the façade, then, a number of factors have made for instability. It was only necessary for some of these to coincide to give rise to actual disruption. In the general strike of 1964, many factors were present but an essential one —the existence of an effective leadership among the trade unionists—was not. The strikers were solid in their protest against the government, but were led by squabbling, self-seeking leaders. The only other organization in Nigeria which had power, different from but commensurate with the trade unions, was the army. In 1964, the military played a relatively passive role. This situation changed after October, 1965, when army units were used to keep Akintola's government in power in opposition to mass protests.

The army in Nigeria, as in any other former French or British territory, is in an anomalous position. In Western industrial countries an army is a conservative, stabilizing element. In Nigeria, however, it is a force for change. It is British-trained; its officers are products of Sandhurst. It is organized as a rational body, based on strict disciplinary lines and with little or no opportunity for corruption. In Nigeria, therefore, the army represents, in a sense, an alien value. On the other hand, the corruption, breakdown of order, absence of discipline are hostile to its traditions, and for this reason the army officers attempted to assume control. The dissidence of the workers has been reflected in a general welcome for military control. There was no need for demonstrations, simply tacit support.

The consequences of the military take-over will depend upon the political acumen of the army commanders, for a final solution can come only through economic and social measures. If the commanders make a transition, as President Nasser did, from dependence upon military power to radical economic policies, they may stay in power indefinitely without reintroducing political democratic measures. If they attempt to maintain power as a military unit and neglect the prime reasons for their ascendance to power, then undoubtedly there will be further unrest and, perhaps, bloody and disruptive clashes against organized labor. If they transfer political power to the hands of those politicians who use office to benefit themselves, as Sir Abubaka Tafawa Balewa's government did, there will be a repetition of the present situation but with more serious consequences.

The immediate need, it seems to me, is to set up a universally accepted political leadership which can act from an ideological base. There is only one source for this and that is among the imprisoned Action Group leaders. Support for Awolowo transcends tribal groups. He is a man of principle, an ascetic in fact and not simply by reputation, and with clearly formulated policies for Nigeria. He, Anthony Enahoro and L. K. Jakande, the extremely able Lagos Action Group leader who is also imprisoned, can provide the leadership which will not only rescue Nigeria from the fate of the Congo but will give it a positive role among progressive African nations. The immediate future of Nigeria depends, then, upon the speed with which the army commanders realize the unifying qualities of Chief Obafemi Awolowo and his Action Group colleagues.

JULIAN BOND

Georgia's 'Uppity' Legislator . . . .

Herbert Shapiro

Atlanta, Ga.

Irony reigned in the Georgia House of Representatives on January 10 when Representative-elect Julian Bond took the witness stand in a special hearing to determine if he should be seated. He was facing men who had repeatedly sworn their defiance of the Supreme Court, segregationists who had a few years earlier applauded student rioting at the University of Georgia against the admission of Negro students, who had urged the doctrines of interposition and nullification. Now they were judging whether Mr. Bond's statement on the war in Vietnam rendered him unfit to take an oath to uphold the federal and state constitutions. The challenge to Bond's seating was led by Rep. Jones Lane who last year invited Alabama Governor Wallace to address the Georgia House. Julian Bond had been asked to leave the Georgia legislature once before: he had been expelled a few years ago when he would not sit in the Jim Crow section of the gallery. "Get those 'niggers' out of there," the Speaker had told the guards. On the present occasion the Speaker, attempting to give the proceeding a veneer of politeness and "due process," insisted that nothing racial was involved. Hadn't seven other Negro Representatives just been sworn in?

Beneath the surface politeness the hearing moved on to a predictable conclusion. When the vote came, only twelve Representatives voted to seat Julian Bond; all of them were from the Atlanta area and five were Negroes. Appeals to seat Bond were made to the House by Rev. Howard Creecy whom Bond had defeated in the Democratic primary, and by Malcolm Dean who had run as Bond's Republican opponent. There was a ripple of laughter as Bond's attorney asked Dean if he knew who had won the House election last June. Dean almost proudly informed the House of his overwhelming defeat: 82 per cent of the votes had gone to Bond. The state's two Negro Senators, Leroy Johnson and Horace Ward, also urged the House to consider carefully and to seat Bond; Senator Johnson predicted that a vote to oust Bond would be an albatross around the neck of the state legislature. But none of this affected the outcome. The House members, specially outfitted for the day with little tin American flags for their lapels, brushed aside the urging of Bond's Negro witnesses.

---

Herbert Shapiro is a professor of history at Morehouse College and one of Julian Bond's constituents. With Ella Winter, Mr. Shapiro edited The World of Lincoln Steffens (Hill and Wang).

Even before the House convened, an atmosphere had been created that made Bond's seating unlikely. Walking through the halls was Lester Maddox, former cafeteria proprietor who long defied enforcement of the Civil Rights Act and who once brandished a pistol at Negroes seeking to eat in his restaurant. Maddox seemed among friends as he talked to the legislators and other capitol officials and handed out circulars boosting his candidacy for governor in the 1966 election. The civil rights workers who attended the hearings were obvious outsiders; the SNCC people, a few with beards and some casually dressed, represented another world as far as these legislators were concerned.

The Atlanta press also contributed to the fever of outrage. The day after John Lewis issued a SNCC statement affirming opposition to the war in Vietnam and standing by young men who decline to respond to the draft (which statement Bond endorsed), the moderate Atlanta Constitution opened a full-scale attack on the civil rights organization. The paper, which claims to be a friend of the Negro movement, identified SNCC's position on the Vietnam war with racism and anarchy. It observed that the SNCC statement "treads far beyond dissent and doubt about policy," implying that criminal actions were involved. The Constitution was perhaps more effective than it intended; on the eve of the legislature's opening it urged the House to seat Bond, but the hysteria let loose was hard to contain. The effort to block Bond was led by segregationists who were prepared to use the issue to provoke a direct confrontation with the civil rights movement, even at the cost of focusing national attention upon Georgia. Georgia's "moderate" business-oriented leadership has sought precisely to avoid such confrontations, to keep Georgia out of national headlines and particularly to give Atlanta a "progressive image." The extremists have now set to work to wreck that image, and it is strange that the liberal Constitution helped put the sledge hammer in their hands.

In the few days that intervened between release of the SNCC statement and the opening of the legislature, some Atlanta Negro leaders had spoken ambiguously about Bond's right to his views, while they stressed their rejection of the SNCC position on Vietnam. The TV stations suddenly became extremely interested in the views of the more conservative leaders of Negro organizations. Perhaps there were some who thought Bond might succumb to this sort of political blackmail, might apologize for his youth, and defer to the wisdom of the statesmen from south Georgia. But the whole significance of Bond's election is that he represents a new kind of Southern politician who thinks principle and politics ought to be related and who genuinely seeks to represent the needs of his constituents. Julian Bond said when the legislature opened that he was ready, willing and able to take his oath of office, but he would also maintain his integrity and refuse to violate his conscience.

His testimony before the House resolved any doubt about the outcome. He was only 25 years old when he came to the state capitol last month. While other members of the House, some of them elected from counties where Negroes still may not register, stood to be sworn in, he was made to sit and listen to the House clerk inform him he must step aside. Then outside the House chamber the newsmen swarmed around him, practically pulling him along to a news conference in a committee room. Through all this Bond appeared unruffled and cool. He read the newsmen a statement addressed to his constituents; he would not offer explanations for his individual opinions to the House as a condition for being seated. He was clear on the issue of his right to speak. "The fact of my election to public office does not lessen my duty or desire to express my opinions, even when they differ from those held by others."

But this was still in a press conference; the test was what he would say directly to the Georgia House. It came a few hours later when Denmark Groover, the counsel for those challenging the young Representative, asked Bond if he still agreed with the SNCC statement. Bond said, "I do!" He said it softly but his answer was clear and it was also clear that he would not compromise his conscience in order to get seated. With his few words Bond took his place among the American dissenters who have refused to conform to the political tradition of opportunism and demagogy. Those in the gallery knew the decisive moment when it came; the tension broke. A representative of an overwhelmingly Negro district, a district mainly of poor and lower-middle-class families, refused to pay the price required for admission to the exclusive club called the Georgia House of Representatives.

Charles Morgan, Southern Director of the ACLU, put it bluntly in a talk before the Hungry Club, a Negro luncheon group. Bond could not have gotten in unless he crawled in crying, "Massa, Massa, I'se come back." He had violated the first commandment of the white supremacist code; he had been "uppity," he had taken a nonconformist position on a basic issue and revealed himself as one Negro politician who would speak out on any issue whenever he saw fit. He did not feel he had first to check it out with the white moderates downtown who proclaim themselves the Negro's best friends. And most important, he had refused to back down when brought before an assembly of white politicians. A Negro legislator who insisted on his right to criticize the Vietnam war, who could not be made to retreat by all the media of public persuasion in Georgia, might be expected to speak out on anything. He just might violate the rules of the club and expose the fact that Georgia state government is still overwhelmingly segregationist in spirit and practice. The other Negro legislators seemed unlikely to be mavericks; they were seated by grace of the Georgia House.

Georgia is still concerned about its image. A group of Florida students recently demonstrated at the state line with signs that read, "You are now leaving the American zone," displayed to motorists crossing the St. Mary's River into Georgia. Florida is no model of integration, but the Julian Bond issue may turn Georgia into the main focus of the Southern civil rights movement. That upsets the state's political leadership and its corporation counselors in Atlanta. Image must be maintained, whatever the reality. So Governor Sanders congratulated the legislature the day after Bond was denied his seat. He said the issue "was acted upon with dignity and a proper sense of responsibility by all concerned. . . . This is as Georgians would have it done." He did not refer to the outcome, he did not comment on the fact that the voters of the 136th district are without representation, he has not said anything as to the right of a legislator to take a controversial position on public policy. A favorite Georgia habit is self-congratulation. Everybody is supposed to be impressed when the forms of due process are followed, never mind what conclusion is reached. One might have thought the Governor was being sarcastic, that his words were meant to parody the previous day's events. A real tragedy of Georgia is that politicians can speak such words with a straight face.

Legally the issue is now before the federal courts, but demonstrations have started to affirm community support of Julian Bond's right to his seat. And beyond this the episode has set off intense discussion in the community that elected him to the legislature. Some Negro conservatives will not lift a finger for Bond; they opposed his election in the first place, they have never liked SNCC, their middle-class respectability does not mix well with SNCC radicalism. Their connections with men of power in the city hall, the state capitol and Washington are threatened by any trend to connect the civil rights movement with opposition to the war. Other leaders speak for Bond's right to be seated, but their real passion is directed toward publicly disavowing SNCC. But this episode is also helping to create a new sense of unity in the Negro community, a unity that may overcome some lingering friction between SCLC and SNCC, and a unity that increasingly sees continuation of the Vietnam war as a threat to American freedom at home. This issue has brought Martin Luther King home to Atlanta to take a place in the leadership of the fight to reverse Bond's ouster; Dr. King has never been more outspoken in his words of praise for SNCC's achievement. He has plainly called the vote of the House a racist action and he has reminded this community that, whatever they think of Bond's specific views, he is a man who has spoken for peace. Dr. King has told Georgians, who usually get only the pro-Vietnam story, of the U.S. Senators who have criticized American policy in Southeast Asia. Conservatives in this city, Negro and white, have sought to keep King out of Atlanta (some of them applaud him as long as his activities are hundreds of miles from here). If the Bond case becomes a protracted fight, King's presence here may galvanize the local civil rights movement.

Since Bond's ouster, SNCC and SCLC have gone to the churches in a series of nightly mass meetings. Community leaders in the 136th district have spoken along with the organizational civil rights leaders. The mood has been one of crusade. At Mount Moriah Baptist Church, hundreds shouted their support for their Representative. Mrs. Dorothy Bolden, one local leader in the slum-ridden Vine City neighborhood summed up the feeling: "Julian Bond is a man." And she added, "We don't have many men in Georgia." To the crowd who cheered, Julian Bond was clearly a Negro leader and not a "leading Negro," selected by the city fathers downtown.

That meeting was also a forum for discussion of Vietnam. The Georgia House of Representatives should be given credit for that. Never before had there been such intense discussion in the Negro community of the distant war. The crowd was once again reminded of the many criticisms voiced all over the country about the war. Prof. Vincent Harding, history professor and Mennonite minister, affirmed his basic agreement with SNCC's position against the war and told the audience that Bond was expelled because he refused to be a slave to President Johnson and his war in Vietnam. Julian Bond's attorney and brother-in-law, Howard Moore, also spoke. Moore responded to a challenge from Charles Weltner, U.S. Congressman from Atlanta, who sits on the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Congressman Weltner's district includes many Negroes, and he has been silent on Bond's right to be seated but had turned over SNCC's statement to HUAC's staff for investigation as to "subversive" content. Mr. Weltner sought to evaluate SNCC; Mr. Moore said it was time to "evaluate Congressman Weltner." This year Weltner may run against Republican state Rep. Rodney Cook, who has enjoyed considerable Negro support. Weltner could be in serious trouble if drained of some of his Negro support. Moore let Georgia politicians know that the Negro is not in any politician's pocket and that maybe he would have to look around for new political alternatives.

Two nights later another mass meeting was held at Rev. Ralph Abernathy's West Hunter Street Baptist Church. Mr. Abernathy, treasurer of SCLC, was introduced by another SCLC aide, Hosea Williams, as the scholar who received his B.A. at Montgomery, his M.A. at Birmingham, his Ph.D. at Selma, under Prof. Jim Clark, and "now is enrolled for some post-graduate studies in Atlanta under Governor Sanders." Ralph Abernathy's speech is rich in the poetry of the Negro Baptist church and this night he was in marvelous form. His theme was "we're not going to bow any more." He told the Biblical story of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, of how the trumpets blew and they were expected to bow but they did not. When summoned they told the king he could blow his trumpet, it belonged to him, but their knees belonged to them. Abernathy asked what is so wrong with American foreign policy that it cannot bear criticism and he, too, spoke of the Senators who have opposed the course in Vietnam. He declared that if Representative Bond is not seated, then his constituents may need to come and fill that seat themselves. Abernathy stood with King in unreservedly paying tribute to SNCC's record of unflinching struggle to create interracial democracy.

The events surrounding the seating of Bond strengthened SNCC's position of connecting civil rights with peace. In the SNCC statement the connection is stated in words; Georgia politics has given reality to the proposition.

THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE POOR

Richard A. Cloward & Richard M. Elman

Syracuse, N.Y.

When liberals and civil rights agitators comment on the condition of the American poor, they are quick to say that the poor require more jobs, equal educational opportunities, better housing. And the poor, on formal and public occasions, are equally quick to say the same. Both enraged by and ashamed of their poverty, they demand the right to conform to the cherished American value of individual achievement, however impractical the application of this value and the governmental measures that spring from it may be to their impoverished condition. So Aid to Dependent Children (ADC) mothers readily endorse resolutions calling for public programs to enable poor people to establish competitive skills and thereby to become self-sufficient.

But privately, away from the drama of framing and passing public resolutions, abstract notions of upward mobility give way to more pressing and immediate matters: how to secure a bare standard of living—minimal housing, food to eat, clothes to wear. In such conversations with the poor, the villain is not so much a faceless society that permits flagrant class and racial exploitation as it is the familiar agents of the social-welfare state who control their lives. That, at least, is one conclusion to be drawn from a hastily arranged national convention of poor people held in Syracuse, N.Y., on January 15 and 16.

The convention in Syracuse, which met at a Negro Elks' club in a portion of the old tenderloin not yet erased by urban renewal, was expressly called to condemn the current "war against poverty." The rallying cry was for "total participation of the poor," not only in the front ranks of the battle against poverty but in the company, battalion, regimental and divisional headquarters as well. In this vein, resolutions were passed asserting the right of the poor to join those already empowered to make decisions about such major issues of American life as employment, urban renewal and education. Curiously, public welfare did not appear on the list. Stating that they were fed up with being the object of government power, declaring themselves ready to participate as equals in local anti-poverty councils along with representatives of private agencies, churches, political machines, public agencies and business elites, the delegates voted to establish a nation-wide, independently financed organization of the poor to advance their claims—even as they wondered where they would get financial resources merely to continue agitating against the poverty program in their various localities.

---

Richard A. Cloward is professor of social work at Columbia University. Richard M. Elman is a free-lance writer.

The Office of Economic Opportunity defines as its target a 30 to 40 million American population living in poverty. About 300 bona fide poor people and 100 representatives of the poor showed up at the Syracuse meeting. Obviously, a demand for "total participation" from such a relatively small assemblage could be construed as a rather insubstantial manifestation of dissent. But such dissent may yet prove to be infectious as more and more anti-poverty administrators and professionals stiffen in their attitudes toward the involvement of the poor in the community-action programs being established all over the country. Meeting at first en masse and later in caucuses called "study groups," the National People's War Council made a plea for unity among "grass roots organizations throughout the country." They further resolved to support any community-action program that agitates against agencies of our "poor law" government.

Slogans such as "total participation" go much beyond the official rhetoric of Title II of the Economic Opportunities Act of 1964, which merely calls for the "maximum feasible participation" of the poor; and to the extent of that difference, this convention could be said to be outside the Establishment's thinking about how the poor are to be brought into the war against poverty. But this extreme stance is, in part, a response to the failure of the poor to attain even modest representation in many community-action programs. It is also a response to the fact that a few anti-poverty programs have been faced with the present loss or future denial of control over their funds as a consequence of their thus far tentative assaults upon the status quo. These delegates, in short, had found the "power structure" more unyielding than they had been led to hope.

In Syracuse, for example, the activities of a university-sponsored, community-action program, using OEO funds, had quickly led the university to dissociate itself, under pressure from angry local public officials (especially Mayor Richard Walsh) who had become the objects of harassment. After just nine months of stimulating protests in housing projects and among blocks of welfare recipients, the nine neighborhood groups, formed with the encouragement of the Syracuse Community Development Association (SCDA), were able to obtain new refrigerators and stoves for all tenants in a public-housing project and won the right to paint apartments in different colors. But they soon found that they had also generated a backlash. OEO ruled that in future they would have to agree to become part of the Crusade for Opportunity—the Mayor's own "umbrella" organization of anti-poverty agencies and boards—or forfeit federal funds. Thus far SCDA has stubbornly refused. Distrusting any political deals that might ultimately limit its freedom to choose when, how and whom to agitate among or against, it has eschewed as well the time-consuming "appeals" procedures established by OEO, although it may yet have to resort to them if it wishes to remain alive in any form. SCDA chose instead to call for expressions of solidarity from other hard-pressed local groups across the country—as many as could make it to a People's War Council on a few days' notice.

Conventions of special-interest groups regularly take place in America, and their recommendations are often heeded. On that same weekend, in fact, the New York State Combined Council of Law Enforcement Agencies also met in Syracuse to register unanimous disapproval of civilian review boards. This group received considerable press coverage. The New York Times gave the National People's War Council Against Poverty a total of 3 inches, and few other papers did better. Yet this many poor have rarely convened anywhere in recent years to pass resolutions about their ill treatment at the hands of government agencies, or about their children's educational problems, their detestation of police brutality, or their right to make decisions affecting their own lives. It was probably to be expected that a convention so hastily summoned would be insufficiently heeded, but the extent of that disregard is worth summarizing: although nearly all top officials of the Office of Economic Opportunity were invited to observe, none ventured to attend; Governor Rockefeller was also invited, but did not come or send a representative; nor did Senators Kennedy or Javits, or Syracuse Congressman Hanley; only one civil rights leader, George Wiley of CORE, was present; representatives from the national Citizens Crusade Against Poverty were also absent.

Of the poor who came, by Greyhound or chartered bus, or in the automobiles of their paid and unpaid organizers, nearly all proved their status as paupers by putting up with sleeping accommodations in the apartments of their fellow poor or on church floors. Many traveled to Syracuse on borrowed funds, some in borrowed clothes. Over the long weekend, a constant activity was passing the hat to assure that all would get home.

Home was chiefly the urban ghettos of New York, Buffalo, Newark, Detroit, Cleveland, Albany, Chicago and Lorraine, Ohio, but there were also contingents of the rural poor: a delegation of striking grape workers from Delano, Calif., under their magnetic leader, Cesar Chavez [see article by James Degnan, p. 151, this issue]; Arizona cotton pickers, freedom delegations from Placquemine, La., a lone Nebraska Indian, a Mississippi Negro who had been activated to work in Cleveland by Students for a Democratic Society. Representatives of the Chicago Woodlawn Organization were in attendance, as was a group from Stryker's Bay on Manhattan's West Side. A dissident group came from an anti-poverty project in East Harlem and a large delegation from Mobilization for Youth on New York's Lower East Side. In Syracuse, ADC mothers from the Puerto Rican barrios of New York, aggrieved Negro migrants to the big cities from the rural South, exploited Mexican- and Filipino-Americans from the fields and vineyards, and hard-pressed Social Security pensioners from Harlem practiced "participatory democracy" with white liberals and SNCC radicals, black-liberation militants, social workers, young Catholic and Protestant clergymen, and grandmotherly Negro women demanding reparations for the former slaves' "400 years of unrequited labor."

What could they all possibly have in common, aside from their economic plight? The satiric criticism of Dick Gregory, on hand to entertain, turned on race, but the chief grievances of the delegates were not racial as the convention came to voice them.

To understand the objectives of the War Council, it is not necessary to beat time to the penny-whistle blues of "total participation"; one need only consider the attitudes toward the poor manifested by such men as Richard Walsh, who was elected Mayor of Syracuse after first serving as Onondaga County Welfare Commissioner. As Commissioner of Welfare, he played upon the public's hostility toward the poor to advance his career. Under his administration, benefits did not notably increase or proliferate, but punitive measures did. Single men applying for relief were either ridden out of town or taken to the county almshouse; married men on welfare were coerced into work-relief programs below the minimum wage if they were suspected as malingerers; families were put on food vouchers as a punishment for fornication, or even for "misspending" inadequate welfare allowances; unconstitutional "after-midnight" raids were conducted to detect the presence of men in the homes of ADC mothers. Case workers, forced to become frauds investigators, worked closely with the county D.A.'s office, regularly intimidating raided welfare clients into relinquishing their constitutional protection against self-incrimination. Even today, the Onondaga County Welfare Department, according to one observer, is characterized by a contempt for the rights of the recipient which is equaled only in some Southern states. It is at least clear that the system of practices that Mr. Walsh engineered and supports in Syracuse violates many of the standards set by the American Public Welfare Association.

Although Mayor Walsh is a trained social worker who likes to boast that he is still doing graduate work toward his Ph.D. in sociology, he said recently that agitation by the poor for reforms has been the cause of the recent upsurge of crime on the streets of Syracuse. Walsh's police force patrols the streets of the Syracuse Negro wards at night as if it were in Watts; indiscriminate stop-and-search procedures are regularly employed, and no active attempt has been made to recruit Negroes for the police. If Walsh has lately shown contempt for delegations of the poor organized by SCDA, he is at least consistent. It was Walsh — through his twin mouthpieces, the Goldwaterite Post Standard and the somewhat less antediluvian Herald Journal (both Newhouse papers)—who excoriated a small group of women who came to demand school clothing for their children from the county welfare office. They were, it was said, the ungrateful recipients of public charity. (It appears, ironically, that Mr. Walsh has received a sympathetic hearing from federal officials during the present controversy over SCDA, partly because he always makes himself available as an "expert" social worker to testify in Congress on rehabilitative legislation for the poor.)

But Mr. Walsh does not despise the welfare state. A middle-of-the-road Republican himself, he makes use of welfare-state powers to level Negro slums and to erect middle-income housing; to scatter the former residents of the ghettos without adequate relocation plans for what were once communities of people. Walsh—like many Americans—supports those aspects of the social-welfare state that suit his purposes.

For the poor to challenge the "poor house" assumption underpinning welfare statism in America is commonly regarded as worse than ingratitude. In one way or another, the poor have had to declare themselves defective in order to qualify for existing programs called Aid to the Disabled, Aid to Dependent Children, or Old Age Assistance. They are, therefore, not commonly endowed by administrators with rights; and that is precisely why Mayor Walsh and his various commissioners can treat their demands with contempt and condescension. How else is one to explain what happened when the delegation of nine welfare mothers, dissatisfied with their first meeting, descended again upon the county welfare office, this time accompanied by their organizers, to claim the school clothing which, according to state policies, is supposed to be standardized and uniform? They had previously been given varying amounts of money, according to their situations; they were now told that each would have to be interviewed "confidentially" to ascertain additional needs. But their further protests led only to arrests for trespassing on city property.

What happens in the Syracuse welfare system is endemic; it happens also in New York, Detroit and Cleveland. Nearly all the delegates to the Syracuse War Council with whom we spoke privately had the same unhappy relationship with institutions of social welfare, but few had been encouraged to do anything about it. Thus public welfare turned out to be the uninvited guest at the proceedings. It was nowhere listed on the formal agenda and only rarely came up at the various study meetings; but the fact that nobody volunteered to speak publicly of welfare did not make the deprivations it imposed, in infinite, painful variations, seem less real.

To the ADC mothers from Lorraine, Ohio, deprivation manifested itself in the bewildering way their benefits abruptly changed every month, raised for some and lowered for others, with no intelligible explanations being given. To the earnest young settlement-house priest from Albany, confused and angry, it was in a system which had to be embarrassed with mass demonstrations before it would distribute surplus foods to supplement an unusually low schedule of cash subsistence allowances. To a Buffalo recipient it was in a system which distributed stamps instead of cash for food, and would not allow the recipients to use stamps to purchase either beer or cigarettes. To the striking Delano grape pickers, it was in the refusal of the Tulare County Welfare Department to grant aid to hungry families on the ground that they could find work in the strike zone. They also told of attempts by Tulare Housing Authority officials to evict rent-striking tenants who were protesting their inadequate living conditions.

If the Syracuse tenants nursed grievances against a Housing Authority which practiced random evictions and often refused to provide services for tenants, the Mexican cotton workers from Arizona had apparently not yet met up with any such institution, for they were living in a collection of shacks, called Guadalupe, on the outskirts of Phoenix. When their homes were inundated by a flash flood, they were sent to the Salvation Army instead of being given county relief. Mr. Walsh may complain to the White House that OEO money is being used to "sponsor class warfare," but officials like him are the ones who help create the grievances from which such conflict springs.

One could go on enumerating the abuses, injustices and inadequacies which were elicited from this somewhat timid and reluctant clientele of the welfare state. Ultimately, these instances of abuse formed a selective view, a silhouette, of the part of the power structure that is immediately visible to the poor. Poverty councils speak of retraining and civil rights workers of job discrimination, but a young Negro from Cleveland told us: "Right after Christmas they just cut a whole lot of us off welfare without anything," and a delegate from Mississippi told how you had to "sell your house, your car, just about everything you owned before they would give you welfare, and then it wasn't ever worth it." "I don't want your welfare," screamed one angry black militant, as if receiving welfare were a degradation every bit as real to him as Jim Crow. A social worker reported that welfare recipients in Syracuse were kept so ignorant of their rights that only a handful of them used the formal appeals procedures available to them under law. Even when there were no complaints which could be brought against welfare policies, there were continual grudging assertions by the poor: "It's not enough. . . ." "It's not the way to treat people." "They'd rather not give it out if they can help it. . . ." "They threaten you if you got a man in the house." "If they [the housing project managers] find paper on the ground with your name on it more than once they will fine you $5." "They tell you to buy school clothing for your boy and then they give you $5." "They [in Arizona] won't give us anything for our families when we earn more than $5 a day in the cotton fields." A young Negro from Syracuse, whose large family required supplementary financial assistance even though he was fully employed, told us: "I never knew I had a right to get anything. . . ."

But if their sordid and insecure dealings with the social-welfare state were the chief interest which skilled grape pickers and unskilled ADC mothers seemed to have in common, the poor were not told what to do about it. They were not told that attorneys could be used to compel welfare officials to provide lawful benefits. Indeed, some of the organizers who accompanied the poor seemed hesitant to urge such tactics lest they induce an even greater dependency among those who were already defined as overdependent. Because of SCDA's attacks upon the welfare state, some significant changes in government practice have begun to occur in Syracuse; but, in general, most delegates from other areas seemed unable to outline similar strategies of social action. It was as if the poor and their militant allies chose to believe that the despised welfare state might some day wither away, when the evidence mounts that it becomes a more powerful influence over the lives of the poor with each passing week.

To the extent that the War Council did not confront that fact squarely, it can be said that this meeting of the dissenting poor—for all its impressive and orderly procedures, tactics and proclamations — failed to produce a strategy that could transform a dissident faction into an effective movement. At Syracuse speakers called for the unification of "the urban poor with the rural poor in a national campaign." Unless the battle plan includes some such frontal attack upon the "American way of public welfare," the campaign may be ambushed en marche by a computerized society.

Monopoly in the Vineyards

The 'Grapes of Wrath' Strike . . .

James P. Degnan

Delano, Calif.

For most of his 38 years Cesar Chavez, the quiet, intelligent and articulate Mexican-American who leads and inspires the striking grape pickers of the San Joaquin Valley, has been an agricultural worker in California. This means that Chavez, like the 500,000 other agricultural workers in California and uncounted thousands more all over America, has worked for an industry (in California, it is the biggest industry) that pays its workers about one-sixth the yearly income of other industrial workers, that recognizes no minimum wage, that offers no holidays, vacations, sick leave, unemployment insurance or pension plan; that grants no overtime, that regularly violates the child labor laws, and that denies the right to bargain collectively.

---

James P. Degnan has written fiction and essays for The Atlantic Monthly, Commonweal, Ramparts and other publications. A section of his forthcoming novel, Memoirs of an Academic Tramp, will appear in an early issue of the Virginia Quarterly Review.

For most of his life Chavez has worked for the only industry in America exempted from the Labor Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley) and from the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board; he has worked, in short, for the only industry that has been untouched by the social legislation of the last thirty years, and by the responsibilities that the United States for a generation has insisted must attend the right to profit from the labor of others.

And until last year, when California finally ended its importation of foreign labor—the Bracero Program—Cesar Chavez and the others like him in California worked for the only industry which has demanded that the government supply it with a captive foreign-labor force when American citizens have refused to accept the appalling wages and conditions that industrial farming offered them. (The scandal of the Bracero Program is well known, but it might be well to recall its essentials. Mexican nationals, because they are cheap, mobile and captive, were imported with the government's blessing to do the agricultural work that belonged to Americans; the Americans, jobless, often went on welfare, for which the taxpayer paid. Then the braceros returned to Mexico, taking almost all of their American wages with them; after all, American money goes twice as far in Mexico. Thus, the economy was hurt; the taxpayer was needlessly soaked; and the agricultural businessman profited. That the outrageous Bracero Program lasted as long as it did is testimony to the influence that a relatively few California businessmen and land monopolists exert over both state and national government.)

Son of an Arizona landowner, farmer and rancher, Chavez came to California during the great depression, when his father lost his land. Like so many in that period, the Chavez family became migrant laborers in the Grapes of Wrath pattern. Cesar, his mother and father, his five brothers and sisters, lived in a succession of tents and hovels and trailers, surviving at times on $1.25 a day. "Usually we had shoes," says Cesar's brother, Richard, "but there were times—I remember in 1939—that we went to school barefoot." As for school, the Chavez boys got more than most migrants of their time; they went through the 8th grade, after being in and out of more than thirty-two grade schools in their migrant life.

During World War II, Cesar Chavez served in the Navy. On home leave in Delano, Calif., in 1944, he attended the local movie house and was arrested for sitting in the "White Only" section. "Cesar kind of laughed off the local arrest," says Richard, "what really hurt him was when he went back to his base and got company punishment too."

Throughout his life, Chavez has entertained one ambition: to help his people, the Mexican-American agricultural laborers, attain first-class citizenship. Between jobs as an agricultural laborer, he has worked with groups like the Community Service Organization — designed to improve the welfare of the Mexican-American poor — and with social workers such as Saul Alinsky and Fred Ross. Two years ago, Chavez organized the National Farm Workers Association (NFWA), a group which last September, along with the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC)—mainly Filipinos—began the longest agricultural strike in California's history and perhaps the most important agricultural strike in America's history.

Written off at first by Joe Brosmer, chief spokesman for the grape growers against whom the strike is directed in the Delano-Earlimart area of the San Joaquin Valley, as "another fly-by-night operation, something that will be over as soon as the outside agitators that started it get tired of the game they're playing and go home," the strike has endured for almost five months and has achieved some notable successes. Although the strikers have failed as yet to gain their major, incredibly modest goals—$1.40 an hour instead of $1.20, an incentive wage of 25c a box instead of the present 10c, and, most important, the right to union recognition and collective bargaining—nevertheless, the strikers have succeeded, with the help of various religious, labor and civil rights groups, in leaving thousands of dollars' worth of Delano grapes to rot on the vines, or to be mauled (and thus ruined for the best markets) by the clumsy picking of imported strikebreakers; in establishing a nation wide boycott against Delano grapes and against Schenley products (the Schenley ranch is one of the biggest the strikers are fighting); in preventing, with the help of rank-and-file longshoremen, the shipment abroad from San Francisco of many thousands of dollars' worth of grapes from the DiGiorgio Corporation ranches; and in gaining the verbal and financial support of Walter Reuther and his United Auto Workers.

And the strikers' future isn't entirely bleak. First-hand accounts indicate that the strikebreakers — most of whom have been imported from Mexico and Texas (many illegally, according to Border Patrol observation) and few of whom are trained grape workers—are making a mess of pruning the grapes now that the picking is over. From the grape growers' point of view, pruning is more important economically than picking. Further, and more encouraging to the grape strikers, citrus workers at a recent meeting at Strathmore, Calif., indicated that they may soon join the strike.

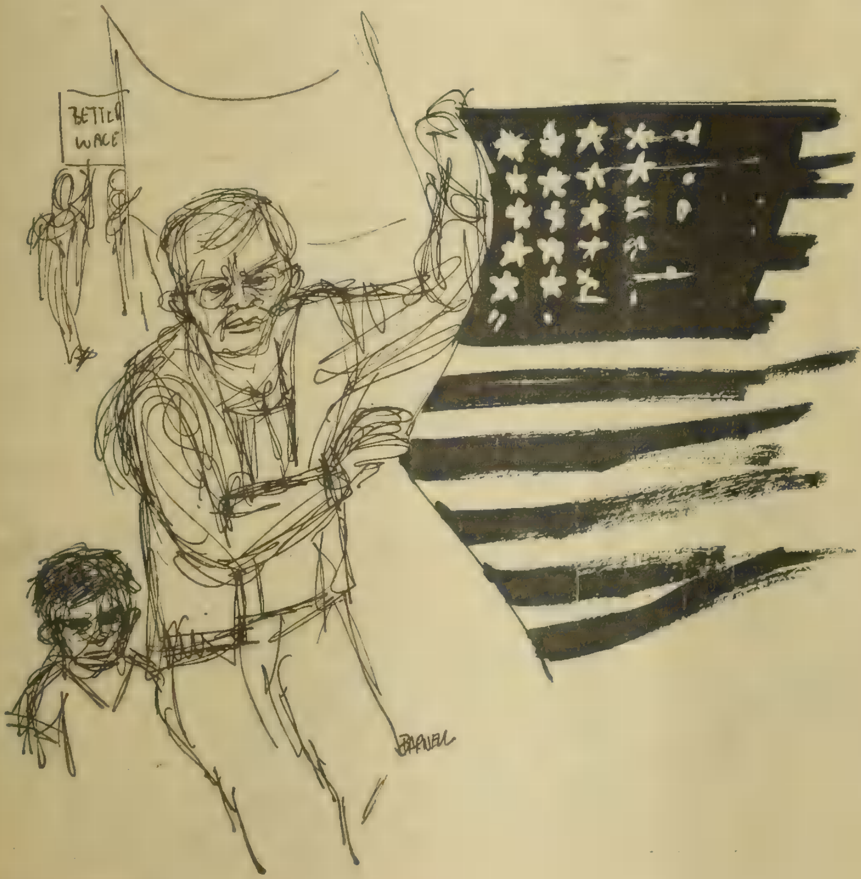
The successes of the strikers have been hard won. Consider, for example, the difficulty of picketing. "Picketing in an agricultural strike," one striker said, "is like picketing an industrial plant that has 2,000 entrance gates and is 40 square miles large." Added to this, the pickets from the first month of the strike have been beaten, sprayed with blinding sulphur, shot at, assaulted with automobiles and tractors, and arrested by the truckloads. In October, for example, forty-four unionists and nine ministers were arrested for shouting Huelga (Strike) to the mostly Spanish-speaking scabs. Discrimination against and harassment of the strikers by the local authorities got so bad that in November the California Attorney General's office investigated, after which the most outrageous incidents, e.g., refusal of the district attorney to consider complaints of the strikers, the setting of high bail for strikers, and the releasing of growers on their own recognizance, somewhat subsided. After the arrest of the unionists and ministers, a local judge issued an order stating that pickets could assemble, but in groups no larger than five and that they should confine their Huelgas to conversational tones. The pickets could not, of course, enter the grape fields where the strikebreakers were working, and when one considers that most of the picking was far off the roads and toward the center of the fields, the effect of this prohibition becomes evident.

Nevertheless, the strikers hung on. While the teamsters freely crossed their picket lines, the strikers picketed grape-loading operations in Delano; and in San Francisco, grape strikers, along with rank-and-file longshoremen, kept the grapes from being loaded for foreign markets. So successful were the strikers that in December the DiGiorgio Corporation was moved to get an injunction against all picketing operations; as yet, no hearing has been held to determine whether the injunction will stand. Lawyers who have been consulted believe that the injunction would never hold up in a higher court, that it clearly violates the rights of freedom of assembly and speech. But such invalid injunctions are common strikebreaking instruments; by the time they have been declared unconstitutional, strikes are often broken.

The endurance and relative success of the strike are a tribute to the organizing skill of Cesar Chavez. "Chavez didn't want this strike," a sympathetic organizer confides; "he would have waited a year or more until he could build up a war chest and until he could make the NFWA what he wants it to be. But when the Filipinos in AWOC struck, Chavez had no alternative but to go along with them."

Chavez's NFWA is more a welfare cooperative than a labor union. For $3.50 a month the 2,000 member families get a wide variety of services. They borrow from the NFWA credit union which has grown from $37 to considerably more than $30,000 in two years; they participate in the benefits of a cooperative food store, drugstore, service station, all of whose profits go to a workers' welfare fund; they have their own newspaper, burial insurance program, and grievance committee to investigate job misrepresentation and to file state welfare claims for illiterate members. The NFWA bails people out of jail, provides legal help, helps bring relatives to the United States, and files income tax returns for families earning about $2,000 annually (there are few such families in NFWA).

Sargent Shriver was so impressed with the NFWA that, before the strike, he had selected it to administer a $267,000 anti-poverty grant. Chavez and Shriver later agreed that the grant should be held in escrow until the strike was over. Since that decision, though, the NFWA newspaper, El Malcriado, says that the big growers have ordered their representatives in Washington to put on pressure; and it now looks as though the grant may be dissolved entirely. As El Malcriado says, this is another instance of the enormous landowner power. Once the growers got to Harlan Hagen (a liberal Congressman and once a champion of Chavez), the paper reports, he suddenly decided that Chavez was unworthy of the anti-poverty grant. But whatever the politicians and growers may think of him, the people will stick by Chavez and may very well win their demands and begin a new era for the agricultural worker in America.



Some major questions lie behind the Delano grape strike, questions occasionally raised but seldom satisfactorily answered. Why is it, for example, that the biggest industry in the state of California, an industry that last year enjoyed direct receipts of $3.6 billion, should so adamantly refuse even to discuss agricultural unions? Why is it that certain growers are willing to pay strikebreakers wages three and four times higher than the strikers are asking as a maximum? Does the farm industry fear declining profits? Hardly. It has been estimated by the Department of Labor that the cost of field labor to the California grower is only 2c to 5c on the dollar, depending on the crop. And, as Willard Wirtz has pointed out, even if growers doubled wages, they could pass on the increase to the consumer without raising prices very much. On a head of lettuce, for example, Mr. Wirtz estimates that such an increase would amount to about 1c.

Why then the bitter obduracy of the California growers? And which growers take this attitude? The most vehement opposition to unions comes from the richest and biggest growers, landowners like the DiGiorgio Corporation, Kern County Land, and the California Growers Association. Many of the smaller growers are actually in favor of the union; and a few have quietly helped Chavez and the NFWA. Chris Bergthold is such a grower. "For me and growers like me," Bergthold says, "there is no labor problem, because we are farmers, not absentee land speculators. We live on the land and work it ourselves; paying our help a decent wage is not much of a problem. After all, we don't need thousands of wage slaves."

"The major opposition to agricultural unions in this state comes from the giants, the land monopolists—the DiGiorgios, Kern County Land, Southern Pacific Railroad, the Tejon Ranch, and a few others who own practically half the state," says Dr. Paul Taylor, emeritus professor of economics at the University of California, and one of the nation's leading authorities on land tenure and agricultural water policies.

"Since early in California's history, land monopolists have needed a flooded labor market, some kind of slave-labor situation to maintain their empires," Dr. Taylor says. "The land monopolists have always been afraid of labor because labor has been traditionally their only real opposition. Why, a really effective farm and urban labor movement here with power in Washington could bring about a series of Congressional investigations that might be the beginning of the end for these monopolies."

When Walter Reuther spoke at Delano some weeks ago, the main substance of his talks was that he intended to call for a Congressional investigation of California land monopoly. It is interesting that not one major California newspaper or television station even mentioned this aspect of Reuther's speeches.

Corroborating Dr. Taylor, Henry Anderson, editor of Farm Labor, a journal that supports the small farmer against the land monopolists, writes that the amount of land owned by the monopolists is "impressive but the aggregation of economic power to which these landowners are tied through interlocking directorates is a great deal more impressive still." Anderson points out that Kern County Land, which owns 1,800,000 acres, has common directorates with Pacific Gas and Electric, Crocker-Anglo National Bank, Pacific Paper Products and several major economic powers. As for DiGiorgio Corporation, its directorate interlocks with the Pacific Gas and Electric, Pacific Telephone and Telegraph, Bank of California, Union Oil, Fireman's Fund Insurance, in, to quote Anderson, "a relationship so close that it is rare even in the world of higher capitalism; DiGiorgio has four directors in common with the Bank of America." Anderson also notes that the enormous California Packing Corporation has four directors in common with Wells Fargo Bank, second only to Bank of America as California's biggest farm financer.

These alliances illuminate the complaint of migrant minister James Drake, an aide of Cesar Chavez: "The little growers really want to help us with the strike; but they say if they dare recognize the union they better not try to get loans for next year's crop."

Dr. Taylor points out other instances of how California's huge landowners and growers regularly violate the spirit and letter of laws designed to prevent land monopoly. Federal reclamation law, for example, upon which Dr. Taylor as a one-time consultant for the Bureau of Reclamation is an expert, was designed by Theodore Roosevelt to guarantee (in Dr. Taylor's words) "that every dollar spent to reclaim land was spent to build up the small man of the West and prevent the big man, East or West, coming in and monopolizing the water and land." To achieve this, the law prohibits distribution of federally subsidized water to individual holdings in excess of 160 acres, unless the owner signs a recordable contract to sell the excess within ten years at a price which doesn't include the increment due to cheap subsidized water. "DiGiorgio signed one of these things in 1952 and when he put the land up for sale in 1964 it was so high nobody even bid on it. And if that's not a violation of the reclamation law, I don't know what is," says Dr. Taylor.

Dr. Taylor also points out that the Interior Department is getting ready to effect another huge water giveaway if it isn't stopped in this session of Congress: "The Westlands Water Project involves $500 million worth of construction to supply cheap subsidized water to an area in which only 30 per cent of the land is eligible to receive such water." Dr. Taylor documents this by showing that in the area to be served by the water project, thirty-six landowners hold 750,000 acres of irrigable land. None of the holders has less than 5,000 acres. "No recordable contracts have been signed in this area, and none is expected to be unless Gaylord Nelson, Paul Douglas, Wayne Morse and a few other interested Senators and Congressmen can come through in this session."

If Dr. Taylor and others like him are right, what started out as a hassle over 20c an hour may prove to be a much more expensive and interesting quarrel.

SANTO DOMINGO
LABYRINTH OF POLICY

Tony Mockler

Santo Domingo

"Feep" is a new word in the vocabulary of the Dominican Republic that baffles the recent arrival. He hears it on all sides, both in Spanish conversation and in English. Is it, he wonders, a type of vehicle or perhaps a new soft drink? Finally an old hand, chuckling a little at the naïveté, will explain that "Feep" is in fact "FIP"—the Fuerza Interamericana de la Paz—and then the newcomer will understand why he has heard the expression so often. For the FIP, the 10,000-man body of OAS troops composed almost entirely of the 82nd Airborne Division, is everywhere. Its soldiers patrol the city, break up demonstrations, escort important personages here and there and show quite clearly that in the last resort they are the one military force in the country that really counts.

A few nights ago the commander of the FIP, the Brazilian General Alvim, gave a farewell cocktail party at the Hotel Jacaragua in Santo Domingo which the force has taken over as its headquarters. It was also a farewell party for his second in command, U.S. General Palmer, who had commanded the American troops in the days, last spring, before the FIP existed. The tour of duty of both generals was about to end. It was an interesting occasion: General Alvim, short and plump, but formidable looking, walked to and fro among his guests. Two of the three members of the OAS ad hoc commission, whose duty and privilege it is to give "political direction" to FIP, propped up the bar —the third and by far the most important member, the veteran American diplomat Ellsworth Bunker, was not present. A yard or two away, filling in what would otherwise have been no man's land, the American Ambassador, Tapley Bennett, was talking to the British Ambassador. And a yard or two away from them a mixed group of Dominican and American officers and their wives were sitting at a long table and enjoying themselves with gusto and camaraderie. At the bottom of the table sat General Palmer and halfway down it sat two of the five generals who lead the Dominican armed forces — Rivera Caminero and Emilio Jimenez. "Take a good look at that," said one onlooker. "Can you honestly imagine the FIP making any move against the Dominican army? Well, can you?"

---

Tony Mockler is a regular contributor to the Manchester Guardian.

Any experiment with a mixed international force is bound to be perilous, as the United Nations found to its cost in the Congo. Powers and the chain of command are not clearly defined, and the military vie with the civilians for actual control of operations. The Dominican Republic is by way of being the Congo of the OAS: it is the first occasion when the OAS has mounted a military peace-keeping operation, and what seemed to be an excellent idea at the start may prove to be a ghastly failure. On the surface any comparison between the two operations is ridiculous: the UN force was composed of contingents from small and very different nations, only too liable to act in accordance with what each commander considered to be his nation's interest or policy. The FIP is composed of small groups from four Central American countries, a moderate group from Brazil, and an enormous group from the United States. It would therefore be only reasonable to expect that the FIP would remain a direct instrument of U.S. policy. This has not proved to be the case, though up to now there has been no disastrous clash.

The Dominican civil war broke out on April 24, 1965; American troops were sent in four days later, to protect civilian lives and to make sure that "Communist elements" on the anti-military or constitutionalist side did not take over the rebellion and lead it to success. This return to the diplomacy of the big stick after the hopeful days of the later Kennedy era aroused a storm of protest, both inside and outside the United States. On May 3, Washington asked other American states to help keep the peace in the Dominican Republic. And on May 6, the Tenth Reunion of the Foreign Ministers of the OAS approved by a vote of 14 to 5, with one abstention, the setting up of the FIP. The OAS asked the Brazilian Government to name a commander, and two weeks later General Alvim arrived in Santo Domingo.

No doubt the "Inter-American Peace Force" sounded better in international circles than the appallingly blunt "82nd Airborne Division"; but no doubt also the U.S. Government thought it would control the reality behind the title. However, it soon became apparent that General Alvim was no puppet. On the contrary, he took his position and his authority extremely seriously and left no doubt that it was he who would decide how and where the FIP should be used. At the time, the worries of the U.S. Government and the preoccupations of General Alvim coincided: the danger was still thought to be a Communist takeover of the Dominican Republic; the "enemy" was thought to be the constitutionalists, while the cooperative Dominican regular forces were the "friendlies." In mid-June the FIP, which had established a zone to keep the two sides apart, was involved in a bloody clash with the constitutionalists, and the troops certainly thought they knew who the enemies were. Naturally enough, they were those who had fired on them, those who had killed some of their comrades.

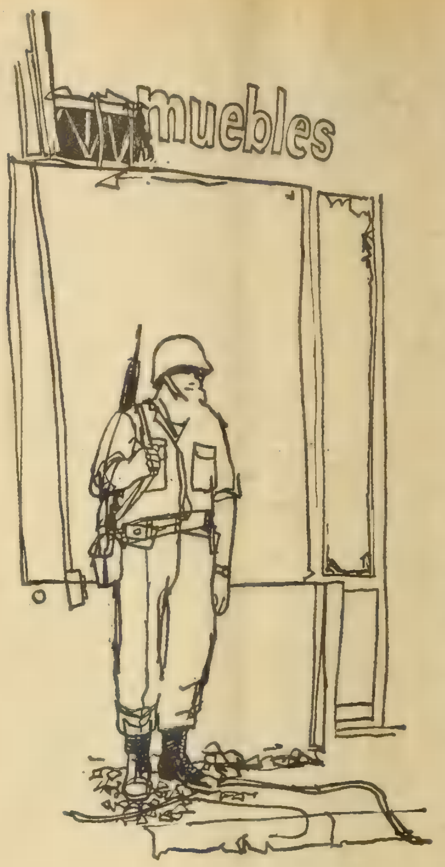
United States policy began to change when Ellsworth Bunker and his two associates on the OAS three-man committee finally, after weeks of negotiation, produced for the provisional Presidency a candidate who was acceptable to both the generals and the constitutionalists. The Act of Reconciliation and the Institutional Act of September 3, which set up the provisional government of Hector Garcia-Godoy, a middle-of-the-road professional diplomat, were signed by five generals on the one hand and by the constitutionalist leaders on the other. The acts were not signed by the leader whom the United States had set up earlier in the spring, General Imbert Barreras, but by then Imbert Barreras had become an embarrassment to his sponsors. His funds were cut off, and he was quietly ignored. President Garcia-Godoy took over, with the official backing of both the OAS and the U.S., and the unofficial support of Mr. Bunker. His main task was to stay in office, administer affairs, and preferably offend nobody until the elections, which are due to be held on June 1 of this year. One month after the elections, the provisional President will hand over power to his democratically elected successor, whereupon peace and order will flourish in the Dominican Republic. Such at least is the theory.

The new regime got off to an encouraging start. The most hated general of all, Elias Wessin y Wessin, was hustled out of the country in a coup de main arranged by Mr. Bunker, with the apparent help of General Alvim. Two weeks later, Juan Bosch returned from his exile in Puerto Rico, to the acclaims of the populace and the joy of the constitutionalist leaders, who had set off the April revolt with a call for his return.

The generals did not openly protest, though they must have been uneasy at the turn of events. For them Bosch, the only elected President that the country has had in more than thirty years, was no better than a rabble rouser; they had imagined that the Americans too thought him a Communist or at least a fellow traveler. And yet he was permitted to re-enter the country while one of their fellow generals was thrown out. What game were the Americans playing? But for the moment the generals held their hand. Two provisions in the Act of Reconciliation interested them. The first was that the rebel constitutionalist soldiers should be "reintegrated" in the armed forces, and the second was that the arms held by civilians in Santo Domingo should be handed in. Originally the rebels had refused to give up their arms as long as Wessin y Wessin remained. Now Wessin y Wessin was gone.



In mid-October the situation in the Ciudad Nueva, the downtown stronghold of the constitutionalists, was very tense. It was not helped by the murder of a former right-wing Minister of the Interior, Severo Cabral, who had too boldly returned to claim his house in the district. The constitutionalist soldiers were being moved out to a camp on the other side of the river, regular soldiers were being moved in, and a halfhearted arms search was being conducted on orders from President Garcia-Godoy. On the night of October 18, Colonel Caamaño moved his constitutionalist troops back into the city, fearing a military attack. Under constitutionalist pressure Garcia-Godoy modified his search plan: three days later the last batch of constitutionalist soldiers finally left for the camp where they have been ever since. A few arms had been collected — "muchas bazookas," the President is reported to have claimed—but nobody was fooled. Obviously the idea of reintegrating the rebel soldiers with the regular army was now shelved, and the civil population were — very wisely from their point of view—keeping their arms tucked safely away. They have them still.

But for the generals and their right-wing supporters it was a time of rage. They were getting from the new government none of the advantages that they had expected when they signed the acts that set it up. On October 25, a wave of assassinations and other acts of terrorism began throughout the country; they have continued sporadically ever since, and the victims have almost invariably been members of Bosch's political party. On the same day Garcia-Godoy, fearing a military attack on the Ciudad Nueva, appealed for the FIP to take over. It swept through the zone, causing five deaths in the process. As a result the American intervention became less popular than ever—even though this time its political motives were less suspect. This period culminated in an attempt by the regular military to kill off all the constitutionalist leaders at one blow, an attempt as ruthless in conception as it was feeble in execution. On December 19, Colonel Caamaño and more than a hundred constitutionalist leaders went to the second city of the country, Santiago, for a memorial service in honor of one of their dead comrades. They were about to sit down to the memorial breakfast in the Hotel Matum, after the ceremony at the graveyard, when the hotel was attacked by four tanks and 400 troops. The battle raged for seven hours until troops of the FIP, arriving rather tardily from their nearby camp, separated the two sides. Had the attack succeeded, the generals would presumably have ousted Garcia-Godoy and taken over the government.

But the attack failed; it electrified the whole country and it is certain that Mr. Bunker and his colleagues were appalled by the attempt. From then on the generals rather than the Communists have been the ogres of the Dominican Republic. On January 3, Garcia-Godoy broadcast a speech to the nation that blamed nobody. Constitutionalist leaders furiously called this "a legalization of crime." Two days later Garcia-Godoy made his now famous decision to send top military leaders from both sides to diplomatic posts abroad. It seems that this was Garcia-Godoy's own decision, made without the approval, perhaps even without the knowledge, of Mr. Bunker. But once it was made, the OAS council came out with a specific declaration of support for the decision and the U.S. Government reiterated its general backing for Garcia-Godoy's government. Six constitutionalist officers (though not the two leaders) flew to their new posts on January 11; but the generals show no signs of going, and have refused to accept the President's orders.

At the moment of writing the stalemate is continuing, and this is where the FIP may act as the sword that cuts its wielder's hand. The FIP was set up by an OAS vote of 14 to 5, but among the five opposing its creation were Chile and Mexico, while the fourteen who voted for it included the most right-wing states of Latin America. Whatever the terms of the resolution may have been, the much-trumpeted danger at that time was of "another Cuba," and there can have been little doubt in anybody's mind as to the side the FIP would be more neutral to. Between using a force such as the FIP against "the rabble" and using it against right-wing generals and the regular army of a Latin American republic, there is all the difference in the world—particularly in the eyes of other right-wing generals and regular armies. Marshal Castelo Branco, ruler of Brazil, has the reputation of being a moderate; nonetheless, it appears that he unofficially informed General Alvim that if one regular Dominican soldier was killed by the FIP, General Alvim would do well to remain abroad.

Not that a Brazilian general or any other Latin American general in such a position would need much restraining. There would be qualms of conscience even among U.S. officers at an order to move against the regular Dominican forces. Political acuteness cannot reasonably be expected of military men; loyalty and a desire for outward order, two of the most important military virtues, inevitably lead the military men of the FIP to sympathize with the generals and their followers. If, however, it was a question of a U.S. force operating directly under U.S. control, the sympathy would still exist but it would almost certainly not affect action. Orders are orders. But within the FIP it is a real question whether OAS orders are orders or not; what is certain is that the U.S. Government can give no direct orders to the 82nd Airborne Division. It must work through the OAS, and the OAS has to work through the three-man committee. But here the bugbear of all international peace forces occurs: the three-man committee can give "political direction" to the FIP, but military control remains in the hands of its commander.

And who is to define when precisely political direction infringes military control? It is an open secret that relations between Ellsworth Bunker and General Alvim have deteriorated recently; the FIP has never directly refused to carry out a suggested move, but its commanders have certainly dragged their feet, and a direct clash may come soon. Garcia-Godoy relies entirely on U.S. support; neither of the two sides in the civil war loves him, no political group supports him, and he has the backing of no class or interest in Dominican society. One of his aides was heard addressing Ellsworth Bunker recently as "Mr. President"—an understandable slip of the tongue. Garcia-Godoy is not precisely a puppet, but take away American support, and he would be lucky to keep office for twenty-four hours. And actual, physical American support consists of the FIP—or did consist of the FIP until the present open clash between Garcia-Godoy and the generals. Now no one can be sure which way the FIP will jump.

But it may be that in the end there won't be a clash; that in the game of bluff Mr. Bunker will win, and the generals will agree to go quietly to an embassy exile that will certainly be pleasant and very possibly be short. What of the Dominican Republic then? Will it proceed quietly to free and democratic elections on June 1?

Skeptics believe that it will not; they believe that the U.S. Government, or possibly the Pentagon, or possibly the CIA, will do everything they can to create an atmosphere in which elections will be impossible, particularly if Juan Bosch is a candidate and shows signs of being successful. Others, rather confusingly, claim that elections are not required — "Constitución sí: elecciones no" is scrawled on many walls. This is what might be described as the "pure constitutionalist" position: that Bosch is still, subsequent coups notwithstanding, the legal President of the Dominican Republic and will remain so until his term of office expires in 1967. Bosch himself appears not to be pressing this point. I asked him recently whether elections would be held: "It depends on American policy makers," he said. "The future of our people is in the hands of American policy makers and I don't think they, themselves, know where they are going. . . . We are dealing now with the elephant, an elephant scared of a little rat, and we can expect anything." Bosch was particularly bitter about Thomas Mann, whose influence as President Johnson's adviser on Latin American affairs he sees as thoroughly pernicious. About his own future he was dubious: "I do not want to be President. I have not the temperament to be an American servant."

And yet the general opinion is that if it comes to elections the two candidates, and the only two candidates, will be Bosch and another former President, Balaguer. Balaguer was President under slightly different circumstances—at the end of the Trujillo era, to be precise—but though he served the tyrant loyally, he is himself a cultured and mild figure who is expected to gain conservative support from all those, including peasants, who are suspicious of any drastic change. To borrow his opponent's phrase, Balaguer has the temperament to be an American servant. It should not be forgotten that Trujillo for almost thirty ferocious years was, if not an American servant, at least a loyal ally—and when he went too far and on his own initiative attempted to have Betancourt of Venezuela assassinated, his own days were numbered. It would not be extravagant to suppose that some American policy makers look back with nostalgia to the Trujillo era when the Dominican Republic was not the problem it has since become. American policy since April 24 has clearly veered among very different solutions; and if at the moment the emphasis is on a democratic solution, continuing vigilance will still be the price of its freedom.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Sob-Sister Gothic

IN COLD BLOOD. By Truman Capote. Random House. 343 pp. $5.95.

Sol Yurick

Writers will have much to thank Truman Capote for. Leading celebrants of the "subjective" life, such as Selby, Pynchon and Heller have been shown the way. Legions of poets will scan newspapers instead of lines, seeking the coordinates of truth!

Actually, taken by itself (aside from a still uncured tendency to rodomontade), In Cold Blood is not a bad book. It is better than the usual police reportage, fast moving, melodramatic, suspenseful in the way of its genre, even a little artful. But it is impossible to dissociate In Cold Blood from the claims its author and publisher are making for it: that it is a new art form and, as such, represents a higher objectivity. Capote's establishment of the new art form reminds one of those special 3-pound weight classes which are staked out in boxing from time to time to fatten the take: junior lightweight; senior bantamweight. Capote's first defense of his new title is successful: we are told Oscar Lewis has written a documentary, ". . . an impure form . . ." (italics added); poor Lillian Ross only managed to write a novella; Daniel Defoe's Journal of The Plague Year certainly wasn't poetic enough; Meyer Levin wrote a novel "suggested" by fact; and as for those thirty or more a year case studies in the annals of aberrant crime, forget it; the Dreisers, the Farrells, the Algrens—they are not in it at all. The minnesinger of engineer reality wins in a stylish walk.

And it turns out that what we are really witnessing is a kind of morality play: the conversion of Truman Capote who, turning away from the sinful, the decadent, the tumid prose pathologic, comes into the clear and healthful air of the world of objectivity and, at the same time, throws open new markets of opportunity by the example of his redemption. He also manages to save the moribund novel which has priced itself out of the market with too much exotic experimentation.

As for the higher objectivity — we are to be persuaded that it is reportage shotgun-wed to poetics. How beguiled we are by the thought of the lived or witnessed experience; what paeans our dust jackets sing to that author who has lived the rich, full life as ritually exemplified by homage to the Dictionary of Occupational Titles. But the critics are demonstrating a deplorable lack of homework in the history of literature and psychology when they respond enthusiastically to this book: we should expect as much from fans of the Reader's Digest. The dramatic distillation of this vast assemblage of data (trunks full, we are assured) follows the paths of mythic selection dictated by the stylebook of New Yorker fact pieces. And Capote's choice of detail is more influenced by The Folk-Motif Index, or amateur readings in Jung's moonshine of the racial unconscious than by any disinterested resolution of social forces. If you accuse Capote of distortion, he can plead the novelist's license; if you point out that Perry Smith's dreams of a poisonous diamond tree defended by a snake is lifted out of mythology and worse, parlor Freud — or that the godlike giant parrot is cribbed from Flaubert's A Simple Heart—his defense will be reportage: the man said it.

Capote's first section, "The last to see them alive," shows how, that dramatic night, the Clutters' destiny intersected with the destiny of the killers, Perry Smith and Richard Hickock. It is done in the best tradition of newspaper sob sisterism wedded to Southern Gothic prose. Each section ends on a doom-note hooker as he switches back and forth from the innocent family going about its business to the approaching killers. "Then, touching the brim of his cap, he headed for home and the day's work, unaware that it would be his last." "A bookmark lay between its pages, a stiff piece of watered silk upon which an admonition had been embroidered: 'Take ye heed, watch and pray: for you know not when the time is.' " "I can't imagine you afraid. No matter what would happen, you'd talk your way out of it." Why go on? Objective? It is "little-did-they-think" writing, fat with portent. Possibly the enthusiastic response is due to years of conditioning by newspaper reportage: At last! a recognizable form; you don't have to work to recognize reality—it's like you see in the newspapers all the time. And like the newspaper approach, the poverty of Capote's "new" art form is appalling, the shallowness stupefying. This is a man who gives us the stunning psychological metaphor, ". . . the criminal mind. . . ." As they say on the radio: "Make this simple test." Read any newspaper or magazine account of Capote's In Cold Blood, then read the book: you will not learn one new thing; you will even have been given all the worth-while lines. A work of art should, presumably, continue to shape our easy acceptance of the world, make us see in new ways, create new metaphors with which to view the world: new art should go beyond engineer reality.

This higher objectivity consists of such factual sentences as ". . . the left eye being truly serpentine, with a venomous, sickly-blue squint that although it was involuntarily acquired, seemed nevertheless to warn of bitter sediment at the bottom of his nature." How wonderful that any accident should adapt itself to the eternal verity of a thing, how right for the world is that "nevertheless." ". . . from first footfall to final silence, flawlessly devised," a fine formation of a florid phrase! One compares it with Lillian Ross's masterly understatement, or with Hubert Selby's restrained catalogue of horrors, the very impersonality of which raises any "truly serpentine eye" from a prosaic given to a poetic fact.

How Capote excels at the list! He enumerates, piling up detail, taking care to shed the aura of doom on artifact so that each item acquires enormous pathos and drips sentimentality. This kind of emotion amplification serves to make one weep over crumpled tissues; pie baking becomes a footnote to the short life of man, what a weak vessel is he; tears are baked in with the cherries. To be sure, after the first section, Capote's prose lavenders more lightly; itinerary, document, presumable interview are more in evidence; but he reprises at the end with an underplayed crescendo of tear-jerking effects, giving us a sheriff's elegy in a country graveyard where the Clutters are buried. Naturalism decays into case history. Case history's half-life becomes decadence, a concern with the emotional charging of literary ornaments, not substance: the sought after effect is the vicarious charge, the tear. This is where we came in: it is still that unreconstructed devil, Capote, not too far off from his earliest ventures. We are still in the presence of Huysmans, not Huntley-Brinkley. The implications for American Fiction are bad because it argues, more and more, a turning away from the recognizably fictional modes not because they are presumably less true but less marketable, less emotion provoking. Capote is in the forefront fleeing the subjective life. But is he?

---

Sol Yurick is the author of the novels, The Warriors (Holt, Rinehart & Winston) and Fertig, soon to be published by Trident Press.

"In Cold Blood is remarkable for its objectivity — nowhere, despite his involvement, does the author intrude," Mr. Plimpton informs us in The New York Times. Nonsense. One of the most studied omissions of the history is the role Capote played in the life of the killers. He tells us with pride that he disdains mechanical recording instruments because they cause a distortion of the interview—that he has trained himself to have 95 per cent memory retention. I won't doubt his word at all. I will suspend belief and accept that the killers said what Capote remembers they said. But how much of their words were, nevertheless, Capote's art and none of their own? Any interviewer has an effect on the interviewed; there is always a subconscious effort to please the questioner, to give him what he wants. Guidance comes in the form of subliminal hints: facial gestures, hand movements denoting approval or disapproval, the very diction of questioning conditions and cues. The interrogatory moral-seeking words of one reporter are useful as response to the next breathless inside-story seeker. Here is Heisenberg's uncertainty principle in action; observation alters the observed. Hitherto illiterate prisoners respond in categories of humility, piety, absurdity, and begin to sound like Dostoevskian heroes on the verge of an epiphany. Prisoners learn their literary style on the edge of the gallows.

And where there has been, admittedly, as in Capote's case, excessive involvement, preoccupation, breathless obsession—a whole vicarious involvement is hinted at — what room and time there was for a leisurely programing of the prisoners in the use of ironic moral overtones, reportorial portentousness: remember, Capote was in touch with them, personally and by mail, for years: he was present at their execution. Capote didn't have to be afraid of tape recorders after all; the prisoners buried the evidence of what they were and forgot about it. Why does Capote leave himself out of it? He is one of the prime actors. Lillian Ross wasn't afraid to include herself in Picture and made a much better book for it. And who's not to say that the polishing of a crude phrase — merely editorship, of course—might not lead to a statement like: "And it wasn't because of anything the Clutters did. They never hurt me. Like other people. Like people have all my life. Maybe it's just that the Clutters were the ones who had to pay for it." How neat. Could Joe Mankiewicz have said it better?

Even the title irritates. Not only is it in the best tradition of sensational headline mongering but it represents the standard incantation used by prosecuting attorneys in asking for the extreme penalty. But the description of the killing indicates that it was done not "in cold blood" but in the grip of obsession, almost sexual passion, bringing a release that was almost as intense as any orgasm or mystical experience. "In cold blood" argues logic, reason, planning, cause-effect thinking, personal responsibility, above and beyond any social conditioning, in the committing of a crime: the phrase is the Establishment invocation of sanity. And Capote's use of the title argues his tacit approval of the system.

It is the middle class which is responsive to and outraged by that violent dislocation, by that apparent unmotivation of certain acts which it is stylish to call irrationality or absurdity in literature. The very words argue the exception that tests a pervasive condition, an everyday state of being. And, after all, it is the middle class which has created a social medium whose very nature is shored up by an ideology that stresses personal volition, cause-effect, reason, logic, historicism. Anything that appears to violate this order is shattering, outrageous, deserving of the death penalty; the very presentation, the very special pleading, of In Cold Blood implies the unusualness of the murderer's act and so becomes diversion, entertainment in case history, and tries to persuade us that what are in fact common patterns of behavior are aberrations. But the poor, for instance, live in a world of violent and "criminal" dislocations, casual unmotivated brutality which no police force tries seriously to stop, so long as it doesn't spill over; it is a world whose inhabitants are not too strongly programed in the ethics of cause-effect, and kill without much feeling, who do not find such behavior absurd, but expected. How few Capotes put their

Bill Watson's Report from Canada

(1) Safe in their giant glass house ruffled by gusting wind, frogs hide under the mud rug and bulge the little waves of their eyes to mean "Winter, spare me; I am just a little life on my knees;
even my eggs are almost water."
And boys throw stones that go magic into that glass.

(2) Geese come by. They strain the downwing sweep, then slide south fifty yards each time, pump history past their checked eyes, and belong wherever they've arrived.

(3) The bear come down. They swing the dream of their heads. Every airedale drop in our dog's blood sings to her throat, and she becomes that queen who said "Whom" and "We are not amused."

(4) Till we grow up we think we're Americans, that comfort will come. But we do our own seeing. They're different. We hear them, their confident tears, in music boxes.
I had not known so many are that way.
I'm Canadian.

William Stafford

obsessed talents to dramatizing such worlds. Selby convinces us, for instance, that the world of taken-for-granted violence and brutality interpenetrates our world. And since they are of these related worlds, we cannot rest with the Perry Smiths and the Richard Hickocks as they are; before we kill them we make sure they negate themselves by turning into literate, psychopathic heroes. We make sure that it is understood that the relationship of the killers to the Clutters is considered aberrant by treating it as a one-of-a-kind case history. Possibly it would have made more sense if Perry Smith's statement read: "And it was everything the Clutters did. They always hurt me. Like other people. Like people have all my life. It's the Clutters who are the ones who should pay for it." They did: and not for the cheap, shallow, sentimental reasons Capote gives us.

The higher objectivity? We are still waiting for it.

Proust and the Tartar Relation

PROUST: The Later Years. By George D. Painter. Little, Brown & Co. 424 pp. $7.50.

Mina Curtiss

George D. Painter's two-volume biography of Marcel Proust is an extraordinary work. The six-year gap between the publication of the two volumes, due largely to the noncooperation of Proust's heirs, necessitates a rereading of the first volume, The Early Years, in order to judge the success of the work as a whole. Its virtues are many and unusual. Not only has Mr. Painter discovered useful material in little-known memoirs neglected by other Proustians but he has, by the meticulous thoroughness of his study of already used sources, succeeded in creating a unique portrait in montage of Proust's day-to-day existence.

The basis of Mr. Painter's biographical theory is the conviction that this account of the traceable details of the daily life of the author and of everyone with whom he came in contact reveals the creative process by which A la recherche du temps perdu came into being. Certainly his handling of the ingredients in this richest of dishes makes absorbing fare. But the biographer is, after all, not the chef whose indefinable personal magic is the essential clue to a masterpiece. If science could isolate the inner processes whereby the recorded acts and thoughts of a genius are transformed into the specific masterpiece that no other artist could have written, Mr. Painter would have succeeded. For no one has surpassed him as historian of the keys to the characters in Proust's novel. But because Proust himself was a moralist and because Mr. Painter has patterned the structure of his biography on his conception of Proust's method as a novelist, there is a recurring, if perhaps subliminal, moralistic tone that gives false emphasis to many of his conclusions. Mr. Painter is not the only distinguished English scholar attracted to the life of an admittedly "abnormal" French writer who seems impelled to stand in judgment on the subject of his choice, ignoring the fact that the artist, a monstre sacré, is under compulsion to follow the bent of his genius through processes perhaps incomprehensible to the noncreative mind.

In her life of Baudelaire the brilliant Oxford don, Enid Starkie, writes:

> In England, Baudelaire . . . would have gone either to Oxford or Cambridge . . . where under proctorial or tutorial supervision, he . . . would probably have made a name for himself . . . in artistic and literary clubs, and this might have satisfied his need for eccentric self-expression. . . . Unfortunately the university system in France does not fulfill the same function that it does in England. . . . [There] Baudelaire was the center of a noisy band of young men . . . [who] lounged about the Latin Quarter . . . drinking in the sordid underground bars. . . . The smoking of opium . . . was their newest and most daring vice. Little did Baudelaire realize at that time that, twenty years later, he would be bewailing his inability to break himself of the addiction.

Not that Mr. Painter would ever claim that exposure to an English university might have inoculated Proust against the form taken by his "need for eccentric self-expression." Nevertheless, his labeling as a "vice" what Proust called the "curse" of homosexuality reveals a preconceived moral attitude incompatible with the open-mindedness essential to a biographer. He seems to feel that a heterosexual youth would somehow have mitigated Proust's "sin." So in spite of the existence of an unpublished letter (Mr. Painter, mistakenly, I think, restricts himself to published sources), written when Proust was 16, describing in lyrical terms a homosexual experience, his biographer, writing about him in his mid-20s, says: ". . . he had often been in love with women; he could still regard himself as fundamentally normal. Now, once and for all, he must admit to himself that he was a homosexual. . . . He was a criminal. . . . Worst of all, he must now devote his life to an interminable effort to conceal his real nature from his mother. If he succeeded would he not crucify her daily with his deceit? If he failed would he not quite literally kill her?" (Again there is an unpublished letter that implies beyond doubt that Madame Proust was well aware of her son's tendencies and even tried to warn him against showing them.)

Mr. Painter's Freudian interpretation of these love-hate feelings is not new. However, as he presents the relationship, it is Marcel who, in spite of being a monstre sacré to his mother, bears the brunt of blame for their torturing love. Yet their correspondence certainly suggests that the mother, in her own sacred way, was also a monster. Mr. Painter's failure to admit Madame Proust's share in the emotionally burdened relationship suggests that his knowledge of French society is based on scholarship rather than experience. Otherwise he would be aware of the domineering power of the mother prevalent in most French bourgeois families even today. Indeed, calling to mind the mother troubles of the writers who at various times were important to Proust — Balzac, Baudelaire, Flaubert, not to mention Ruskin—one wonders whether certain illuminating analogies, which would reduce the significance of Proust's guilt, have not been ignored. Mr. Painter, however, uses his great gift as critic and explicator only at the rare intervals when he is not preoccupied with fitting keys into what is not, after all, a locked microcosm, but a world as rich in poetic description and metaphor, in analysis of the arts and of the phenomena of time and of memory, as in the development of personal relations. He is less interested in exploring the psychological parallels between Proust's peers in the macrocosm of art and of time than in tracing the chronology

---

Mina Curtiss is the author of Bizet and His World (Knopf), translator and editor of My Friend Degas by Daniel Halévy (Wesleyan University Press), and of Letters of Marcel Proust to be republished this year by Vintage.

of his contemporaries whose existence, once they are all dead, will be of as little importance to the reader of Remembrance of Things Past as the fact that characters in Anna Karenina and in War and Peace were, much to the Countess Tolstoy's annoyance, based on members of her family.

A critic's function is not, of course, to deplore a writer's failure in achieving an aim that he has not set himself. Yet I can't but feel that a further-reaching Freudian consideration of Balzac's early and enduring affairs with women his mother's age, Baudelaire's perpetual demands for money from his mother, Flaubert's attacks of false epilepsy as a young man, and Ruskin's impotence might have enabled Mr. Painter to regard Proust's deviations from normal or conventional behavior in the light of those of other great artists, rather than within the narrow bonds of sin.

From his obvious discomfort at the belief that Proust never experienced a physical relationship with a woman stems his attempt to prove that one existed. But what are the actual facts behind his statement that Proust "had often been in love with women"? At the age of 15 he underwent a typical adolescent infatuation for Marie Bernardaky whom he never saw after he was 16, but whom he described a few years before his death as "one of the two great loves" of his life. By that time, however, Gilberte had come alive in his imagination; was it not the composite flowering of this character in his novel whom he really loved? ("A book is a great cemetery in which one can no longer decipher the half-effaced names on most of the graves. . . . The young girl with the deep-set eyes and the indolent manner of speech, is she here? And if she does lie here, one no longer knows in what part and how can one find out under all the flowers?" The Past Recaptured.) In his 20s, according to his fellow student, Fernand Gregh, he and Mary Finaly "felt for one another a childish and reciprocated love." Childish was certainly not the word for the "affair" that he had in his 30s with Louisa de Mornand, to which Mr. Painter attributes such importance. For Louisa combined the career of an unsuccessful actress with that of a successful courtesan. She was the mistress successively of two of Proust's friends.

Mr. Painter's theory that the lovemaking between Proust and Louisa was, as he says, "carnal" (surely a word more evocative of St. Paul than of the belle époque) is based on his interpretation of Proust's letters to her as well as a most un-Ruskinian inscription in the presentation copy of his translation of The Bible of Amiens. But nowhere in his book does Mr. Painter take into account the chameleonlike quality inherent in all letter writers. Proust's letters, especially, "sustain," as Harry Levin has said, "the high pitch of effusiveness, the mannered tone of formality that Proust's friends characterized by inventing a verb: 'to Proustify.' Significantly, he cautioned one of them against showing a letter to another one because, he said, 'It's too honest to be sincere.' " To me, Proust's love letters to Mlle. de Mornand imply the acting out, in the Freudian sense, of a wishful illusion. At the time he wrote them he was enchanted at being the cherished member of a group of charming, handsome, young aristocrats, many of whose traits he incorporated in the character of Saint-Loup. All of them were passionately involved in affairs with women, one of them, indeed, with Louisa herself. So it seems not improbable that Proust took advantage of her availability for flirtation—not a "banal" one, nor "exclusive," as she noted twenty years later in writing of this "amitié amoureuse," in order to share as closely as possible the emotions and experiences of his new friends.

"Did Proust ever talk to you about Louisa de Mornand?" I recently asked Céleste Albaret, Proust's remarkable housekeeper who at 73, looking no older than 60, still retains a total recall of every word her master spoke. "He said she was stupid," Céleste replied, "and that he used to tease her." "Do you think he could ever have gone to bed with her?" "Tout est possible, Madame," was the answer. And indeed everything is possible, even that Proust lied when, shortly before his death, he told Gide that he had "never loved women other than spiritually." The complexity of the motivation for this lie, if it was a lie, is such that it would seem more logical to accept Proust's statement as true.

The relevant point, however, is Mr. Painter's pejorative judgment that because Proust made love to Louisa under his mother's roof, "he was at once proving his mother's love by . . . punishing her with more than a hint of sadism. . . . He was arranging for other women, almost before her eyes, to bring him the good-night kiss she had denied him at Auteuil." The various manifestations of Proust's sadism have long been recognized, but in this instance one is bound to wonder whether it may not have been directed against the intruder rather than against Madame Proust. How successful a love affair could have been carried on while, as Proust wrote Louisa immediately after his mother's death, "you [saw] me always all ears and heart, on watch at Mother's door, where I used any pretext to return and kiss her again and again"?

Sadism is unquestionably a vice, but when Mr. Painter speaks of the "twin vices of homosexuality and snobbism," one can only feel that his preoccupation with the mundane activities of the man, Marcel Proust, has made him ignore the point of view of the narrator, Marcel, thereby bringing in question his whole theory of the relationship between the man and the novelist. In Cities of the Plain, Proust and/or the narrator describes homosexuals as a > race upon [whom] a curse weighs and [who] must live amid falsehood and perjury, because [they] know that the world regards as punishable and scandalous, as inadmissible, [their] desire, that which constitutes for every human creature the greatest happiness in life . . . [a race] obliged to make a secret of their lives, to turn away their eyes

"Far and away the best interpretation...of the inner life of Dag Hammarskjöld"

DAG HAMMARSKJÖLD

A Spiritual Portrait

by Sven Stolpe

"Sven Stolpe, the well-known Swedish novelist...has sketched a sensitive and sympathetic portrait ... He refutes widely circulated misrepresentations and corrects puzzled misunderstandings with near-perfect perception...Stolpe's affectionate yet discerning exposition of his friend's spiritual struggles and triumphs is the most helpful aid to those who have found themselves baffled by the extraordinary book where they are revealed." —HENRY P. VAN DUSEN

$3.95 SCRIBNERS > from the things on which they would naturally fasten them . . . to change the gender of many of the words in their vocabulary, a social constraint, slight in comparison with the inward restraint which their vice, or what is improperly so called, imposes upon them with regard not so much to others as to themselves, and in such a way that to themselves it does not appear a vice.

Snobbism considered as a vice would, I think, have surprised Proust. It is "a serious malady of the spirit," he wrote, "but one that is localized and does not taint it as a whole." Although the antitoxin to Proust's variation of this ailment left him with a residuum of disillusionment that pervades a work in which only one character besides the narrator and the members of his family maintain their integrity throughout, Mr. Painter seems to believe that the snobbism of Proust's youth persisted throughout his life.

However, it is not the novelist but the biographer who at the end still sees the French artistocracy as Proust had in the beginning before they welcomed him into their world. "In their drawing-rooms," writes Mr. Painter, "flourished a gay elegance, a fantastic individuality, a chivalrous freedom, a living interplay of minds, morals and emotions. . . . It is our duty as twentieth-century barbarians to salute the ninteenth-century civilization which we have overwhelmed." To my mind, A la recherche du temps perdu is not a salute to a dead order, but to the mystery and magic of time and memory, to the triumph of will power and character in relation to the creation of a great work of art. Mr. Painter's romantic picture of le haut monde, as depicted in Proust's novel, is belied by the novelist's own words in his final volume:

> It is true that life, in bringing these people across my path had rerepeatedly presented them to me under special circumstances which, surrounding them completely, had hemmed in the view I had of them and thereby hindered me from knowing their true nature. Even these Guermantes, who had been the object of such a magnificent dream when I had first approached one of them, later appeared in my life . . . in the capacity of my grandmother's old friends. . . . It is true that it bored me to go to call on them as much as on the other society people I met later. Even in the case of the Duchesse de Guermantes . . . I felt her charm only from afar; it vanished when I came near her because it existed only in my memory and my imagination.

Not only was Proust in his later years bored with the actual people whom his imagination had, as he said, "translated" into the more than life-size inhabitants of the world he created, but the "malady of snobbism," if indeed for him it had ever been more than the embryonic entomological passion for collecting specimens, ceased to exist:

> One of my various selves, the one who used to go to those barbaric banquets called formal dinners, where for the men in evening dress and the semi-nude, feather-bedecked women values are so reversed that anyone who fails to come, after accepting the invitation . . . commits a more reprehensible act than the immoral conduct discussed so lightly in the course of the dinner . . . that self within me had abided by the rules of society and lost his memory. My other self, on the contrary, the one who had reached a clear conception of his task, had not forgotten.

It is this other self that Mr. Painter seems to me to neglect, inevitably, because of the initial flaw in his concept of literary biography, his non-Proustian concept of time, and his unquestioning acceptance of the validity of all of his sources.

In discussing his contribution to the recently published The Vinland Map and the Tartar Relation, Mr. Painter, Assistant Keeper of Books at the British Museum and "all-round medievalist," remarked: "I sometimes wonder which I am—an incunabulist or a Proustian. I wish there were two of me. . . . I've been a Proustian ever since boyhood—the other is a professional thing. . . . I think I'm more competent on it than I am on Proust."

It is not a question of alternative competence. Mr. Painter has with more than competent skill used the trained incunabulist's technique to project the image of the living Proust. It is simply a question of the wrong technique. These correspondents of Proust, these memorialists, on whose writings the biography is based, were many of them still alive when Mr. Painter initiated his project. In my own experience with them they contradicted one another and themselves. They admitted deleting any portions of Proust's letters that displeased them or seemed too intimate. They accused one another, in all honesty, of lying. They were, each in his own way, "too honest to be sincere" about anything except their devotion to Proust (there was only one who admitted disliking him or perhaps just envying his fame) as a genius and as a "good" man. Those were the reiterated and significant words. If Mr. Painter had taken advantage of their touching eagerness to welcome anyone who wished seriously to honor their great friend rather than relying on their carelessly edited correspondence, the documents assembled by frequently self-interested amateurs, he would not have succumbed to his romantic view of their reliability.

The contrast between the incunabulist's method as Proust's biographer and as historian, editor and translator of the Tartar Relation is highly relevant. To a reader ignorant of the Middle Ages, this account of the Franciscan mission sent in 1245 by Pope Innocent IV to the Mongols is as exciting and enriching as was the initiation of a Proustian to the master's long journey in search of time lost. The exotic fascination of the text of the Tartar Relation is immeasurably enhanced by Mr. Painter's editing. At home, as a medievalist, in the world of these indefatigably courageous monks and the legendary savages whom they visited, he has ignored no source of error, no possible lie, no mistake in copying, no textual variation, no clue to any legend. Confronted, however, with a society as unfamiliar, as exotic as Proust's Paris must have seemed to an intellectual young Englishman, his guards were down.

Lack of space precludes the discussion here of the varying reliability of Mr. Painter's sources, and it is not a subject that will disturb most readers. For if these two volumes are not the selections from

YEVGENY YEVTUSHENKO

The BRATSK Hydroelectric Station and other poems

First English translation published by

NEW WORLD REVIEW

monthly magazine specializing in East-West relations, cultural exchanges and peace

Free with 4-mo. trial sub. to N.W.R. $1.00

NEW WORLD REVIEW, Suite 308
156 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10010

I enclose $1 for 4-month trial sub.
Send me free copy as noted above.

Please print clearly.

Name ....

Address ....

City ....

State .... Zip No. ....

"definitive" biography the author set out to write, they do form a concordance to Proust's life and work, unique because by the brilliance of their composition they project an absorbing portrayal of an era and a society. This work is indispensable to Proustians. Readers who have never progressed further than Swann's Way can enjoy it as a Goncourt-style journal focused on one man. But will it lead them to read through to the final volume — The Past Recaptured — in which, Marcel, the narrator, achieves the goal that eluded Mr. Painter, the elucidation of "The workings of [Proust's] imagination at the very moment of creation"?

Entering the Age of Feiffer

THE TIN MEN. By Michael Frayn. Little, Brown & Co. 216 pp. $4.95.

Peter Buckman

We have reached the stage when almost anything passes for satire. The only workable divisions are between the "public" and the "private" practice of the art: the "private" covers the witty columns in English newspapers of veterans like Beachcomber and Paul Jennings, while the "public" is embodied in the Beyond the Fringe team, who combined the muscularity of the American masters with a pointilliste accuracy of mimicry. Their success engendered the English satirical wave, which swamped all divisions. The columnists, unchanged, found a new audience that did not discriminate between old-fashioned wit and the newly fashionable satire. The Fringe, which had built this insatiable following, had also captured the dedicated audience of the old Goon Shows, which brought the Absurd to an unsurpassed pitch of professionalism.

The Goons were the leading in-group of the fifties. They were not pegged as satirists and their humor was zany Perelman rather than Mort Sahl, with their plot to foil a German invasion by floating a cardboard replica of Great Britain in the English Channel and then pulling out the plug. They made everything ridiculous, which according to the dictionary is the true purpose of satire. And they built an audience of cognoscenti, of people who knew their private vocabulary, and who were conditioned to the outrageous. It was these people who raved over the Fringe.

That success resulted in the foundation of The Establishment, a satirical night club. Britain moved into the Feiffer Age, more than a little behind America. And Private Eye was founded, the first purely satirical magazine. Its staff was of the same cut as the Fringe: Oxbridge graduates, witty, left wing, fashionable. Designed to look like the product of amateurs, with its typewriter print and erratic layout, the magazine attracted distinguished wits such as Claud Cockburn and the egregious Malcolm Muggeridge. Peter Cook of the Fringe was for a long time on its editorial board, and its leading cartoonist, William Rushton, was a star of the B.B.C. show That Was The Week That Was. There were a lot of the same faces under different hats. The magazine thrived on the scabrous, the obscene, the send-up handled with quarter-staffs rather than rapiers. Its targets were mostly political, aimed with the scattered shot of a blunderbuss.

But in this "public" sector there was a curiously accelerated degeneration into banality. Inventiveness died so rapidly we hardly knew it was with us before we were bemoaning its passing. The Establishment went bankrupt (it continues under very different management). Lenny Bruce was not allowed to land. Two B.B.C. shows of straight satire went off the air. The third has frequent rests. Even Private Eye has found it impossible to continue being funny about the same things in the same way. Despite occasional bursts of popularity its circulation has steadily declined.

Meanwhile, back in the "private" sector, that of the columnists, little changed. The old hands remained unmoved by the wave. They are the still small voices, with their swollen audiences intact. Of a totally different stamp from the Fringers, they are mostly older and do not betray their origins. Their nearest American equivalent is perhaps Art Buchwald, only it's a gentler descant that they sing; their satire is rural rather than urbane.

Michael Frayn is a relatively new recruit to their ranks who came to fame while the wave was at its height. It was, and is, a private world he invented, with devotees who had to learn his language. Unlike the Goons he is rarely outrageously absurd. His characters are from local lore, minor government figures, suburban mothers, politicians. Idly reading an occasional column may result in total incomprehension: you have to know the rules. In common with his Sunday-paper colleagues, he is very much family reading; nothing obscene, nothing off-putting. This bland strain is very different from that of the "public" satirists, who have frequently caused offense.

Frayn qualifies for the satirical label because his pieces render recognizable characters and situations, once you've got the hang of it, ridiculous. His novel is very much a stringing together of pieces. It is ostensibly the story of the William Morris Institute of Automation, thrown into confusion by the impending visit of the Queen to open a new wing dedicated to the automation of Ethics. But the story, often hilarious, is only an excuse to satirize—there is no other word—various aspects of English society. Starting with a television magnate, Rothermere Vulgarian, we proceed through the various members of the institute who, intellectuals all, exemplify some weakness, some absurdity we can all recognize. It's farce from start to finish, without even a straight character against whom the weirdies can be compared. There is Rowe, for ex-

Peter Buckman spent three years in publishing, in London and New York, and has recently returned to England to write.

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ______

ADDRESS ______

CITY ______

STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

ample, who is writing a novel but cannot begin till he has completed his own reviews. There are several characters from stock, janitors and deprived and dessicated spinsters who would never survive the light of a Sunday column, but who are here brought in as filling. There is Macintosh, the head of the Ethics Department, trying to build a computer (called Samaritan) which will offer a coherent ethical behavior pattern under the purest form of the ethical situation: two people aboard a raft which will only support one of them:

> Samaritan II came back up to the gantry, winched by the crane. There was something about its visible dials and displays that struck Goldwasser.
>
> "Doesn't it look a bit sanctimonious to you?" he asked Macintosh.
>
> "Aye, it always does after it's gone over the side. It's a minor defect. We'll get it right in development."

It contains some marvelous flashes, notably the description of computerized journalism, based on the constancy of certain types of stories and the incomprehensible ambiguity of headlines—a random selection by computer from a small vocabulary will produce headlines as acceptably meaningless as those in any popular paper:

> 'STRIKE THREAT PLEA PROBE MOVE SHOCK HOPE.'
>
> 'MAYFAIR MAN IN SEX SHOW MIRACLE.'
>
> 'DO-IT-YOURSELF ENVOY IN SOCCER PROBE MARATHON.'

Yet the inventiveness which in Frayn's columns is sustained by not being overexposed does not support a novel. He succeeds in ridiculing a lot of not-so-sacred cows; but as they stand, comical nuggets barely connected by a thin tissue of incredible narrative, they fail to add up to anything substantial.

Among a satirical group, Frayn is almost alone in daring the novel form. Spike Milligan, an ex-Goon, has written one, subject to the same strain and unpublished in America. We are promised a novel from Jonathan Miller, but as with Tom Wolfe, there are many publishers who have had to stop holding their breath. Those "private" celebrants of the art who had a steady record before the satirical wave hit them have survived by conserving their strength. It was the sustained glare surrounding the "public" practitioners which brought them down. Being satirical takes heavy toll.

But then so does writing a novel. Mr. Frayn's columns will continue to delight his aficionados because there the limits of space and frequency are ideal for his talent. While almost anything will pass for satire, the same indulgence cannot be extended to the novel.

SUMMERLANE CAMP

in the tradition of

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

•

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

•

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

Malcolm Lowry: A Reminiscence

David Markson

Malcolm Lowry's novel, Under the Volcano, was recently reissued by Lippincott, along with an edition of Lowry's Letters. His two unpublished novels, Dark Is the Grave and October Ferry to Gabriola, will be brought out by New American Library in the fall of this year and in 1967.—The Editors

For seven or eight days, in the summer of 1952, I visited with Malcolm Lowry in the squatter's shack on the beach beyond Vancouver where he had written most of Under the Volcano. In September, 1954, while they were awaiting the departure of a freighter to Italy, he and his wife Margerie lived for two weeks in my New York apartment. The duration of both visits seems greater in retrospect, since time spent with Lowry was somehow concentrated, or distilled.

Speaking of Dylan Thomas, Lowry told me once: "You know, I never saw him when he wasn't drunk." I have to begin with the same qualification about Lowry. The man could not shave himself. In lieu of a belt, he knotted a rope or a discarded necktie around his waist. Mornings, he needed two or three ounces of gin in his orange juice if he was to steady his hand to eat the breakfast that would very likely prove his only meal of the day. Thereafter a diminishing yellow tint in the glass might belie for a time the fact that now he was drinking the gin neat, which he did for as many hours as it took him to collapse—sometimes sensible enough of his condition to lurch toward a bed, though more often he would crash down into a chair, and once it was across my phonograph. Then he would hack and sputter through the night like some great defective machine breaking apart.

Yet what one remembers is less the excess than Lowry's own attitude toward it, an incredible impression he conveyed that he could never take any of it quite seriously. He had an acute sense of his own dissolution, eternally chagrined at being a nuisance, apologizing hourly for small disasters, but what he sensed equally was the underlying absurdity in it all: the very idea, a grown man and that is the third burning cigarette I have misplaced tonight.

One afternoon in New York we had to leave him alone for a time, though safely within the apartment. Because a party was being given for him that evening, Margerie had done her best to establish what Lowry termed her "tyranny of five o'clock"—no hard liquor before then. What gin we possessed was hidden, and we left him with six or eight cans of beer. I returned first, about three hours later. Within moments, Lowry had commenced to giggle. Sheepish, but no less transparently gleeful, he glanced about furtively before he confessed: "I have a funny story to tell you, about something that happened when you were out." Something had happened, as opposed to being done. A day or two before, I had bought fresh shaving lotion. I did not ask what it had used to dilute itself.

One jokes because Lowry joked: this was mischief only. Though the mischief was somehow cosmic too, as if ordained. In his autobiographical narrative, Ushant, Conrad Aiken remembers a younger Lowry as "visibly and happily alight with genius," and the phrase means exactly what it says. Lowry looked like a genius; there was a gleam not within but behind the eyes that seemed to transcend any ordinary alertness or mirth. The notion will be more provocative if one recalls the Consul's "demons" in Under the Volcano — another surely autobiographical work — and how often those demons are "in possession." He had Scandinavian eyes, with a certain whiteness in the pigmentation of the lids which complemented that demonic glitter. But his upper teeth protruded slightly, suggesting a grin whether one was intended or not, making of him a roguishly improbable Faustus at best.

David Markson teaches English at Long Island University. His satirical novel, The Ballad of Dingus Magee (Bobbs-Merrill) is to be published shortly.

And he was really too "bookish" for the role, even if there was a distinct manner in which he cared far less about the written word than about the personality of the man who had put it down. A book became a kind of introduction, for Lowry, to the author personally. Voicing some insight or other, he might preface it thus: "As old Melville would say. . . ." What followed would be a notion that Melville (or whoever) had never anywhere expressed, but that only he among authors might have.

He chose his men, however: "You cannot trust the ones who are too careful. As writers or drinkers. Old Goethe cannot have been so good a man as Keats or Chatterton. Or Rimbaud. The ones that burn."

He delighted in repeating an anecdote about having known "a poet" of 17 or so, in London—"a wild boy who insisted he was already dying, smashing glasses after each drink, that sort of thing." Some years later, he had begun to admire the work of "one" Dylan Thomas, whom Margerie then met during a visit to England on her own. "And how is ruddy old Malc?" Dylan asked. Margerie was certain that Lowry did not know the man. Nor could Lowry himself make the connection until a new Thomas collection appeared with an Augustus John portrait as a frontispiece.

Then again his "familiars" were not necessarily always his peers. During one New York conversation, and after a lengthy pause on Lowry's part, the talk had been taken up again for some moments before he announced: "Incidentally, there was an owl perched outside there just now. You saw it, of course?"

An owl. On West 113th Street. Well, it was not impossible—though with Lowry there was also the question of what sort of owl. One morning when he was alone at the Dollarton shack, for example, a bird several times plummeted from a tree to crash against a window. The question to be asked at Margerie's return, for one with Lowry's occult orientation, was self-evident: "Is there mail? Someone is trying to get in touch with me." As Lowry related the incident, it was almost redundant that Margerie carried a letter from a total stranger, the last line of which read: "You have got to write to me." There would be a merriment in the telling, perhaps even a hint of self-mockery. Doubtless it sounds stagy; in reality, it was unsettling.

In any case such dimensions were more than appropriate to Lowry's talk which, again like the Consul's, was wholly remarkable, wholly implausible, if not to say so full of involution and subordinate phrases that even

"THE WRITER'S FUNCTION is not without arduous duties. BY DEFINITION, he cannot serve today those who make history; he must serve those who are subject to it . . . Whatever our personal frailties may be, the nobility of our calling will always be rooted in two commitments difficult to observe : refusal to lie about what we know and resistance to oppression."

Albert Camus (accepting the Nobel Prize for Literature, December 10, 1957)

A call to The American Conscience: A group of American writers, some of the best creative minds and spirits of our time, will gather together to bear witness to the viability of the American conscience.

Join with them at the READ-IN for PEACE IN VIETNAM

SUNDAY EVENING FEBRUARY 20 8:00 P. M.

THE FOLLOWING IS A PARTIAL LIST OF THE AUTHORS WHO WILL READ SELECTIONS FROM THEIR OWN WORKS :

Eric Bentley / Hortense Calisher / Alan Dugan / Jules Feiffer / William Gibson / Joseph Heller / Alfred Kazin / Galway Kinnell / Stanley Kunitz / Denise Levertov / Robert Lowell / Walter Lowenfels / Norman Mailer / Bernard Malamud / Lenore Marshall / Arthur Miller / Dwight MacDonald / Muriel Rukeyser / William Styron / Harvey Swados / George Tabori / Louis Untermeyer / Robert Penn Warren /

THE FOLLOWING IS A PARTIAL LIST OF THE ACTORS WHO WILL PARTICIPATE IN THE EVENING :

Ossie Davis / Ruby Dee / Viveca Lindfors / Elaine May / Tony Randall / Maureen Stapleton /

CHAIRMAN OF THE EVENING: Stanley Kauffmann /

TICKETS ARE AVAILABLE BY MAIL OR AT THE BOX-OFFICE OF TOWN HALL, 113 WEST 43RD STREET, NEW YORK, N Y 10036. PRICES : ORCH $10, 7, 5; LOGES, $7; BALCONY. $5, 2.50 (FEW STILL AVAILABLE). PLEASE ADDRESS MAIL TO READ-IN; MAKE CHECKS PAYABLE TO TOWN HALL AND ENCLOSE SELF-ADDRESSED STAMPED ENVELOPE. There will be no solicitation at the Read-In. The evening has been arranged by the Committee of the Professions, 224 West 4th Street, New York 10014, MO 3-9426 simple declarations were rarely completed: every owl reminded Lowry of twelve other owls. One afternoon, out with friends, he began an anecdote about a French hospital where, apparently, several kindly but ill-advised nuns had supplied him with liter after liter of red wine. The story was started at least eight times. But after digressions about everything from Manx fishing customs to the reading habits of James Joyce, it spiraled finally into absolute incoherence:

"Malc, will you for heaven's sake tell us what you are talking about?"

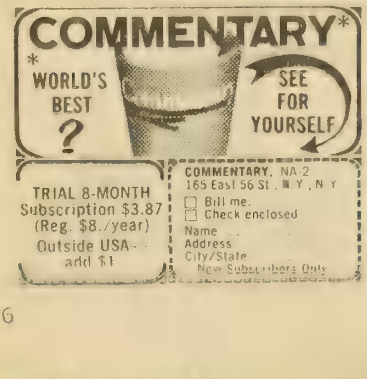
"Well, it's difficult. But you have to listen. It's . . . contrapuntal!"

The tale of the nuns was told, insofar as it was, in an exclusive East Side hotel, under circumstances themselves characteristic. Lowry was to meet his agent there at about noon. After various confusions he arrived at approximately 4, wearing baggy denim trousers, a boyish sports shirt without a necktie, and a zippered denim jacket. In fact, he was in the process of being turned away, until another member of our party was recognized by the doorman—though Viscount Peter Churchill's status at the hotel has presumably been in question since.

A point should be made that such situations did not occur because of the drink alone, though they had nothing to do with anything like Bohemian protest either; rather, there was a kind of naïveté in the man, and a considerable innocence. He had lived in isolation for so long, in Cuernavaca and in British Columbia, that he simply did not think about such things as neckties. In the Dollarton woods, where the Lowrys had neither electricity nor plumbing, an "appointment" meant a casual invitation to look in at the shanty of some fellow squatter 100 yards down a stony beach.

As it happens, Lowry and I did take a more "formal" excursion up there one day, or what began as such. The Dollarton house was situated on one of the deep-water Pacific inlets east of Vancouver Island. Somewhere to the south, though "just around the bend," was a town called Port Moody that Lowry decided we might inspect. In bathing trunks, carrying our clothes, we set out via dinghy: "Around the Horn to Valparaiso!"

The latter was more like it. After an hour investigating flora and fauna along the wooded shore line, we were next evidently in the great strait itself, banging about amid currents, inspecting the looming, rusted underbellies of freighters at anchor a mile or so from any docks, absurd though maybe intrepid too in our tiny craft. Four hours had elapsed before we made fast—to discover that we might venture no farther than to the first dockside tavern. Somehow, en route, Lowry had lost his pants over the side.



COMMENTARY*
*WORLD'S BEST?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
TRIAL 8-MONTH Subscription $3.87 (Reg. $8./year)
Outside USA—add $1
COMMENTARY, NA-2
165 East 56 St., N.Y., N.Y.
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed
Name
Address
City/State
New Subscribers Only

Undaunted, we had the required drinks. Yet even well into dark Lowry was reluctant to depart, though now what held him was a special flavor of the tavern itself—of the sea at its door and of men who followed the sea. More often than literature, or Mexico, the sea colored Lowry's talk, recollections of his one boyhood voyage as a coal trimmer, of other passages thereafter, and for all his removal from it now it lured him still. This stocky, clumsy, shy little man just turned 43, without a cent in his pockets, for that matter without pockets, appearing on the threshold and grinning ingenuously, yet timidly too, which was characteristic of him among strangers . . . and yet within a moment being grinned at in turn, his obvious joy infectious and winning. Men lifted their glasses, they called hello. There is a line in one of the stories: "The very sight of that old bastard makes me happy for five days. No bloody fooling." Long after recording it Lowry remained too pleased to admit he had overheard it being said about himself.

But at last, departure. Once Port Moody was behind us and the random lamps of the freighters at mooring had faded to port the darkness was absolute. "Now listen, Malc, do you recognize this inlet?" "Oh, it's near, it's near." He, himself, all but invisible in the stern, sprawling, dragging one arm or the other in our wake. "There are whales here now and then, have I told you?" Then, from somewhere in the mountains, the eerie "Zinnnng! Zinnnng!" of a sawmill running through the night. "Ha! There is old Kafka, leading his orchestra. He must have been a splendid fellow. Kafka. I prayed to him once, and he answered my prayer." It is well past midnight when we locate the solitary dim gleam in the distance. Still, we may be rowing an additional half-mile out of the way. But no, it is the shack; Margerie has left a kerosene lamp in the window. "Oh, I knew you chaps would have some adventure or other." To which, Odysseus: "I say, you do have the decency to offer us a drink?"

Up there in the wilderness, Lowry swam for half an hour or more each morning, whatever the weather. It may have saved him—certainly it postponed the inevitable. He was all chest, though in that athlete's way of going to fat where chest and stomach become one, and he had short arms that often seemed to flop about ineptly, like the appendages of some beached sea thing.

Yet he had been handsome and, as the photos show, with his beard the face expressed a kind of gravity and wisdom in the last days. But at this time he was weathered and turning fleshy. Interestingly, the older Errol Flynn, cast as the boozy Mike in The Sun Also Rises, took on a look very like Lowry's.

I have said there was something naive or ingenuous about him. On another level it was simply honesty: one was convinced he had never in his life been motivated by pettiness. But he was also able to talk about love, in an essentially masculine, platonic sense, without inviting accusations of mawkishness, or worse. A case in point involves Conrad Aiken, who had filled an in loco parentis role for him in his youth, and whom he had not seen for nineteen years before the New York visit.

Aiken was on Cape Cod when the Lowrys arrived, and Margerie sent a telegram. After two decades, and though he was 65 then himself, Aiken still knew his man. It was the poet who made the trip.

Unfortunately, his arrival coincided with the aforementioned party. For some years Aiken has maintained a walk-up in the East 30s, and we went there first. Lowry was still in fair shape outwardly, the after-shave "bracer" to the contrary. (He had this faculty: musing, perplexed by unmentioned private visions, he could be teetering at the edge of the abyss and for a time not seem drunk at all, merely abstracted. Eventually, of course, he would come back to reality like a bridge collapsing.) At Aiken's, the fare is martinis. Lowry had been elated for days over the prospect of seeing the man again, but here too he was initially shy, and there were false starts. In rough form at the moment was a novel, October Ferry to Gabriola, the most nearly finished of the several to be left at his death. For some minutes Lowry endeavored to summarize a nonexistent plot, after which: "Well, nothing happens. Nothing should, in a novel." Whereupon Aiken, whose Blue Voyage Lowry readily acknowledged as the critical influence on his own concept of fictional subjectivity: "No. No incidents."

Lowry also talked a good deal about his condition, laying it in part to his pain at having to leave Dollarton, where the squatters faced eviction. "I have to slide through this time of crisis on my unconscious," he repeated more than once. During the conversation he was beset by the shakes, and discussed this also. (Shortly after his arrival in New York, having to sign a paper before a notary, he was unable to write his name. Three martinis effected a remedy, though he spilled the first and the second had to be held for him.)

Margerie had gotten him into a tie and jacket for the evening, and I had shaved him, so at the party itself his appearance again may have been briefly deceptive. Present were his friends James Agee and James Stern, his editors Frank Taylor and Albert Erskine, and two or three wives. The night was exceptionally hot; Agee, apparently already ill himself, stood through most of it in a pool of sweat that had literally dripped from his chin to the floor. Almost at once, Lowry drifted into a kind of rapt silence, likewise sweating profusely, gazing at nothing; perhaps an hour passed in which he spoke to no one at all, nor did he move from his chair. Then, suddenly, cupping his hands to his mouth, he began to make sounds that can only be called "beeps"—though one who knew could infer jazz, and more specifically tunes associated with Bix Beiderbecke: Singin' the Blues; I'm Comin', Virginia; In a Mist. For thirty minutes at least, even more absolutely lost to the rest of us now, the man rendered the Dixieland he had loved as a youth. ("I learned to write listening to Beiderbecke," he had remarked in Dollarton. He owned an ancient, hand-cranked phonograph, and a collection of scarred recordings to which he could listen for hours. "Oh, what pure art!" he might cry, or, "Ah, the discipline!" Amid the New York baggage was a ukulele, but with strings missing.)

The private recital ceased only when Aiken announced his departure: "Good night, disgrace." Then, however, Lowry insisted upon seeing him home—this with no idea where Aiken was headed and, chances were, with no money in his possession either, since Margerie normally handled all cash. In the street, in jest but in sadness, Aiken had to wrestle him off as a taxi drew up. Breaking Lowry's hold, the older man tumbled to the floor as the vehicle took him away.

Those next moments, gazing into the empty street where only now a small rain, like a mist, had begun to fall, Lowry could not have appeared more sober. "He is an old man," he said. "And now I will never see him again." He was right, if for a wrong reason; and for a time he wept.

By morning, the twinkle had returned. Aiken had spoken of a 9 o'clock train, and Lowry did not begin to function until well past that hour, but he insisted upon seeing the poet off. "After all, he is my father, and I haven't seen him in fifty-eight years. How can you keep me from him?" And again: "Of course, I would have gone to Massachusetts myself if I had to, even on all fours." In the end he settled for a telegram: Was on deck 7 a.m. to see you off Wednesday but was offset by hurricane am going to encounter Monday afternoon off Cape Hatteras. . .. (There was, in fact, a hurricane along the coast that week, called "Edna," which Lowry talked about incessantly and which he insisted he had "invoked.")

At the same time he was able to regret what he determined had been "rudeness" at the party, apologizing too for the mounting havoc in my own apartment—glasses broken, books and bottles and half-smoked cigarettes scattered everywhere, if not to mention the sheaf of manuscript poems reposing for days now beneath the kitchen sink—or the blood that had mysteriously appeared on his blanket.

Similarly, whenever we were out together, always the generous impulse: "Here, here, let me pay." Then the hand at the pocket, the sigh of frustration. "Well, later, Margerie has money." Neither would he forget, ultimately demanding that she contribute $10 or $20—"my share, at least"—on an accounting that had come to infinitely less.

They were to sail, via an Italian line, from Brooklyn—on a ship he gleefully proclaimed was certain to carry high explosives.

En route to the docks, he was much taken by the Brooklyn Bridge, and he was "almost tempted" to revise a judgment on Hart Crane (he felt the bridge a static symbol). Loyally, he remembered to remind me that I must read both Stern and Agee, as well as Aiken's Great Circle—"Though I did not write that. The one I wrote in another life was Blue Voyage." And throughout the drive he repeated a line, in a spurious Mississippi accent, that he attributed to Faulkner: "Ah can stand anything. Ain't nothing wrong with me that a good bour-bon won't cure."

In fact he stood the first few hours well. At breakfast the shakes had been extreme, but he had acknowledged without argument that a shave was necessary. The sailing was to be seven or eight hours delayed, however, by which time he was semi-conscious in his bunk.

"I must see the skipper. If he is not a company man, this will be a happy ship." Meanwhile he impressed upon Margerie the urgency of tipping the steward at once. "Italian ships have holds full of Chianti."

Then, final words which will perhaps be allowed in a reminiscence of this sort: "I'm a pretty bad man, but you should really come to Sicily with us. We love you, you know, but not so that you have to shove a cork up your arse, old man."

Three years and intermittent letters later, the cablegram: Malcolm Suddenly Dead—Margerie.

And vale, since he eludes one's poor words anyway. One was convinced that the demons were real. But what one remembers, in the end, is the innocence withal, the mirth, the sheer abundance.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 2-7-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

LETTERS

(Continued from inside cover)

grim. Further, through a clever placing of sentences, Mr. Eastlake implies that the "many" Indian tribes which supported the Puritans' war against the Pequots is about the same as the "many" Vietnamese who are supporting us today in Asia, whereas in fact about 90 per cent of the Indians of New England supported the Puritans in 1637. . . . Mr. Eastlake also would have us believe, in defiance of all available testimony, that Puritan land law conflicted with Indian land law: and he advances a curious concept of moral responsibility in dubbing as a "gadget" of the Pilgrims a host of communicable diseases that the 17th-century colonists conceived as their own most bitter and incomprehensible enemies. In final desperation Mr. Eastlake conjures up an invidious and thoroughly inappropriate trope about Governor Winthrop and tosses in an ad captandum vulgus reference to Indian fornication. This is competent reviewing? . . . Alden T. Vaughan

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

Highlighting Creativeness—MIDWESTERN ART REVIEWS, Box 947, Chicago, 60690. Trial subscription $3.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS – Economical, insured moving and storage Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC) 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709

PERSONALS

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

PART-TIME SALESMAN—Office Snack Bar. College student preferred. Hours flexible. Call Paul, 212 - HA 8-6504 after 7 PM, or write Box 581, c/o The Nation.

INTERESTED IN FUNERAL REFORM?

WHAT ARE NEEDS AT THE TIME OF DEATH?

Consider membership in a memorial society.

For dependable information, write

CONTINENTAL ASSOCIATION
Room 400 N, 59 East Van Buren St.
Chicago, Illinois 60605

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Garbage

Brooklyn, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: While watching the late news this evening, I was presented with two sharply contrasting messages, which I offer without comment other than that a new type of subliminal doublethink seems to be with us.

Resonant Harry Reasoner, on C.B.S., read without so much as ironic intonation the following paraphrased article: In the Dominican Republic today, students dumped trash cans at the entrances to streets, with the result that garbage was strewn along the gutters. A U.S. paratrooper ordered one youth to pick up the garbage, the youth protested, argument ensued, and the paratrooper killed the youth with a shotgun.

Not a second after the last word of the bulletin, a young girl in maid's costume flies into the living room of a troubled woman with a new product of impliedly magical potential that will leave her hands in perfect shape and appearance for playing the piano at a party. Stephen Gillers

Aid for the obsolete

Lexington, Va.

Dear Sirs: I was shocked to learn of the sad plight of many Negro sharecroppers in Mississippi described by Robert G. Sherrill in "The Obsolete Negro" [The Nation, Jan. 17]. I am a senior at Washington and Lee University and have spoken to several professors and fellow students about this matter. We feel that we should make an attempt to provide clothing and whatever else we can collect for these less fortunate citizens. Would you please send me more detailed information concerning the number, location and needs of those who have been treated in the manner described by Mr. Sherrill? Roger S. Sennott

Information can be obtained from, and contributions sent to, The Delta Mission, National Council of Churches, 475 Riverside Drive, New York, N. Y. 10027. The Editors

Good-will tour

West Haven, Conn.

Dear Sirs: Congratulations on the superb work you are doing in The Nation. Your editorial "The Message" on Vietnam in the issue of Jan. 24 hit the nail on the head. We could have peace there any time that we were willing to abide by the Geneva Agreements of 1954. The North Vietnam Government has made this offer.

We want to invite all your readers to join our Interracial Goodwill Seminar this coming summer, visiting Denmark, Sweden, the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, France and England. Write Promoting Enduring Peace, 489 Ocean Ave., West Haven, Conn. We see top government leaders everywhere and on a previous trip saw Khrushchev for three hours in the Kremlin. Jerome Davis

Gullible Hanoi

New Rochelle, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: I wonder why, during this time of the Vietnam crisis, the parallelism of protest with the Northern "peace movements" during our own Civil War has not been discussed in your pages. . . . The peace movement of the early 1860s demanded negotiations with the South, demonstrated to remove government troops, wrote countless newspaper articles and pamphlets, held mass meetings and even had barn burnings. (Much bigger than draft cards.) . . . But the most important parallel was the great damage that our Northern peacemakers then, and our present protesters now, had and have in confusing the reality judgments of the enemy. North Vietnam today believes that a vast peace movement is sweeping the United States and all they need do is wait it out until our troops are withdrawn by popular demand. Jefferson Davis, too, was conned into believing that the Northern desire for peace would drive Lincoln from his office. . . .

The Copperheads, as they were so descriptively called, helped both to prolong the Civil War and cause much extra damage. How much more true is it today with our highly publicized "get out of Vietnam" movement?

Lee Oscar Bloomgarden

Suppression

State College, Pa.

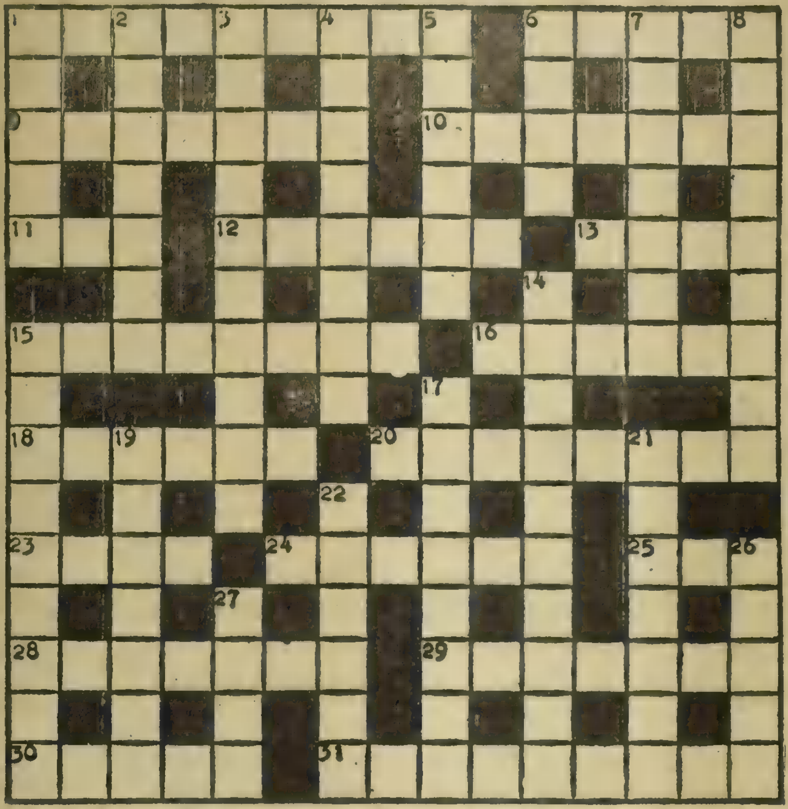
Dear Sirs: The Portuguese Society of Writers, suppressed suddenly in May under violent circumstances, has appealed to the courts. The appeal is to be heard now that the elections to the National Assembly are out of the way.

The Portuguese Government called the society unpatriotic for giving its prize to an Angolan writer convicted of terrorism. In its appeal (which the Portuguese press could not publish and which our own "free" press apparently failed to report), the society maintains that (1) the jury which attributed the prize was autonomous and acted on literary merits; (2) the novel which received the prize had already been given three prizes in Angola proper, one of them after the author's jailing; (3) the author was not condemned to fourteen years' detention for any activities but for what he allegedly told a co-defendant during a conversation; and (4) the attribution of the prize was a pretext for suppressing the independent society. . . .

Publicizing the reason for the suppression may be the only way to move the Portuguese Government now to rescind an action that cannot but damage its reputation abroad. G. M. Moser

Crossword Puzzle No. 1139

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Novel description of such people as 17? (6, 3)
6 See 11 across
9 Money belonging to the organization, by implication? (7)
10 Those who glide might look for one to kite a money order? (2-5)
11, 12, 6 across and 15 down Might this cause a buzzing in your radio? (3, 6, 2, 3, 9)
13 March out like this if the entrance is a little sheepish? (4)
15 Old reprobates might try to be in playful raillery. (8)
16 and 29 How you might consider the grade if tired of remarks fixing future responsibility. (3, 3, 2, 2, 3)
18 Mr. Hale sounds more of a German artist than a musician! (6)
20 Down? Say a different word for the present. (8)
23 An absence of resinous material, by the sound of it. (4)
24 The wrong color label to apply to Hitler's jumping-off time. (3, 3)
25 With a core, such a robe would seem fishy. (3)
28 A false boast in the matter of defense? (7)
29 See 16 across.
30 Wined and tipsy, like Mr. Drood. (5)
31 and 26 down His study of Arachnida reputedly contributed to a rule well-remembered by some. (6, 3, 5)

DOWN:

1 Not heavy in the beam. (5)
2 Where one might find a rattle in the last of the line. (4-3)
3 It might be a pointer for a woman of class, but a little spongy. (10)
4 Signs to spoil such as a 31-26. (8)
5 Nothing with which to mix up a hat and a gun! (6)
6 They can be long on light horses, too. (4)
7 One might have found her ruling a strain. (7)
8 The sort of net fishes find complicates things. (9)
14 This garter is crooked, so make it less so. (10)
15 See 11 across
17 General attraction — at least so designated by Barnum. (3, 5)
19 It might be cutting humor of a poor writer. (7)
21 He may have a breakdown connected with his work. (7)
22 Maybe only a point for the less obese. (6)
26 See 31 across
27 One's manner sounds rather nasty. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1138

ACROSS: 1 Savings stamps; 9 Icing; 10 Pompadour; 11 Nightly; 12 Equates; 13 Nooks; 14 Tribesman; 16 Wayfaring; 18 Get-up; 19 Enacted; 21 Another; 22 Legendary; 23 Glove; 24 Numbers racket. DOWN: 1 Spinning wheels; 2 Vainglory; 3 Negates; 4 Sepoy; 5 Timbering; 7 and 6 Short measure; 8 Present perfect; 14 Third base; 15 Matchlock; 17 Antonym; 18 Georgia; 20 Argon; 21 Abyss.

PUBLICATIONS

Fun to Read!

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on the World Council of Churches and the Vatican to jointly promote religious liberty, racial justice, a solution of the alcohol and poverty problems, marriage rights for priests and nuns, Christ-worship for all non-Christians, and World Democracy, and to sponsor an endless line of Symbolical World Presidents until the world is transformed.

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2 — 50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

WHAT did Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society, really say? Send $2.00 for your postpaid copy of "The Politician." Ampel, 502 Park Avenue, N.Y.C. 10022

A NEW UNDERSTANDING

FREE. Send for "THE REIGN OF CONSCIENCE" by Ralph Norman Waldman. 22-page treatise. Independently published in faith of aiding moral purpose. Outlines events leading to world undivided by property and rank. Views resultant humanization of man as prelude to Kingdom of God. Meaning of God restated in humanistic-psychological terms. Advent of Kingdom predicted through a transvaluation of the value basis, from money-status to conscientiousness. Offers new understanding, not doctrine of social protest. Limited edition.

Please request your free copy now.
No obligation.

RALPH NORMAN WALDMAN
Box 4519, Grand Central Station
New York, N. Y. 10017

"COSMOPOLITAN CONTACT" — polyglot magazine for international friendship, correspondence, trade, exchange, travel. Sample 35c. Post Office Box 29117, Hollywood, Calif. 90029

"AESTHETICS OF LOWELL" by Charles J. Zaroulis, Esq., pending. Inquire: Press Relations, 52 Boylston, Cambridge, Mass.

THE DELANO GRAPE STRIKE
(See THE NATION, page 151)
"HUELGA" by Eugene Nelson
The fully documented and action packed account of the greatest attempt since the 1930's by farm workers to organize and win decent wages. 180 pp., dozens of photos, $1.50 FARM WORKER PRESS, P.O. Box 1060, Delano, California.

MUSIC

A LOVE AFFAIR WITH THE PIANO! Master lessons, through correspondence. 33 years experience. Beginners. Rusty intermediates. Age no barrier. Cameo Studio, 25C Cameo Road, Levittown, Pa. 19057

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

nizing the National Liberation Front. However, the pause had another effect that the President did not relish. Those members of Congress who had grave doubts about the whole Administration policy in Asia were encouraged by the lull to voice their misgivings. The persona non grata Senator Fulbright, as well as Senators Mansfield, Aiken, Cooper and others, made public their opposition to further bombing, and fifteen Senators wrote the President to ask that he listen to their views before ending the lull. The dominoes were falling and Mr. Johnson acted. He curtly pointed out to the fifteen that they had given him a blank check, so to speak, at the time of the Gulf of Tonkin incident, and if they had forgotten it, he had not.

Nevertheless, while resuming the punishment of Hanoi, he kept the peace offensive going by instructing Ambassador Goldberg to appeal to the Security Council. Thus Hanoi was further damned by its rejection of UN mediation, on top of its iniquitous utilization of the lull in the bombing to repair its bridges and rail sidings. In the New York Herald Tribune Roscoe Drummond hailed the result: "Resumption of Bombing Seen Unifying the Country." Such is Mr. Johnson's desire, but the reasoning is of a piece with the theory that bombing the North would pacify Vietnam. It will bring not unity, but the appearance of unity, with disunity festering underneath. Opposition will increasingly be equated with treason. It will take clear heads and stout hearts to continue openly to condemn American policy in Asia, and that variety of courage is never in long supply in any country or under any system of government.

In that respect, democracy is perhaps in no better case than totalitarianism. An incipiently totalitarian version of democracy, based on public relations, is in fact developing in the United States. In The New York Times James Reston writes: "Something important has happened in America since Woodrow Wilson went to his grave believing that the President of the United States was paralyzed in the foreign affairs field by the overwhelming power of the Congress and public opinion." Public opinion, and thereby to a considerable extent the Congress, is controlled by the President through the mass media, and so effective is his control that he can contradict himself at will. Reston ticks off an appalling list of items on which Mr. Johnson has ended up by doing what he had vowed publicly not to do, the bombing of North Vietnam being only one instance. Under these conditions unity is a laugh, and not a merry one.

The Plutonium Keg

Joe Alex Morris, Jr., covers the Middle East for the Los Angeles Times and other papers from his base at Beirut. His long article in the January 16 Times, "Arab D-Day Closer Despite Safeguards," should arouse concern in the State Department and the White House. The fact is that the safeguards may soon exist more in fancy than in fact, and the danger of war in the Middle East is steadily increasing. Moreover, the possibility that such a war might be fought with nuclear weapons cannot be ruled out. Initially, a full-scale nuclear exchange between the U.S. and the USSR seems less likely than an outburst at the Hiroshima level between smaller powers. Where such a "small" conflict, with only a few hundred thousand victims, would eventually lead is of course anyone's guess.

The basic threat in the Middle East is that the Arab countries consider themselves permanently at war with Israel and periodically reiterate their determination to drive the 2 million Israelis "into the sea." And there are 85 million Arabs in the region to make the deed fit the words. The obstacles have been lack of unity among the Arab states, the exceptionally high quality of the Israeli armed forces, the technological backwardness of the Arabs in contrast to Israeli progressiveness (aided by private sources in the United States) and, most important, the presence of the U.S. Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean.

Slowly but surely these safeguards are being eroded. The least affected, for the present, is the fleet but, with a major U.S.-China conflict looming in the Far East, no nation in the Near East, or in Europe for that matter, can be confident that the American shield will be held over it indefinitely. As for the happy circumstance of mutual dislikes among the Arab rulers, unfortunately these are gradually being subordinated to the religious and political hatred of the Arabs for their Semitic brethren. A United Arab Command has been formed and apparently this time it is not merely on paper. At the same time, the arms situation in the area is in a state of flux. The United States and its NATO allies have been supplying both sides (see editorial, "Kuss of Death," January 24) while the Soviet Union has been arms supplier to the Arab states, except for Lebanon and Jordan, which have preferred to rely on the West. But this may change. Schedules for rearming the key states surrounding Israel have been set by the Arab high command, and if Lebanon and Jordan cannot meet the deadlines from their regular sources, they are obligated to contract for Soviet equipment instead.

Of course the Arabs are plagued by the centrifugal tendencies common to all allies, plus some special ones of their own, but they appear to be making progress toward the goal of a coordinated military force of more than half a million, armed and equipped on a par with the Israeli forces. The Israelis can hardly be expected to view this prospect with equanimity. They have denied any intention of making nuclear weapons. Such denials are of course pro forma. In the back of every responsible Israeli head there must be the thought that if worst comes to worst, the output of the atomic reactor at Dimona could produce enough plutonium to make a few "small" nuclear weapons a year, and since the ranges are short, these weapons could be delivered quite accurately.

Against this developing insanity, one may set the appeal of Israel's foreign minister, Abba Eban, for Tashkent-type negotiations between his country and the Arab powers "either directly or with the help of a major power." He knows, of course, that two major powers would be required—the United States and the Soviet Union. After the success of the Soviet mediation between India and Pakistan nothing can be ruled out, but it is clear that enormous pressures would be required to induce the Arabs to relinquish their avowed intention to complete, so far as lies within their power, the task of extermination that Hitler began. As for collaboration between the U.S. and USSR in the cause of peace, one need only look at Vietnam to realize how remote it is. Here we see once more the infinite capacity for mischief, and the formidable obstacles against a relaxation of tensions, raised by the American insistence on policing the world.

The View from Jakarta

Something ought to be said about our response to the Indonesian crisis—not so much Washington's reaction, which has been quiet and (one hopes) cautious, but the public reaction. For it is another indication of a lack of sophistication about the world that continues to burden us as a nation. For one thing, our press has by and large ignored the massacre which followed the October coup. Some reports indicate that 200,000 may have already died at the hands of Islamic and other groups on a vindictive rampage against Communists in Java, Sumatra, Celebes and elsewhere; no one in Jakarta seems to be able to control this situation, which will leave behind a terrible and long-lasting bitterness in Indonesian society. In the light of this slaughter, simple humanitarian impulses ought to move us to say something more than "things are looking up for the West in Southeast Asia."

Second is our notion of the foreign-policy alternatives other states enjoy. We had assumed, with a touch of hysteria, that Indonesia was going Communist and therefore was necessarily against America; when the country went more or less military and anti-Communist instead, Indonesians should automatically have become pro-America. The present balance of American and Chinese power in Asia lends some truth to that proposition, but it is limited to what Indonesians perceive as being in their own interest and does not preclude a continuing hostility to other aspects of the American presence in Southeast Asia. Sukarno's recent expelling of American reporters who wrote that he was weak can be understood in terms of the power and personal relationships of Jakarta politics. But why has Indonesian opposition to anti-Communist Malaysia not yet publicly abated? And why does the army press—our friends—continue to display anti-imperialism slogans directed against Britain and the United States (as well as China now), to inveigh against foreign bases in Southeast Asia, and to condemn the American effort in Vietnam? Of course the ideological momentum of the last several years will not fade immediately, but still more it may be that army officers and other leaders, despite a shared interest with the United States in containing China, also fear American checks upon Indonesia's freedom of action. They remember American aid to a rebellion against Jakarta in 1958 and quite possibly harbor deep resentment of any white intervention in Southeast Asian affairs. Whatever the exact reasons for the Indonesian failure to fulfill our expectations, it seems that the world is divided in a more complicated way than into two halves; Indonesians have their own peculiar view of international affairs which places Indonesia, not the United States or the USSR or China, at the center of history. We are taking a very long time to understand this elementary point.

Banned from Valhalla

Although it was unseemly of Attorney General Katzenbach to gallop up to the edge of the grave, as it were, waving his spuriously reasoned 7-page opinion, still it was most fitting to have the ashes of Robert G. Thompson refused burial in Arlington Cemetery. Arlington, after all, is the ultimate accolade to the military mind—the Valhalla of the easy answer. If a man does his hitch and afterward avoids a federal prison sentence of more than five years, he is as eligible for burial in Arlington as he would have been if he had died in battle. It does not matter if he flaked off as a soldier, was a black-hearted dead beat and fake as a civilian; he served, and stayed out of prison, and therefore he was a hero. The subtleties of the military mind extend to only two slots: here is the friend, there is the foe.

Thompson's life, on the contrary, was another complex patch on the crazy quilt of modern politics. He believed in the United States; he believed in communism. He fought for the leftists in the Spanish Civil War; he fought for this country, and won a Distinguished Service Cross, the second highest honor that can be awarded a fighter. In the late 1940s and early 1950s he went down under the wave of McCarthyian foam, convicted as a subversive; he tried to dodge prison by jumping bail but he didn't make it. A brave, defiant, blighted life.

It is also fitting that the Congressman most responsible for getting the Attorney General and the Defense Department to keep Thompson's offensive ashes out of Arlington was Charles Bennett of Florida. Bennett's career has been mainly distinguished by his efforts to prevent the federal government from making Ed Ball, caretaker of the Florida DuPont holdings, toe the line (see "Florida's Railroad War" by Robert G. Sherrill, The Nation, March 9, 1964), and by his suggestion to take all the boys out of the job corps and put them to something "useful" in the Army.

Of him it can be said — as Senator Clark recently remarked of Russell Long's views on Vietnam — that his mind paddles along at the level of "grade school questions" and, when it must make a choice, inevitably does so between two primitive alternatives. That a man of this sort could persuade Katzenbach and the Defense Department to go along with him is, if one looks around at what is happening elsewhere in the nation and the world, not really too surprising.

Strike at St. John's

Why the Professors Picket . . .

Maurice R. Berube

With the rise of mass education, the question emerges of whether the college professor may not best protect his profession through the medium of unions. The current strike at St. John's University in New York City places that question in sharp and controversial focus.

Since the early 1950s, college enrollments have nearly tripled to an estimated 5.5 million for 1965, and the ranks of college teachers have doubled in the same period. Caught in the flood of unprecedented college expansion, the professor often finds himself in the role of hired hand. A widening gulf between teachers and boards of trustees increases his feeling of impotence, and the publish-or-perish doctrine is a symptom that the academician is becoming a cog in a giant educational industry.

Nowhere has all this been more apparent than at St. John's. Its rapid expansion in less than a decade from a small parochial university, owned and managed by the priests of the Congregation of the Mission, the Vincentian fathers, into the largest Catholic university in the United States is a prime example of the burgeoning college establishment. The composition of the faculty shifted in that period from Vincentian teachers to a predominantly lay staff.

The university's structure began to assume striking parallels with a business corporation, with decision making firmly implanted in a managerial administration. For some of St. John's lay teachers the net effect was that of manning classroom assembly lines. Statutes of the university created a board of trustees two-thirds of whom were to be Vincentians. In the academic senate where the professor might expect to have a voice in the determination of professional matters, he was hopelessly outnumbered: only one teacher representative was seated from each of the university's seven schools, as against sixteen members appointed by the university administration. On the departmental level, matters were no better. Departmental chairmen were nominated by the school deans and appointed by the board of trustees. Bernard Malamud's hero of A New Life, hoping his colleagues would "elect him head of the department," could not have been conceived of at St. John's.

Recent university presidents have approached faculty-administration relations with an air of priestly paternalism. The Very Rev. Father Edward Burke, in an interview with a student reporter, invoked paternalism: the president, as father, is absolutely responsible for the well-being of the family and all authority is in the top administrators of the university."

Father Joseph Cahill, his successor, did not depart radically from this idea of a university. "If you sit down and explain things," he was quoted in the press, "most people will be reasonable."

The result has been a two-year running battle between faculty and administration. The spur has been the United Federation of College Teachers, a local union of the American Federation of Teachers. Although never officially recognized by the university administration, its mere formation produced an immediate reaction. St. John's administrators, having previously ignored a reactivated chapter of the American Association of University Professors, proceeded to meet with the AAUP group. Many of the teachers instrumental in reconstituting the AAUP on campus had also founded the union chapter.

Faculty discontent, once given a means of expression, escalated from a concern with a pension and insurance plan to a desire for greater freedom in the teaching process. Faculty rebellion erupted at a faculty meeting last March. The immediate cause had been the failure to implement a pension and insurance plan promised by President Burke. Dr. Andrew Robinson, AAUP chapter president, distributed copies of the university's budget for 1964-1965 (never before released by the administration), which showed a $2,500,000 surplus. For a staff with the lowest salary scale of the ten largest Catholic universities, this was insult as well as deprivation. Two hundred of the faculty walked out of the meeting.

St. John's troubles were not confined to a disgruntled faculty. Students followed the faculty example two days later with their own demonstration. Their protest centered on a demand for greater flexibility in selection of invited speakers and the recognition of student clubs. Students for a Democratic Society had been denied campus status. Speakers were blue-penciled on the ground of being controversial, a policy that attained absurdity when Bishop Fulton J. Sheen, the television priest watched by millions a decade ago, was found unduly controversial. Commencement speakers have included Russell Kirk, a noted conservative, and Claire Booth Luce, a Goldwater supporter. The Vincentian definition of controversy left much to be desired.

In the spring, the AAUP and the UFCT became uneasy partners in revolt. Four main objectives were proposed: a 25 per cent wage increase to remove the AAUP "D" salary rating from the university; an elected faculty senate; election of departmental chairmen, and studies on reorganization to be adopted by vote of the faculty.

St. John's administration moved in two directions to "explain things" to the faculty. On reorganization, it called in Dr. John Meng, president of Hunter, to aid in directing a self-study in several unit investigations. Its unilaterally appointed "mediator," Rev. Joseph Tinnelly, C.M., was to oversee the study. On teacher compensation, it proposed a token increase in pay, a free major medical plan and a group life insurance plan. This latter offer was rejected by the faculty with a resolution to demand around-the-clock bargaining through the AAUP at its next scheduled meeting with Father Burke. The AAUP never presented the resolution.

A moratorium ensued in the hope that the studies, staffed by faculty-elected representatives to a Faculty Planning Council, would resolve the impasse. Eight committees worked through the summer and prepared recommendations on every aspect of the university, from academic freedom to university objectives. In August, the council adjourned indefinitely after interpreting the unilateral appointment of the chairman of the Philosophy Department as a gesture of bad faith. Later attempts to reconvene were thwarted by Father Tinnelly, who claimed that the council had technically dissolved itself and was no longer functioning. Throughout the early fall, the faculty maintained a drumbeat of demands that the university implement some of the council's completed proposals.

---

Maurice R. Berube is assistant editor of The United Teacher and formerly editor of The Labor Leader, published by the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists.

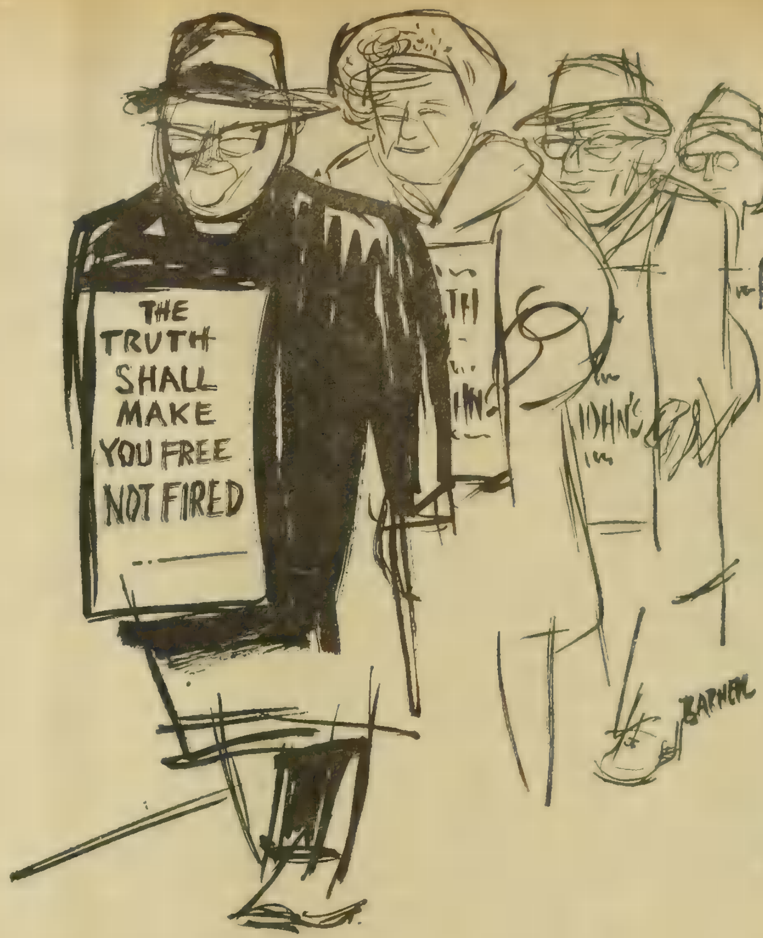
In December, the university resorted to radical surgery. Thirty-one teachers were given summary written notice of termination of their faculty status, without benefit of hearings. Four were chairmen of the eight Faculty Planning Council committees, those on academic freedom, university objectives, curriculum and student affairs. Twenty were members of the union and two of these were non-Vincentian priests: Father Peter O'Reilly, a Thomist scholar serving as chairman of the UFCT chapter, and Monsignor John Clancy, a former member of the Vatican Secretariat of State and biographer of Pope Paul. According to the university the thirty-one were dismissed for such "unprofessional conduct" as "unauthorized demonstrations" and a "continuing effort to impugn the credibility of the Vincentian community."

After this amputation, the university revealed part of its plan for reform. This initially included the establishment of a university senate, composed of eighteen administrators and thirty-two representatives from the faculty; at the same time, approval was given in principle to the 1940 AAUP "Statement on Academic Freedom and Tenure," and to a revision of the mechanics of tenure.



THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE NOT FIRED
JOHN'S

The St. John's quarrel has renewed debate on one of the perennial aspects of academic freedom. To what degree can a university fulfill its obligation to free inquiry if it is committed to a religious dogma? The AAUP in its 1940 statement on academic freedom took a defeatist approach to the problem by admitting of religious exceptionalism. The statement endorses unhampered freedom for the professor in the non-religious school, but notes that "limitations of academic freedom because of religious or other aims of the institution should be clearly stated in writing at the time of the appointment."

A recent study by the Danforth Foundation of academic freedom in 817 church-related colleges is less pessimistic. The Danforth study finds free inquiry not inconsistent with a religious orientation. This type of college, the "free Christian college," is free "because it does not control thought, Christian because it has a definite commitment." This is feasible because the free Christian college "stands unapologetically for religion and liberal education, but it relies on example, persuasive presentation of ideas, and a climate of conviction, rather than on conformity, to accomplish its ends."

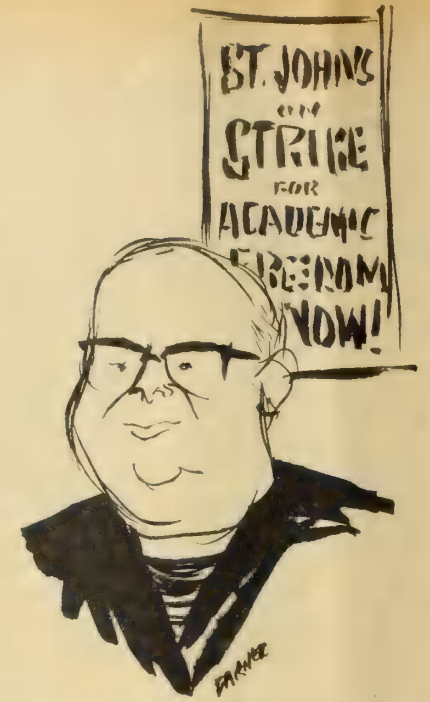
The stillborn report on academic freedom by the St. John's Faculty Planning Council echoes the optimism of the Danforth Foundation. The committee, chaired by Father O'Reilly, recommended that the teaching of controversial issues be removed from a setting where there is an "assumption that they are settled in advance." The report, based on studies made by the American Civil Liberties Union, states: "Studying a philosophy or a social theory for the purpose of approving or denouncing it is not studying it with an open mind. Such discussion should include presentation of divergent opinions and doctrines, past and present, on a given subject."

St. John's leans to the posture of defender of the faith. "The trustees of St. John's are determined to maintain this university as an institution which is both Catholic and dedicated to academic excellence," Father Cahill announced. Yet the dismissal of twelve members of the Department of Philosophy, including one cleric, and another priest in the Theology Department, casts doubts on the Vincentian commitment to free inquiry.

Perhaps a more pertinent issue is how to insure academic freedom without impinging on the necessary administrative functioning of a university. In the alienation of college teachers from the centers of policy making, a rash of university senates have sprouted up, such as the one at the University of Pennsylvania. These governmental bodies often serve as mere buffers between faculties and administrators, functioning primarily as safety valves. Despite the existence of a senate at the University of Pennsylvania, departmental chairmen are still appointed by administrators.

Situations vary with each college, but one main fact emerges: faculty participation in policy is precariously dependent on university administration. At City University in New York City, where departmental chairmen are elected, judgments of the department on tenure, appointment and promotion are nevertheless subject to veto by administrators. Within the scheme of a collective bargaining agreement, where rights are not only given clear definition but are strictly enforceable, the college teacher would possess a viable base outside administrative purview.

The major thrust of the union's efforts at St. John's has been to liberalize the existing framework. There is every reason to believe, nonetheless, that what the university feared most was collective bargaining. This is somewhat difficult to understand in light of the social encyclicals, notably Pope Pius XI's Quadrigesimo Anno, exhorting Catholics to join unions. Despite the semantics of the word "worker" in the encyclicals, few would maintain that it was meant to apply solely to craft and industrial workers.



The issue, then, becomes one of professionalism. Teachers, sensitive to their status, have hesitated to join unions, although many professionals—journalists, musicians, actors and engineers—came by unionism much earlier and more naturally. Teachers, both in the public schools and in the colleges, have seen an incompatibility between professionalism and unionism.

In the past five years, the American Federation of Teachers has gone a long way toward dispelling these notions. Collective bargaining in New York City between Local 2 of the United Federation of Teachers and the Board of Education regularly negotiates on sizes of classes. This is not simply a condition of employment but a matter affecting educational policy. Furthermore, the union and the Board have developed in concert a pilot program to uplift the educational quality of elementary schools in the ghettos. Such an item as classroom discipline has recently been spelled out in a contract between the AFT local in Detroit and that city's Board of Education.

The American Federation of Teachers, parent body of the fledgling UFCT local involved at St. John's, is predominantly composed of public schoolteachers. But its ties with the college are of ancient vintage. One of the AFT's prominent members was John Dewey. A more recent prominent member was the former college professor, Hubert Humphrey.

One effect of the St. John's strike has been to give college unionism a wider audience than it might have hoped to obtain in years. From the deep South, where unions are not traditionally received kindly, has come a strange request. The law school faculty of the University of Mississippi invited the UFCT to send a speaker. The topic: What a union has to offer the college professor.

WELFARE IN AFFLUENCE

THE MIRAGE OF RATIONALISM . . . Reece McGee

It has now been thirty-four years since Franklin Roosevelt took office with a mandate to alleviate the great depression through unprecedented welfare measures, and more than fifty years since an earlier Roosevelt institutionalized liberal programs as a responsibility of the federal government. Under Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson, political liberalism with regard to the responsibility of the government for the welfare of the people has remained the guiding philosophy of considerable activity and spending. The present Administration has set in motion programs illuminated by this ideal of a magnitude unknown in previous generations. All this has not occurred without considerable debate. The reactions of the conservative community (ranging from mutters of malediction and dire warning to screams of pure anguish) have been audible for half a century and become entirely predictable. The liberals, for their part, differ considerably among themselves about the content and structure of various programs, but rarely question the assumptions of the ideology that guides them. Under these circumstances, then, and given the fifty-year experience of the consequences, it may be appropriate to ask what, really, is the ideology that undergirds our welfare spending? What are its assumptions and bases, what its weaknesses and failures?

It seems fair to characterize the liberal programs of this century's administrations, regardless of party, as "quantitative." From the first Roosevelt's trust-busting and conservation measures to Johnson's "war on poverty," the government has dealt, directly and indirectly, almost exclusively with material phenomena, principally money and income. (Such New Deal measures as the Artists' and Writers' Project are not exceptions to this generalization, for they were motivated, as witnessed by the treatment of their products, more by the need to put funds into the hands of a jobless occupational class than by care for artistic creation. Nor was John Kennedy's support of the arts an exception, since it was not defined or carried out in the context of welfare measures.)

---

Reece McGee, professor of sociology at Macalester College, St. Paul, is coauthor of The Academic Marketplace.

Whether programs have taken the form of direct relief, as many did during the depression and many still do, or of the more sophisticated ventures in education, retraining, etc., now under way in VISTA and the poverty program, they are still directed toward the relief of unemployment and want, or toward changing the circumstances of individuals in such a way that those ancient enemies will find some persons or categories of persons less vulnerable. Little attention has been paid to programs which might affect the quality of life for our population (although, to be sure, some programs have done so as a side effect) and none has been focused on the basic structural assumptions of our society which produced the problematic conditions in the first place. We have dealt with the poor and the jobless as individuals or, at furthest remove, with conditions promoting unemployment or poverty in specific industries or geographic areas, and rarely with the underlying and persisting structure responsible for them. (The Civil Rights Act, by exception, is an example of such structural programs. It is interesting, however, that the provisions in it which might bring about radical change, like their parallels in the Constitution, have remained largely unenforced.)

It seems inevitable that this should be so. The quantitative character of government-sponsored welfare programs, and their necessarily individual focus, are both probably inherent in a democratically governed materialistic society with its great susceptibility to pressure brokering (which makes fundamental restructuring of the social order a practical impossibility). Too, no reasonable way has yet been invented to direct and "program" qualitative measures centrally. Thus it is possible to provide income for artists and poets, to distribute their works, or to beautify the nation's highways (although it is proving difficult to get the latter done), but there seems no way in which a program of the American Government can either seriously promote qualitatively superior activities or educate the population to them.

A more fundamental reason for the character of this century's political liberalism seems to lie in the philosophy and assumptions upon which it built. For liberalism as we know it today is a direct outgrowth of Enlightenment rationalism and, as its heir, has inherited both its strengths and weaknesses. The strengths are sufficiently well known that they need only be recited here: a concern for individuals and the conviction of their worth, the idea that government is the creation and property of the governed, the faith that man is, if not inherently good, at least not evil. The great documents of the American people are firmly rooted in these traditions, and the vitality, stability and duration of our political process, built upon them, is testimony to their power.

The weaknesses and perhaps downright errors of Enlightenment rationalism are less apparent; it may have taken the 20th century to make us begin to apprehend them. Fundamental is the article of faith that men really are reasonable or, stated another way, that the truth or the right need only be made known and men will follow it. Insights unchallenged in the works of Marx and Freud call this into question. (From Marx, that knowledge can be put into the service of ignorance and slavery; from Freud, that reason unaided may be unable to penetrate the final recesses of the human mind from which flow some, at least, of the springs of conduct.) And recent advances in science and its philosophy (notably, the work of Einstein and Heisenberg) raise doubts as to the absolute nature and stability of "truth" itself. It may still be that the truth could make men free, but that we can and will know it and, knowing, act upon it, remains an assumption.

With specific regard to welfare programs and the rationalism which seems to enliven and direct them, a corollary of the basic Enlightenment posture is that it is good to alleviate want and that the absence of want, in itself, creates satisfaction. The "good life" and the "good society" are essentially quantitative. (It can, of course, be argued that nothing in rationalism necessarily leads to this conclusion, and that is probably so. That it has led to it in the United States, however, and —following us—in much of the rest of the world, and that it has been the animating principle of our welfare posture, seems unarguable.) And the evidence of this century in particular seems not only unable to support that assumption or hypothesis but flatly to contradict it.

None of the above is meant to denigrate the successes and accomplishments of quantitative liberalism. Its monuments are all about us. Through the liberal and liberating programs of past administrations we have gone a long way toward alleviating or even eradicating physical want in large segments of our population formerly subject to it. Free public education has enabled "the masses" of our society to overcome handicaps of birth and to attain, and in some respects enjoy, a material standard of life unknown in the world previously and unequaled by similar classes anywhere else, even today. The diseases which have most often been the scourges of man in other times and places have been, if not entirely banished, at least held at bay, and it is probably not soft-headed to predict that, barring catastrophe, man's oldest enemy, hunger, will never again prowl our streets. In the light of human history these accomplishments are nothing to take for granted. They may, in fact, be our greatest triumphs, for no other society has ever attained them. They are, without apology, the glory of our national liberalism, and cannot by any means be explained as mere accidents of history and natural resources, for many societies have been fortunately endowed but have failed even to attempt such accomplishments through lack of the guiding altruistic ideology which defines them.

But as these unquestioned "goods" are the products of Enlightenment rationalism, so are its failures, for they, too, spring from its definitions of man and his place in the world. The root problem of Enlightenment rationalism, surprisingly enough, is precisely its emphasis on the individual and its consequent doctrines of individualism and individualistic enterprise. These, especially when combined with laissez-faire economic theory and its rationalizations in Protestantism, have produced an ideology that is, despite its material successes, both inhuman and dehumanizing. This is the credo that man is motivated by self-interest (for how else should individuals, these special, separate personae, be accounted for?) and is measured by his accumulation of wealth. These, the roots of materialism, are just as much products of rationalism as are democratic politics. That they may also be necessary ideologies for capitalization and industrialization, as Weber pointed out, may well be true; but although he described some facets of puritan character which he associated with "the spirit of capitalism," he could have had no foresight of the situation that confronts us. Individual self-interest has probably been the "motive force" of Western societies for the past two centuries, the ideology or frame of reference which defined them and kept their members going. But we have celebrated its successes overmuch and, therefore, overlooked its failures and disintegrative consequences, some of which are only now beginning to be apparent as the United States becomes the first society to offer fulfillment of the ideology to all.

The dilemma is simply this: individualism, self-interest, and judgment of the worth of men according to their accumulation of wealth act as motive forces for a society only so long as most of its members cannot attain that wealth. Once an affluent economy has been created, one in which most people do share in the prosperity and abundance, such criteria no longer provide goals and satisfactions and, in addition, create discontents which cannot be materially alleviated because they are products of materialism in the first place.

(It should be noted that, in these matters at least, there seem to be few essential differences between the economic systems of the United States and the Soviet Union. The Economist has called them, perceptively, rival systems for the provision of material plenty. It is not surprising, then, that some familiar American problems are beginning to haunt the Russians: juvenile delinquency, worker absenteeism, alcoholism and hedonism. It would even be possible to say with some validity, if one were inclined to be particularly critical of the American experience, that Marxism has some moral superiority over "free-enterprise capitalism" as we practice it. For basic to Marxist notions about the necessity for collective ownership of property is the judgment that greed is a social force so dangerous that it demands rigid control. In the United States "free enterprise," at least as interpreted by Ayn Rand and some recent Republican candidates for election, would seem to exalt greed as a character trait good and essential to the social order.)

If, as has been suggested, individualistic materialism cannot satisfy in an affluent society, and may even bring its own internally created discontents, evidences of this state of affairs should surely manifest themselves in the United States, which is highly individualistic in its culture, and affluent to a degree unknown to history. And the evidence among us of social and psychological discontent is widespread.

Socially, there is revolutionary discontent among one-tenth of our population—the Negroes, who have had to take to the streets in massive civil disobedience in order to jog the government and the rest of us into even an awareness that there is something amiss with their condition and our responsibility for it. And there is massive lethargy or resistance to doing anything about it among large numbers of the rest of the population. In another sector of American life the reactionary radicals—again a minority, but an influential one—seem alienated from the century in which they live and view many aspects of their society with hatred and paranoid suspicion.

Psychologically, there is evidence of massive failure of health and stability. The mental health associations speak of one hospital bed in eight being filled by a mental patient. Even if this figure is only approximately accurate, it is incredible, for if one bed in eight is occupied by a person mentally ill, what must be the proportion of our population that is deranged but unhospitalized? (For behavior must be considerably aberrant before the sufferer is committed.) Drug addiction is an increasing problem in many of our large cities and has reached epidemic proportions in neighborhoods of some of them. Alcoholism blights the lives of an unknown number of our citizens; responsible estimates reach into the millions. Suicide terminates over 19,000 lives annually and is a leading cause of death among the young. When their conditions of life cause such staggering proportions of a society to flee them through mental illness, drugs, drink or suicide, it does not seem amiss to view those phenomena as evidences of massive discontent.

Thus despite thirty (or fifty) years of federal programs for the alleviation of want and need, and the quite real abundance in which, as partial consequence, the vast majority of Americans live, there remains in the land a large degree of serious unrest. (In this respect, at least, Senator Goldwater's political strategy was correct; he sensed the discontent and focused his campaign upon it. But he never really understood it, since his own philosophy was an expression of the very forces producing it, and he missed his mark more broadly than any previous contender for the Presidency. It is interesting that John F. Kennedy, who also campaigned on the notion that "something was wrong" with the society, won. Note, however, that his remedy called for self-sacrifice rather than self-interest.)

The explanation for social maladjustment in an affluent society is simple: material goods, of themselves, are incapable of creating human satisfaction. Man, as any social scientist or practical politician knows, is a symbolic animal, the only member of the animal kingdom that is. The present relevance of this fact is that men do not experience reality directly, as other animals do, but rather as mediated and interpreted by the symbol systems which make them men instead of unspecialized apes. In a materialistic society, value is placed on things, and satisfaction comes from having acquired them in symbolically specified quantities and conditions.

Men thus come to appraise themselves against symbolic yardsticks which measure whether they have been "successful" in obtaining socially defined qualities and quantities of goods; their self-appraisals become a function of possessions. But there is a double jeopardy in this. In the first place "moth and rust . . . corrupt" material goods, and "planned obsolescence" degrades our appraisal of them, so that, for example, the ego satisfaction derivable from possession of a new car lasts only as long as it is "new," and the annual Detroit marathon insures that the period will not be extended. Second, and far more destructive, making objects the measure of our satisfaction gives into the hands of those who order the supply of them, or dictate the evaluation to be placed upon them, control over our self-esteem. We become not our own masters but hostages to the appraisals of others.

Most important and most destructive of all, however, are the theological consequences of materialism. Paul Tillich has defined God as "ground of being," that is, that which is most important to us, that value for which, in the end, we would sacrifice all others. In this sense—and the most irreligious among us will have to agree, I think, that it makes sense—all men have gods. And in a materialistic society, things are god. It should be unnecessary (in the pages of this journal) to reiterate the domination of American political and social life by the commercial community and commercial values. ("Why is it," a visiting Scots professor remarked to me rather wistfully last year, "that in your country money always wins?" The perpetually lost battle of the conservationists to which he was referring is only one of a thousand cases in point.) But if we worship things, and the things are symbols of ourselves (and we do and they are), then we are worshiping ourselves . . . only no one really can be his own god, for we know him, then, too well.

The very abundance of material goods in which the vast majority of Americans now live (judged by the standards of the rest of the world), and the political forms through which that abundance has been shared by most strata of our society (for who can deny that our years of liberalism have "spread the wealth"?) have created problems for us. The more obvious one of these is simply that, with the material necessities provided nearly everyone, and a fair portion of luxury common to many, the qualitative needs of life are rising to attention as never before. Our bodies pampered and our physical appetites sated either directly or vicariously, our physical security relatively assured and the future bright, the tawdry, blighted and despoiled in American life are everywhere becoming more notable and more serious to us. But the awareness has come too late, it seems, for if our ears are no longer assailed by the din of hideous shops or slums, so that we have learned the values of quiet, they are now assaulted from supermarket to dentist's chair with Muzak or the ubiquitous transistor. And if we now have great highways flinging their spans across the continent—and sometimes not unaesthetically—our cities also pay the price for them in smog and traffic jams. (A news item recently reported that on one weekend in Los Angeles a mere two accidents had involved a total of 150 cars on smog-shrouded freeways. The end in that direction would seem to be in view.) Further listing of our failure to attend the qualitative needs in life could no better illustrate the problems both of their absence and of the way in which our quantitative bent has made it difficult if not impossible to serve them.

A second problem is closely involved with the forms in which liberal programs of government have been staged. While it is certainly true that as a result of such programs wealth has been more widely distributed in our society than at any time in the past, the same programs have also created pockets of poverty among us which are appalling, whether measured by absolute or philosophical standards. These are populated by what one writer has called "the communities of those left behind" by the thrust of the society and government aid. Among them are such familiar problem populations as the aged, the illiterate or unschooled, the Negro and those with obsolescent skills. And to this painfully familiar list, I would add another paradoxically unfamiliar: many of the members or supporters of the radical Right, whom the society has also "left behind," but in a new, strange way. For in the case of the first group, the "motive force" of our society and our programs for its enrichment have failed to deliver, and in the second, it may be argued, it has delivered all too well. Both are, in effect, the creation of materialism with its consequent worship of things.

Those among the materially poverty-stricken have been left behind in the grab for things. The relative deprivation of this population—surrounded by a society of sparkling abundance and overwhelmed by its demands that all must have—can be nothing short of frightful in its pain and frustration. (For if one must have cars, and television, and boats, and beautiful clothes and handsome companions to be successful and satisfied, what can one think of oneself if one must struggle to eat?)

The other population, that of our frustrated, flaming radicals of the Right, is more difficult to understand until its social origins are analyzed. For surprisingly enough, material success is well represented among them. It would be interesting, although perhaps impractical, to compute the median income of members of the John Birch Society. Certainly its many corporate supporters can make no plea of poverty, and its representation among physicians (one of our highest income occupational groups) is, in some sections of the country, at least, very high, if not overwhelming. But the radicals are, apparently, generally new to wealth, and seem to come, themselves or in a generation, from more humble origins. A subgroup comes from an older population that has recently fallen on evil days.

For those new to money, the Horatio Alger myth is real: when one has money and things, one is "successful" and therefore by definition, satisfied. But since it has not proved to be so (and cannot, for reasons inherent in materialism already discussed), and since these bewildered persons cannot question their ethic (it is their selves), there must be something fearfully wrong, out there, in the world. The application of the argument to groups that have lost status as society changed—old Anglo-Saxons, for example—is obvious: must not something also be fearfully wrong with a world where one has arrived and yet, somehow, loses anyway? Thus, because of our very abundance, and because of the relativity of our standards of self-assessment, those without luxuries, even if they eat good bread and send their children to high school, may feel bitterly deprived by a society where they have been encouraged to want cake and college, and to judge themselves by their acquisition. And those who have eaten cake may feel equally betrayed, because they have won the prize and it has proved unsatisfying.

It is my suggestion, to summarize the argument to this point, that there is, indeed, "something wrong" with the state of our society, although John Kennedy did not define it, and it is not what Barry Goldwater described. What is wrong is a great malaise of spirit induced, essentially, by rationalism and individualism which, when coupled with materialism, have led us to the conception of a man-centered (and hence, self-centered) universe in which to seek our fates. In the United States, these notions have been ratified and exacerbated, especially for the lower-middle classes, now everywhere coming to power and position, by traditional Protestantism and what Weber called "The Protestant Ethic," and they have left us with an outlook and a self-conception both weak and bleak. And however liberal and well intentioned the programs mounted by the government may be, and however well they may alleviate conditions of material want, even among those now members of the communities of the left-behind, they will not resolve our dilemma. They are incapable of dealing with the spirit and the self-conception of man and thus are our undoing. Men need gods greater than themselves to live by: one need not be a theologian or a believer to comprehend this. Our human history teaches it, and if it did not, we have the witness of our present condition and our frantic rush to escape it.

Part of that condition and that rush is clearly visible throughout the 20th century, with its search for "causes" larger than themselves to which millions have given, and are giving, themselves. Archetypal among these was Nazism, as clear a call to death as any ever sounded, singing paeans of death, and dealing it wholesale: to its own adherents as well as to others, and with no other promise from the beginning. (For long before Churchill offered to his grateful people the bitter bread of blood and sweat and tears, Hitler had proffered the sweetmeat of killing and death for the Fatherland. It is relevant and sinister that the same self-destructive fervor is today visible in the preventive-war enthusiasts of the far Right, who would rather that all of us be dead than any of us Red.)

In the United States, where we have thus far managed to escape the consuming ravage of 20th-century war, the philosophical and behavioral responses are beginning to appear, and are almost equally appalling. For our response (still in its first, tentative, faltering steps) is nihilism and anarchy. And, knowing the roots of the malaise, the response seems obvious. Nihilism—in the form of material destruction—is an old reaction of the dispossessed. It does not seem accidental in Rochester and in Watts, where the Negro protest inflamed the ghettos into mob action, that the thrust of collective reflex was against property. In so utterly materialistic a society, "Burn, Baby, Burn," is more than a mob password; it is a nihilistic call to death. (For in such a society, remember, things are self.)

Equally, anarchy is a response to a material ethic on the part of a new rich class whose ideology has consisted in getting the material prizes their society has offered them, but which has found them totally unsatisfying. For if the order to which they have given themselves and which has given them the only meaning they have ever found, has provided no resource of spirit to uphold them, then they have been betrayed, and that order must be brought down. The radicals of the Right are bitter critics of our society, but even their intellectuals have been notably silent on constructive suggestions for replacing the social structures they so despise. It is probably not accidental either that much of their political activity consists of spoiling engagements which they cannot win, and which can have no other consequence than destruction of their natural political allies, the traditional Republicans.

This, then, is our dilemma: we are an individualistic society in an age when the interdependence created by our complicated social structures has made individualism obsolete. We are a materialistic society at a time when the very success we have enjoyed in the production and distribution of material goods has made them useless as providers of satisfaction. We are a liberal society in a condition where the attempt to alleviate some wants (certainly morally valid in itself) will only inflame others. And we are left, at the end, with nothing larger than ourselves.

There is nothing really new in this recognition. At least three major philosophies or ideologies exist to which appeal has been made, with varying degrees of awareness of the problem, for the resolution of the dilemma. One of these, rampant in the world but with little real foothold in the United States, is leftist radicalism. There have been occasional radical experiments in our history and there are some buglings of it now, but the historic examples have tended to be of short duration and have failed, as have the contemporary modes, to catch the imagination of the American people. To explore the reasons for this failure is not within the scope of this discussion, but certainly one of them must be that radicalism has failed because it is, at least in part, a creation of the very ideology it attacks.

A second remedy, whether apparent or real, is far more ancient than any contemporary political or economic radicalism. This could be called the "medieval" response of Christian theology (using the term "medieval" in its historic rather than its pejorative sense). More than most radical solutions with which I am familiar, the answer of the Christian Church does work—at least for the relatively few church members in the United States who are behavioral Christians. There is, I think, incontrovertible evidence that those who have understood the Church's message of crucifixion and resurrection have been enabled thereby to overcome the siren call of death and to live stable and joyful lives. But for most of us (and I include a large proportion of American churchgoers and, indeed, much of the Church itself), God has been dead for at least 200 years. The Church, seduced by its surrounding culture, has tended to adopt that culture's values, and all too often continued to preach not He Who Is but an Old Testament Man in the Sky in whom no thinking person can possibly believe. A reformation in the Church has clearly begun and is making remarkable headway at a speed which few, twenty years ago, would have believed possible. Despite this glimmer of hope, however, it is probably too late to win the race with chaos. Most of the world is not Christian and is not going to be, and is plunging headlong into the very materialism which seems to be condemning us. Much of it, further, seems to be politically and socially irresponsible, and either has or soon will have ultimate destructiveness at hand. The medieval remedy does not seem to provide a practicable answer; it has managed, barely, to keep the Church alive since the Reformation, but it appears unlikely to generate sufficient appeal to make itself the avenue of our salvation now.

A remedy which to many minds has probably appeared both more contemporary and more "American" is the possibilities inherent in simple diversity. The toleration, or genuine encouragement, of diversity in ideas and behavior has the decided advantage of being attuned to our political and social system. It does, to the degree that it can overcome demands for conformity, make possible behavioral alternatives. Another positive feature is the fact that diversity in ideas and behavior can be "programed" by centralized control, so that if the government chose to do so, it could actually encourage and increase it.

Unfortunately, the notion that the encouragement of diversity per se offers a way out of the dilemma in which we find ourselves smacks too much of Enlightenment rationalism to offer much hope for the future. We are not a people noted for great tolerance of nonconformity, and much of the thrust of recent administrative activity seems to have been in the other direction. Neither is there evidence to indicate that even if diverse alternatives are logically possible, nations or people will necessarily adopt them. Cultures are notoriously resistant to planned change and, while it is certainly true that a society such as ours will produce people and ideas to counter the cultural mainstream, by the very token that the dilemma I have described is our cultural mainstream, diversity per se seems unikely to offer an effective resolution.

It is possible, in other words, for persons to arise and survive here who do not share the common values of our culture. It is even possible for them to transmit their ideas to others. The current reformation in our churches is a case in point. But the weight of the culture appears overwhelming and the time we have remaining to us may well be running out. There is no real support in the United States for a re-evaluation of human worth; the idea of man as a market commodity is firmly fixed and does not appear capable of being changed simply by the existence in the society of contrary ideas. Such concepts have, after all, existed in what we (revealingly) call our "market place" of ideas for a long time.

This remedy, or purported remedy, nonetheless, does offer the only resolution for the dilemma in which it appears reasonable to place hope. If it may be stated in simple form, the dilemma appears to be that the materialistic nature of our society has encouraged us in selfishness and removed the bases of self-evaluation from our own hands, thus making us hostages to fortune. But the individualism of American life has permitted to spring up within our society in recent years three phenomena which run counter to that trend and which have captured the imagination of the American people and, indeed, the attention of the world. These are the Peace Corps, the civil rights movement, and more recent student revolts against the bureaucratization and meaninglessness of much higher education. All three have the common denominator of selflessness, are devoted to nonmaterial ends (and, to some degree, are even anti-materialistic), and have offered their participants the opportunity to judge themselves according to transcendent standards. Their results have been, within realistic limitations, little short of remarkable in each case—often most particularly for the participants if not always for the objects of their action.

We can conclude from these experiences that nonmaterial motivations are not only still possible in American life but are sought for and welcomed by fairly large segments of our people, and that the rewards which some have demonstrably discovered in such action have been adjudged worth suffering for. And the contrast of the enthusiastic acceptance on many levels of these behaviors, with the sullen toleration of our problem in Vietnam, should also be instructive: it is not too late. What the public reaction to the Asian situation shows is not that Americans are unwilling to suffer, even for goals not entirely clear, but that they are unwilling to suffer for goals not clearly seen as noble. The political scientist might conclude from this that the public has not yet attained political maturity, and it may be so. But the philosopher might speculate that the best of rationalism and its liberal political consequences are yet with us. The horns of the dilemma on which we are impaled may not be entirely paradoxical after all.

Corps of Engineers

THE PORK-BARREL SOLDIERS

Robert G. Sherrill

Three brave and perhaps quixotic Senators will attempt in this session of Congress to disrupt the oldest established permanent floating boondoggle in American politics—that carried on between a number of their fellow legislators and the Army Corps of Engineers. Senators Frank Moss of Utah, Lee Metcalf of Montana and Joseph Clark of Pennsylvania will push a bill that would turn the Department of the Interior into a Department of Natural Resources, with the new cabinet office absorbing several scattered agencies and bureaus including the civil engineering dictatorship of the Corps.

Just another bill in a bill-laden Congress would have no significance, but this one is said to enjoy the support of Interior Secretary Stewart Udall, a man who is not unwelcome around the White House; and the rearrangement would be in keeping with the President's apparent desire to regroup cabinet responsibilities.

This isn't the first time a Department of Natural Resources has been proposed, nor is it the first time an effort has been made to cut the mighty Corps down to proper size. The Hoover Commission tried to do it thirteen years ago but, after scaring the pants off the Corps and its allies, it ultimately lost. Moss and colleagues may lose, too, but they've already got a good scare going. Braxton B. Carr, president of the American Waterways Operators, the largest and most influential organization of tugboat, towboat and barge owners, recently sent out an agony memo to his 225 member companies warning that "the future of navigation in the United States will be dim indeed if the Corps of Engineers loses its responsibility for civil works to a catchall Department of Natural Resources." Carr reported that while Udall would be working behind the scenes to shackle the Corps, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara is not expected to help the engineers, with the result that "the Corps' hands will be effectively tied." He urged members to "get into the fight."

If, as Carr predicts, the Corps' hands are tied, it will be the first time. When this recommendation was previously before Congress, ex-President Hoover complained that the corridors of the Capitol were thick with engineering generals and colonels, lobbying like mad against the proposal.

Moss has carefully couched his appeal for reorganization in the phrases of efficiency, and there is certainly that to consider. Responsibility for the development of water resources is presently scattered among at least forty bureaus, departments and agencies of the government. Four cabinet offices share control at the top. Within the Interior Department alone, ten agencies meddle with the water. Federal land management is almost as splintered, and there is no unity of power development. Moss would also gather such control groups as the Forest Service (now in the Department of Agriculture), the Federal Power Commission and the Tennessee Valley Authority into the new department. They are not expected to go willingly.

The real fight will develop over the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers. Why should that venerable fraternity of specialists — which West Point was specifically established to perpetuate—be deprived of its civil functions? Because, some say, it has in recent decades become merely a political arm of Congress. One Texas Congressman, complaining about the public's suspicious nature, said recently: "You never heard of an Army Engineer program yet that has not been criticized as pork barrel." If the Department of Interior has not been entirely free of favoritism and the taint of pork, its reputation is still better in that regard than the Corps'.

The boondoggle routine is perfectly balanced. The Corps justifies the projects, and Congress appropriates the money. On the one hand the Corps gets bigger and more influential — two conditions dearly prized by generals — and on the other hand public-works money is doled out to civilian contractors "back home" with Congress getting credit for spreading the happiness. And the largess is booming. During its 150-year life the Corps-Congress cornucopia has put, or is now putting, $22 billion into the contractors' pockets; another $35 billion is programed for the next fifteen years.

Everyone gets fatter all the time, and with no fuss and usually little debate. No special hearing was held in the Senate, for example, on the St. John River hydroelectric project in Maine, although it is expected to cost at least $300 million. Most of the nation's greatly needed flood-control dams have been built by the Corps and most of the navigable streams and harbors have been shaped and improved by the Corps. It has 222 flood-control dams, 603 local-protection levees, and 19,000 miles of improved inland waterways to its credit, and many of these are worth while. But others are merely worth boodle, and now that the Corps appears to be running out of ready sites for dams and dredgings, it seeks desperately to maintain its powerful position with Congress by sponsoring some projects that verge on the scatter-brained.

It has pushed through dam projects on the west fork of a river when it was the east fork that presented the flood problem. It has scooped out harbors to give better access for tankers carrying fuel to utility plants that are converting to natural gas. It has proposed recreational reservoirs on rivers too polluted to support fish life. It has built dams to protect less farm acreage than is flooded by the resulting reservoir.

Fearing that some day it may run out of projects, the Corps authorizes far more than it can handle. Some untouched backlog projects are fifteen years old, and the longer they lie on the shelf, the more ridiculous becomes the original price tag attached to them. Sometimes, such is its haste to get business, the Corps just plain goofs in its estimates. On several projects in the Southeast, actual costs ran 257 per cent higher than the estimates. Even Louisiana Sen. Allen Ellender, who appears to think that money grows on hat-racks, was heard to whimper when the cost of one project went up 600 per cent in a year. Discrepancies of 200 and 300 per cent between original estimates and final costs are not uncommon.

Obedient to Congressional whim, the Corps justifies building longer and longer waterways into the bald spots of America. It approved the notorious 516-mile channel connecting Tulsa with the Mississippi—a $1.2 billion project which inspired the observation from economist Cecil Haver that, considering the cost of maintenance, the nation would be better off if it abstained from using the canal after it was built.

Now the Corps is ready, and Congress seems more than willing, to build a canal from the Gulf to connect with the Trinity River at Fort Worth and Dallas. This Trinity River project has been proposed, off and on, for a generation, but it used to be considered a joke. Will Rogers is usually given credit for being the first to suggest that the best thing they could do with the Trinity was to pave it—an allusion to the fact that in the Fort Worth-Dallas area the Trinity is often a reluctant trickle, shallow enough to wade across. The cost of this project will be such that one critical Congressman allowed as how it would be cheaper to move Fort Worth to the Gulf. Nevertheless, such projects emanating from Texas are no longer a joking matter; San Antonio now seriously proposes that it have its own canal to the Gulf—125 miles as the crow flies. Give the Corps enough time to study the matter, and it is sure to come up with a positive response to San Antonio's dream ditch. The Corps is famous for rationalizing fantastic proposals.

The idea of building a canal from Lake Erie to Pittsburgh has been kicking around since the old canal days of the last century. Although it was revived again in the 1930s, nothing ever came of it because, except for the fact that the canal might readjust the commercial traffic pattern to benefit Youngstown, Ohio, other possible gains were hard to envisage. However, Rep. Mike Kirwan of Youngstown is fond of this project, and the Corps is expected eventually to come up with a study that justifies digging. Kirwan is a big man in water-resources development.

The Water Valley Dam on Eleven Point River down in Arkansas is another good illustration of the Corps' research bounce. Just about everybody but the Corps and a group of influential Arkansas politicians has agreed that putting a dam on Eleven Point River is a poor idea. The state of Missouri, the Interior Department, the Bureau of Fish and Wildlife, the U.S. Forestry Service, many conservation organizations—all oppose it. The Corps gamely started out with the argument that the dam was needed for, of course, flood control. But inasmuch as the last serious flood on that river occurred in 1915, nobody took that seriously. Next, the Corps proposed to build the dam for power development, but could find nobody who wanted to buy the power. Then it tried to sell the idea of a dam to impound a "recreational" lake — although there are seven other man-made lakes in the area and fourteen in the state, and although to build this superfluous dead-water reservoir they would have to destroy one of the last free-flowing rivers in the Ozarks. The lake would ruin $28 million worth of farmland and businesses, and force 500 families to move.

Last April the Corps which, when left alone is not always unreasonable, agreed that the idea for a dam should be scrapped. But Arkansas Congressmen howled in protest and demanded a new study. So the Corps took another look and said, well, the dam might be a good idea after all.

Then there is the Cape Fear River development in North Carolina. Thirty-two years ago the Corps made a study and reported that flood control is not justified in the lower Cape Fear basin. Nineteen years ago, after that area's worst flood of modern times, it again studied the situation and again could not justify a dam. But today the Corps—with a joyous background chorus of most Congressmen from North Carolina—says flood control is essential. The Corps' estimate of potential flood damage is about 40 per cent higher than the estimate of the Soil Conservation Service. Even if flood control isn't needed, says the Corps, see the fine recreational reservoir we shall make for the people of North Carolina!

Into this reservoir will feed the Haw River, the most polluted stream in North Carolina, and the New Hope River, which the National Park Service says carries moderate to severe pollution. One knowledgeable critic forecasts the result to be an expenditure of $72 million to create a "gigantic cesspool for raw sewage from towns and cities and for discharged chemicals from industrial plants" upstream. To achieve this, the Corps will drown 35,000 acres, and drive 150 families off farms that have come down to them through seven and eight generations.

A resident of New Hope Valley, which will be at the bottom of the reservoir, appeared before the House Public Works subcommittee to beg Congress to leave them alone. When he was asked, "What is an average price of the land in the valley?," he answered proudly: "I would say that there is much land in the valley that is of such value to the people that it would take as much to buy it as it would to buy the Capitol in Washington." (His neighbors who had come to Washington with him, and who filled the committee chamber, applauded.) "I do not mean to be disrespectful but I mean that many of those are not to be sold. They have been handed down from generation to generation as an asset, something that has been looked forward to." The committee was unmoved.

Back in 1942, Congress revived an old idea of a canal across north Florida as a way to out-fox enemy submarines lurking offshore. Those were desperate days when cost didn't matter, but even under such conditions Congress gulped when the Corps reported that the benefit-cost ratio would be a wretched 0.19—that is, the cost would be more than five times greater than the benefit. Defense officials said to forget it. Taking a second look at the project, they decided that ships going around the tip of Florida would not be nearly the sitting ducks that barges emerging from the canal would be.

And so forget it most of the nation did. But not Florida land speculators, or politicians, or pulpwood and phosphate companies with stuff to barge. They wanted that canal. The Corps eventually obliged with the right benefit-cost ratio, although it did take some time. The year the war ended they squeezed here and squeezed there and managed to come up with a benefit level of 1.05, still not good enough. In 1958, they tried again, and again decided the benefit level wasn't high enough to move.

But five years later, with some superb juggling, the Corps had a respectable figure. It took some doing. Although construction costs had risen nationally 36 per cent since the 1945 estimate, and though the project plan had been expanded, the estimated cost was mysteriously slashed 13.5 per cent. As for the forecast benefits, they now included half a million dollars a year in "land enhancement"—something nobody had thought to consider before. It wasn't pointed out until some time later that the Corps had forgotten to place on the minus side the permanent flooding of the Oklawaha River Valley—a river which The New York Times has properly called "one of this country's most beautiful free-flowing streams"—and the disenhancement of the lands that will be covered by the canal.

Raymond W. Stuck, who was for four years chief of the Corps' civil works division but is now retired and can speak frankly, calls it a nice piece of "hocus-pocus." The sleight of hand would probably not have been successful if President Kennedy had not needed the support of Florida Congressmen to liberalize the House Rules Committee. Getting their support, he personally asked that the barge canal be put into the 1963 budget.

The Cross-Florida Barge Canal—which Senator Ellender calls a "little work," costing only $145 million—at least illustrates with what a free hand the Corps is permitted to maneuver. In 1964 the Corps asked for, and got, $200,000 to start Rodman Dam on that canal project. The politicians put on their best suits and trooped out to the site and made speeches and set off some dynamite. Last year, the Corps was back, asking $350,000 for Rodman Dam. To continue work on it? No, to start work. Even such great and good friends of the Corps as Ellender and Florida's senior Senator, Spessard Holland, were embarrassed by the fast shuffle. Said Ellender to the Corps' General Welling: "Last year you asked for $200,000 to initiate Rodman Dam. Today you are asking for $350.000 to initiate the Rodman Dam. What happened?" And Holland chimed in: "I went there when they supposedly started that project and you all put on quite a good show of blowing up a lot of soil a year ago. Now you mean to tell me you have not been able to go ahead and award this contract?"

That, said General Welling, was exactly what he meant to tell him: "We applied it to other contracts."

That seemed to end the discussion, because Ellender and Holland do not mean to be critical by such questioning. When Florida's Governor Haydon Burns appeared before the Senate Public Works committee to beg that the government continue with the canal, he complained that some people were writing about it as being a "pork-barrel outrage." Tut tut, soothed Ellender, "we get such blasts as that every now and then. Don't pay any attention to such articles."

And then Ellender made a point that is basic to the leapfrog philosophy by which Congress and the Corps cooperate: that is, spend a little money and then you can argue it would be wasted unless you spend a lot more. Up to now the government has put $5 million into the Cross-Florida Barge Canal, leaving a minimum of $140 million to go. Said Ellender, "We have invested quite a bit of money up to now in that project and once a project of that kind is started—"

Governor Burns: "It is no time to stop."

Ellender: "That is right. This criticism is just so much chaff."

Chaff or not, it irritates. When Arthur Maas of Harvard wrote his book Muddy Waters, criticizing the Corps for highhandedly ignoring the President, Lt. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, then chief of the engineers, explained publicly that Maas was simply "trying to get more centralized power in government" (and you know what that means). Life magazine's recent editorial, "The Seductive Odor of Pork," suggested that there might be something other than logic behind the proposed canal from Fort Worth-Dallas to the Gulf. Gen. John L. Person (Ret.), executive vice president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, flared back that the editorial was "ridiculous . . . superficial, inaccurate and cynical . . . using innuendo and false implications."

Maj. Gen. Jackson Graham, currently director of the Engineers' civil works program, is really showing a thin skin. In two recent speeches he complained of "a downpour of the 'pork barrel' and 'boondoggle' type of criticism" and "the current fad of castigating water-resource engineers and highway engineers and other engineers on this subject of beauty. 'Despoilers' and 'uglifiers' are typical of the epithets. We try to put these brickbats in perspective. . . ."

The Corps and its allies have a way of handling their critics. Chief among these critics is Senator Proxmire of Wisconsin. It may be only accidental, of course, but while every neighboring state is receiving several millions of dollars from last year's rivers-and-harbors budget, Wisconsin will receive nothing. It may be only coincidental, too, that Utah, Moss's home state, is left out of the budget.

Leslie A. Miller, ex-Governor of Wyoming and chairman of the Hoover Commission's task force on natural resources, once gave this appraisal:

> The Corps of Engineers, one of the oldest of government services, has become undoubtedly the most powerful lobbying and pressure group in the government today.
>
> By various grants of authority from Congress, it has extended its power and influence into many fields of civilian services, including the plum-rich areas of river-and-harbor improvements and flood control.
>
> Theoretically, the Corps is responsible to the Secretary of the Army, and through him, to the President. In practice, it has worked out that the engineers deal directly with Congress itself, often arrogantly ignoring, as has been demonstrated in many instances, the expressed wishes of the Commander-in-Chief. It has become hard to tell now who is the master — Congress or the Corps of Engineers — for, though Congress provides the appropriations for these rich and often wasteful engineering projects, the Corps provides the modus operandi and the excuse for the spending of billions on the project that brings such joy to the home districts of the rivers-and-harbors-bloc Congressmen.

Miller wrote that thirteen years ago. He could have written it today. Nothing has changed.

Last year, in a further effort to by-pass the executive branch and make as many arrangements as they can just between themselves, Congress voted to allow the Corps to proceed with any project costing not more than $10 million that the Corps and the two Congressional Public Works Committees agreed on, without going to the full Congress for approval and without even looking for a nod from the White House.

President Johnson, properly jealous of his powers in this instance, said they wouldn't get away with it. He is likely to remember this attempted slight and act accordingly in the coming Department of Natural Resources fight.

The opposing camps are already assembling. On the one side will be such groups as:

¶ The National Farmers Union and the Grange and other rural blocs that are tired of the Corps coming in with its grandiose schemes and, without consulting local farmers, flooding them with another reservoir on which city folk can water-ski on weekends. The Interior Department's Bureau of Reclamation is not guiltless in this regard, but the Corps is much more high-handed.

¶ The National Audubon Society and all lovers of wild retreats, to whom the Corps is The Great Destroyer. Speaking for these opponents, one columnist wrote recently that to the Army Engineers "a vast sheet of water apparently is the most coveted thing in the world—another great artificial lake to attract tourists, swimmers, boat riders, fishermen, hot-dog peddlers, motel operators, all to 'up the economy' of the area. If there is anything that challenges, even nauseates, the Army Engineers, it is a free-flowing stream."

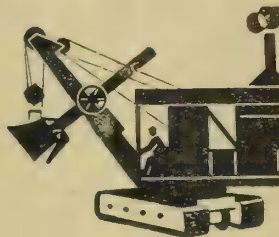
¶ The Soil Conservation Service, which is constantly being badgered by the Corps. The SCS was the first government agency to challenge the Corps' total domination over flood-control matters. Nine years ago it won the right to build small dams upstream, mostly for the protection of farmers (this arrangement with the Corps is quite properly called a "treaty"). But even these dams have to be approved by the Corps and it loves to quibble over the SCS's plans. One soil conservation official told me recently: "We spend more damn time rebutting the Corps than we do in planning our projects. We have 707 watershed projects going today, and we had to rebut the Corps on 20 per cent of those."

On the other side, standing four-square with the Corps and almost indistinguishable from it, will be that fascinating organization called the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. In the previous furor—the one thirteen years ago—a House member charged that the National Rivers and Harbors Congress was attacking the Hoover proposal because members of the NRHC were tied up with contractors' lobbies who feared a slump if the work was taken away from the Corps. The same charges will no doubt be heard again, because the same old National Rivers and Harbors Congress, with a few new faces, is still around.

The NRHC is an undisguised lobbying organization, and its most important members are Congressmen and Senators. In a brochure distributed by the NRHC, it describes itself as "non-official in nature" but "unique" in its "long tradition of close cooperation with top officials in the legislative and executive branches of the government."

It should indeed have uniquely close cooperation with the legislative branch, since all members of Congress are ex officio members of the NRHC, all eleven of its national vice presidents are Senators or Congressmen, as are the chairman of the board and all chairmen of the standing committees.

Here are found such names as Sen. John McClellan of Arkansas, chairman emeritus of the NRHC. (He is also chairman of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, where the Moss bill perilously lies.) Senator Ellender is a national director of NRHC; he is also chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee which decides on the Corps' budget. Other vice presidents are Sen. Everett Dirksen of Illinois, Rep. Joseph Martin of Massachusetts, Sen. Spessard Holland of Florida, Rep. Robert Sikes of Florida, Sen. Ralph Yarborough of Texas, Sen. John Sherman Cooper of Kentucky, Rep. Mike Kirwan of Ohio, Rep. Robert Jones of Alabama, Rep. Ed Edmondson of Oklahoma and Rep. John Blatnik of Minnesota.



Once a year the NRHC gets together and decides which rivers and harbors projects it should present to Congress. Then its Congressional members change hats, go back to the Capitol, and start lobbying one another. This past session the NRHC approved projects that would cost $1,936,542,000. Congress turned out a bill costing $1,985,785,000. That's what those Congressmen-lobbyists call "close cooperation."

More of it will be seen when Moss, Metcalf and Clark come over the barricades.

PENNSY-CENTRAL

ONE BIG HAPPY RAILROAD . . . Desmond Smith

> In the use made of the railroads by their owners and managers, the legitimate profit on transportation was often a relatively unimportant motive. The power to fix freight rates carried opportunities compared to which reasonable return for services rendered was inconsequential. It opened the door to schemes and conspiracies.
>
> Our Times

In the thirty-seven years since Mark Sullivan wrote those words, very little has changed to alter this remarkable insight into the Realpolitik of U.S. railroad management. Over the past decade a series of seemingly unrelated mergers have, in effect, created a new entity in the market place, a group of giant regional railroad monopolies. Some rationalization of the sprawling U.S. railroad system is obviously necessary, but in the next few years the nervous system of President Johnson's Great Society — the railroads—will begin to exercise a profound leverage on the American economy. For just so long as the railroads have had to compete with one another, the power to fix freight rates has been held in check. Now the nation-wide merger movement is rapidly destroying the restraint of free competition. Design, not coincidence, is behind the well-organized railway-merger campaign. Ben Heinemann, the aggressive president of the Chicago & North Western, has quietly predicted that the stage is already being set for the supermergers of the 1980s. Then, says Mr. Heinemann, with commuter city traffic out of the way, three or four Goliath-sized transcontinental transportation companies will share among them 90 to 95 per cent of the freight moving across the United States.

Under these circumstances, the closest scrutiny should attend the audacious application of the Pennsylvania Railroad for public approval to merge with the New York Central. For the moment, consider the immediate consequences of such a merger. The Pennsylvania New York Central Transportation Company (observe that the word, railroad, is avoided; the new company plans to get into all forms of transportation) will be the biggest corporate merger in American financial history. The two companies will pool assets of more than $5.5 billion, own and operate more than 20,000 miles of track, 4,000 locomotives, 8,000 passenger carriages, 227,000 freight cars, vast real estate holdings, and 19 million shares of common stock. Moreover, this prodigious transportation company would wield its vast economic power through thirteen states containing 40 per cent of the country's population. From New York in the East to Chicago in the West, from Louisville in the South to Mackinaw City in the North, a transportation trust would be created beyond the dreams even of a Harriman—who first raised the idea of one railroad partially controlling another on the principle of "community of interests." Since both Mr. Perlman (of the N.Y. Central) and Mr. Saunders (of the Pennsylvania) have described the benefits of this merger in terms of eliminating schedules, abolishing terminals, cutting down on equipment, ripping up "surplus" track, and terminating the employment of thousands of workers whose whole lives have been spent on the railroads, it is worth examining why their common interest is not in the public interest.

At present, the N.Y. Central and the Pennsylvania are rivals. At more than 140 points on a thirteen-state railroad map the two giants have to fight in the market place for the right to carry a customer's business. A Penn-Central combine would result in a drastic shake-up of the present highly competitive Eastern railroad structure. Western shippers, dependent on rail transportation, would inevitably find themselves having to pay more for goods shipped from the East. In turn, manufacturing plants on the Eastern Seaboard would be confronted with freight increases on raw materials from Western states. When Mark Sullivan singled out the power to fix freight rates he focused on an aspect of railroad economies usually hidden from public view. Prof. Walter Adams of Michigan State University has described this economic power with a simple analogy: "In a poker game with unlimited stakes, the player who commands disproportionately large funds is likely to emerge victorious. If I have $100, while my opponents have no more than $5 each, I am likely to win — regardless of my ability, my virtue or my luck. I have one asset the others lack, the power to bankrupt my rivals." In the railroad business, market power is very largely the sum of all the freight cars owned. Today the Penn-Central companies own every second freight car rolling through the Great Lakes, Central Eastern and Pocahontas regions. It is no good for Mr. Perlman and Mr. Saunders to dance around this question of market power: the two gentlemen blandly proclaim their sole purpose is efficiency. But as a big Pittsburgh manufacturer told Business Week: "Here we have two of the largest and slowest lines in the country merging. It's going to make a single line that's twice as large—and twice as slow." Another Pittsburgh shipper added: "Anything that gets to be 150 per cent the size of the Pennsy is too big."

The proposed Penn-Central merger provokes three important questions. They concern the adequacy of Congressional measures in dealing with the railroads; the current financial status of the Penn-Central companies, and the public usefulness of the Interstate Commerce Commission as it presently functions.

On the first of these questions there can be little doubt that until recently the state of the railroads was on a par with the state of the Pima Indians, as far as Washington was concerned. Indeed, until the nation's passenger services began to fall apart in the early 1960s, neither White House nor Congress ever gave much time to what was tacitly understood to be the preserve of private enterprise. It is still an interesting (and unanswered) question how much credit for this lamentable neglect can be laid at the door of the powerful railway lobby. A case in point is Sen. Claiborne Pell's long and unsuccessful fight to win passage for an inter-city railroad reorganization bill. When Sen. Harrison Williams' Urban Mass Transportation Act was passed in 1964—with a midget appropriation of $375 million spread over three years — it was the first government action in years. Compared to the $141 billion spent on the federal-state highway program in the past twenty years, the Williams measure is ludicrously inadequate. Finally, it should be noted that the Williams bill is restricted to intra-city problems.

---

Desmond Smith is a regular contributor to The Economist (London).

In one of the most curious public relations campaigns of all times the cash-rich railroads have spent literally millions of dollars in recent years persuading the American public that they must be doing something wrong. Thus, the best brains in U.S. advertising and public relations have been busy telling what may be dubbed "The Failing American Railroad" story. As with all advertising, the perceptive reader will look to the subplot for the real message. That message is merger. It is on this issue that the second question then emerges: has it been sensible to allow the Penn-Central companies their day at the hoardings without rebuttal?

Few people realize that railroads split their bookkeeping into separate halves. Railway presidents are always talking about operating income being in the red. What they seldom discuss in public is their nonoperating income. But railway companies are enormously wealthy landowners, real estate operators, mine operators, and dozens of other things besides. Since so many highly paid minds have been employed to bring about a general condition of public numbness on the railway issue, it seems worth while to look briefly at the Penn-Central argument in 1962 before the ICC. When the publicists left the stage, the railway lawyers moved in from the wings. The ICC knows all about nonoperating income, and the railway argument shifted therefore to the matter of competition. The Pennsy's attorneys argued that the transportation business today is a dog-eat-dog world where pipe lines, truckers, barge operators and air lines have all conspired to finesse the railroads at every turn. "The railroads can no longer consider any traffic captive. One form or other of transportation offers competition for substantially all traffic which the railroads are handling with long and short haul."

During the hearings, the eleven ICC commissioners were shown an endless parade of gloomy graphs, maps and statistics. Even with a merger, according to the presentation, Penn-Central was confronted with a doubtful future: the inroads of other competition would insure a steady decline of freight handled in the years ahead. Competition is less serious, however, than Penn-Central would have the ICC believe. Railroads continue to provide the only large-volume, low-cost, general-transportation service for the shipment of virtually any product, anywhere in the United States. In striking contrast to the picture of woe painted for the benefit of the ICC are the more recent stockholder reports. Take a glance at the New York Central. "Automobiles," says its report, "once handled almost entirely by highway carriers, are now rolling in Central's new multi-level cars in ever-increasing numbers. Coal traffic is also returning to the Central, primarily as a result of the new unit trains and incentive rates. New markets for Flexi-Van (a road-rail service), the most versatile freight container ever devised, are being rapidly developed."

The New York Central's erstwhile rival is not doing too badly either. Not long ago Pennsylvania's president, Stuart Saunders, told a group of businessmen: "We are going to put a minimum of 5 million tons of coal in Europe in less than five years, and much quicker than that, I think. We are willing, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, to commit some $50 million to this project." It is generally difficult to see how the Penn-Central companies can continue to cry poor in the face of such evidence. Alfred Perlman of the New York Central, in fact, calls railroads "the surprise growth industry of the next decade." Not surprising then to find that last year the "failing" Pennsy managed to distribute a $2 dividend to some 13 million shareholders.

So much for questions of Congressional inaction and of shell-game methods of accounting on the part of the railroads. The final question to ask is: have the regulated industries taken over the regulators? Specifically, how diligently does the ICC protect the public interest when it deals with the railroads? Railroads are regulated in the belief that they contribute something vital and essential to the economy as a whole. Additionally, the public now has a taxpayer stake in the railroads as a result of federal-state subsidies for passenger services. A regulatory agency, whose purpose it was to promote healthy competition while protecting the public interest, could be remarkably useful. Instead we have the ICC. So discredited is this agency among independent-minded economists that the question arises of its continued usefulness as a regulatory agency. As Prof. Walter Adams has remarked, "These days, the ICC does not protect the public against the industry but protects the industry against the bargaining power of the public." As a result, the ICC's long-awaited decision on the Penn-Central case is scarcely in doubt. It will be in favor of the merger. And, in the Washington headquarters of the Association of American Railroads, no one will be a bit surprised.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Joining Father's Outfit

THE PENKOVSKIY PAPERS. By Oleg Penkovskiy. Introduction and commentary by Frank Gibney. Foreword by Edward Crankshaw. Translated by Peter Deriabin. Doubleday & Co. 411 pp. $5.95.

Samuel L. Sharp

There is something of an established tradition about documents purporting to show the schemes of Russian leaders for world domination or other equally nefarious plans. Even when adjudged forgeries, such documents have a remarkable capacity for survival and periodic re-emergence. The most famous example is that of the so-called Testament of Peter the Great, which first popped up in the alleged memoirs of the Chevalier d'Eon, that fascinating 18th-century transvestite and French intelligence agent. The "testament" was published in 1836, courtesy of Polish political exiles who wanted to alert the West to the dangers of Russian expansion. The habit of quoting the "testament" in evidence survived the collapse of the czarist system; it was turned into a weapon of political warfare against the Communists. As late as 1951, Father Edmund Walsh, S.J., reprinted the "testament" in an appendix to his book, Total Empire, a study of "the roots and progress of world communism," thus making a proto-Bolshevik out of Peter I. An explanatory note states that the "testament" had been declared a forgery by historical scholarship, but Father Walsh argues that "independent . . . of its authenticity, the will possesses great intrinsic interest, as embodying principles of action followed out by Russia during the last hundred years. . . ." Similar arguments, ascribing "intrinsic interest" to not quite authentic but plausible documents have been heard about the famous Zinoviev Letter of 1924 and other fabrications.

Do the Penkovsky Papers (let us dispense with the phony pseudo-scholarship of the transliteration used throughout the book) belong to this category of not quite authentic documents? Some experts—including Victor Zorza of the Manchester Guardian — question its authenticity on the basis of a careful analysis of the internal evidence of the text. Edward Crankshaw, himself somewhat of an accessory to the operation as author of a foreword to the book, dismisses this approach as tedious exegesis, an occupational hazard of professional Kremlinology, of no interest to the general reader. He politely suggests in an article elsewhere that Frank Gibney, chief surgeon of the operation, "oversimplifies" when he tells us that Oleg Penkovsky, the colonel in the Soviet military intelligence (GRU) who turned spy for the West, actually jotted down the "revealing hotchpotch" in his cramped Moscow quarters. Crankshaw and others are inclined to look upon the Penkovsky "papers" as transcripts of de-briefing sessions held during Penkovsky's several visits to the West, to which some material sent by him from Moscow may have been added. It may indeed be silly to insist, as some obstinate truthmongers did, that the original Russian manuscript or typescript be produced. As Paul Blackstock points out, these, too, could easily be manufactured by one dis-information outfit or another, be it the CIA, the British M-6 or one of the many free-lancers in the business. The central issue to Crankshaw is not the method of delivery of the document in its present form, but the authenticity of the material as coming in one way or another from an important operative close to the very centers of Soviet power and decision making. On this score he has no doubts, nor do we. What we question is the material truth of what are billed as valuable revelations.

Let us have a close look at what is before us. The core, although by no means "most of the book," as Mr. Gibney claims, indeed consists of material which seems to have originated with Penkovsky. By my count, 221 out of 411 pages are in this category. The rest is made up of Gibney's introduction and continuity, a foreword by Crankshaw, and a couple of pages by Greville Wynne, British co-defendant in Penkovsky's trial and his main contact with Western intelligence. The book is padded by a 60-page insert of the "Prihodko lecture" on how to spy in America, a document presumably made available by Penkovsky in microfilm. There are also family pictures and reproductions of passes, membership cards, diplomas of the colonel, all in support of the authenticity claim.

To this reader, a substantial portion of the "papers" is early Penkovsky and belongs to the immediate period following the colonel's success in establishing contact with Western intelligence operatives. The problem facing a defector (including what is known as a "defector-in-place" who changes allegiance but not his place of residence) is that of impressing the prospective recipients of his material with his access to important secrets, as well as his competence in evaluating information. On both these scores, Gibney insists, Penkovsky was a very valuable source. Yet there is something pathetic in Penkovsky's efforts to establish himself as a man in the know.

Penkovsky begins by stating that he knows "more than most" about Khrushchev's plans and policies; yet nowhere in the text is there anything to support his boast. His only contact with Khrushchev, other than a passing glimpse of him during the war, was rather remote: while in London, he wrote to the First Secretary an indignant letter about the state of neglect of the grave of Karl Marx. This, we are told by a supposedly sophisticated operative, was to bolster his standing as a zealous Communist while already spying for the West. Incidentally and quite revealingly, he enjoyed the discomfort his complaint caused to the personnel of the Soviet Embassy in London, by no means the only instance of digging under fellow workers. When he was stationed in Turkey as assistant military attaché, he reported on his boss and used for the purpose the channel of the rival intelligence network, the K.G.B., dirty pool even in this dirty business. This is mentioned because it is in Penkovsky's personality and his relations with people around him that one finds the key to his "revolt" against the system. One does not have to accept the primitive epithets employed by the prosecutor in Penkovsky's trial to identify certain character traits which compel even Mr. Gibney to describe his man as a "flawed hero." Although successful in his military career, Penkovsky tended to feel shortchanged when assigned to political work or training activities in the rear. He wants to go to the front: "After all, at that time there were already several hundred decorated heroes of the Soviet Union, but all I had was a cigarette case which I got for fighting the Finns." When decorated with the order of Alexander Nevsky, he feels that "all this lifted my spirits considerably, and I went back to my regiment anticipating a brilliant military career." Those who were in charge of Penkovsky later in London must have caught on to his vanity and love for shiny hardware; he apparently had himself photographed in a British and an American colonel's uniforms. Political transvestite? Shades of the Chevalier d'Eon!

---

Samuel L. Sharp is chairman of Soviet Studies at The American University, Washington, D.C.

There can be no doubt that at one point the colonel became disgusted with the system in which he lived. But he tells us in what sounds like a true confession that he began by being disgusted with himself: "I felt before, and I feel now, that I must find some justification for my existence which would give me inner satisfaction." And again: "Inwardly I have not grown one bit, and I have the feeling that every day our 'Communism' is pulling me back instead of moving me forward." This feeling of personal emptiness leads by one step — I am sure the psychiatrists have a word for it — to the notion that not he, Penkovsky, is sick with frustration or whatever is nagging him: the system is sick, the country is sick. "Some disease or infection is gnawing and eating at our country from within, and we must do something to stop it. I do not see any other choice, and this is the main reason why I am joining the ranks of acting fighters for a better future for my people." From this point on, he does not have one good word for the realities of the Soviet Union. Khrushchev and his gang are adventurists bent on aggressive war. The generals gorge themselves with caviar and grow roses in their gardens while the people starve, actually starve. The Soviet leaders are planning for a "first strike" in a nuclear war. And here comes the clincher: "This would open the road to the subjugation of the entire world," a standard phrase about Russian — Russian, not just Soviet — intentions which is several centuries old.

Before we let Penkovsky off the couch or out of the confessional, one must mention the constant references to his father, a father whom he never knew and who died in 1919, the year of Oleg's birth, as an officer of the "white" armies fighting the Bolsheviks. This detail of his biography has somehow escaped the allegedly all-knowing keepers of the secret files, but whenever Penkovsky feels that he is in trouble, he expects it to be flung in his face. So the ghost of Vladimir Penkovsky stalks the Papers, performing several functions: he feeds his son's paranoia and at the same time legitimizes him with his new friends. Oleg can now in spirit join his father's outfit.

Perhaps it needs pointing out that disenchanted Boy Scouts who discover the not too elegant nature of politics—and Soviet politics must indeed be quite dirty when seen from the kitchen side—are not very reliable evaluators of the realities which they so violently and totally reject. I feel that although the West no doubt made a first-rate catch — actually the fish practically forced his way into the net — and presumably received a lot of useful technical information, Penkovsky's contacts must have been relieved when he decided to return to Moscow, driven by a most vigorous death wish. But why revive the whole episode now? There are various theories on this subject, too, the most plausible being that we have here the answer of the CIA and/or M-6 to the publication of the memoirs of Gordon Lonsdale, recte Konon Molody, a Soviet spy caught and convicted in England but exchanged for Wynne. Yet the politically minded would not be satisfied with the answer and would look for more than a prank-counter-prank game involving the dis-information boys of three great powers. The Papers may particularly appeal to some by reinvigorating and updating the notion of the "immutable aims" of the Soviet Union. That this is done with the help of evidence that came from a highly charged and therefore not entirely reliable source; that the evidence, even if — as in the case of the interest of the Soviet military in the "first strike" option around 1960-61 — true at the time may now be, as Mr. Gibney blandly suggests, of "academic interest," is beside the point. Psychological warfare, an oversold endeavor supported by a well-heeled vested interest, must go on, even if against one's own people, always the handiest target.

The Incurable Species

THE PROUD TOWER: A Portrait of the World Before the War, 1890-1914. By Barbara W. Tuchman. The Macmillan Co. 528 pp. $7.95.

George Dangerfield

On a first reading, this is impressionistic history, symptomatic, brilliant, but not deep. On a second reading, it seems to be suffused with despair. The "world" of 1890 to 1914 depicted here is, significantly enough, an Anglo-American and Western European world; it is shown to be bursting with energy; it batters itself to bits. Across the gigantic "sudd" of World War I, lying between us and it, only a few exceptional voices utter a language which connects with our own; they are the voices of composers, artists and writers; the rest are either complacent or base or deluded or unavailing. These speakers—the best as well as the worst of them—stand there on the farther side of the great "sudd," in a posture of failure. But the posture is symptomatic only; it does not reveal, still less explain, the cause of failure; indeed, it intimates that the failure is incurable. Mrs. Tuchman sums this all up, it seems to me, in one deadly sentence at the very end of the book: "The working class went to war willingly, even eagerly, like the middle class, like the upper class, like the species."

This sentence is deadly, not only for what it says, but for what it implies. Mrs. Tuchman is witty, she is very intelligent, she has a remarkable gift for narrative and descriptive prose; but when she uses the word "species," I do not think that she is writing like a historian. "Species" is a biological term, which reminds us of the immensities of evolution, and which—in the context of the sentence cited above—implies that mankind is a warlike species and must always remain so. Historical progress, on the other hand, is a matter of the incorporation of previous experience; and unless we assume that history is simply the record of follies and crimes, we have a right to believe that progress of some sort has taken place. By progress, I mean moral progress—the endeavor to develop the full potential of man. When Mrs. Tuchman writes (of Jaurès' indictment of the capitalist system), "in his time it was still [the italics are mine] possible to suppose that the fault lay in the system, not humanity," she appears to be denying this kind of progress. I may have misinterpreted her, but I feel that The Proud Tower, vivid and engrossing though it is on almost every page, is at heart a despairing book.

---

George Dangerfield is the author, most recently, of The Awakening of American Nationalism, 1815-1828 (Harper and Row). His other books include Chancellor Robert R. Livingston of New York and The Era of Good Feelings (both Harcourt, Brace).

The contents of her portrait are, necessarily, eclectic; as she says herself, she might have picked an entirely different set of subjects. The ones she has chosen are: the English Tories of 1895-1902, the Anarchists, the American imperialists, the Dreyfus case, the Peace Conferences at The Hague, the world of Richard Strauss, the English Liberals, the Socialists. Her criterion is that they should be "truly representative" and have "exerted their major influence on civilization before 1914, not after." (This is not true of the chapter on Strauss, which contains such names as Matisse, Picasso, Braque, Proust, Yeats and Stravinsky, and which is the one hopeful chapter in the book.)

How right she is to begin with the most complacent of governments. The Tories under the Marquess of Salisbury were, she says, "patrician." The epithet is altogether fitting. Not all Tory cabinets, it is true, had been so packed with landed aristocrats of impeccable lineage as this, but that is the point. For this was to be the last of the old Tory dispensations; and, as if to emphasize the fact that its hour had come upon it, it was arrayed in unusual splendor. And yet, by its behavior in the face of a world in rapid motion, it seems to have been quite unaware of its doom. Lord Salisbury — kindly, irritable, melancholy, retiring Lord Salisbury—was a very clever man, but his cleverness did not include an acute sense of the future. He was, said his Chancellor of the Exchequer, in schoolboy language, "keen about the housing of the poor and sanitary improvements," but that was all. "As long as I am here," he told the House of Lords, "nothing will happen." "Rightly or wrongly," he once announced, "I am not interested in the legitimate aspirations of Ireland." If a man says "rightly or wrongly," he always means "rightly."

Lord Salisbury was often bored by the speeches to which he was compelled to listen in the Lords, on such occasions he would set up a nervous drumming with his heels which, his colleagues on the front bench complained, gave them the sensation of seasickness. Boredom was also a characteristic of that other pillar of the Tory Party, the Duke of Devonshire. As Marquis of Hartington in the House of Commons, he had been a pillar of the Whigs; unable to see eye to eye with Mr. Gladstone, he had joined the Tories as a Unionist. Although he was the only man in public life who had been known to yawn in the middle of his own speeches, public life—next to horse racing—was his chief antidote against tedium. His immense wealth, his princely estates, the embraces of the Duchess of Manchester—none of these sufficed. Nor would it be true to say that he took office for the good of the nation (a claim often made) unless one adds the necessary rider that he identified the good of the nation with that of his own order.

Poem

Little green leaves in the wind,
are you tourists?
John Tagliabue

In fact, the Tories under Salisbury were a conspicuous example of the "stake in the country" principle. Now it is almost a truism to say that those who hold this principle either end by plunging the stake into the heart of the country, or submit, like any common suicide of the old days, to having it plunged into their own. Because they were manifestly unable to accept the concept of change, the Tories, under Salisbury's exquisite nephew Balfour, were routed in the election of 1906; one might well say that they had died by their own hand. The election of 1906 is a crossroads in English history; and beneath all such crossroads there is some evidence of political felo-de-se.

Mrs. Tuchman, I presume, intends to make these unimpressionable Tories an example of indifference to the aspirations of the governed—an indifference inseparable from any portrait of this fin de siècle Europe. Fin de siècle, of course, usually implies decadence; and this world (as she points out) was seething with energy—aesthetic, scientific, industrial, human. With the exception of the Dreyfus case, which had all the fury of an ulcerated tooth, not one of her subjects reveals a decadent state of society. Each, however, points to a misgoverned one.

It is only appropriate that Mrs. Tuchman should follow her chapter on the Tories with a brilliant account of the anarchist movement. Deploying all her virtuosity in the description of personalities, she constellates this account around the figure of Prince Kropotkin. Kropotkin, with his noble forehead, huge beard and diminutive body, looked somewhat like one of Edward Lear's Old Men; and, like them, inhabited the ineffable world of Nonsense. But it was Nonsense with a difference. Gentle and amiable in his private relations, he dreamed of nothing but the spontaneous violence of unorganized revolution. After that, man would assume his rightful place in the Eden of stateless mutualism; in fact, he had always been there, although he had never realized it. This kind of Eden thinking is characteristic of the extreme Left and the extreme Right. It is as if the Serpent had wheedled, conspired against, squeezed and tormented man, but had never succeeded in forcing him to take the fatal bite. To Kropotkin, man was essentially good: he had not fallen.

When Bernard Shaw, in a pamphlet designed to annihilate anarchism, asked "how [if man was good] did the corruption and oppression under which he groans ever arise," this question was not (as Mrs. Tuchman seems to think) unanswerable. To such as Kropotkin, corruption and oppression were historical necessities, designed to reveal to man the horrid features of his Tempter. From this point of view, the theorists advocated "the propaganda of the deed"—attentat, assassination. Strike the Serpent in his most glittering form—a czar, a President of France, an empress of Austria. But, alas, such excesses led only to worse things. When anarchism's terrorists began throwing bombs mindlessly into theatres and cafés they seemed (like the flogging English headmaster, who wished that his scholars had only one bottom among them) to be saying that all mankind should be collectively chastised, since it stubbornly refused to recognize how good it was. In the end, the theorists disavowed the terrorists; they may have realized that Eden thinking ends only in death; and anarchism drifted away into organized movements, such as syndicalism, whose very name implies organization of a sort.

The anarchists did succeed in emphasizing (to put it mildly) the hypocrisy and misery which flourished under the capitalist state. If organization had not been alien to their mutualist philosophy, who knows how far they might have gone? The Socialists were organizers to a man; but the Socialists, in turn, did not succeed in their great and most humane endeavor, and that was to persuade all workers to down tools in the event of a declaration of war. Perhaps it was their compulsive fragmentation—splendidly described in "The Death of Jaurès"—which did them in; but more probably it was the fact that, unless all workers in all major states downed tools, the result would be frightful; for then the state whose workers had not struck would inevitably overwhelm the rest.

To express it another way, the only means of preventing war is to do so before it has broken out. Si vis pacem, para pacem: this is the difficult lesson which (I think) the governors of this world will learn, are indeed already learning, before it is too late. Manifestly, the official classes of Mrs. Tuchman's world were of another mind. Her chapter on the peace conferences shows that the personages gathered there were concerned only with formulating the rules under which it would be possible to conduct a war. But because that world was misgoverned then, must we blame this on humanity? Or, conversely, must we say that humanity always deserves the government it gets? Rightly or wrongly, I believe in the possibility of progressive government. But I believe that it is government, not humanity, that has to learn to be humane.

Schisms & Chasms

THE STATE OF WAR: Essays in the Theory and Practice of International Politics. By Stanley Hoffmann. Frederick A. Praeger. 276 pp. $5.95.

Irving Louis Horowitz

This book of essays proved disquieting. Not because its author's brilliant shafts lacked incisiveness, nor because it dramatically altered my picture of the world; my discomfort stemmed rather from a nagging sensation that I had been through these arguments before. The State of War recalled to mind dozens of issues I had grappled with—and not always as successfully as Mr. Hoffmann—in my own book of essays, The War Game. Yet Mr. Hoffmann's volume differs quite markedly from mine. His work called to mind the Symphonie Fantastique, in which the beautiful waltz scherzo of the second movement is transformed into a grotesque parody of the witches' sabbath in the fifth movement. The State of War has a remarkable capacity for clear initial statement which slowly declines into a sad and bitter pessimism (in the name of realism, of course), where Rousseau, Game Theory and Dialectic all become tragic grotesqueries.

Mr. Hoffmann and I (along with many social scientists) share a theory of programed conflict, view with similar disdain moralistic approaches to political problems, and have the same ultimate hope that the value of survival will prove to be more compelling than the interests of nation, class or prestige. But for him all of this shared wisdom is offered in the name of a hard-nosed continuance of the cold war, while I offered my interpretation as evidence that the cold war is obsolete and useless. The uncomfortable feeling therefore has to do with this: that if Mr. Hoffmann and I were in accord on the facts, then our discord was precisely over the question of morality—which I dare say we both seem too ready to dismiss as rhetoric.

But before being driven to such a conclusion, I felt it important, to myself at any rate, to see whether we were in fundamental agreement as to matters of fact and theory. With only slender satisfaction, I can say that the difference between The State of War and The War Game is not only a moral schism but, just as assuredly, a scientific chasm.

Mr. Hoffmann's book is divided into nine chapters. Six and one-half of them are more or less linked to the title, while the other two and one-half are essays in the history of ideas—from Rousseau, Kant and Hobbes to Aron, Schelling, Kahn and Tucker. Hoffmann is at his best as a historian of ideas, but the bulk of the book and the burden of the argument rest upon the chapters directly concerned with the "state of war." Chapters 2, 3 and the first part of Chapter 8 could well form the basis of a study in the the-

---

Irving Louis Horowitz is professor of sociology and Director of Studies in Comparative International Development at Washington University (St. Louis). He is the author, among other books, of The New Sociology (Oxford University Press), Revolution in Brazil (Dutton) and The War Game (Ballantine).

"In the field of international social psychology, THE PATTERN OF HUMAN CONCERNS is clearly a work of first magnitude."
—PROFESSOR GORDON ALLPORT, Harvard University

by HADLEY CANTRIL

Using a brilliantly original technique of psychological exploration, this simply stated book proposes a new way of looking at mankind's social structure. Employing what they term the Self-Anchoring Striving Scale, Dr. Cantril and his associates reveal how people everywhere feel about their lives and nations, the pasts, presents, and futures.

Their study embraces nearly a third of all the people on earth—citizens of both developed and developing countries, of democracies, of dictatorships—a coverage of fourteen nations, five continents, and many islands, including—importantly—Cuba and the Dominican Republic. Dr. Cantril's fresh method of approach shows how it is possible to avoid many errors in the exercise of national policy, and to embark on policies which offer a likelihood of success.

Dr. Cantril has been an adviser to four of the last five United States administrations. His report deals with the real world. Its implications embrace politics, government, history, social science, economics, cultural anthropology and a dozen other fields.

Charts, diagrams, 450 pages, $10.00

This volume is one of a group of major works published in celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of Rutgers, The State University.

THE PATTERN OF HUMAN CONCERNS

•

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Brunswick, New Jersey

oretical underpinnings of conflict theory in political and social science; but its critical spirit somehow does not carry over into the analysis of the main body of the text. Perhaps the problem is that this is a set of papers written over a five-year period, and reflects uneasy responses to amorphous audiences. Even in their "considerably revised" form, we have a set of essays held together by the author's sentiments rather than by a systematic accounting.

Hoffmann's sense of the dialectic is magnetic, perhaps even a bit magical. For instance, he can break out of the number three only once in the important chapter on International Systems and International Law:

A new system in the stakes of conflict is said to emerge when there is a new answer to the questions: (1) What are the units in potential conflict? (2) What can the units do to one another in a conflict? (3) What do the units want to do?

Next, the kind of alteration in the system is indicated by changes (1) that do not affect the system as such, (2) merely weaken the system, (3) ruin the system altogether.

The balance of power which brought about equilibrium in the classical period is then divided into three: (1) relative equilibrium among major states which are more than two in number, (2) common ties that cut across national lines, (3) systems in which the state exercises only limited power over its citizens.

Conversely the process of international deterioration is also subdivided into threes: (1) irrepressible ambitions of individual rulers, (2) the destruction of transnational ties through technological innovation, (3) strong integrative tendencies in the nation leading to heightened nationalism.

After a brief interlude, where the number four intrudes, we return to dialectical gamesmanship in describing stable international systems: (1) The law of the political framework. (2) The law of reciprocity. (3) The law of community. This dialectic of "the obsolete and the premature" goes on through the entire chapter. Indeed, even the chapter itself is subdivided into three parts. What is wrong with all this is not dialectics, but its didactics. Instead of concrete studies of international law, we get systems analyses. The legal order is said to be based on (1) common ends, (2) variations in time and (3) variations of space. Specific analysis yields to the pressure of a metaphysical catalogue. The purpose of this baroque jumble of categories is brutally simple: to tell us that the solidity of international law remains in serious if not inevitable doubt. Out of such dialectical mountains are molehills fashioned.

WHY DON'T YOU WRITE?

EARN EXTRA MONEY IN SPARETIME writing short stories, articles on business, travel, hobbies, local, club and church activities. Under the guidance of professional writer-editors, you learn by writing at home through the fascinating NIA Copy Desk Method. FREE "Writing Aptitude Test" tells whether you have qualities to become a successful writer. Write TODAY. No obligation. No salesman. 41st Yr. Lic. by N.Y. State. Acc'd't Member NHSC

NIA
WRITERS INSTITUTE DIVISION
Newspaper Institute of America
Suite 5196-B, Two Park Ave., N.Y. 10036

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

The world Mr. Hoffmann creates is so "realistic," it is unbelievable. There are no economic forces at work propelling nations. There are no popular classes moving to gain independence from the bureaucratic empires of both East and West. There are no sloppy problems in the world but only systems about the world. As long as real dialectic is kept out of the reckoning—the dialectic of how the other participants to the game of war perceive war and the potential for peace—then, of course, Mr. Hoffmann can hardly be confounded. But the intellectual rigidity which motivates the author is irrepressible.

In a remarkable paragraph on restraints and choices in American policy, he writes:

> One is bound by one's commitments; one is committed even by one's mistakes. The United States may be free to avoid new and mistaken entanglements in the future, but it is not free to tear out of its scrapbook the political misjudgments of the past. Nor is it free to avoid entanglements altogether. (The mediocrity of SEATO as an instrument of foreign policy has led, not to a United States withdrawal from the defense of Southeast Asia, but to a downgrading of this particular alliance in favor of direct United States involvement.) Once more, freedom of action shrinks to mitigating the bitterness of the unavoidable.

What can this mean but the carefree abandon of the gambler—the "patriot" rather than the "expert" taking command? The fate of the gambler is that the rules of the game itself drive him to desperation. Programing conflict is a marvelous phrase—but such programing relies so heavily on the equilibrium which obtained even before the game gets under way that its utility as a root concept is questionable. The actual game has its own dialectic—and as Hoffmann shows, Russian Roulette is inevitably the outcome. To be committed to one's mistakes is to be committed to the probability of defeat. To think of every concession as a political collapse is to be committed to the inevitability of war. It is to confess the bankruptcy of the international "peril parity." Mr. Hoffmann's celebration of indeterminacy, ambiguity and a patternless world may lead to its opposite, a demand for determinacy, precision and manifest destiny—to a commitment to one's mistakes. What is so frightening is how accurately Hoffmann's views portray the current moment and mood in United States history.

The most significant scientific dilemma involved in Hoffmann's approach is his insistence on dividing the political world into two parts: the domestic and the international. The "domestic" ostensibly reveals a consensual pattern and is "based on the model of the integrated society." The "international" is based on a conflictual pattern, and represents a "decentralized milieu divided into separate units." This dualism enables the author to rule out of consideration civil wars or wars of national liberation. It fosters his already highly concentrated elitism by allowing him to consider men and nations of the Third World as manipulated tools of the big-power struggle. He speaks of revolutionary movements "as proxies for both Russia and China." Having convinced himself that the "domestic" is grounded in the idea of community, he can come to no other conclusion than that the absence of community is internationally inspired by the "game situation."

Such a dualism has serious analytic consequences. It stops one from examining the interpenetration of national and international goals. Take one recent instance: the Dominican Republic. The Dominican crisis can be considered an example of the trade-off policies of the Democratic Party—engaged in by its Presidential leadership from Woodrow Wilson to the present. The Democratic Party has a long history of bartering international self-determination schemes for national social security programs. That is to say, the classical technique has been to silence the opposition by maintaining a harder-than-thou posture toward the threat of international communism. In this way, the party can dissociate its domestic program of "creeping socialism" from any implications that such domestic legislation will aid the Communists. The Democratic Party posture—from the belated involvement of the United States in World War I, the arms embargo on weapons for Republican Spain in the thirties, the intervention in the Greek Civil War in the forties, etc.—has been to accept commitments to conservative foreign regimes in order to gain the advantage for liberal domestic programs. This pragmatic policy has been highly successful: it greased the path for the New Deal, the Fair Deal, the New Frontier and now the Great Society. There can be little doubt that this is but one instance of how national and international politics can be understood only as two sides of the same coin, rather than as qualitatively different entities.

The most significant philosophical dilemma involved here is Hoffmann's exaggerated sense of voluntarism in politics. As if political strategies of an age uninformed by past experience express anything other than the shared illusions of that age. He speaks of "spectacular mistakes" made by political leaders without considering the possibility that the ignominious defeat which engulfed Hitler on the Russian front is not nearly so much a matter of caprice and miscalculation as it is of the inevitable clash of world empires moving in contrary directions. To speak of the "mistake" of risking too much or too little as a threat to security or survival is naive, since one knows mistakes by the consequences rather than the prediction of events. The purpose of this voluntarism is to reinforce the untested premise that modern revolutions multiply the risks of war. This may be true when revolutions are carried out by small nations that leave intact the essential balance of forces (as did Cuba in the Western Hemisphere), but it is just as certain that warfare is minimized when revolution is carried out by major global areas that thoroughly restructure power balances, as in Russia in 1918 or China in 1949. What Hoffmann terms "risk" is therefore little more than the strident belief of current United States policy makers that any shift in the international equilibrium is in itself untenable and unacceptable.

Mr. Hoffmann uses the word "modest" in the most immodest way possible — as a warning against doing things or saying things which go beyond the confines of his vision of game theory; for example, a "modest pretension." Furthermore, he employs a barrage of terms quite differently from ordinary usage: strategy is used to replace rather than augment principles; balance of power is the same as bi-polarization; commitment is a surrogate for fanaticism; concession is akin to capitulation; realism becomes an equivalent to whatever the situation now is (as Hoffmann perceives it to be); operational is any policy unhampered by considerations other than victory.

What ultimately makes the book obsolete is not Hoffmann's vocabulary but the political motives behind his vocabulary: his notion that the major consequence of nuclear weapons has been to substitute crises for wars. Raymond Aron's premise is no longer true; for in the post-nuclear era, what has become decisive is the replacement of "crisis" (of the higher dialectical gamesmanship practiced by the major powers) with small wars. Indeed, to the extent that Aron is correct, Hoffmann draws the least interesting inference. For in a world of continuing crisis, the moral basis of conflict becomes more, not less, urgent and compelling.

We are told that the best social science can do is to show the limits of our knowledge and provide tools for the analysis of concrete situations. Causal analysis — single or multiple, historical analysis, and integrating principles for that matter—is held to be immodest and hence invalid. Mr. Hoffmann salutes his intellectual mentor Raymond Aron by noting that Peace and War is "a monument of scholarship in the service of doubt." One can only reverse the phrase when dealing with the author of The State of War: he has provided us with a monument of doubt in the service of scholarship. What is now required is not a celebration of doubt but the removal of at least some doubt through diplomacy.

Is He A Trendy?

JOHN BUCHAN. By Janet Adam Smith. Little, Brown & Co. 524 pp. $7.50.

Mordecai Richler

In the end, you've got to like John Buchan. Before accepting the job of Governor-General of Canada in 1935, he made a list of pros and cons, which included the following:

AGAINST	Too easy a job for a comparatively young man A country and people without much glamour
FOR	An immediate peerage might revive mother

Buchan got his immediate peerage, becoming Lord Tweedsmuir, which prompted Ezra Pound, of all people, to write: "Thank god for one Brit. peer who didn't BUY it or get it by DIRT." Pound, it seems, not only admired Buchan's thrillers, among them The Thirty-Nine Steps, but shared with him an enthusiasm for social credit and anti-Semitism. Describing a 1903 affair in Park Lane, Buchan wrote: "a true millionaire's dinner — fresh strawberries in April, plovers' eggs, hooky noses and diamonds." On the other hand, as Buchan's biographer, Janet Adam Smith observes, with an unconscious sense of parody, some of young Buchan's best and richest friends were Jews; and again in 1903, this time as one of Milner's young chaps in South Africa, Buchan went so far out on a limb as to write that it would be unfair to think of Johannesburg as "Judasburg":

> You will see more Jews than in Montreal or Aberdeen, but not more than in Paris; and any smart London restaurant will show as large a Semitic proportion as a Johannesburg club.

Furthermore, like many another young anti-Semite, Buchan mellowed into an active supporter of Zionism, a speaker at Jewish National Fund dinners, perhaps in the hope that hooky-nosed gourmets would quit Mayfair for the Negev.

But Buchan, I must say, was an astute Governor-General, full of insights into the Canadian soul. On the occasion of King Edward VIII's having his thing with Mrs. Simpson (the real-life story now being filmed with the principals by Jack Le Vien and soon to open in hard tops all across the Commonwealth), he wrote Baldwin: "Canada is the most Puritanical part of the Empire and cherishes very much the Victorian standards in private life. . . ." Buchan also grasped immediately that Canada suffered from a Mordecai Richler, a Canadian novelist now living in England, is the author of The Apprenticeship of Dudie Kravitz (Little, Brown) and Stick Your Neck Out (Simon & Schuster).

---

SPRING SEMESTER IN THE CLASSROOM

THE NATION

"Wherever I go, I continue to introduce The Nation to my classes in International Relations as a journal whose informative articles are accompanied by sane, constructive editorials, pungently and effectively expressed."
—D. F. Fleming, California State College, Los Angeles

"I have used The Nation for twenty years in my courses in American Government and American foreign policy. Its consistently high level of performance has made it the most useful aid of any periodical attempting to interpret the American scene."
—Norman L. Parks, Middle Tennessee State College, Murfreesboro

"I find The Nation an invaluable classroom aid for the teaching of American problems because of its objectivity, readability and low cost per student."
—Darrell Hawes, Bend (Ore.) High School

For the convenience of teachers, who want to use The Nation in the classroom, we offer a special classroom rate.

65c per month per student in bundle orders of ten or more delivered to the same address. Desk copy is supplied free to the teacher. Simply fill out the coupon below for immediate service.

THE NATION, Education Department
333 6th Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me .... copies per month for .... months. (Minimum order ten copies per month.)

☐ Check enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

2-14-66

great deal of provincialism and that the "crying need" was for "some national leader who would really guide the thought and touch the imagination of the whole country." In Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister he suffered so gracefully, Buchan saw no such leader. King, a crafty politician but unbelievably embarrassing sentimentalist, was a bachelor who kept pictures of his dead mommy everywhere, and consulted spiritualists rather than Washington before making major policy decisions (which, incidentally, suggests a theme for a future study of Canadian policy, foreign and domestic: on balance, were mediums less harmful to Canadian development than FDR, JFK and LBJ?).

Buchan also understood that Quebec was a major Canadian problem and that:

> A great deal of blame attaches, I think, to the English population. There is a truculent Orange element in Ontario, and in Montreal, where the whole business world is run by the English, who are only a quarter of the population, there has been in the past a good deal of arrogance and unfriendliness. . . . It is not easy to get any kind of imaginative outlook from the ordinary hard-faced business man.

He was refreshingly receptive to the ideas of bright young Canadians, like David Lewis, then national secretary of the C.C.F. (now the New Democratic Party), and actually read radical Canadian journals like The Canadian Forum, a reading habit shared with possibly 2,000 other Canadians.

In 1939, Buchan, bless him, brought King George VI to Canada on a visit. While the King never actually stopped on our street in Montreal, he did pass nearby and we were all scrubbed and turned out of school to wave at him on our first unscheduled holiday, as I recall it, since Buster Crabbe, the Tarzan of our day, had spoken to us on Canada Youth Day. For as long as George VI was in Canada my friends and I used to set pennies down on the tracks to be flattened by passing freight trains and then fan out into rich neighborhoods, where we told the kids the royal train had gone over them and got a nickel for each.

This tour, Janet Adam Smith writes, gave "great impulse to the growth of Canadian national feeling, as against provincial. French Canadians had begun to talk of 'our' rather than 'your' King and Queen." Lord Crawford wrote from London: "The visit has given Canada a status never quite conceded hitherto. Canada now stands out more distinct from the U.S.A., with her own personality clearly defined. . . ." To which I can only add: fiddlesticks. A year later the Mayor of Montreal, Camillien Houde, was interned for telling French-Canadians not to register for military service, and thousands took his advice, tore up their draft cards and took to the hills, rather than fight "a British war." Since then, of course, French-Canadian comments on the royal family are largely unprintable. As for us, the hooky-nosed, our feeling for the royal family was characterized by an amused benevolence. They didn't affect the price of potatoes. An enterprising lady on our street, Mrs. Miller of Miller's Bakery, baked the largest chaleh we had ever seen and sent it to Buckingham Palace for Princess Margaret's birthday. Her picture appeared in all the newspapers. "For local distribution," she told reporters, "we also bake knishes and cater for weddings."

Janet Adam Smith's biography, highly praised in England, cannot be faulted elsewhere. It is clearly a labor of love, impressively researched. She succeeds in convincing us that Buchan, with all his prejudices, was a decent and honorable proconsul. The archetypal self-made gentleman, jolly good at many things, embarrassingly excellent at none. He is survived by such as Harold Macmillan and Sir Alec Douglas-Home, which is another way of saying, if one may lapse briefly into contemporary British parlance, he is not a trendy.

Yet Another Interview With B. Bonnet

L. L. Case

(An interview with Beauregard Bonnet, author of In Cold Weather, the much discussed fur trappers' handbook, which many critics have hailed as a brilliant new departure in creative writing: A novel, in this case an arctic romance, cast here in the form of a nonfiction reference book, a compendium of statistical tables, charts and graphs.)

Mr. Bonnet, most reviewers have been surprised by your switching to a fictional theme, considering that your reputation has been based almost exclusively on your celebrated actuarial tables published by the Scylla and Charybdis Life Insurance Company in the forties. It must have taken a lot of soul searching before you decided to venture into fiction.

It certainly did. And I must say I didn't get much encouragement. When I first formed my theories of fiction as nonfiction my friends were unsympathetic. They felt that what I proposed—a tabular form that employed the most modern techniques of statistical method but was at the same time compellingly fictional — was nothing more than a mathematical solution for tired statisticians suffering from lack of data. I felt, I must say, that it was they who lacked data!

My theory, you see, is that you can take any fictional theme and make it into fiction as nonfiction. I don't mean by that, of course, that just faking some charts to prove a political point would qualify; it's an interesting genre, to be sure, but impure, without either the poetic altitude of fiction or the artistic integrity of a good bell-shaped distribution. I've been quoted, incidentally, as saying that fiction is now more factual than nonfiction. That's not what I said. I simply feel that fiction has been neglected, and that it has great relevance to 20th-century data processing.

Some critics have charged that fiction-nonfiction isn't really new.

Oh, sure. Usually they bring up Moby-Dick. But they're wrong, of course. Everybody knows that Moby-Dick was a treatise on whaling, but some of these people have been trying for years to prove that Melville really wanted to make a novel out of it. I don't believe it for a minute. He wrote this perfectly good whaling book and made it sound like a novel. Quite the other way around, and old hat, really. And it's just as useless for a writer whose talent is essentially fictional to attempt fiction-nonfiction, because it simply won't work. Do you follow me? A factual orientation is fundamental. I hate to sound querulous or arrogant about this, but I truly don't believe anything like what I have done exists in the history of fiction.

Getting back to your book, I think everyone agrees the climax was breath-taking. I'd like to know how you managed to resolve it.

You're referring, I know, to Graph 34, but I don't think of it as the climax. If you go back to Tables 14 and 15, you'll see that the intersection of the two principal curves was inevitable, given the situation set forth in Chart 33. The optimum conditions for Jane's survival were clear, even though the only variables explicitly compared in Table 14 were temperature and length of exposure. The style of parka she wore, her blood count, her hair length, her socio-economic background, her hygiene-aptitude scores, and the various other factors were what we call self-canceling. And ditto for Dick, from Table 15. Graph 34 merely carried through from Chart 33, by extrapolation; their two curves, though parabolic, were not parallel. Intersection was both possible and necessary. So Dick and Jane not only survived, but got together at the end, even though they lost their dog Spot. Sorry about that, of course.

Anyway, I'm glad you liked it. I was emotionally exhausted for weeks after I finished. But at least I'm certain that I brought it off perfectly. The book will be a classic.

A few people—I'd rather not mention names—have implied you've made a good thing out of your book financially. Any comment?

Well, why not? I went way out on a limb and risked six years of my life not to get rich but to invent a serious new art form for posterity. Besides,

---

L. L. Case's satires have appeared in The New Yorker and the New York Herald Tribune.

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________

ADDRESS ____________

CITY ____________

STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

what if I make a million dollars or so, what's so great about that? Anyway, a boy has to hustle.

I couldn't agree with you more. Tell me, is it true that you never used a computer?

Yes, it is. I've always felt that a computer is incapable of the sophisticated nuance I require; besides, the flashing lights give me a headache. Even an old-fashioned calculating machine artificializes, you might say, the atmosphere of a statistical application to a novelistic problem. So I began, twelve years ago, to train myself to use an abacus. It took me a year and a half of daily practice to achieve perfect accuracy. And I'm terribly, terribly clever about that. When the abacus told me something a little bit wobbly, the beads slid from right to left, so I'd go over that part again. I'm an algebraic Paganini. I knew then, you see, that I was going to initiate a new art form, and I wanted to make sure it got off to a good start.

Are you planning another novel in this genre?

I'm thinking about it. Geodetic Press was rather pleased with the success of In Cold Weather, you know, and they're after me to do another. What I have in mind—this is only exploratory, understand—is a study of beach erosion in the West Indies. My working title is Shifting Sands, and the protagonist behind the charts will be a kind of modern Robinson Crusoe. I may make him a writer who is fed up with bestsellers, movie rights and book-promotion gimmicks, who loses himself on an island where there is no television and no interviewing. Everything is fine for a while, but what he doesn't know is that the beach-erosion rate on this particular island is increasing geometrically, and soon, well, you can see what I'm leading up to. I've already roughed out some marvelous charts!

I'll have my slide rule ready for it, Mr. Bonnet, and many thanks.

THEATRE

Harold Clurman

NOTES

Some weeks have passed since I felt impelled to say anything at length about the new plays on or off Broadway. A play must possess a certain degree of merit for me to take the pains to denounce it. One of the vices of our theatre as well as of our criticism which exercises a malignant effect on our audiences is the practice of discussing shows in superlatives of praise or rejection. Is it worth anyone's trouble to expatiate on the inedibility of a rotten egg?

I am reminded of a critic who said in depreciation of a well-known and generally respected dramatist that he had a "second-rate mind." A second-rate mind is a very good mind if one begins to think of those one might cite as first rate: Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, Spinoza. In what rank does Ibsen belong if we compare him to Aeschylus or Shakespeare; where does Pirandello stand in relation to Sophocles or Dante? And if Aeschylus, Shakespeare, Sophocles or Dante are "placed" higher than the others, does it signify that Ibsen or Pirandello is thereby nullified and cannot add to our understanding and pleasure?

The silly rating of artists by categories which are extremely vague and not really helpful to anything except perhaps to the critics' self-esteem must be decried. We are a hasty and lazy lot, we theatre critics, and we indulge our egos to the detriment of craftsmen and artists who in most respects are our superiors. This does not matter much except that our readers' minds are frequently softened in proportion to the stiffening of our critical snobbery.

I can be severe with Marat/Sade because it interested me in many ways. A play like Cactus Flower by Abe Burrows out of a successful French ("Boulevard") comedy does not exasperate or bore me (Royale Theatre). I liked looking at Brenda Vaccaro. I thought the others (Lauren Bacall, Barry Nelson and the rest) pleasantly proficient, and like most of the audience I found numerous occasions for laughter. It's a "good show." But I have seen its equivalent many, many times all over the world, and beyond taking note of its commercial smile I see no value in further critical examination of it.

The Mad Show (at The New Theatre, 154 East 54 Street) is called a musical revue based on Mad magazine—a publication that has hitherto escaped my attention though it may be widely read. It is a very fast show: a series of high-voltage blackouts. Most of them are marked by joshing rather than satire of television—offensive to no one. One gasps at the pace, guffaws at the snappy punch lines, and appreciates one's own hipness as it reflects that of the entertainment. The company's four participants (particularly Linda Lavin in The Boy From—which is musically the best of Mary Rodgers' numbers) all work hard and well. Lyrics are by Marshall Barer, Larry Siegel and Steven Vinaver, and "Alfred E. Neuman's" biff-bang-thank-you-ma'am direction achieves its purpose. I had a brisk good time, but now some weeks since I attended the spree I can barely remember any of the things which amused me during the evening.

There is more substantial fun in the two one-act plays by Douglas Turner Ward at the St. Marks Playhouse (133 Second Avenue), the first of which is called Happy Ending, the second, Day of Absence.

Happy Ending is a comedy skit about the exploitation of a silly and wealthy white couple by a family of Negro servants. They relish fleecing their no-account victims and we are gratified by their malice.

More biting and more pertinent is Day of Absence. In this the all-Negro (but one) cast plays white folk in very jolly masks—a "reverse minstrel show." In a small Southern town, the author bids us suppose all the black inhabitants have disappeared for one day. The white citizenry cannot conduct any of its business. The wellborn lady doesn't know how to feed or diaper her baby; no one is capable of cleaning, sewing, administering or brightening anything.

A batch of Southern types is introduced from the Mayor (played by the actor-author with considerable gusto) down to the Mop Man. All are characterized with hilarious caricatural skill. The play is somewhat too wordy, but provides us with a proper poke, even as it tickles. The direction by Philip Meister displays an ability to draw savage strokes of guying, so that the show exhilarates with a good swift kick in the seat of our conscience and risibilities.

What interests me most in Stanley Mann's two one-act plays which are being presented at the Cherry Lane Theatre, under the collective title Rooms, is the acting. The first of the two plays, Better Luck

Next Time, is a gimmicky comedy with one memorably witty line—something better than a wisecrack—and a few incidental pleasantries. The second play, A Walk in Dark Places, is a dramatization of a clinical case history involving hysteria, homosexuality, rape, drugs, madness and sundry psychic bumps from the trivial to the criminal. All this is projected as an alienist's office investigation resembling a trial scene.

None of the acting is "great": how often must it be said that great acting is almost more exceptional than great plays and that it benefits nobody to discover "greatness" in every effective performance. Shirley Knight, a handsome girl, alternates a comedy characterization of a lovable nitwit in the first piece, with the portrayal of a pathological young woman in the second. (George Keathley's direction in the comedy is too scrupulously exact or studied to establish the ease needed to relax the actress and the audience sufficiently for full enjoyment.) As far as the scheme of the play allows, Miss Knight's enactment of the sick girl is arrestingly graphic in its painful tensions.

Irene Dailey plays a professional divorce co-respondent with fine assurance and crisp intelligence in the first play, and brings an honest command based on emotional and technical maturity to the second—the coordination of personal experience or content with the calm of craftsmanship.

These performances (in addition to those of James Broderick in both plays) made me aware once again how versatile a company of young American actors might prove, how much they might offer us if there were really permanent companies in true repertory theatres around the country. The significant feature about the performances in Rooms is that, though they are not extraordinary in the sense of "genius" or breath-taking "inspiration," they are the kind we might frequently witness if actors were more often given the opportunity to play such contrasting roles as the actors do here.

In this regard I recalled with some melancholy that Irene Dailey, who made her New York stage debut in a bit part in Maxwell Anderson's Truckline Cafe in 1946, was never again seen in New York till she appeared in The Subject Was Roses in 1964.

Shall I remind my readers that there are other forms of theatre to be enjoyed besides those up- or downtown, on the main stem or in the byways of the city? There is, for one thing, the Dance. With the American Ballet at the New York State Theatre branch of the Lincoln Center festivities, one may admire the Broadway brilliance of Jerome Robbins' version of Stravinsky's Les Noces—a theatrical masterpiece. I use the qualification "Broadway" in this instance not as a pejorative but as a descriptive term. For though Stravinsky's score is eminently Russian (as well as "cosmopolitan"), and the original interpretation I saw at its world première in Paris many years ago confined itself to a stark black and white and the curious stiffness of a pristine religiosity, there can be no question that Robbins' variations and concatenations of a peculiarly American energy, with its hectic precision and feverish challenge of invention, serve Stravinsky in a marvelously original manner, adding new notes to the vocabulary of the dance theatre.

RECORDS

Benjamin Boretz

BACH: Brandenburg Concertos. Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Herbert Von Karajan, cond. (Nos. 1-6); with Suites Nos. 2 and 3. DGG 1(3)8 976/78.

Concentus Musicus, Vienna; Nikolaus Harnoncourt, cond. (Nos. 2, 5, 6) Telefunken (S)AWT 9460-A Ex.

Marlboro Festival Orchestra; Pablo Casals, cond. Columbia M2L 331/ M2S 731.

Bach, evidently, can be misinterpreted in an inexhaustible variety of ways, of which three are given definitive representations on these Brandenburg Concerto recordings. Von Karajan, at his usual loss when confronted by music whose structural issues cannot be dodged behind sheer sound or propulsion, takes his usual course of substituting broad "interpretative" conceits for any real consideration of the compositional ideas at hand—not really that complex in the Brandenburgs, after all. Here the notion is to "characterize" each movement by imposing a single articulative approach on every event; thus every attack within a given movement is either completely detached or completely slurred. Whatever doubts remain are drowned in official symphony-orchestra sound. The latter, at least, provides some peripheral laughs: the booming reentry of the overkill string tutti after the (competently played) tiny-voiced harpsichord cadenza in the first movement of No. 5 has a grotesque pathos; the slow movement of No. 1 seems to have been performed under the curious illusion that it was the Tristan prelude; and the slowly unfolding sonorities of the first movement of No. 6 could, with a simple tonal transposition, be played at Bayreuth before the curtain to Das Rheingold without arousing anyone's suspicions. The orchestra, soloists and recording engineers add no further complications beyond the rather badly out-of-tune horn playing in some of the First Concerto, especially the third movement.

The performances by the Concentus Musicus of Vienna, on the other hand, are models of misplaced historicity, careful in their use of all the "authentic" instruments and ensemble dimensions, with no equivalent concern for the resultant balances, or for any particular weighting of accents, dynamics or phrases. Thus, although the performers all play within the same time span, and with respectable accuracy, they don't seem to be playing together in any musically significant sense; the effect in Bach's tightly interlocking textures is almost comical at times. What emerges may indeed be "the sound Bach heard"— his well-known views on the competence of contemporary performers gives some substance to this claim — but it is certainly not the music he composed; the neutral Baroquery of the Collegium Musicum is no nearer to Bach than is Von Karajan's Venusberg.

The Casals album is still another matter, for it represents far more a cruel and cynical exploitation of the eccentricities of an old man, whose name is still prestigious and salable,

SUMMERLANE CAMP
in the tradition of
The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill
The Gorky Colony
Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.
•
Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19
•
BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

HELP TUSKEGEE SECURE JUSTICE IN ALABAMA

- by ending terror and murder
- by enforcing rule by law
- by representative juries
- by actual desegregation
- by registering voters
- by electing good leaders

Financial aid urgently needed
by Tuskegee Institute faculty, students and community.

AD HOC COMMITTEE FOR JUSTICE IN MACON COUNTY
Box 99, Tuskegee Institute, Ala.

PERSONALS

"PLAY IT AGAIN, SAM."

GIANT photo mural . . . typical "BOGIE" pose, (43"x30") from one of his most famous movie roles, lithographed on poster stock . . . shipped in protective mailing tube. $2.00 postpaid. Hudson Industries, Dept. N, 116 Charles Street, New York, N.Y. 10014

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons. $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

COOPERATIVE LIVING aimed at a permanent community patterned after B. F. Skinner's WALDEN TWO. Write: Walden House, Box 53, Mt. Rainier, Maryland.

PART-TIME SALESMAN—Office Snack Bar. College student preferred. Hours flexible. Call Paul, 212 - HA 8-6504 after 7 PM, or write Box 581, c/o The Nation.

PUBLISHER'S EDITOR — writer, analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. French-English Box 580, c/o The Nation.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 2-14-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY ....

STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

than any serious offering of a performance of the Brandenburg Concertos. The resultant exhibition is painful; madly fast or erratically fluctuating tempos, screaming accents, sudden spurtings out of inner-part fragments and equally sudden fade-in-fade-out volume changes, as if someone were randomly turning volume controls for each part independently, as well as for the entire ensemble. In this context, Rudolf Serkin's sober (piano) playing of the harpsichord cadenzas in No. 5, and, in general, the exemplary precision with which all of Casals' instructions are carried out by the Marlboro performers, thus projecting every oddity with brilliant clarity, only make the experience all the weirder.

BACH: Hohe Messe (Mass in B-minor). Soloists, Chorus, and Orchestra of the Netherlands Bach Society; Anthon van der Horst, cond. Telefunken (S)AWT 9416/18.

A performance in the good, clear Netherlands choral tradition, textually faithful and utterly straightforward, which again results in the transformation of the intensely special language of Bach's ideas into the common formulas of his Baroque predecessors. Even more than the Concentus Musicus recording of the Brandenburgs, this represents a highly professional execution of an essentially amateur conception; such, evidently, is the increasingly inescapable fate of works of great internal profundity and complexity that are superficially easy to perform, but it seems an inappropriate subject for a recording project.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Sonatas: in B-flat, Op. 106 ("Hammerklavier"); in A-flat, Op. 110. Charles Rosen, piano. Epic LC 3900/BC 1300.

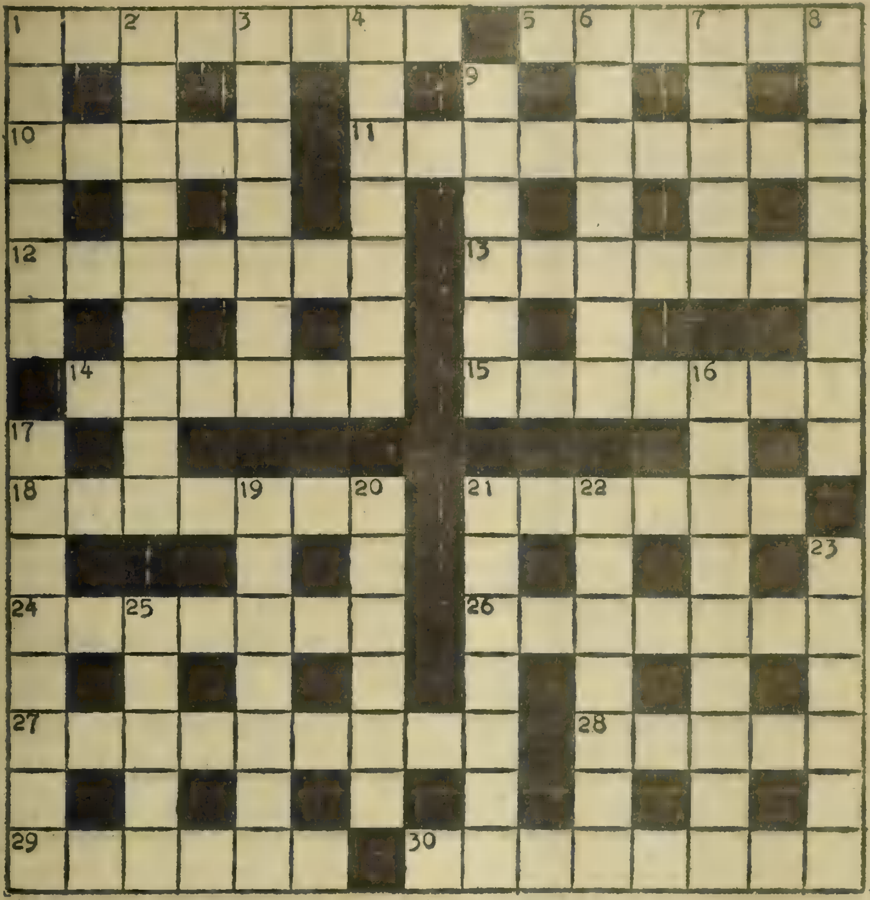
If Charles Rosen is not the most remarkable living pianist, there must be other criteria for that distinction than the capacity to play the Hammerklavier at the tempo and with the sonority and control that one had always assumed were reserved for the "ideal piano" obviously conceived by Beethoven—to be heard only mentally during a reading of the score or by inference from the best possible, necessarily imperfect performance. Rosen's capacity to project both the long-range pitch and rhythmic structure (especially the way pitches in the same register connect as linear and durational profiles even when separated by long time spans) is truly sensational. In the outer movements, this is accomplished by taking tempos fast enough to give unitary coherence to large-scale events; and within these astonishingly concentrated time spans, every detail is not only clearly articulated but sonically and accentually weighted so that its precise relational meaning is clear. In the slow movement, this same precision of weighting, particularly in sonority and volume, sustains the coherence of succession over remarkably long and slowly unfolding passages. And the transition among the tempos, textures and sonorities of the Adagio and those of the Fugue, achieved as a wholly continuous succession, is perhaps the most impressive moment of all. Throughout, one has the sense that Rosen is aware of all the events taking place in the length and breadth of the work's texture, not just those at the registral extremes or immediately adjacent to one another; it is this quality, above all, that seems to give his performance its wonderfully complex intelligibility.

BEETHOVEN: The Rasumovsky Quartets (Opus 59, Nos. 1-3); Quartet, Op. 74 ("Harp"). The Juilliard String Quartet. Epic SC 6052/BSC 152.

The Juilliard's performances are characteristically purposeful, with a tensile alertness to every nuance and detail that produces precisely the right framework for the projection of Beethoven's string-quartet ideas. Their realization of the extended dynamic, accentual and registral ranges of the works (perhaps facilitated in Bartók-Schoenbergian retrospect) is probably equaled by no other existing group; the explosive openings of Op. 59, Nos. 2 and 3, of the Allegro of Op. 74, and the less obvious accented single cello note beginning the second movement of Op. 59, No. 2, for example, depend entirely for their identity as immediate signals of formal concentration on the instantaneously full-valued attack that the Juilliard Quartet uniquely achieves. And the final fugue of Op. 59, No. 3, is played nearer to the blinding speed required by Beethoven's metronome marking (as well as by the counterpoint of time levels essential to the entire structure) and with more precision in the machine-gun articulation of every figurational attack than any performance I have heard since the recording (on the Bartók label) by the old New Music String Quartet. But all this only makes one wish, even more, that the Juilliard Quartet would at last match its articulative capacities with an equivalent care for ensemble accuracy, intonation and sonority.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1140

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 and 5 Reared by the sound of it, and by a goat? It's one's basic job! (5, 3, 6)
10 A slice of melon and other fruit.
12 Not muffs for the listeners — they're nuisances. (7)
13 How Hans Brinker spoke of a troublesome situation. (2, 5)
14 A very minor insult! (6)
15 Claimed to be a type of school for those we might expect to cut up.
18 A recognized part of the curriculum in Pennsylvania. (7)
21 A saucy word for those who are reputedly swinging on top. (6)
24 One who applauds with the tongue, perhaps. (7)
26 Stimulated by the call of the sirens? (7)
27 Listens in actual surroundings while getting ready for play. (9)
28 Where some put chalk, as those in 27 should respond. (2, 3)
29 He used to supply fighting men, but sounds more delicate. (6)
30 Lots of these are common, on or near the highway. (4, 4)

DOWN:

1 All birds are requested to pay! (6)
2 Her suitor was a real swinger when it came to using a 24! (That's how real dames turn out!) (9)
3 Were such men of Conan Doyle hard to figure out? (7)
4 This might help drive a head out of sight, though we probably have one on hand. (4, 3)
6 Turned over and tacked on, by the sound of it. (2-5)
7 Characteristic of art, it could be.
8 To do so would be a rather warm gardening job for the dissolute. (8)
9 Such an architectural feature would be almost a triumph. (6)
16 The saucer gets broken when Kitty climbs in, looking for Friday's dinner? (9)
17 Gets experienced churchmen, possibly. (8)
19 How to find the second runner fixed. (2, 5)
20 Glaring like a fish? (6)
21 and 22 Burgundy evidently made him daring. (7, 3, 4)
23 Proving summers might be a little deadly. (6)
25 and 11 across Not a light measure for 2 ounces! (It might be experimental.) (1, 4, 2, 3, 4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1139

ACROSS: 1 Little Men; 9 Guilder; 10 Up-draft; 11, 12, 6 across and 15 down The Flight of the Bumblebee; 13 Lion; 15 Badinage; 16 and 29 It's all up to you; 18 Mahler; 20 Nowadays; 23 Lack; 24 Der Tag; 25 Alb; 28 Bastion; 30 Edwin; 31 and 26 Robert the Bruce. DOWN: 1 Light; 2 Tail-end; 3 Ladyfinger; 4 Markings; 5 Naught; 6 Odds; 7 Tsarina; 8 Entangles; 14 Straighter; 17 Tom Thumb; 19 Hacksaw; 21 Analyst; 22 Leaner; 27 Mien.

PUBLICATIONS

To Oppose War Is Not Enough,
We Need Creative Alternatives

THE FRIENDLY WORLD

welcomes subscriptions for people of all ages, in all countries. $5 yr.; $8 for 2 yrs. Includes "1966 World Holiday Calendar" featuring Hans Christian Andersen paper cuttings. THE FRIENDLY WORLD, GPO Box 1004, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11202.

Fun to Read!

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER

125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N. Cos Cob, Conn.

WHAT did Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society, really say? Send $2.00 for your postpaid copy of "The Politician." Ampel, 502 Park Avenue, N.Y.C. 10022

THE DELANO GRAPE STRIKE
(See THE NATION, page 151, Feb. 7)

"HUELGA" by Eugene Nelson

The fully documented and action packed account of the greatest attempt since the 1930's by farm workers to organize and win decent wages. 130 pp., dozens of photos, $1.50 FARM WORKER PRESS, P.O. Box 1060, Delano, California.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE PAPERBACKS. Free List. Write: Books, P. O. Box 767-J, San Leandro, Calif. 94577

THE LADDER, a Homophile Publication for Adult Women. Information free. Sample copy 60c. Write to: P. O. Box 3629, Grand Central Station, New York 10017

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

INCOME TAX returns prepared. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers, instructors. LO 9-9026 or SW 5-7315.

SUBSCRIBERS

For prompt receipt of YOUR issues, please cooperate with the Zip Code Program of the Post Office Department.

Use YOUR Zip Code Number in all addressing

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

Big as well as small business follows the flag. The two largest U.S. banks, Bank of America and Chase Manhattan, have asked for licenses to open branches in Saigon, and First National City and American Express are also studying the opportunities. Fifteen banks are already operating in South Vietnam, with the French and British in dominant positions. While doing a job on the Vietcong, shouldn't we be correcting this situation too? Henry M. Sperry, a National City Bank vice president, thinks we should. After cordial visits with Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge and Vietnam officials, Sperry declared that it would be "illogical" to permit the French and British to "monopolize" the banking business, because South Vietnam's economy "is becoming more and more U.S.-oriented."

And with so many big spenders around it is also becoming more and more inflationary. The Newsweek story pointed out that the United States has been pouring vast amounts into South Vietnam—$600 million a year in foreign aid alone, or more than one-fourth of that country's gross national product. The current $500 million military construction job is not being done by organizations like the Seabees of World War II—that wasn't free enterprise. A consortium of U.S. construction companies is handling the job this time, with a payroll that will rise to 65,000.

Of course if the Vietcong should win the war and get back their own country, the boom would collapse. But the American business community is confident that nothing so calamitous will be allowed to take place. As one big construction official said, "Johnson certainly wouldn't build all this for the Communists."

AID for Whom?

If nothing else, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on Vietnam are making painfully clear how hard it is to get a sensible response from a bureaucrat. David Bell, the administrator of AID, told Sen. J. W. Fulbright's group that the $2.7 billion in economic aid pumped into Saigon's corrupt economy since 1954 has left the country in "much better" condition, with "considerable agricultural improvement" —although in the next breath he had to admit that Vietnam, which used to be the rice bowl of Southeast Asia and as such a great exporter of the commodity, now is in such terrible economic shape that it must import $21 million worth of rice each year. To some extent, of course, this is because U.S. troops and airmen have burned the rice fields.

Bell said he felt that the AID program had done a lot of good. For whom? For the Saigon crooks? For the North Vietnamese? Bell admitted that one of AID's "very significant problems" is the ease with which Vietcong agents can go into stores in South Vietnam, buy U.S.-supplied medicines and groceries, and, with a little cautious dodging, take them to North Vietnam or even China. The Saigon merchants, imbued with the patriotism we hear so much about, will sell to anyone, especially if he is willing to pay black-market prices for the goods we gave their transient rulers for nothing. Sen. Joseph Clark pointed out that more than ten years ago President Eisenhower insisted that economic aid to Vietnam be dependent on the reform of the government. Had this policy been followed? No, Bell conceded, it hadn't.

Sometimes the cheerful recitation of multibillion-dollar mistakes brought pained outcries from Senators who cannot understand such smug waste. "There is a $37 billion backlog of unmet needs in communities in this country," Albert Gore remarked, "yet this year alone we will spend half of that in Vietnam." Yes, said Bell, and that's too bad; but he thought Gore might be overlooking the brighter side, which is that Korea has sent a division of troops to the war! (He said this in earnest, as if he did not mean to mislead, as if he could not see the shining irony of it—that we have two divisions of U.S. troops stationed in Korea, whence one division of their troops come to our assistance!)

It is not likely, with the Administration staunchly resisting any conversation with the American people, that much information of consequence will come out of these hearings. Indirectly, however, the Administration's efforts to suppress news is already having the desired and expected reaction—a flurry of exposés by newsmen such as the Washington Star's Richard Critchfield, four of whose articles from Saigon placed in the Record by Senator Clark, gave the first session of the Foreign Relations Committee its only meaty information. "Though the United States has spent billions in Vietnam, it has invested only $4 million in land reform from 1954 to 1960, nothing from 1960 to 1965 and is spending only $1 million this year," writes Critchfield. "The United States gives goods, the goods are sold to people with money to buy them and the money goes to support the war. But the effect is to nourish an urban economy in which the middle and upper classes prosper but does almost nothing to improve the life of the 80 per cent of the peasant population."

It would take Fulbright's group three hours to drag that much information out of a man like Bell, and then it would come forth wrapped in misleading excuses. Critchfield is not the only reporter on the scent. Richard Harwood of The Washington Post writes, "Of the total AID package of more than $500 million for the current fiscal year, less than $2 million is earmarked for schools and school supplies in the villages, only $1.1 million for rural water systems, $1.8 million for 6,000 rural self-help projects, $12.8 million for public health, and $5.8 million for agricultural development. The total for these projects—about $24 million—is less than the $27 million AID will invest this year in a desperate effort by the National Police Force to curb the misuse of U.S. aid and to stop the flow of contraband to the Vietcong."

This kind of tough honesty, which is seen with encouraging frequency in the American press these days, is going to make the artful dodging of Administration witnesses sound all the sillier.

The Top-Priority Issue

It is sometimes useful to view an issue from outside the conceptual framework within which it is currently discussed. There has been no real debate on the China question although, as James Reston pointed out recently in The New York Times, it "lies behind the whole war" (in Vietnam). While there has been no real debate, it has become clear—despite Dean Rusk's muscular efforts to avoid an unambiguous statement on the point—that our main concern is with China, not with Vietnam, North or South. It has also become increasingly clear that some if not all of our hawks would like to see us strike at China's nuclear installations now, on the assumption that we will eventually have to deal with China militarily. China, of course, makes much the same assumption. In effect, therefore, the military of both nations look at events from closely aligned viewpoints; that is, they assume that China and the United States will sooner or later find themselves at war. It is precisely this shared assumption that creates the greatest danger of war.

What is not so clear is that both nations are now in the process of preparing for a direct military confrontation. For example, if the Pentagon assumes that we will eventually strike at Chinese nuclear installations, either by provoking China or by way of reprisal or for any other reason, then it would follow that we would first bring into being, in South Vietnam and Thailand, a military complex formidable enough not only to prevail on that ground but to withstand a massive land attack from the Chinese to the north. For it should be kept in mind that the North Vietnamese and the Chinese might move south so rapidly, and in such force, that they would overrun South Vietnamese and U.S. forces or succeed in creating a situation in which we would not dare to use nuclear bombs because of the grave hazard to South Vietnamese and our own personnel. Also we might well hesitate to use nuclear weapons for fear of the damage that just one well-placed Chinese bomb might work on Saigon and its inhabitants. By this logic, then, we would first need to have a huge force in South Vietnam and Thailand, a force of, say, 800,000 or 1 million men, as some experts have estimated, along with bases, air fields, harbors, warehouses, etc. In effect we would have to have a force in being before we struck at Chinese nuclear installations.

From the Chinese point of view, therefore, what we are now doing must seem a convincing fulfillment of their own deep assumptions that we intend to make such a strike. If China's leaders assume, as they must, that we intend to launch an attack, sooner or later, then it is reasonable for us to assume that they want us to establish a huge army on the mainland, regardless of what it may mean to the Vietcong or the North Vietnamese. For China cannot expect to cope with U.S. air and naval power; in these fields it is hopelessly outclassed. As China sees it, then, the only way to fight a war with the United States with any prospect of success or stalemate would be to bait us into establishing a huge army on the mainland. This in turn might account for China's insistence that North Vietnam fight on—and on. Granted that all this is surmise, it is still relevant. For one thing, it indicates the vital need for a real debate on China.

The Chinese may not be, as U Thant suggested recently, "obsessed with fear and suspicion," suffering from "the equivalent of a nervous breakdown," but there are now unmistakable signs that they are preparing for war; Felix Greene detailed some of the evidence in a recent speech at Stanford University (January 19). The Pentagon, of course, must read these signs as fulfilling its own assumptions about Chinese intentions. Before we get into a land war with China, arising out of "the mirror image" that each military has of the other, full hearings and debate should be held on our China policy—if we have a policy. And a likely lead-off witness might well be Henry Luce who, in a little-noticed address before the Commonwealth Club in San Francisco on December 3, gave it as his opinion that the general East-West confrontation in the Pacific—not communism per se—is today the top-priority issue on the world's agenda.

Conscience of a Lawyer

The New York Civil Liberties Union this month gave its 1966 Florence Lasker Civil Liberties Award to Clifford Durr, a man well known in the days of Franklin Roosevelt as the conscience of the Federal Communications Commission. He was responsible for issuance of the Commission's "Blue Book," a report that criticized broadcasting for excessive commercialization and tried to impress on the industry its responsibility for serving "the public interest, convenience and necessity," as the law provides. It was Durr, also, who put through what became known as the "AVCO rule"—prompted by the Aviation Corporation's attempt to buy radio stations—which provided that a station owner wishing to sell his property must advertise for bids and not make private deals (a rule that has not been enforced as well as it might have been). Durr fought against advertising agency control of broadcasting and pushed FM, insisting that at least some of the new channels be reserved for educational purposes. He stood up against encroachment by the big newspaper publishers into broadcasting.

Durr's career in Washington came to an end when he boldly quoted the Constitution to Harry Truman, who was then setting up his Loyalty Review Board and creating a temper in the country that encouraged Sen. Joseph McCarthy to scramble for power across the reputations of his fellow citizens. He denounced McCarthyism even before the term was invented. In recent years, Durr has been practicing law (he has recently retired) in his home town of Montgomery, Ala. It has been a quiet practice, primarily the crises and tragedies of the very poor. None of the big civil rights cases have come his way—perhaps because he is a brother-in-law of Justice Hugo Black, and potential clients have feared that if their cases were to reach the Supreme Court their warmest friend on that bench might have to disqualify himself. Or perhaps clients wanted a less controversial lawyer; Durr has never been orthodox, in Washington or in Alabama.

The Lasker citation refers to "consistent and outstanding courage and integrity in the defense of civil liberties whether in the performance of duty or above and beyond the requirements of duty." Clifford Durr would agree that he has tried to do his duty, but nothing he has ever said suggests that he feels he has done more than his personal integrity and professional skill have required of him. It would not have occurred to him that there was anything unusual in that, and we are particularly happy, therefore, that the Civil Liberties Union has obliged him at last to see himself as his admiring contemporaries see him.

Lewis Gannett

Lewis Gannett was as attractive a man as everybody said he was, and he was a superb 20th-century reporter. He had exceptionally clear blue eyes. He saw a book or a thing plain. Then he sat down and within minutes wrote what he saw, exactly. He reported precisely and steadily in his column in the New York Herald Tribune what was in that book—that was his gift. He reviewed 8,000 books in 6,000 columns. He was possibly the one American newspaper critic of whom we can say that he was lucid, informal, readable, unpedantic and, above all, unpredictable all the way. Lately, he entered the hospital in Sharon, Conn., near an old house on top of a sun-swept and wind-seeded hill, where he had lived for forty years, and he died on February 3, at 74, after a short illness.

Lewis Gannett made his way to the New York World and, after covering the Versailles peace conference, to Oswald Garrison Villard and The Nation. He became an associate editor and continued as a contributor to the magazine after joining the Herald Tribune staff in 1928. He wrote what he saw in Lewis, Dreiser, Anderson and Cather, and then in Hemingway, Faulkner and Dos Passos—as he had written and was to write what he saw in China (Young China, 1926), and from an automobile crossing the United States (Sweet Land, 1934), and on that hilltop (Cream Hill, 1949). Four times he wrote two successive columns about single books—by Santayana, Henry Adams, Sandburg and Gunther. In the world of books when he began, and for twenty years thereafter, American writing was generally thought a branch of English literature. Gannett did not overestimate the work of his countrymen; if anything, he underestimated it. But he was quick, penetrating and, on occasion, bold. "I would recommend to editors a name I have never met before, that of John Steinbeck," he wrote in 1932 of The Pastures of Heaven.

One day in the 1950s, he walked about Cream Hill with a friend. The old house had many good plain American chairs in it and comfortable space between them, and there wasn't a piece of clutter in it, front to back. Several times Gannett paused to look at a lithograph by his wife, Ruth Crisman Arens Gannett; he said, "Ruth is the artist, you know." It is easy to imagine the coming scholar, busy at his push-button research in American literature, asking the computer: "Who thought the book worth reading when it came out? What did he see?"—and getting back one of those 8,000 reviews in 6,000 columns (1923-56) by Lewis Gannett.

Marguerite Young

DE GAULLE AND L'AFFAIRE . . .

Alexander Werth

Paris

It is tempting to say that there are more important things in the world than the Ben Barka scandal. This month, the Common Market crisis, which had dragged on for more than half a year, at last came to a reasonably satisfactory end. Weighing up the pros and cons, all the Six decided that it was in their interests to let the Common Market continue. The five other partners refused to put on paper their agreement with France's objections to the Council's majority vote in favor of "supranationality"; but it almost comes to the same thing: if they do not want to break up the Common Market (and, for the present, they obviously don't), they must act as though they had subscribed to France's objections. The French insist on this point in part because they believe that if the majority vote does not take force, it will be easier for Great Britain to join the Common Market in the near future. In 1963, during his great love affair with Adenauer, de Gaulle slammed the door in the face of "America's Trojan horse," but he has since discovered that the real Trojan horse is not Britain at all but Germany, and he would welcome in the Common Market a major partner who shared his objections to supranationality.

In fact, though, de Gaulle no longer rejects, as he did last summer, any kind of political union; during the election campaign in December, he defined his position:

> Once, as I hope, we get over the Common Market ordeal, we should like to propose once again . . . the beginnings of a political cooperation. I am sure that, sooner or later, England will join. But this would not be a supranational Europe. Europe is what it is. But it could become a cooperative body and, after a time, a confederation.

During the campaign, de Gaulle became acutely aware that if France strongly approved his foreign policy in respect of NATO, the Atlantic Alliance, Vietnam and his rapprochement with the Russians (he is to visit Moscow this summer), the country, particularly the French farmers, was made exceedingly nervous by the thought that the Common Market might disintegrate if de Gaulle persisted in his tough policy, as illustrated by the June 30 break-up at Brussels. Not that the French were alone to blame; men like Hallstein and Mansholt thought (as the French put it) that they could extend the powers of the Brussels commission, with the French not daring to provoke a major crisis inside the Common Market a few months before the French Presidential election. This was the "blackmail" to which Couve de Murville refused to yield. Much to everybody's satisfaction, the danger to the Common Market has now abated.

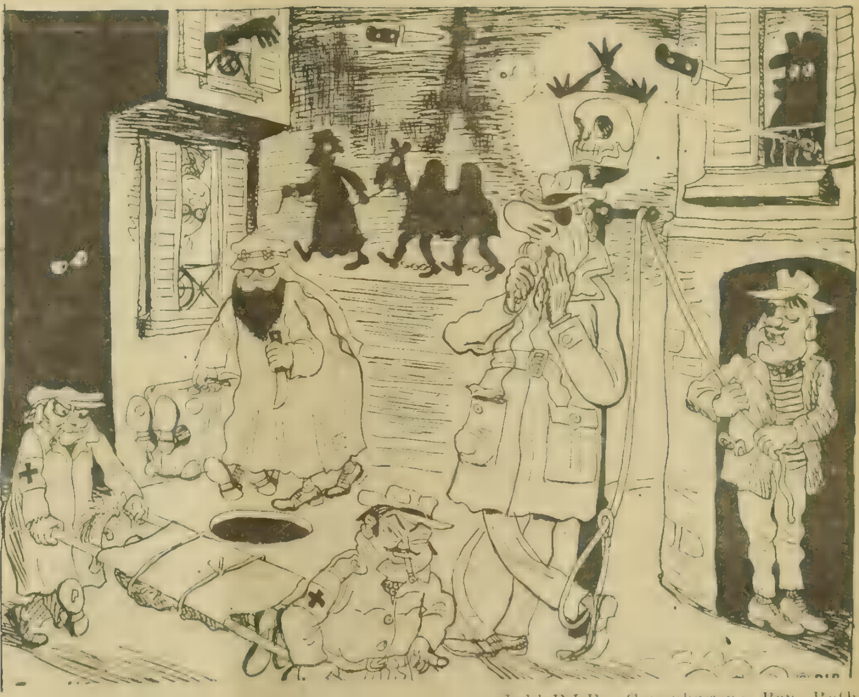
Far more important than the ups and downs of the Common Market is the resumption of the bombings of North Vietnam. It would take too long to summarize all the French charges of hypocrisy, incoherence, ruthlessness and ineptitude that have been brought against President Johnson's policy in the last few weeks. It is sufficient to say that even if the "Christmas truce" was not taken very seriously, it still suggested that Washington was perhaps trying to find some way out of the impasse. The appeal to the UN might have made sense if some reasonable and constructive proposals had been submitted with it; but on four occasions—so it is thought here—the President made it clear that he was not thinking along those lines. Le Monde dismisses the appeal to the Security Council as a demagogic trick intended merely to weaken the growing opposition in the United States to the war; "but to approach the Security Council after the resumption of the bombings was to destroy in a few minutes all the good done by the pause. . . ." Recent utterances by General Wheeler and other brass have created the greatest uneasiness in France, and in Europe generally; not only is the word "genocide" being used, more and more frequently, in respect of the unhappy men, women and children of Vietnam, but many European commentators do not rule out an extension of the war to China (with God knows what further complications) before the end of 1966.

All this is, of course, much more important than Ben Barka. Nevertheless, the scandal is filling up ten times more space in the papers, and taking up more time in conversation, than any other topic. It has become L'Affaire, and only two affaires in the past have enjoyed the capital A: the Affaire Dreyfus between 1894 and 1905 and the Affaire Stavisky of 1934 which shook the foundations of the Third Republic. Its ultimate effect on the future of France is still unpredictable; but if it has not marked the beginning of the end of de Gaulle's Fifth Republic, it has certainly, for the present, weakened it to an extraordinary degree.

De Gaulle has made a practice of referring to the "rottenness" and "corruption" that existed under the Third and Fourth Republic; and he had largely succeeded (with the help of the strait-laced Madame de Gaulle) in giving France an air of majesty, purity, integrity and respectability. Madame de Gaulle had surrounded the "Court" with an aura of Victorian virtue; thus, divorced people were banned from the more select receptions at the Elysée Palace; persons not married in church were frowned upon, and no man with a girl friend on the side had much chance of being elevated to the rank of cabinet minister.

The Ben Barka affair has shown that, below the façade of Gaullist respectability, there was a great deal of dirt in France—some of it very near the steps of the throne. It also recalled to mind that, ever since de Gaulle's London period in 1940, a great deal of very shady police activity has gone on in the great man's shadow. If de Gaulle regards the secret police as an evil, it has been to him an inevitable, and indeed indispensable, evil, and there were times when he was only too glad to use its services as an instrument of his policy.

One of the President's sharpest critics, Admiral Muselier, commented years ago on the "basse police and Gestapo atmosphere that surrounded de Gaulle in London"; his secret services, run by men like Soustelle, were of great value to him in Algiers in 1943, during his struggle for power against the American-patronized General Giraud. Later, in 1947, when de Gaulle started on his "Rally of the French People" movement (RPF), a "shadow army" was built up; it included many bona fide Gaullists, who had taken part in the Free French intelligence networks during the war, but attracted also a remarkably high proportion of criminal-fringe riffraff, among them former German collaborators, former members of the Vichy milice, of the Doriot gangs, et al. This "shadow army" of the RPF was to be maintained in a small way even after the RPF itself had collapsed as a political force; and its 1954 chief, Jacques Foccart, is now the secretary-general of the Elysée in charge (officially) of African affairs but (unofficially) of police and intelligence matters. His name has been mentioned in connection with the Ben Barka scandal. Police inspector Souchon, one of the policemen who actually arrested the



Juul-P.I.B., Copenhagen; Ben Roth

President de Gaulle Has Personally Requested a Thorough Investigation into the Ben Barka Affair

Moroccan leader, later claimed that he had been given assurances by Antoine Lopez, the chief organizer of the kidnaping, that Foccart knew all about the plan and that he, Souchon, was therefore "covered" at the highest level.

During the late phases of the Algerian War, when the French-Algerian OAS terrorists became extremely active in both Algeria and France itself, de Gaulle's "shadow army" split into two fragments, part of it following Soustelle into the OAS and another part subdividing again into what came to be known as the "parallel police" and the barbouzes — respectively, an anti-OAS intelligence network and anti-OAS commandos. Since these people were fighting the anti-de Gaulle and "French Algeria" terrorists in their own way, it might be argued that they were on the side of the angels. Many barbouzes lost their lives in savage encounters with the OAS. But the trouble is that the barbouzes and the "parallel police" included many shady adventurers and downright gangsters.

After the Algerian War ended, the two groups should have been dissolved but, for still unexplained reasons, they were not. Instead, they enlisted still other adventurers, many of whom had originally been part of the OAS terrorist gangs. By the time the Ben Barka scandal blew up, it was difficult to say to what political camp any of these people belonged. Many of those who took a direct part in the kidnaping of Ben Barka were plain gangsters, such as Boucheseiche, to whose villa outside Paris the Moroccan leader was taken; or Figon, who had apparently been ordered to assassinate him in Cairo last summer, who took part in the kidnaping, and who was then found shot through the head in his Paris hide-out on January 17 when the French police finally made up their minds to arrest him. It is generally believed here that he was "suicided" by the police.

Not only the "parallel police" but also the two much more official French police services were involved in the kidnaping. Lopez, the chief organizer, was an important (though unofficial) member of the SDECE, the "French CIA." Officially he held an important administrative post at Orly airport outside Paris, but it seems evident that he was also acting as an agent of the Moroccan secret services and, more particularly, of General Oufkir, Morocco's Minister of the Interior. Oufkir, the "strong man of Morocco," dominates the police, the army and (to all appearances) the King himself.

To cut short a terribly long and complicated story, it seems clear that Ben Barka had been approached on the King's behalf with the proposal that he should return to Morocco and so help to "widen the political base" of the Moroccan regime. Oufkir, determined to scotch his dangerous rival, induced Lopez to organize the kidnaping. Lopez secured the help of two regular inspectors of the Préfecture de Police, Souchon and Voitart, who carried out the actual "arrest." Lopez seems to have persuaded them that this would be done with the approval of both the Elysée (M. Foccart) and a certain M. Aubert, right-hand man of Roger Frey, the Minister of the Interior. Such at least was Souchon's claim.

Apparently on the strength of the stories told by the much-too-talkative Figon (a hireling who took part in the operation), L'Express published on January 10 a hair-raising account of how Oufkir himself arrived in Paris, drove to the villa where Ben Barka was held prisoner, and, unable to control his blood lust, stabbed his political rival to death "with a Moroccan dagger."

Whether Oufkir personally murdered Ben Barka has not been definitely established; indeed, it is not even certain that the man is dead (no body has been discovered). But the French Government could not pretend that it did not know Oufkir organized the kidnaping, and that he had been in Paris on October 30 and 31, the two days following Ben Barka's disappearance. Hence the belated international warrant for the arrest of Oufkir—a quite unprecedented step for a government to take against an important minister of a foreign country.

The question that has, quite inevitably, been raised is to what extent the American CIA is mixed up in the affair. One has only to leaf through the New York Herald Tribune to see that Oufkir is looked upon in certain American quarters as "Morocco's best protector against communism," while Ben Barka, an organizer of the Three-Continents conference in Havana, was regarded as a "Communist agent," or at least (and bad enough) as a man who would help turn Morocco into a "Gaullist" and "neutralist" country, as free as possible of American influence.

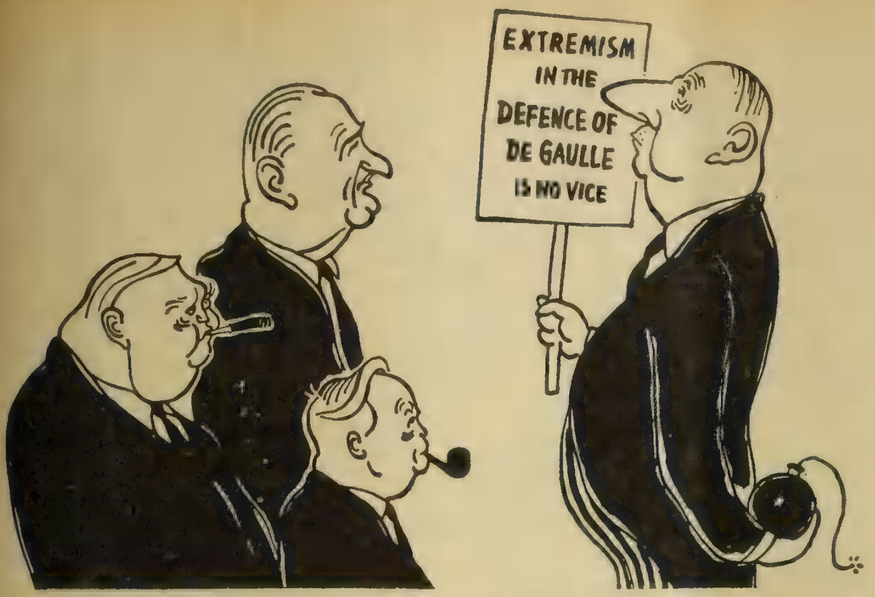
There is good reason for saying that de Gaulle was deeply upset by the "stab in the back" coming from Morocco, for whose young King he had a particular friendship and whom he had tried, over the years, to convert to a "neutralist" policy. It has also been suggested in Paris that one of de Gaulle's most cherished ambitions is to form all three North African countries (Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco) into an "American-free" French zone of influence. This is not to imply that there is any truth in the story Oufkir is now (so it is rumored) planning to reveal: that de Gaulle had two important meetings with Ben Barka shortly before the kidnaping. But the theory that the CIA played a part in the kidnaping is given fairly wide credence in Paris. François Mauriac declared in the Figaro Littéraire that the American agency had pulled off a tremendous double coup: it had deprived the Third World of Ben Barka, and had discredited de Gaulle. "If they didn't do it, then the Devil himself must have played the game for them."

The inquiry into the Ben Barka affair is continuing, and the extent of the reaction still cannot be gauged. It has already had serious international repercussions. Relations with Morocco (whose King has refused—or has been too scared—to do anything to Oufkir) are extremely strained, though diplomatic relations have not yet been broken. The attitudes of the other Arab countries have been curious. Nasser has taken de Gaulle's side. When a Moroccan envoy arrived in Al-

POVERTY, INJUSTICE & THE WELFARE STATE

Beginning next week, a two-part study of the bureaucratic preoccupations, moral judgments and abuses of power which corrupt the administration of public welfare in the United States. Why would an Ombudsman be largely ineffective here? Three proposals for establishing justice for the poor.

By Richard A. Cloward & Richard M. Elman



EXTREMISM IN THE DEFENCE OF DE GAULLE IS NO VICE

Abu, The Observer, England: Ben Roth

geria, thousands of students demonstrated in the streets, shouting "Oufkir assassin!" (and also, here and there: "Vive Ben Bella!" and even "Vive de Gaulle!")—in effect, a left-wing demonstration against the military dictatorship of Boumedienne, now figuring in the minds of the more progressive elements as a sort of Algerian equivalent of Oufkir. In Paris, Moroccan students passed a resolution condemning Oufkir's police state.

De Gaulle may have derived some slight satisfaction from this African support, but the Ben Barka Affair has not done him, still less his regime, much good. The truth is that when de Gaulle announced that he was running for President on November 4, he must have known some of the main facts of the Ben Barka kidnaping. He may already have felt that some of his ministers were not running the various police services as they should—which would help to explain why he asked for a personal vote of confidence, not even mentioning his ministers as the people who would continue the "new Republic" after he had gone.

Many other strange things happened. On November 3 (barely a week after the kidnaping) Oufkir was again in Paris, and invited Frey, the Minister of the Interior, to a dinner at the Moroccan Embassy. Sufficient evidence was already available to arrest him, but for "reasons of state," as was later explained, this was not done. Two days later de Gaulle asked the King of Morocco to take action against Oufkir, but it is clear that the President was anxious at that stage not to create a major diplomatic incident, and—what is more damaging—did not wish the Ben Barka scandal to become public in France before the election. Only a very small number of arrests were made, and practically all the underworld figures who had taken part in it (Boucheseiche and the rest) were allowed to escape to Germany or other countries. They seem to have been well paid for their services by the Moroccans (out of CIA money, several papers here have alleged).

The arrest of the two police inspectors directly responsible for Ben Barka's arrest was first delayed and then kept dark. Needless to say, de Gaulle's opposition has alleged that, whoever may have been "covering up," the President himself had, to say the least, tolerated the reticence.

Even after the election, very little was heard about Ben Barka; his kidnaping did not become L'Affaire until the second week in January when L'Express published its sensations, and especially until Figon's mysterious "suicide" on January 17. A few days before that de Gaulle is said to have flown into a sudden rage over the goings-on in the various French police services; he then fired General Jacquier, the head of the SDECE, and transferred the agency from the authority of Prime Minister Pompidou to that of the Ministry of Defense. A former ambassador, 77-year-old Léon Noel, was given the job of recasting the whole French police system. The old gentleman said it would take two or three months to draw up the reform. The opposition parties duly noted that the sorry business was being pretty well kept "within the family," Noel having been one of the big shots of the RPF in the past and, worse still, the "protector" of Lemarchand, a Gaullist deputy and the lawyer who had defended Figon in his 1955 trial, who had maintained close personal contact with his "client," and who had been extremely active in Algiers as a barbouze and a member of the unofficial "Gaullist" intelligence network.

During the cabinet meeting following Figon's "suicide," de Gaulle again become very angry when he realized that few of the ministers accepted the "suicide" story. Whatever the President himself thought, he made some disobliging remarks on the way Frey had conducted the whole affair. Not that Frey has been fired yet, nor, for that matter, Pompidou, then the nominal head of the SDECE, who had received various warnings about the impending kidnaping of Ben Barka but had done nothing about them.

De Gaulle has, to some appreciable extent, been deglamorized, and some of his ministers, and particularly Frey, are thought to have covered up a great deal of very dirty police business. Now the big question is how long will it take for the affair to blow over. The inquiry being conducted with energy by the inquiring magistrate, M. Zollinger, is intended (so de Gaulle has promised) to "tell the whole truth." But will it? The opposition have suggested that de Gaulle is now going through all the motions of righteous indignation, but that he himself may have a few "guilty secrets"—which would explain why he has not yet fired Frey. (Frey, we might add, played a curious role at Algiers in 1958 when he used the radio there to spread panic in France; perhaps he knows more about the inside story of 1958 and more recent events than de Gaulle wishes to have generally publicized.)

What seems much more serious is that de Gaulle, for all his apparent desire to have the whole truth revealed, has so far firmly opposed a special meeting of parliament and, above all, the constitution of a parliamentary committee of inquiry on which all the political parties would be represented. Such committees did valuable work both under the Third and the Fourth Republic, whenever public opinion was badly rattled by a major scandal. They usually got at the whole truth —whether about the anti-parliamentary riots of 1934, or about the Stavisky scandal, or in 1950, about the affaire des généraux, with its leakage of military secrets, or the affaire des piastres, the currency rackets in Indo-China. But the idea that the detested "parties" should poke their noses into a matter as delicate as the inner workings of the various police services is more than de Gaulle can as yet bring himself to swallow.

The Gaullist ministers and Gaullist UNR deputies are deeply perturbed by what has happened, and look with some dread toward the parliamentary election of 1967. It is, indeed, difficult to believe that the opposition parties will not make political capital out of the Ben Barka affair. It is even more difficult to see Pompidou or Debré leading the UNR to a great election victory.

'CONDUCT UNBECOMING . . .'

Lieutenant on the Peace Line . . . . John Rechy

El Paso, Tex.

As this is written, Second Lieut. Henry H. Howe, Jr., 24, of Boulder, Colo., is locked up in the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.—the first soldier to be punished for marching in a peace demonstration against the United States Government's position in Vietnam. He was arrested last November by civilian police in El Paso, Tex., in a manner which many contend—and at least one military spokesman for the prosecution asserted — was illegal.

Tried by general court-martial, Lieutenant Howe was euphemistically charged with using contemptuous language toward President Johnson and with conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. A third charge—intention "to promote disloyalty and disaffection among the troops and civilian populace of the United States" — was dropped.

Although ably defended by his military counsel, Capt. Thomas C. Bigley of the Judge Advocate General's staff, Lieutenant Howe was found guilty and given a severe sentence: two years' imprisonment at hard labor, dismissal from the service (the equivalent of a dishonorable discharge), and forfeiture of all pay and allowances.

Despite the fact that appeals of his case were pending, Lieutenant Howe was immediately placed in virtual solitary confinement in the Fort Bliss stockade. He was allowed visits only from his counsel, his family and, on special permission, from his girl friend. He was permitted to receive telephone calls from the same parties, but a call from a Denver reporter was interrupted. His mail and reading material were censored.

Joining the case as civilian counsel, the American Civil Liberties Union quickly announced its intention to appeal Lieutenant Howe's conviction in the civil courts as unconstitutional, being a violation of his right of free speech. The ACLU also charged that holding Lieutenant Howe in the stockade while appeals were pending was a further violation of his rights.

Subsequently, in an automatic review of the case, Maj. Gen. George T. Powers III, commanding general of Fort Bliss, reduced Lieutenant Howe's sentence to one year's imprisonment at hard labor. It was announced belatedly that Lieutenant Howe would be given credit for time served in the Fort Bliss stockade.

In view of the ACLU's announced intentions, General Powers' reduction of the sentence has been interpreted by some as a strategic move whereby the defendant officer may have served his full sentence by the time the case is appealed to other courts. Thus, even if the decision were reversed, the Army seems vindictively determined to punish Lieutenant Howe.

In an adventurous maneuver (if realized, it would have been the first such instance) the ACLU filed a writ of habeas corpus in the U.S. District Court to have Lieutenant Howe released on bail pending appeals. Attorney Melvin L. Wulf of New York, pleading the case as legal director of the ACLU, pointed out that defendant officers in the past have been allowed to remain free or restricted to quarters while appeals are heard—and not imprisoned in the stockade unless the charge involved violence. It was clearly the political nature of the case which resulted in Lieutenant Howe's incarceration, Mr. Wulf implied; and he charged that Major General Powers had acted "capriciously and arbitrarily" in the matter.

General Powers was subpoenaed to answer the charge. A man with three sparse patches of hair and narrow eyes in a face stamped with a stony mirthlessness, attesting to his many years in the Army, General Powers reacted to Mr. Wulf's questioning with the outrage of a man not used to explaining his actions.

He asserted bluntly, almost belligerently, that he had decided to incarcerate Lieutenant Howe because the lieutenant was "not fit to be an officer" and, outside the stockade, he would have had to be treated as one. The general "just knew" that other officers would want to have nothing to do with Howe (although, on Mr. Wulf's prodding, he admitted he had taken no survey, nor asked any officer).

Predictably, General Powers asserted his belief in the infallibility of the Army system ("I have never questioned the constitutionality of a court-martial proceeding"), although, again, Mr. Wulf managed to make him admit that on occasion he had heard that a court-martial decision had been reversed. "I don't think this case will be reversed," General Powers prophesied.

General Suttle, the judge (who had only a month or so earlier ruled against a petition filed by Leon Day asking that the Army be en-

---

John Rechy is the author of City of Night (Grove Press).

POLICE DEPT.
BARRICADES
POLICE DEPT.
TRAITORS

joined from discharging him dishonorably for having belonged to the Socialist Workers' Party), left little doubt as to where his own sympathies lay. He pointed out to Mr. Wulf that "we have to think in numbers," implying that Lieutenant Howe's case must be considered in regard not to one individual's rights but to the efficient operation of the Army. He also admonished Mr. Wulf that this was "not a civil rights rally." Almost as predictable as General Powers' testimony was Judge Suttle's ruling that the decision to incarcerate Lieutenant Howe had not been "capricious and arbitrary." He would, however, not act on a motion by Mr. Wulf that the Army be restrained from removing Lieutenant Howe from Fort Bliss pending disposition of his case in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals. The judge declined to do so on the ground that he had no jurisdiction in the matter, although in ruling at all he had assumed such jurisdiction! No amount of rational explanation by Mr. Wulf concerning this and concerning the fact that Lieutenant Howe's removal would create new difficulties for his defense would sway the judge, who announced his feelings quite succinctly:

"I hope we don't see the day when the federal courts can tell the U.S. Army what to do!"

The next day, Lieutenant Howe was flown to Fort Leavenworth.

Now, his case goes automatically to the Army Board of Review; then, depending on that board's findings and the subsequent decision of the Howe defense, it may be appealed to the three-member civilian Court of Military Appeals, the highest military court. Neither of these two bodies may increase the sentence—only reduce it or allow it to stand. Claiming that Lieutenant Howe's constitutionally guaranteed rights have been violated, his defense will appeal his case in every court available. If it should reach, and be accepted for hearing by the Supreme Court, it will be the first military case heard by the highest court in America.

Recalling that Gen. Edwin Walker was never court-martialed for disseminating Birch Society and similar rightist material to soldiers in his command, one must wonder whether any charges would have been brought against Lieutenant Howe had he been demonstrating, say, for the bombing of Hanoi.

A second trial emerging out of the same demonstration in which Lieutenant Howe participated will be based on charges for libel brought by Dr. Richard C. Trexler, of the History Department at Texas Western College, against the El Paso Times for printing a letter exhorting the college authorities to "throw the bum out," and brandishing the wild—and currently popular—charge of "treason."

The peace demonstration from which these trials stemmed occurred on an unusually warm, humid November afternoon in El Paso, Tex., when about a dozen young men and women, most of them college students, led by Dr. Trexler, marched in San Jacinto Plaza—the heart of this handsome city—amid jeers and shouts for scorched flesh from a mob of more than 2,000.

The paradox is that El Paso, compared to Texas' pistol-packing larger cities like Dallas, or its devil-oriented smaller ones like Lubbock, had appeared, before all this, as the progressive daughter in a wealthy reactionary family. It was the first city in the South to pass an ordinance banning discrimination, and reportedly the first to integrate both its lower schools and college. It accomplished all this without incident, and subsequently one of its previously all-Anglo high schools elected a Negro "most popular boy."

What, then, could have stirred this generally tolerant city into a vortex of hatred? It began like this:

Late in October of last year, Nick Cheshire, a former student at Texas Western College, which is located in El Paso, and Harry Bowen, a graduate student and teaching assistant there, petitioned the city council for a permit to march in protest of the Vietnam war. They had previously been told by a member of the traffic control department that they would need such a permit.

At the hearing of the council, the Mayor, while contending that there was nothing illegal about such a demonstration, called the request for a permit "an exercise in provocation and incitement . . . a further refinement of the tactics of civil disobedience . . . intended to . . . discourage the laws requiring patriotic duty in service of the flag, and impede the conduct of war." An alderman intoned: "I can think of nothing more despicable than a man who will not fight for his country." (It would be interesting to know how the alderman ranked genocide, poverty and lynching in his scale of things despised.)

Although the alderman also admitted that such a demonstration was legal, the council — in what was, for its questionable ends, an idiotic move at best--voted to deny the group permission to march.

Insisting that they would march, the small committee retained J. B. Ochoa, Jr., a man identified with civil liberties cases, as its attorney and found a faculty spokesman in Dr. Trexler, formerly a first lieutenant in the Air Force, now a captain in the inactive reserves.

The hostility began to mount. A branch of a local patriotic club, the Civitans, adopted a resolution asking that Texas Western College professors showing sympathy for students in the protest group be "silenced" (a funny—if scary—echo of gangster movies!) or "separated from the tax-supported salaries they now enjoy."

The Junior Chamber of Commerce drew up a resolution urging El Pasoans to fly the American flag to indicate their "stand against communism." Not to be left out, the local League of United Latin American Citizens (LULACS)—reputedly the only national minority group not represented at the civil rights march on Washington—drew up its resolution opposing the demonstration, perhaps mainly to show that its members are every bit as pseudo-patriotic as the Anglos. It is a compulsion exhibited by certain of El Paso's Latin Americans. (One could call them Uncle Tomáses.)

The intrepid American Legion urged that no permit be given to the demonstrators and, reminding them of the freedoms they enjoyed, inevitably illustrated the most ferocious irony of rampant ersatz "patriotism": its seeking to deny the very freedoms it celebrates.

Germinated by such fever, two threatening telephone calls were made concerning Dr. Trexler, one to his wife, one to the Mayor's secretary. As a result, Dr. Trexler was guarded at the college by a campus policeman.

LET'S HAV
MORE

Shifting from the crowing complacency of the earlier weeks, before the city had revealed that it too contained a group dedicated and brave enough to demonstrate, the El Paso Herald-Post, a Scripps-Howard paper, reacted like a wronged wife. Its headlines shrieked, its editorials dealt in innuendo, its news stories inflamed, and its letters-to-the-editor column allowed its readers to denounce, as did that of the El Paso Times, an independently owned newspaper. ("Communist-inspired beatniks," the letters shouted, "egghead professors," "malcontents," "anti-American," "seditious," "led by an expert . . . trained for such things," "advocating revolution.") In a typical editorial, while condescendingly upholding the group's right to demonstrate, the Herald-Post declared:

"The history of communism has been one of infiltration, subversion and terrorism. . . . In time, unless we stand up to it, it will reach our shores (as indeed it has already in some measure)." After that statement, its thickly rhetorical "caution against tarring advocates of free speech with the brush of treason" (a bow to those "good citizens, who abhor all that the dissident group represents [but who] nevertheless defend its right to be heard") amounted to mere piety. The overall meaning was clear.

Although not known as a "liberal" newspaper, the Times at least seemed occasionally to be attempting to sound a rational note. In a stirring move, it printed the Bill of Rights to remind the city of the granted rights which some were attempting to deny the demonstrators.

Before this recent uproar, the atmosphere at Texas Western had been accurately described as "seething with apathy." A somewhat sleepy college, despite a handful of competent and even talented people on its staff, it had seemed determined to qualify for its nickname —"the high school on the hill." Years ago, a brave instructor had protested the showing, without opposing comment, of the pro-HUAC film Operation Abolition. He left shortly thereafter, and apathy again settled on the school like moss.

Lately, however, the college, partly through its Excellence Fund—supported by local private contributions—had managed to bring a more spirited group of teachers to its campus. Among them was Dr. Trexler.

Dr. Trexler's courageous stand caused a roiling questioning of themselves among the complacent members of the faculty who had lulled themselves these many years. A petition, signed by sixty-three faculty members and administrators, urging the city council to reverse its decision—"irrespective of the undersigneds' opinions as to the merits of American policy, or as to the wisdom of the planned protest" —was safely worded, but it was enough to cause great anxiety among some of the faculty.

One later retracted her support. Another explained that he was asking the city to pave a section of land adjoining his property and could not therefore afford to sign. A third questioned the integrity of one of the demonstrators whom she did not like personally. Another contributed—secretly—to the group's legal fund.

The dissenting professors received other support: from the Action Committee of the local chapter of the American Association of University Professors; from 675 students at the college who signed a resolution upholding the decision of professors to speak out; from the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith; from letters to Dr. Trexler (including one from a woman "in a military home"); and from infrequent letters in the newspapers. But those notes of reason were all but drowned by the cries of lunacy.

At the height of the furor, the city attorney was finally consulted as to the legality of the demonstration. (Incredibly the city officials had not thought of doing this at the start!) The ludicrous result was the revelation that no permit had ever been needed. The city council had acted fatuously on hot air.

On the eve of the demonstration, the Scripps-Howard paper carried an "interview" with Dr. Trexler, featured prominently at the top of its front page. In the only bold-face paragraph of a 20-inch story, the newspaper reported:

"Dr. Trexler said that he believes the welfare state is an ideal situation. He said he does not believe that the individual's control of his own money or property is a basic freedom." In the minds of those already aroused, that was tantamount to making Dr. Trexler a professed Communist.

Protesting that he had been misquoted, Dr. Trexler clarified his views to the editor and the reporter who had written the story. He had said that the "right to own property is not the only basic right"; he had not mentioned money. He had further said he thought the welfare state was "necessary and desirable" in that "the government has interest in the welfare of its people," and he approved of that interest.

"That's the same as 'ideal,' " said the reporter.

"No, it isn't," the editor admitted.

The paper made no formal retraction, but a clarification appeared about 26 inches down in the body of the story that described the demonstration the next day—too late and too obscure to affect anything. The president of a mortgage company wrote the college president, enclosing a photostat of the questionable interview and encircling the very remarks Dr. Trexler had denied:

"I am encircling a paragraph which certainly distressed me. In view of Dr. Trexler's general attitude, I see no reason for our company to continue to contribute to the Excellence Fund at Texas Western College as long as a man of this type remains on the faculty."

The atmosphere had grown so ominous that the police department announced it was stocking tear-gas grenades to cope with possible disorders during the demonstration.

At 1 o'clock on that warm Saturday the sad circus finally began.

"Here they come!" a youngish man (hanging from the branch of a tree) shouted to the mob in San Jacinto Plaza. The mood until then had been that of a high-school football rally: young people laughing, vendors doing a good business. But, now, that awful camaraderie which exists among those who have found a mutual scapegoat seemed to embrace the majority of the spectators. Hatred focused on about a dozen young men and women—mostly "A" students at the college—led stoically by Dr. Trexler.

Its dignity further outraging the mob, the small group began its slow, somber, courageous march, outlining a quadrant of the park. They carried signs which read: "Have We Asked The Vietnamese?" "End The Bombing." "I Want The Truth About Vietnam." "Would Jesus Carry A Draft Card?"

The only harshly worded sign was carried by a thin, serious-faced young man, clearly not a part of the planned demonstration. His placard read: "End Johnson's Facist Agression in Viet-Nam," and, "Let's Have More Than A Choice Between Petty, Ignorant Facists in 1968." Its two misspelled words perhaps attested to the fury with which they were penned.

This demonstrator, wearing civilian clothes, was Lieutenant Howe, a graduate of the University of Colorado and at the time of the demonstration assigned to the 31st Engineers at Fort Bliss. Not very long ago, he had written his parents that he was proud to serve his country. The escalation of the Vietnam war, despite Johnson's campaign promises to the contrary, had led him to join the demonstration.

"They oughtta turn the boys from Fort Bliss on 'em!," an old man wearing a cap shouted, ignorant that one of "the boys from Fort Bliss" was among the demonstrators. Pitifully he turned (like a child to an adult) for approval from the young people about him. Other sad old men were passing out miniature flags, obviously exulting in the awareness that the crowd was with them. Again a part of an army—this time a heckling, cackling, motley army—they joined in piling insult on insult:

"I'll get the gasoline, you burn yourselves!" "Yellow reds!" "Traitors!" "Commies!" "Cowards!"

An emaciated young counter-demonstrator (paradoxically he looked like the press's caricature of the "peacenik") appeared carrying a sign which read: "Don't worry, the squirrels will gather them up before winter sets in." On the apparent assumption that anyone who carries a picket is against America, the crowd had at first hooted at him as he walked toward the demonstrators; and when he joined the march, an obviously drunk man tried forcibly to remove a tiny American flag which the pasty-faced counter-demonstrator had pinned to his lapel. As the crowd read the sign, cries of approval replaced the execration. From the side lines, the Mayor, sporting sunglasses and a funny small hat, watched with an amused smile as the crowd became surer of itself.

After about half an hour, the demonstrators crossed the street to the garage where their cars were parked. Quickly, Lieutenant Howe was led to one side by the police, who began immediately to question him. The other marchers drove away through a portion of the street cleared by the cops.

Even a howling mob is pitiful; this one hung around for long moments, like those who linger at a party afraid of the isolation they know will grip them once they're alone again. Having acted in unison against a scapegoat that was now gone, they were strangers once more, these outcasts in their own right, so desperate to be incorporated.

Why Lieutenant Howe was stopped by the cops is still not entirely clear. Several conflicting reasons have been offered, including one that he had called attention to himself on the base by expressing his views against the Vietnam war and was therefore quickly spotted by military police who pointed him out to the civilian police. The fact is that the police knew he was a serviceman (and at the station one cop offered to turn him over to the other prisoners).

Many contend his being held in the first place to be illegal, pointing out that he was stopped and detained ostensibly as a "vagrant" when the police did not have the requisite "reasonable grounds" to suspect him. In a brief filed with the military court, Captain Bigley asserted that the seizure and arrest had been illegal. Angry reaction from the prosecution did not shake its decision to withhold from evidence the placard carried by Lieutenant Howe. (If it had been introduced, the legality of the manner in which it was obtained might have become an issue.) Instead, photographs of Lieutenant Howe carrying the sign were introduced, and the court heard testimony by witnesses as to the wording of the placard.

However, in his review of the case for General Powers, the staff judge advocate, a colonel, admitted that the sign was a product of illegal arrest and subsequent illegal seizure and that for that reason had not been introduced in evidence at the court-martial!

In the interrupted interview by Harry Farrar of the Denver Post, Lieutenant Howe is quoted as saying:

> One of the hallmarks of fascism is the suppression of free speech. There is a clear distinction between responsibility to the military and the rights of a citizen. I have never refused to obey an army order. I would go to Vietnam if ordered to do so. On the other hand, I believe I have the right to express my opinions as a citizen. . . . I believe it is my responsibility, as a citizen, to protest against something I think is wrong.

So far, the Army has disagreed; but the case is still to be resolved —perhaps, if all else fails, by the Supreme Court.

And El Paso now? The Herald-Post still practices its sometimes subtle, sometimes blatant distortion. Carrying a UPI story on the anti-war demonstration in Washington, it shouted across page 1: "Peace Pickets Wave Red Banners." Any who read beyond that—and many, of course, had not—would discover, buried half a dozen paragraphs beneath the harsh gravestone of the headline, that only six among the more than 15,000 carried the foreign banners. And the Times recently chastised twenty-two Presbyterian ministers in San Francisco who, contending that Jesus had taught Christians to pray for their enemies, criticized President Johnson for asking for a day of prayer "exclusively in support of anti-Communist forces" in Vietnam.

Still, there are hopeful indications in this badly shaken city.

The letters to the editor are not as vituperative as before; and one of the city's most sedulous right-wing letter writers recently decried those who deny free speech, no matter of what political leaning.

Also, in numbers exceeding all expectations, hundreds (jammed beyond the doors of the hall), mostly students from "the high school on the hill," attended a pro-and-con discussion on Vietnam; and that discussion was held on the campus of the college where, not too long ago, several instructors had been afraid to sign a petition in support of free speech.

Further, when Harry Bowen, one of the two who petitioned to demonstrate, was informed that he was being fired from his supplementary job as counselor of a privately owned — but college-controlled — dormitory, fifty students threatened to move out of the building, and a group of professors protested the firing to the dean of students. Bowen retained his job.

And greatly significant was the Scripps-Howard paper's grudging editorial after the demonstration. While still denouncing the marchers, it said:

"Perhaps it takes courage of a sort to demonstrate in an unpopular cause."

Truth in Packaging

THE SUPERMARKET CAPER . . . Jennifer Cross

Now that the "truth in packaging" bill has been taken out of Senatorial deep freeze, the legislature will again find they have uncovered a thistle scarcely less prickly than the issue of how many guns for Vietnam or how much butter for the war against poverty. If the bill manages to pass, it will be a major landmark in consumer legislation. Like the National Commission on Food Marketing (NCFM), which was set up by act of Congress in July, 1964, and is due to report in July of this year, it has provoked the concentrated hostility of the $80 billion food industry.

Rumbles of discontent were being heard in the supermarkets long before Sen. Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.) started his packaging investigations five years ago. Consumers and consumer organizations the country over complained that the retail shopper, far from being the sovereign, rational buyer that manufacturers like to make out, was bewildered and frustrated. Since 1961, the supporting evidence has become monumental, and most of it centers on packaging.

Aside from the problems of how to choose from among the 8,000 items in today's supermarkets (more than five times the number stocked before the war), confusing or dishonest containers make it impossible to buy rationally or to compare prices. To drive this point home, Mrs. Helen Nelson, California's Consumer Counsel, organized a shopping test in a typical Sacramento supermarket. She selected five college-educated housewives, gave them each $10, and asked them to buy fourteen common household items, ranging from rice to toilet soap, choosing solely on the basis of the most quantity for the least money. The results, she later testified before the Hart subcommittee, were depressing. Her team took nearly twice as long as the average shopper, and half the time could not identify the cheapest items.

The ladies were not incompetent —merely at sea among the plethora of sizes and weights which go far beyond people's desire for variety. As Mrs. Sarah H. Newman, general secretary of the National Consumers League, told the NCFM last October, "customers really do not benefit from having seventy different sizes of potato-chip packages available to them." Nor do they benefit from the multiple fractions in which these weights and sizes come, and which would be quaint if they did not look suspiciously like cheating.

A These odd measures can be legitimate marketing practice, as the packaging industry has been quick to point out. Some manufacturers prefer to sell by price, and alter quantity as the cost of the foodstuffs fluctuates. Different products, or even the same product from different sources, may vary in densities, and that will produce odd amounts when uniform packaging is essential (e.g., in vending machines) or desirable (e.g., spices). Harrison F. Dunning, president of the Scott Paper Co., told the Hart subcommittee: "The housewife wants a neat little rack of six kinds of spices, and she wants them to look good in her kitchen, so she wants them all the same size. They have different specific gravities, so to fill the bottle you have got to have 2¼ oz. of one, 3½ of another, 4⅛ of a third, and that is what the housewife wants."

---

Jennifer Cross is a British free-lance journalist now living in Berkeley, Calif.

Not so legitimate is the phenomenon of slow shrinkage, all too often the result of manufacturers' attempts to increase profits and acquire an edge over competitors. Familiar friends like Betty Crocker Instant Mashed Potatoes and Kraft Fudgies have gradually dwindled (from 7.2 to 6.5 oz., and from 15 to 12 oz.). The once standard No. 2 can, containing about 20 oz., has largely given way to the 16 oz. No. 303 can or the 15 oz. No. 300. Today, almost the only commodities sold in standard units are flour, sugar, ground coffee, tea, cheese foods and dry beans. (A notable exception is the line of goods sold by the Co-op under its own label. These come in regular sizes.) The erosion is continuous. "How long will it be before one of the current 15 oz. brands comes out "new" containing 14 or 14½oz.?," inquired Mrs. Nelson. "This kind of competitive battle, fought with constantly changing package sizes, compounds confusion for consumers." Of course, the package looks the same and costs at least as much as it did before.

A more acute and tangible grievance is deceptive packaging. In the course of only two years, Consumers Union alone has collected complaints involving 200 different product lines, some of them coming from the biggest manufacturers in the country. There is the package cunningly designed to look bigger than it is . . . the full-color picture that bears scant relationship to what's inside . . . puffy adjectives like "big" quart and "jumbo" gallon, and meaningless descriptions of size like "king," "giant," "large," and "super." Other packages suffer from marked schizophrenia, wherein the legend on the front, which is what the customer reads, is not borne out by the contents listed in small print on the back. Thus one is offered "pineapple-filled oatmeal cookies," which contain neither filling nor pineapple, and a frozen creamed spinach, "expertly blended with heavy cream, fresh farm butter and the perfect touch of seasoning," which (besides the vegetable itself) contains mostly milk, flour and vegetable shortening.

Another problem is the "cents-off" label, offering a small reduction on "the regular price," whatever that is. According to Mrs. Esther Peterson, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs and Assistant Secretary of Labor, this is misleading because "the manufacturer is in effect promising something that he cannot at all times deliver. . . . He has no control over the prices charged at the wholesale or retail level. The 'cents-off' legend may mean cents off to the wholesaler or retailer—but it does not necessarily mean cents-off to the consumer."

Aside from the packaging issue, other serious questions about food-trade operations have been raised by the NCFM. These are the quality of certain foodstuffs, the less-than-good system of food distribution available to the poor, higher retailing costs that raise consumer food prices, and an increasing domination of agriculture by "oligopolies" — the big processing and retailing chains that can use their bargaining power to depress farm prices.

While the quality of American food is generally good, a number of witnesses brought enough evidence to the contrary to suggest the need for new or revised federal standards for certain frozen and canned products. A Consumers Union report on frozen entrees (October, 1965) found that "stingy portions and mediocre quality make them hardly worth while," while their tests on frozen fruit pies (September, 1965) revealed declining weight and quality. David Angevine, public relations director of the Cooperative League of the U.S., cited watered-down juice drinks, turkey dinners with only one-third meat, and fruit-juice substitutes which are little more than "sugar-water, flavored, colored, with two or three vitamins added."

In some cases federal standards are low enough to disappoint people who buy prepared foods in the expectation that they will resemble homemade recipes. Thus it is perfectly legal to sell frozen chop suey which contains only 2 per cent deboned chicken meat, or frozen breaded shrimp which is only 50 per cent shrimp. Manufacturers are legally required to list the ingredients in order of predominance, but not to state the percentages. The differences in terminology which result are too subtle for most buyers. How many realize that "chicken with noodles" contains at least 15 per cent chicken, but "noodles with chicken" has only 9 per cent?

These problems affect everybody, but the 34 million living at or under the official poverty line have troubles of their own. While not all consumer experts are yet ready to endorse David Caplovitz's view that "the poor pay more," evidence is piling up to show that he is right. Mrs. Dorothy Height (national president, National Council of Negro Women) said there were fewer big supermarkets in poor, particularly Negro, urban districts. Stores were smaller and more congested, with less choice of goods, poorer quality and few fixed prices. Mrs. Nelson's consumer survey of the Watts area showed many similar complaints—plus high prices, particularly in neighborhood stores which give credit. Rightly or wrongly, more than half the 250 people interviewed felt in some way cheated. The main targets of the August riots were retail stores; seventy food markets were burned and looted.

Not only Watts complains of high prices. From 1960 to 1964, everyone paid 1 per cent a year more for food, and in 1965 we paid 3 per cent more. One of the most important NCFM jobs is to find out why, with particular reference to retailing costs. Gross margins (the difference between the wholesale and retail price, expressed as a percentage of total sales) have gone up from 18.1 per cent in 1955 to 22.2 per cent in 1963, and last year accounted for 3.7 per cent of the public's $69 billion food bill.

It would seem that either retailers are on to a good thing, or else operating costs have risen sharply. In fact, supermarket net profits, which run generally between 1 and 2 per cent, are not exorbitant. However, between 1947 and 1963, labor costs went up by 36 per cent, and the cost of plant and equipment by 51 per cent. Possibly the consumer got better service, but he got nothing out of supermarket rent increases (up 400 per cent during this period), interest payments (up 300 per cent) or advertising and promotion (up 300 per cent). And he did not get any of the financial advantages resulting from improved food technology.

The last person to benefit has been the farmer. Between 1947 and 1964, the public paid $26.2 billion more for their food, but 88.5 per cent of it went to the processors. During the same period, agricultural prices dropped by 12 per cent, and farmers were saved only by a 40 per cent increase in production. Farm incomes have generally failed to keep pace with the rest of the population. The average annual wage of a farm operator ($3,750) is well below the national average and less than almost every type of worker in the food processing and handling industries.

Many NCFM witnesses feel that "the core of the problem . . . is the accelerating control of the 'toll gates' between primary producers and consumers which is coming to be exercised by an ever decreasing number of increasingly powerful corporate complexes." By moving into certain commodity markets, particularly livestock feeding and packing, these giant retail-wholesale-production chain complexes are gaining an unchallengeable grip on prices. So the commission has started a separate inquiry into concentration in the food industry, sending questionnaires to firms with more than $750 million a year turnover — A&P, Safeway, Kroger, Acme, Food Fair, Winn-Dixie, National Tea, Jewel Tea and Grand Union.

The food industry's replies to its critics are genially simplistic, ingenious or brutally frank, depending on whether you read the national press, the Senatorial committee and NCFM hearings, or the trade press. Since 1964 (by which time the food industry and its satellites had pulled themselves and their resources together sufficiently to undertake a national publicity campaign), the housewife has been told repeatedly that food is a bargain, costing less of her take-home dollar than ever before. She is also reminded that the American food industry is the envy of the world, and that she is a splendid little shopper to whose lightest whim the industry is only too glad to cater.

Official testimony, backed up in the trade press, has stressed certain themes until they have become well worn. After polite preliminaries about what a good job the food industry does, spokesmen picture the consumer as a rational shopper, choosing freely and expressing approval or disapproval of different products by the way he spends his money. "Because of his dollar ballots," said Prof. Steuart Henderson Britt, editor of the Journal of Marketing, "the consumer will continue to be king. Every day he casts these ballots at the cash registers." As for the female of the species, according to an ad for the Scott Paper Co., "a woman in a store is a mechanism, a prowling computer. . . . Jungle trained, her bargain-hunter senses razor-sharp for the sound of a dropping price."

A second point made frequently is that if there are lots of products and package sizes cluttering up the supermarket it's because the consumer likes it that way. According to Mrs. Helen Wolcott Horton, consumer service director of the Pillsbury Company, there is a growing demand for convenience foods because one-third of all women over the age of fourteen have jobs away from home. Today's buyers (flattery is the industry's favorite weapon) "have more money, more education, more sophistication and more willingness to experiment. They are optimistic, highly mobile, recreation-minded and family-centered." Along with their sophisticated taste in food is a sophisticated taste in service, running to fancier stores, bigger car parks, Musak and kiddie korrals.

Packaging, said the manufacturers at a NCFM hearing, cannot be a serious issue because they get so few complaints about it. Most women shop by brand rather than by weight and are not interested in comparing prices. Mrs. Blanche M. Stover, food editor of Parents' Magazine, confirmed: "We all get the same general comments on industry—its products, its packaging and labeling, its advertising, its service. We know that some women are concerned about unfilled packages, bulky packaging, hard-to-read fine print, weights in fractional ounces, etc. But . . . we have received little adverse criticism of packaging and labeling as it exists today. The reader is much more likely to complain that the local store does not yet stock a new food product she has read about in a magazine."

SUPER GIANT
R.

At the Hart subcommittee hearings on truth in packaging, manufacturers could not very well dismiss the issue as of no consequence, so they gave more detailed explanations for the multitude of package sizes, and reinforced these with warnings of what would happen if the industry were forced to standardize quantity. First, such uniformity would not eliminate fractions for the consumer who wants to know the price per pound. Second, it would stifle initiative in developing new products or improved packages. Third, it would lead to increase in costs, in the form of more packaging machines and a proliferation of container sizes, which would probably be passed on to the consumer. Manufacturers had different ideas of what this particular bill would be. The Kellogg Co., for example, estimated that its current volume of production, if packed in standardized sizes, would cost additionally "between $3 and $6 million," not counting the probable loss of business "due to inability to give the consumer the sizes she wants to fit the needs of her family." Collectively, the cost was estimated at tens of millions of dollars which, as Mrs. Newman was quick to point out, is probably what we are currently paying for unstandardized and generally uncalled-for package changes. Last, and just in case there might be grounds for reform, the industry insisted it would be wrong to effect changes by legislation. Properly strengthened and fattened, existing regulatory agencies (particularly the Federal Trade Commission and the Food and Drug Administration) would be quite adequate.

On the question of supermarket economies, at least as they affect consumers, the industry based its case on the harsh necessities of retailing competition, stressing low profit margins, and the large slice consumed by rising wages and fringe benefits. Furthermore, the housewife was surprisingly fickle—not, of course, because she was discontented but because she was exercising her sovereign choice. Robert R. Mueller and George E. Kline, editors of the Progressive Grocer, showed that 42 per cent abandoned their favorite store each year, either because they moved, or because they were dissatisfied, mainly because of high prices.

Quite the most noticeable thing about the truth in packaging and NCFM hearings is the staggering contradictions in consumer and industry testimony. Is the consumer, for example, a rational, sovereign buyer, or a confused woman trying to read the small print on the label and doing sums on her fingers? How would the "prowling computer" have made out in Mrs. Nelson's shopping test? Do consumers really want the huge variety of foodstuffs offered them, along with jazzy packaging, fancy supermarkets, trading stamps and other promotions? Do women really care about truth in packaging anyway?

A little light on these and other discrepancies can be thrown by the grocery, advertising and packaging trade press where, as Dexter Masters puts it in his Intelligent Buyer's Guide to Sellers, business people are more apt to speak their mind. The consumer and her needs are discussed with a good deal less reverence in private than in public. Admen and others have known for many years that the problem of our overstocked economy can be solved only by making people want what is produced rather than by producing what is wanted, and to this end anything goes—from trading stamps to research on the effect of the housewife's menstrual cycle on her purchasing habits.

The result is not necessarily pleasant shopping. A packaging magazine recently admitted that today's supermarket is "a confusing jungle filled with a blur of colors, shapes and noisy jostling people, all contributing to a tense and confusing atmosphere for the shopper. . . . There is no clerk to guide her, the atmosphere is a bit unfriendly, lighting conditions are often poor, she can't find things easily."

The housewife also encounters a good deal of sharp practice. A recent survey by the National Bureau of Standards in Arkansas showed that "more than 80 per cent of prepackaged foods were found to be of short measure." Only last December, Jerry Cohen, staff director and chief counsel for the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Anti-Trust and Monopoly, revealed he had interviewed 100 package designers, and "many were discouraged because they were asked to design deceptively."

Industry has also been less than honest about its motives in opposing the packaging bill. Behind stated complaints lurks a mortal terror of government interference. Consumer experts, on the other hand, are adamant that industry should not and could not put its house in order unaided, any more than it should claim to know what the consumer wants better than he knows himself. Mrs. Peterson stated: "If a competing firm institutes a questionable practice and succeeds, then others suffer if they fail to follow, a process which has been called "Gresham's Law of the market place." Existing government machinery is certainly not adequate to cope with the problem. Thirty-three federal agencies are currently engaged in 296 consumer-protection activities, most of which were originally set up by Congress to represent producer interests.

The truth in packaging bill can solve a lot of problems. In its present form it calls for the statement of the net-weight content on the front panel of a package, plus standards for the size and location of the type in which it is set. It prohibits adjectives like "giant," "big" and "jumbo" in the net-weight description; "cents-off" legends as an integral part of a label, and package sizes, shapes, dimensions or pictures that may deceive consumers. It will also establish reasonable standards of weight or size for packages, and for declarations of quantity other than net weight (i.e., the meaning of "a serving"), and will require adequate information about the ingredients and composition of the contents in a prominent place on the package.

The bill is not intended to obviate the need for more food standards or to halt the flood of products in today's supermarkets. Nor will it end all the difficulties of the 22 million people who lack an 8th-grade education and may have trouble reading a label, however specific. But it will clear up some of the present confusion. More important, it will save money. At least one supermarket operator estimated that 25 per cent of the family food bill could be saved by more rational shopping. In California alone, consumers could save $25 million a year on food if costs were lowered by just one-half of 1 per cent.

If the bill manages to pass, it will be despite the food industry, whose formidably coordinated national lobby has thrown dust in the public's eye, while keeping the bill corralled in Senate committees. The opposition consists of the Grocery Manufacturers Association, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the National Association of Manufacturers, linked by trade press and national, regional and state conferences. Most formidable is the GMA, which links more than 100 national food-processing trade associations, supported by allied industries that sell in supermarkets and, of course, the advertising industry. Supermarket News described their lobby thus: "Grocery manufacturers descended on Washington last week and in a VIP turnout before the Senate Commerce Committee blasted the truth in packaging bill in a concerted bid to kill the administration-backed legislation." They lobbied individual Senators. They lobbied in the trade press, sniping at Senator Hart, Mrs. Peterson, and later, the NCFM. They also managed to kill, or postpone, some state truth in packaging bills, e.g., in California.

The latest move is a report designed to help the NCFM get "an accurate picture" of the food industry. To finance it, the GMA dipped into its own kitty and also passed the hat around the advertising agencies and media, applying a little pressure to keep the contributions flowing. James Patton, president of the National Farmers Union, has condemned the whole episode as "shocking" and "deplorable," and filed a complaint with the Department of Justice.

Two massive campaigns aimed at the public in 1964 and 1965 dinned home the message that "food is a bargain." The industry spends a billion dollars a year to advertise its product, and for this it also expects some editorial cooperation. The GMA president "suggested to the publishers that the day was here when their editorial departments and business departments might better understand their interdependency relationships as they contributed to the operating results of their company, and as their operations may affect the advertisers—their bread and butter." First result of this wordy but unmistakable warning was a Look magazine article (January 26, 1965), that was almost blatant propaganda for the food industry. Follow-up comment by Senator Hart never saw the light of day; neither did several TV appearances for which he was scheduled, nor an article by William D. Zabel, supporting the bill, and due to be reprinted in Reader's Digest.

Against these efforts, the consumer lobby is puny. Lacking time, money and organization, it has made little or no attempt to coordinate the efforts of local consumer councils with national organizations like Consumers Union, National Consumers League, Cooperative League of the USA, AFL-CIO, and the American Home Economics Association. If the bill manages to pass, it will not be mainly due to consumers' efforts. The encouraging thing is that the Administration appears to be behind the bill — a point that was made by Mrs. Peterson last November to the Association of California Consumers, and confirmed by Vice President Hubert Humphrey at a consumer conference in New York last December.

Also pending in Congress is a "truth in lending" bill. Since this would if anything be even more unpopular with the business community, truth in packaging may pass after all.

The Point Beyond Decency . . .

Owen Lattimore

Two years ago, at the International Congress of Orientalists in New Delhi, a couple of Soviet delegates made slighting references to American "neo-colonialism." I remember challenging them on this, with the counterproposition that the liquidation of empires has now gone so far that one can properly speak only of post-colonialism. What a fool I made of myself! If a Russian today were to call American policy in Vietnam "neo-colonialism," my only retort would be that he, though a Marxist, couldn't recognize an attempt at outright colonial conquest when he saw it.

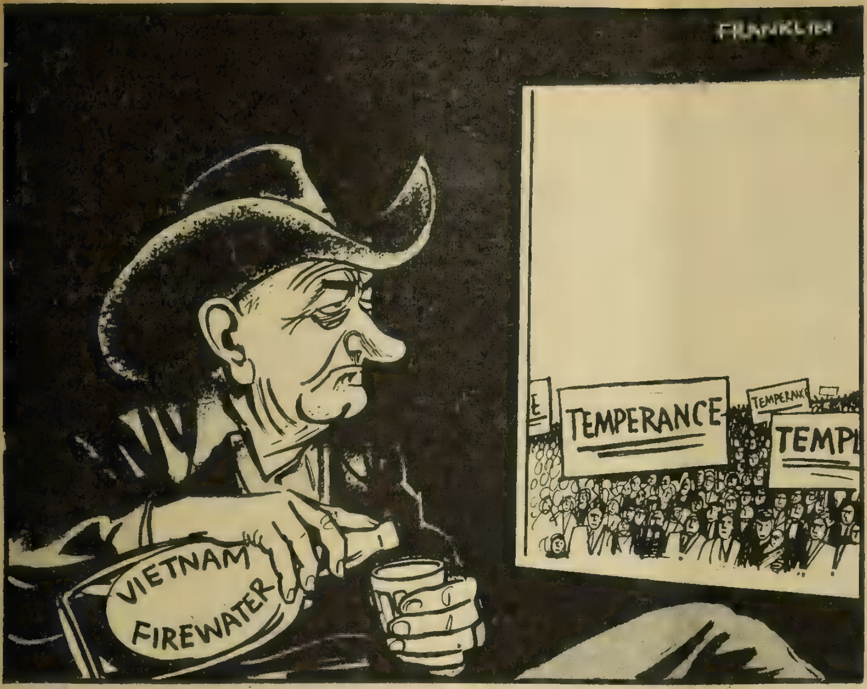
This policy has a clear colonial ancestry. After the defeat of Japan, the United States, which during the war had supported Ho Chi Minh (there was no French anti-Japanese resistance in Indo-China to support), swung over step by step to support of the French attempt to restore colonial rule. The critical step was taken by President Truman. It has mostly been forgotten by now that when North Korea invaded South Korea in 1950, Truman did three things, not just one:

(1) He ordered immediate resistance by the American troops already in South Korea. (There were no Russian troops in North Korea.) For this he very quickly got UN support, and it is the one decision that is now remembered.

(2) He interposed the Seventh Fleet between Taiwan and the coast of China. For this he got support from no other country, nor from the UN. The original purpose of this measure was not only to prevent China from taking advantage of the Korean War but to prevent Chiang Kai-shek from enlarging the crisis and involving America by attacking China. This was what "interposing" originally meant. The

---

Owen Lattimore is head of the Department of Chinese Studies, the University of Leeds.



Franklin, Daily Mirror, England: Ben Roth

later antics of "unleashing" and "releashing" Chiang Kai-shek were inventions of the malign genius of John Foster Dulles.

(3) He put America squarely behind the French in Indo-China (which then still included Laos and Cambodia as well as Vietnam). This measure later became, under initiatives taken by Dulles, a policy in which the Americans were more ardent than the French. Its continuation was due to the fact that American aid to France in Europe, under the Marshall Plan, could be juggled to provide enough to keep things going in Vietnam for a few years. With a sure supply of funds from America, a "free world democracy" through which to funnel them, and a politically corrupt area in which to spend them, there is no end to the combinations you can play. From that point on, the American shift from support of a receding French colonialism to entrapment in an all-out attempt at colonial conquest can be traced stage by stage.

The intermediate Eisenhower-Dulles stage may seem obscure, but only because of the means by which Dulles fooled Eisenhower. It is often said that Eisenhower, who had spent his life in the Army, knew enough to restrain his generals in Vietnam. It is more realistic to assume that, having won an election largely by his promise to get out of a "Truman war" in Korea, Eisenhower did not want to risk the label of an "Eisenhower war" in Vietnam. Even so, he was no match for his Secretary of State, whom he trusted too far, as weak Presidents tend to do.

It was Dulles who found Ngo Dinh Diem and installed him in South Vietnam. The clear intention of the Geneva formula of 1954 was to avoid dividing Vietnam, like Korea, into two countries. There was to be, first, a cooling-off period, with the withdrawal of foreign troops, and then an election to determine how Vietnam was to be united as one country; not—repeat not—whether it was to become two countries. Ngo Dinh Diem, with Dulles behind him, was able to sabotage this intention, even after a Democratic administration had once more been elected in America.

The fatal flaw in the Dulles-Diem ploy was that it trapped America in the squeeze between "rivals" and "enemies." Diem, like Chiang Kai-shek in China before him, was a strong-man nominee in a weak country. Like Chiang before him, he (or his sister-in-law, Madame Ngo Dinh Nhu) realized that when the clamor arose for a more reasonable facsimile of a democratic regime, the danger would be not that America would come to terms with his enemies, the Communists, but that Washington might replace him with some rival—some liberal or moderate who stood a little to his left, but yet far to the right of the Communists. Therefore, like Chiang Kai-shek, he directed the main drive of his police terror against such liberals and moderates. If he could get these potential rivals out of the way he would, with American backing, be able to deal with the Communists "from a position of strength." The tragic result was that, as in China previously, no leadership against the foreign-supported reactionaries was left—except that of the Communists.

The root of the matter is not that North Vietnam has "taken over" the National Liberation movement in the South, but that the South has said to the North: "We have made our fight, we have shed our blood, we have sacrificed our leaders. If you don't come in now, you are no patriots, and every anti-imperialist in Vietnam will despise you."

We come then to the present stage, in which our forces committed to South Vietnam grow nearer and nearer to half a million men, and the "free world" head of its government we are nominally backing is a swashbuckler who says that what the country needs is "half a dozen Hitlers." We are now at the point Japan reached when Manchuria had been conquered, "Manchukuo" had been established (that "bulwark against Bolshevism" of blessed memory), and the question was whether to escalate the war into China south of the Great Wall. In those days a Scottish missionary friend of mine interviewed a Japanese Christian who had just been installed as mayor of Mukden. He pleaded with the Japanese that surely there must be a possibility of putting an end to the bloodshed. Surely, if reasonable compromise could be offered, there would be moderate, progressive Chinese who would be willing to work with Japan for a stable, prosperous Manchuria.

The Japanese Christian paced the room. Then he said: "If we tried to work with any such Chinese, we would only have to shoot them within a month or two." The meaning is plain. You reach a point where decent-minded people, because they are decent-minded, have to resist, or sabotage, or evade your policy.

We have reached that point in Vietnam, and what we now confront is our own imperialism, and the ghastly showdown in which decent-minded people prefer Communist leadership to our patronage and our napalm.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Compleat Cold Warrior

THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War. By David Horowitz. Hill and Wang. 451 pp. $6.95.

Arnold S. Kaufman

When men engage in conflict, the first casualties are integrity and truth. As the scope of conflict enlarges, the costs increase. The heaviest price exacted by the cold war has been the moral contamination of people. Perhaps one should accept the toll with reflective calm. David Horowitz has refused to do so. The result is a book that describes and interprets the history of the cold war in a way that challenges, excites, provokes, angers and inspires. Horowitz has written a sincere and important book, which says much that desperately needs saying in these times of madness. (A casual perusal of Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.'s relatively sympathetic discussion of the way the Vietnam crisis evolved during the Kennedy administration reveals the extent to which this madness penetrated the official Establishment. See Chapters 20 and 37 in A Thousand Days.) It is more the pity that Horowitz's work is not strongly reasoned; that he succumbs to some of the same sorts of mistakes which he correctly imputes to the cold warriors in and out of government.

Horowitz's basic thesis is that American leaders are almost entirely responsible for the origin, intensification and perpetuation of the cold war. This is so because "the early post-war power situation was such as to give the United States a near monopoly on the strategic decisions which would affect the basic structure of international relations in the post-war period." By contrast, Russian rulers "were bound by the same imbalance of power to make moves of primarily tactical significance." This is a viewpoint already advanced by such scholars as D. F. Fleming, William A. Williams and Isaac Deutscher. Along with Walter Lippmann, these are the men to whom Horowitz acknowledges a special debt.

Given his basic assumption, the question to which the author properly addresses himself is why the American Government has pursued cold-war policies in the way it has. His explanation is offered in the course of a sometimes repetitious examination of the different stages and aspects of the making of American foreign policy during the last two decades. What gradually emerges are the assumptions Horowitz believes have controlled decision making at every critical juncture in that tortuous journey. Though he nowhere states them briefly, and in sequence, it is worth doing so. Taken together, they constitute an ideological profile of the Complete Cold Warrior.

- An international Communist conspiracy exists. Polycentric tendencies are illusory. The ultimate aims of the conspiracy are unchangeably aggressive.

- In the short run, America's vital interests require that these aggressive forces be restrained. In the long run, communism must be destroyed.

- Quite independently of their aggressive intent, Communist powers are morally vicious. As President Truman put it when he announced the doctrine that bears his name, "One way of life is . . . freedom. The other, terror and oppression."

- The destruction of communism can be achieved through a policy of military containment. For the Communists practice tyranny so gross that, if their destructive energies are not permitted to flow out, they must be turned against their own people. They will thereby sow the seeds of their own destruction.

- The free world must be prepared to use any means required to achieve the desired end. The forces of Communist darkness are so black that no effective policy can be more heinous than the evil it is directed against.

- The protection of freedom against Communist threat comes out of the barrel of a gun. Force is the only instrument on which the free world can, in the end, rely. It is the only thing the Communists understand.

- Programs of social and economic aid are justified only if they reinforce military containment. Military containment, in turn, requires nuclear kill capacity many times over. It also requires that we make it very clear to the enemy that, for aggressors, there can be no sanctuary.

- Any sign of weakness in the deployment of our massive military might is tantamount to appeasement on the model of Munich. Moreover, as President Kennedy once put it, "that which serves to unite us (America and its allies) is right, and what tends to divide us is wrong."

- Conditions of social instability in the underdeveloped countries invariably provide the cunning Communists with opportunities to subvert nationalist revolutionary movements. Though we should support stabilizing reformist tendencies, we should always and everywhere oppose left-wing revolutionary forces—even if effective opposition requires intervention in the affairs of other nations.

- Liberal democracies are inherently vulnerable to Communist subversion. We must ruthlessly guard against this possibility, even if it requires that we weaken institutional protections normally accorded political dissent. McCarthy's errors were tactical, not strategic.

- In the end, our cause is just. Our ultimate aims are personal freedom and national self-determination. We have no right to interfere in the affairs of any other nation except on grounds of self-defense. But, as Communist subversion or aggression invariably threatens our vital interest, the U.S. is always entitled to move against existing threat in every way possible, provided only the move promises to be effective. (Thus, the House of Representatives on September 20 passed, by overwhelming majority, Rep. Armstead I. Selden, Jr.'s resolution giving legitimacy to the unilateral use of force by any nation which considers itself threatened by "international communism, directly or indirectly.")

I believe these points fairly represent the views that Horowitz imputes to America's ruling elites. He thinks that almost every major postwar foreign-policy decision can be understood in terms of one or more of these assumptions, and he attempts to show, with relentless, scholarly persistence that this is so. His specific arguments are always provocative, frequently persuasive, and occasionally overwhelming: especially so when he discusses the Truman Doctrine and the Potsdam conference, the evolution of the Atlantic Alliance and how we got ourselves into the Cuban mess. At least part of his analysis of the Kennedy administration's response to the Cuban missile crisis is spectacularly confirmed by Schlesinger's recent admission that with at least a "2 to 1 superiority in nuclear power targeted against the Soviet Union, the shift in military balance of power would be less crucial than that in the political balance." (A Thousand Days, emphasis added.) Whether the complete cold warrior is anywhere to be found in all his pristine idiocy in the official Establishment, Horowitz seems to me to have established beyond doubt that a host of his near relatives have been hard at work shaping, subverting and distorting policies to make them conform to their ideological prejudices.

---

Arnold S. Kaufman, associate professor of philosophy at Michigan University, is spending a year at Tuskegee Institute. He was one of the founders of the teach-in movement.

It is regrettable that there is much in this provocative and important book that makes it vulnerable to legitimate criticism. For example, Horowitz describes President Truman as having a "basic McCarthyist orientation." Whatever deficiences this vastly overrated President may have had, however inept and erosive his efforts may have been to counter the political threat posed by McCarthyism, he was no McCarthyite. Horowitz makes it seem as if Averell Harriman is one of the complete cold warriors; but this characterization is simply inconsistent with many of Harriman's actions, not least his lonely efforts to persuade President Kennedy to give the Russians more time to respond to the impending blockade during the missile crisis. Horowitz roundly and rightly condemns many of President Kennedy's actions—especially his Bay of Pigs adventure. But he devotes not a word to the fact that President Kennedy did draw back from hurling our air power at Cuba during that disaster; not a word about his farsighted efforts to negotiate a settlement between the Indonesians and the Dutch; not a word about the Peace Corps; nothing about the support he gave the Bosch regime in the Dominican Republic; in short, very little attention to anything that tends to confirm what I think is in fact the case—that Kennedy was a most ambivalent cold warrior. On balance, he was trying to bring American public opinion to recognition of some of the realities of the contemporary international scene. Curiously, of the four Presidents who have held office since Roosevelt, it is Eisenhower who comes through Horowitz's mill in best shape. This is to come perilously near to reductio ad absurdum.

But it the author's more systematic errors that are most damaging. There are at least three pervasive theoretical distortions.

Horowitz has naive notions about how historical intent is to be established. For example, he claims that by 1946 the United States had already "decided" to use its productive capacity exclusively as an instrument of power politics. This is a simplistic account of what has in fact been an extraordinarily complicated national response to the plight of the world's needy. It's an example of the "nothing but . . ." fallacy. Aid to India, the Peace Corps, the Alliance for Progress, the decision to ransom the Cuban prisoners, aid to Indonesia, aid to the Congo, to Algeria, to Egypt, to Israel, to Chile—all are nothing-but instruments of power politics in the cold war. No doubt this factor is an indispensable condition of all these measures, but not enough. The fundamental logical distinction between a necessary and a sufficient condition is one with which Horowitz seems to have little acquaintance. Moreover, just as cold warriors often adopt a rhetoric of benevolence in order to justify certain kinds of aid they actually endorse on cold-war grounds, so a good deal of genuine benevolence has been masked by the rhetoric of the cold war in order to make proposals acceptable to our "political realists." Crusty experts like Hans Morgenthau and Senator Fulbright have often tried to conceal warmheartedness beneath a blanket of coldly prudential words.

A second basic defect of the book is the extent to which Horowitz fails to understand that much of the antagonistic reaction to Stalin's Russia was due both to the nature of Stalinism, and to the experiences many good people had with domestic communism during the thirties. It would be entirely reasonable for Africans to mistrust America's Rhodesian and South African policies solely on the ground that we are still a predominantly racist society. By and large, our Negro citizens are still second class politically, economically, educationally and socially —and we have only begun to dismantle the institutional system that perpetuates their condition. Similarly, it was not, after all, maniacal for American leaders, and many others, to mistrust Stalin's Russia solely on the ground that his regime was a barbaric tyranny. The relationship between domestic vice and foreign policy is cruelly intimate — especially when the tyranny operates a substantial military establishment.

Moreover, it was reasonable to sup-

The NEW midstream
NOW PUBLISHED MONTHLY
(Formerly a quarterly)
Continues to Offer You
A SEARCHING EXPLORATION OF THE CRITICAL PROBLEMS FACING WORLD JEWRY TODAY

In the February issue you will find:

The Complete Text of
"NO STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS FOR GENOCIDE"
by Karl Jaspers

Also—
"THE SPLIT IN ISRAEL'S COMMUNIST PARTY"
by Maurice Friedberg

"THE ERRORS OF HANNAH ARENDT"
by Marie Syrkin

"ARTHUR KOESTLER AS WITNESS"
by Renee Winegarten

PLUS many other exciting features.

Don't delay. Take advantage of this Special Introductory Offer and begin your subscription with the current issue of the new—expanded in coverage—monthly midstream

Special Introductory Offer for New Subscribers (Save $3.50 on Newsstand Price)

midstream N2
515 Park Ave., New York, N.Y. 10022
Please enter my subscription for
☐ 1 year for only $4.00
(I save $3.50 on Newsstand Price)
Name..
Address..
City.......................State........Zip ....
☐ Payment Enclosed ☐ Bill me

pose that those who had called the tunes to which American Communists performed their acrobatic dances during the thirties were not men in whose good faith one could place much confidence. Ideologically, a monolithic international Communist conspiracy — that is what it was at the time—was a potential aggressor. One could not have any confidence that once the havoc of the war had been repaired, aggressive communism would not rampage. It is true that these early cold warriors often had crudely oversimplified notions about the imperviousness of Communist systems to change. But ideological naïveté of this sort was more than matched by those who persistently apologized for the viciousness of the Stalinist regime.

These remarks are not meant to imply that American policies were consistently justified, and certainly not that they were consistently correct. But neither were they consistently and exclusively the result of bad will and stupidity. There is a difference between being correct and being justified. And many of the policy decisions that have, in the aspect of history, proved to be incorrect were, all the same, more or less justified on the basis of existing knowledge and in terms of acceptable moral standards. Horowitz seems reluctant even to consider this possibility.

The third basic defect of his book is perhaps the most important. Horowitz, like so many persons of the New Left here and abroad, simply fails to understand or appreciate what may be called "the normal political process" in the United States. The point is important because many actions that can be interpreted as impenetrably self-defeating expressions of the cold-war philosophy betray not the historical intent of leaders as much as the collective intent—or at least apparent intent—of very large and influential portions of the population to whom politicians are responsive. For leaders will often act not as they want but as they think they must. In so doing they may, no doubt, often be at fault—but the fault is of a different kind than that which Horowitz imputes to American politicians. For the defects lie not in their views about the threat of communism but in the power, or apparent power, to which they feel they must subordinate their actions, and in their conception of how much submission to that pressure "political realism" permits.

The vagaries of the normal process were strikingly revealed by the government's actions during the Dominican crisis. A sequence of events that Theodore Draper has described as "a kind of political phantasmagoria that would make anyone dizzy, actors as well as onlookers" has, at the moment, brought to power a Boschite, Hector Garcia-Godoy, who is "no puppet and no reactionary" (Commentary, December, "The Dominican Crisis"). The present Administration's Kennedy-like ambivalence is ironically dramatized by the fact that at the very moment McGeorge Bundy was trying to restore the constitutional Bosch regime to power in the Dominican Republic, he was heavily under attack from two quarters: a few understandably credulous participants at the National Teach-In in Washington were accusing Bundy of fearfully reneging on his commitments to address the teach-in; and certain State Department aficionados (not, mind you, Pentagon people) were double-crossing Bundy by undermining the compromise solution to which he had secured Bosch's agreement. Thus, according to Draper, the same Bundy who is one of the architects of our Vietnam disaster, is the only person to have emerged from the Dominican fiasco with "dignity and honor." Anyone who honestly tries to discover a coherently malevolent cold-war logic in all of this is, like Job, doomed to moan: "How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words?"

Oddly, C. Wright Mills understood all of this in his more reflective moments. He knew that, in the long run, the correctness of American foreign policy depends on the quality of American civilization; and that the quality of our civilization in turn depends largely on the extent to which men of reason and morality can permeate and reshape existing institutional arrangements. A formidable task, no doubt, but not one we have the right to abandon in fits of frustrated rage either at pusillanimous "liberals" or at romantic "radicals." Instead, we must persist in the coldly reflective search for concrete steps which, though they may not achieve anything as dramatic as "building a movement," have some prospect of making more and more Americans acknowledge the truth about our foreign policy.

C. Wright Mills did not always conform to his image of the responsible intellectual. Few do. Horowitz is often sadly deficient. But when I compare his driving determination to expose the network of lies, half truths, distortions, logical fallacies, irrelevantly patriotic appeals, and the old-fashioned ignorance which presently enmeshes the American people in a Vietnam adventure as viciously immoral and imprudent as any large-scale endeavor on which this nation has ever embarked; when I confront first hand what often passes for governmental expertise; I can only conclude that Horowitz's thesis is in balance more correct and better reasoned than prevailing official alternatives. But this conviction does not prevent me also from regretting the frequent weakness of his reasoning and, consequently, the diminished effectiveness of his arguments.

Roundheads and Bluenoses

THE REVOLUTION OF THE SAINTS: A Study in the Origins of Radical Politics. By Michael Walzer. Harvard University Press. 334 pp. $6.95.

W. Warren Wagar

"My only object," says Michael Walzer in The Revolution of the Saints, "is to make Puritan radicalism, so unattractive to my contemporaries, humanly comprehensible." This he has done superbly well. And it is no light undertaking for a member of the editorial board of Dissent. The modern radical instinctively looks on the Puritan radical with loathing and disgust. We conjure up nightmare visions of flint-faced Presbyterian tycoons and generals decreeing preventive nuclear war against godless world communism with all the fanaticism of resurrected Roundheads. We call to mind that long line of Puritan bluenoses who have been telling us these many years what books we may or may not read, what drinks we may or may not imbibe, with whom we may or may not sleep. Following Max Weber, we discover profound connections between the Calvinist ethic and modern cutthroat capitalism. Even the familiar argument, disseminated by G. P. Gooch and others, that in Calvinism lie many of the roots of liberalism and democracy does not really help. We are not sympathetic. "Calvinist saintliness," as Walzer himself admits, "has scarred us all."

---

W. Warren Wagar teaches modern European intellectual history at Wellesley College. His most recent book is H. G. Wells: Journalism and Prophecy 1893-1946. (Houghton Mifflin Co.).

According to the Walzer thesis, in contradistinction to the Weber thesis, Calvinism bears little direct responsibility for the "spirit of capitalism," but it does deserve recognition as the first outbreak of political radicalism in history. The 20th-century radical is asked to put aside his prejudices and regard the Puritan of the Reformation era as a spiritual forefather. Like the Jacobins and Bolsheviks of later centuries, the Puritans developed "a politics of party organization and methodical activity, opposition and reform, radical ideology and revolution." They were men of a transitional epoch, a time of troubles, who responded to the disintegration of the old order by supplying disaffected gentry with a new faith. Anticipating the millennial ambitions of Jacobinism and Marxism, the Puritan faith sought to make the world over again. In place of the easy performance of tasks appointed by tradition, it called for a new, hard, egalitarian, impersonal discipline and a life of unremitting toil. The saints, working through state and church, would have made a world without love, beauty or leisure, but also a world of justice and righteousness, as good in God's eyes as life on earth could be. In a word, the politics of Puritanism was a radical politics.

The proper place to begin any study of Puritanism is the mind of John Calvin, and Walzer provides a lucid summary of Calvin's political ideas. He will irritate Calvinist scholars by preferring to see the founder of their faith as "a French refugee intellectual caught up in Genevan politics . . . not primarily a theologian or a philosopher but an ideologist." Calvin had little to offer in the way of new theological insights. Walzer seems to imply that he played Lenin to Luther's Marx. His real contribution was his radical expression of discontent with the traditional order, and his subordination of the problem of personal salvation to the collective effort of building a new heavenly order on earth. Luther's church was a sanctuary raised on native soil; Calvin's was a church militant dominated by exiles and refugees, pilgrims and crusaders, strangers to one another, bent on world conquest.

Most of Walzer's book is devoted to a study of the "ideology" of English Puritanism, traced from the thought of the Marian exiles in Geneva down to the beginning of the Civil War. Puritanism carried on the work of Calvin in a spirit rather more authentic than that of the Huguenots of Calvin's own country. Whereas in French Calvinism, the principal thinkers were lay saints who combined Calvinist ideas of duty and discipline with traditional medieval constitutionalism and sought, in a sense, to breathe new life into political feudalism, the leadership of the English movement was quickly seized by ministers, who functioned as a radical intelligentsia and indoctrinated elements of the rising gentry with a pure and rigorous Calvinist Weltanschauung. When the opportunity for revolutionary action finally appeared, leadership passed to gentlemen and soldiers, but the Puritan ministry had done its work well, over a span of ninety years. Parliament and Cromwell became the instruments for giving practical effect to the Puritan program for national reformation. As one Puritan minister, Thomas Case, charged the Commons in 1641:

> Reformation must be universal. Reform all places, all persons and callings; reform the benches of judgement, the inferior magistrates. . . . Reform the universities, reform the cities, reform the countries, reform inferior schools of learning, reform the Sabbath, reform the ordinances, the worship of God . . . you have more work to do than I can speak. . . . Every plant which my heavenly father hath not planted shall be rooted up.

Although the author may somewhat exaggerate the affinities between modern ideology and the Puritan program, he is not otherwise on the side of the modernists in the scholarly debate concerning the modernity of the Calvinist Reformation. In its form and energies, Puritanism may have had the character of modern radicalism, but he insists that its basic inspiration was exclusively religious. The Marxist line is rejected, despite a good word for the books of Christopher Hill. The Weber-Tawney thesis fares no better. In the tradition of Werner Sombart, H. M. Robertson and many others, Walzer points out that although the Puritans gave new dignity and urgency to work, they inveighed as much as anyone against profiteering, usury and the lures of Mammon. They did not regard great private wealth as a sign of election, and they counseled against giving too much attention to commercial enterprise. They may have delayed rather than encouraged the development of capitalism in England. Nor, as Walzer correctly observes, did the Puritans make any theoretical contribution to liberalism. For Tudor-Stuart tyranny they proposed to substitute a tyranny of their own, a medicine more fatal to human freedom than the disease it promised to cure. If in many ways Puritanism acted unwittingly as a modernizing force, it was not itself modern. Its purpose was to bring heaven down to earth. The Puritan divine, gentleman and warrior did battle for God, and not for any human goal.

This is a solid book, of sound scholarship and rich with historical insight. Its comparisons between Puritanism and modern radicalism are nothing dazzlingly new, and one may wonder if the Joachitic and Anabaptist sects discussed in Norman Cohn's Pursuit of the Millennium do not deserve to be considered as the first expressions of political radicalism in Western history, although they were clearly less "political" than Puritanism. But The Revolution of the Saints is a valuable and sophisticated study of the political ideas of English Calvinism, worth all the agonizing efforts to achieve true historical empathy which it must have cost its author.

He ends on a nostalgic note. Puritanism after 1660 went the way of Bolshevism after the death of Lenin, and there are some effective quotations from one of the last poems of Sergei Esenin. One may feel the same wistfulness about the decline of political radicalism in this country since 1945. The swords lie rusty. The old battle cries are heard no more. "What a misfit I've become/ . . . I feel a foreigner in my land."

HORSE
Chinese, Han Dynasty, 206 B.C.-A.D. 220. Metropolitan Museum of Art. Original in bronze. Ht.: 4". Replica in metal. Price $3.50. (Please add 60c shipping and insurance, and sales tax where applicable.)

You can afford the finest

Now you can grace your home with authentic masterpieces in replica—reproduced with astonishing fidelity to originals sculpted by great artists. With each purchase of this Chinese Han Dynasty Horse, you will receive a copy of our new sculpture catalog, with over 125 photographs and descriptions of the world's great sculpture, and a special section on museum jewelry in replica. For the catalog alone, send 25c in coin.

BRENTANO'S
Dept. NA-A
586 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10036

Graham Greene's Bonbon du Bon

THE COMEDIANS. By Graham Greene. The Viking Press. 309 pp. $5.75.

Alan Cheuse

Comedy writers, says Aristotle, are evil speakers and telltales. Graham Greene, by that definition, has been a comedian for years. With his right hand he spins button-lipped mysteries such as The Third Man. With his left he creates the lambent malevolence of the razor gang of Brighton Rock, that original bonbon du mal. In addition to his continuing skill for depicting the violent underworld of racketeers and espionage, and his forthright dramatizations of an orthodox vision of a world where sin is a necessary part of the human condition, he has recently widened his fictional universe to encompass revolutionary politics. The first hint came in The Quiet American, that angry, sometimes even hysterical, portrayal of a love rivalry between a British reporter and a CIA agent in pre-Johnsonian Vietnam. Fowler, the news writer, puts his rival, Pyle, out of the way by collaborating with the Vietminh.

Greene, in this new novel which deals with life among the resistant and acquiescent elements — native, English and American—in contemporary Haiti, has drawn upon both aspects of his unique talent to produce the most interesting novel of his career. It lacks the passion of The Power and the Glory; also, the colorful landscape of Hispaniola seems to have been slighted by the same Greene who has made so much of every other country he has used. The writer has other concerns. His heretofore narrow moral view has widened to include new elements, some hopeful, others pessimistic. This marks a turning point in the artistic life of a man who could have been called a "mature" writer a decade ago. The Comedians will force critics to open the lids of their boxes labeled "Greene, Graham," and take a fresh look.

"The Comedians" are those who, at first, try to adjust to the barbarous Duvalier bureaucracy by day, and the nighttime terrorism of his secret police, the dark-spectacled "Bogymen" Tontons Macoute. Brown, the middle-aged narrator, born in Monaco, with a background of writing War Office propaganda and huckstering "modern" art, arrives in Haiti to see his mother who wills to him the major interest in a Port-au-Prince hotel. Suddenly a "capitalist," Brown has an accompanying vision of success:

> One night I had looked out of my window at two in the morning. There was a great yellow moon and a girl was making love in the pool. She had her breasts pressed against the side and I couldn't see the man behind her. She didn't notice me watching her; she didn't notice anything. That night I thought before I slept, "I have arrived."

But the totalitarian climate counteracts for potential tourists the lure of rum punches and voodoo dances staged at the poolside. Brown decides to sell. On the voyage back from New York, after an unsuccessful attempt at dumping the property, he meets "Major" Jones, an entertaining fellow who boasts of a past of guerrilla warfare against the Japanese and hints of a current mission to the Haitian Government. To the team of Brown and Jones is added Smith—who ran for the United States Presidency in 1948 on the Vegetarian ticket. Smith and his wife are also on a mission. Innocent of current politics, they want the Duvalier regime to sponsor a Vegetarian Center. ("Eliminate acidity," says ex-Freedom Rider Smith, "and you give a kind of elbow room to the conscience.")

Brown suspects Jones's real motives. He wonders, "Are you and I both comedians?" Brown, Jones and Smith are seen as "interchangeable like comic masks in a farce." When the cast grows, more clowns, the worldly impotent, enter. About his love affair with Martha, the wife of a diplomat stationed in Port-au-Prince, Brown says: ". . . neither of us would die for love. . . . We belonged to the world of comedy and not of tragedy." He also shares with her husband the view that their common Jesuit education allows them to see "the kind of part" they play. Philipot, the poet nephew of a Duvalier minister (whose corpse replaces the revelers in Brown's swimming pool), interprets his life through the same metaphor: "Wasn't I a comedian with my verses smelling of Fleurs du mal . . .?" And Brown's mother, from her deathbed, asks, "What part are you playing now?"

> I suppose [Brown thinks] I was playing a part—the part of an Englishman . . . of a responsible businessman . . . the act belonged too closely to the theatre of farce.

The comedy is not merely confined to character. Prophylactics are substituted for balloons at a shipboard party. Jones escapes from the vicious Tontons Macoute — themselves grotesque parodies of movie extras or hipsters behind their dark lenses—in the dress of a Latin call girl; Smith passes himself off as Truman's major 1948 election opponent. Such incidents paint Greene's usually more sober face with comic lines.

But beneath the new effects Greene is still the captive of one theme: how innocence prevents one from becoming eligible for salvation. Even if the world is run by faithless comedians—men without religion or politics—one must join it; one must commit the "necessary" sin of living a conscious life. The uninspected life is not worth saving. Pyle, the "quiet" American, may have caused many deaths through his clandestine activities, but he never felt the bite of culpability. Thus Greene made him out to be the real evil presence in that novel. (Pyle is murdered. Fowler keeps the mistress they were vying for, but for his complicity in the American's death he lives in a kind of purgatory on earth, wishing that there was someone to whom he could say he was "sorry.") Martha, Brown's mistress, is not a "comedian" because, Brown reasons, "she had kept the virtue of her innocence." She loves her repulsive son, puts on no act for her lover, and not until Brown, unable to bear her innocence, badgers her into saying that she has slept with Jones does she ever lie to him.

By the novel's end, all the "comedians" have become revolutionary actors. Brown and Jones commit themselves to the rebel movement in the hills, Jones to the death. Young Philipot has gone into guerrilla training and Brown's hotel man, Joseph, goes with him. Martha's husband has opened his embassy to its first political refugees. Even the seemingly innocent Smiths eventually set out on their own course of subversion (and emerge as the most admirable of the many Americans whom Greene has portrayed, despite their eccentricity).

There is only one "straight" actor;

Coming

A response by David Horowitz to Arnold S. Kaufman's review of his The Free World Colossus; and a reply by Mr. Kaufman.

Alan Cheuse, formerly an editor of Studies On The Left, now lives in Mexico.

he is the retiring Marxist Doctor Magiot. Previously tolerated by the government as an ideological gesture toward potential friends in the East, he is gunned down by the Tontons Macoute when the American ambassador returns to Haiti. Nowhere is the meaning of the novel's action more clearly implied than in a letter written just before he dies which Brown receives after the murder. His radical commitment to a new Haiti, Magiot writes, has not been composed only of materialist theory but also of a mystique, a humanist faith. He is not afraid to act because: "I would rather have blood on my hands than water like Pilate." The richness of the novel's denouement, of the entire narrative, really, is the result of such political variations on Greene's old theme.

Ex-capitalist Brown toys with the idea that the "comedians" are the only truly committed, to > . . . the whole world of evil and of good, to the wise and to the foolish, to the indifferent and to the mistaken. We have chosen nothing except to go on living. . . .

But he dismisses this version of the truth. His act of daring on behalf of the insurgents has given him the perspective to see beyond false philosophies. After crossing the border into the Dominican Republic, he applies for a job as caterer-manager to an American mining company. He badly fails the interview. The American, he later tells the sympathetic Smith:

> . . . assumed I was a communist. . . . Because the Tontons were after me. Papa Doc [Duvalier], you remember, is a bulwark against communism. And insurgents, of course, is a dirty word. I wonder how President Johnson would deal with something like the French Resistance. . . .

(Greene points out clearly how America's militant anti-communism, like a medieval auto-da-fe, sullies almost beyond redemption her admirable ideals.)

The author's continuing pessimism has led to the farcical atmosphere and despairing comic tone. Surely Brown speaks for Greene when early in the novel he declares:

> . . . it was only my sense of humour that enabled me to believe in Him. . . .

The radical politics, paradoxically joined with that pessimistic view, rather than alleviating the suffering merely intensifies the pain. Beyond innocence, after dissembling and fakery are dispensed with, having fled from the dark inferno of Haiti's (read "Hades") public life, Brown has merely raised his torment to a higher level. His vision of poolside voluptuousness has been replaced by a view of the world "as a great plain," and he is "walking and walking on the interminable flats." Purgatory! The cosmic joke remains: only "Death is a proof of sincerity."

And God is revealed by the conclusion to be "an authoritative practical joker." Haunted by a dream of "Major" Jones playing his revolutionary role in the style of an English music-hall comedian, Brown finds work as a funeral director's assistant in Santo Domingo.

This Commedia is more satanic than Divine. Brown's stand on the side of social justice has not saved him from an end that reeks with the irony of our time. It has, rather, led him there. Pacem, Aristotle. This is closer to tragedy than anything Graham Greene has written.

Contra Sontag

AGAINST INTERPRETATION: And Other Essays. By Susan Sontag. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 304 pp. $4.95.

Charles Thomas Samuels

Susan Sontag is a writer of rare energy and provocative newness, sustained by an intimidating if arcane erudition. Even when her methods are questionable she gives fresh drama to a cast of players that fills the quarterlies with predictable performances of moderate acuity and suavely lucid prose.

But how does she perform? And in behalf of what conception of the critic's role?

Miss Sontag's ideas about art and criticism are most fully developed in the title essay of her collection and in a piece "On Style": (1) Art is formal and meaningful only through its form. (2) Modern critics are fixated on content even though they proclaim their belief that content and form are inseparable. (3) This fixation with content leads to the technique of interpretation that ignores what she calls art's "voluptuousness." And (4), as a result, we need "in place of a hermeneutics . . . an erotics of art."

Thus armed, Miss Sontag sets forth to do battle against interpretation; but there is something oddly superfluous about her attack.

Where has she been since the advent of I. A. Richards, Panofsky or B. H. Haggin, to mention some originative or practical critics of several arts? Who can she be talking about when she asserts that "most people assume . . . interpretation is . . . an absolute value, a gesture of mind situated in some timeless realm of capabilities"? Does she confine her critical reading to Bosley Crowther and Charles Poore? If not, why does she trouble to confute "the prevalence of genteel-moralistic judgments in a contemporary literary (and film) criticism"?

Yet one could accept her book as an exercise in theory (discounting the polemical tone as high spirits) were her theoretical statements clearer and more intimately related to her practice. To begin with, what does she mean by "interpretation"? She offers a definition ("a conscious act of the mind which illustrates a certain code, certain 'rules' "), but she never tells us what the code is or why its rules are objectionable. Moreover, since she defines "style" as "the set of rules" by which "the will plays with itself" (whatever that means), it is a little difficult to see why she should be so formalistic when talking of art, and so free-spirited when attacking the formalistic nature of criticism. Nor by citing Marx and Freud as examples of the interpretive spirit which stifles the modern age does she identify the movement she disdains.

Insofar as she is clear, she is against an unarguably naive tendency toward reading things allegorically, and she violates her crotchets when she engages a work of art. She damns "the modern style of interpretation . . . [which] . . . digs 'behind' the text, to find a subtext which is the true one," and then analyzes Blues for Mr. Charlie to show

"A brilliant presentation."—Rev. Russell Way, St. James Church, Cambridge. The latest book by W. F. Luder (whose preceding book One Pearl of Great Price was called by the Christian Herald a "monumental novel") exposes the fallacy of the "New Morality" and offers a positive alternative:

A NEW APPROACH TO SEX

Addressed to all Christians, a reply by a prominent Quaker to Towards a Quaker View of Sex and Honest to God. $1.85 cloth, 85c paperback

SPECIAL OFFER until April 1: 95c cloth; 35c paperback. At your book store.

FARNSWORTH BOOKS 44 Farnsworth St. Boston, Mass. 02210

"a rather complex displacement of the play's true subject." She has nothing but scorn for critics who apply the test of imitation, yet she finds that Chaplin's The Great Dictator is "painfully, insultingly inadequate to the reality it purports to represent."

Her method of argument combines loosely asserted connections and the sort of historical survey with which tired professors are likely to regale their undergraduates. In the title essay there is a passage illustrating both traits:

> At least since Diderot, the main tradition of criticism in all the arts, appealing to such apparently dissimilar criteria as verisimilitude and moral correctness, in effect treats the work of art as a statement being made in the form of a work of art.
>
> To treat works of art in this fashion is not wholly irrelevant. But it is, obviously, putting art to use—for such purposes as inquiring into the history of ideas, diagnosing contemporary culture, or creating social solidarity.

At least since Diderot. Miss Sontag likes this method of introducing a topic: "In the modern tradition (roughly, Rousseau forward) . . ."; "The culture-heroes of our liberal bourgeois civilization are anti-liberal and anti-bourgeois. . ."; (this last in a 1½ page piece on Simone Weil). There is something so pleasantly organized about it, particularly when one can authorize the generalization with an exemplary culture symbol.

apparently dissimilar criteria as verisimilitude and moral correctness. Why "apparently"? Do we talk of Dubliners and Germinal in the same way, though one depicts a social actuality and one moralizes it? And don't the dissimilar styles and intentions of these books demand different critical responses?

To treat works of art in this fashion is not wholly irrelevant. But it is, obviously, putting art to use. If not wholly irrelevant, shouldn't some notion of its relevancy be set forth, and shouldn't that relevancy qualify the impassioned attack against interpretation which is Miss Sontag's raison d'être? "Obviously" is made to do the work of argument, but it is nothing more than innuendo. And don't artists themselves put art to use for the purposes, among others, which Miss Sontag lists?

The "new critics" argued all this decades ago, and they did it with more philosophical sophistication and more careful consideration of texts than Miss Sontag does with her lists of approved modern fringe thinkers (Artaud, McLuhan, et al.) and obscure works of art (Franju's Le Sang des Bêtes, Noël Burch's Noviciat, etc.).

Her affirmations are no more persuasive than her attacks. To revise the putative fashion for overvaluing content, Miss Sontag proposes a simple reversal, as if we could improve critical discourse by simply turning an error on its head. "In art," she tells us " 'content' is, as it were, the pretext, the goal, the lure which engages consciousness in essentially formal processes of transformation." When she writes "the sense in which a work of art has no content is no different from the sense in which the world has no content. Both are. Both need no justification," there rings the rusty clangor of MacLeish.

No wonder Miss Sontag rejects evaluation along with interpretation. Her god is love. Though she toughly asserts "I don't, ultimately, care about handing out grades to works of art," she is liberal with As. In an intellectual milieu marked by exquisite acts of differentiation and a powerful tendency to exclude, Miss Sontag has won fame by equating art with existence and proclaiming herself the liberator of the sensibility to new sources of pleasure.

Which makes it all the more puzzling to see how careful she is to deny any vulgar delight in thrills when once she begins making a case for something she enjoys. Celebrating "Jack Smith's Flaming Creatures" [The Nation, April 13, 1964], she initially declares that it is difficult to advocate a film full of "close-ups of limp penises and bouncing breasts [with] shots of masturbation and oral sexuality. . . ." But, given her theories about art, one is surprised to find her casting a veil over her responses: "Rather than being sentimental or lustful, Smith's images of sex are alternately childlike and witty." How ingeniously the arguments that the film is not pornographic jostle the ingenuous glee that it is: "In Flaming Creatures, amateurishness of technique is not frustrating, as it is in so many other recent 'underground' films. For Smith is visually very generous; at practically every moment there is simply a tremendous amount to see. . . ." Only a critic as absolutely humorless as Miss Sontag could have perpetrated this howling example of misplaced pomp:

> One great virtue of the pop-art movement is the way it blasts through the old imperative about taking a position toward one's subject matter . . . there are some elements of life — above all, sexual pleasure—about which it isn't necessary to have a position (emphasis hers).

Her rare analyses of art works are invariably surprising in view of her theories. Perhaps the best such essay in the book is the review of Ionesco: at least here she provides valuable insights into her subject and designates serious critical issues concerning his ultimate worth. As she asserts, Ionesco's "plays are not 'about' meaninglessness. They are attempts to use meaninglessness theatrically." For that reason, Ionesco should be a prime example of the new art she seeks to promote. But the conclusion of her review judges that Ionesco is less great than Brecht, Genet and Beckett because he does not share their "full-bloodedness . . . grandeur and relevance."

What is one to make of a critic so intellectually armored, yet so vulnerable? Exactly what Miss Sontag avows in her prefatory note: "What I have been writing is not criticism at all, strictly speaking, but case studies for an aesthetic, a theory of my own sensibility." If we substitute "attitudes" for "case studies" and "reflection" for "theory" we can begin to estimate her positive contribution.

In her famous essay, "Notes on 'Camp,' " she anatomizes more than a fashion in contemporary taste. In notes which reveal a fundamental impatience with intellectual work (ingenuously defended on the ground that one cannot catch a "fugitive sensibility" in "a linear, consecutive argument"), she makes a claim, belied by her jottings, that she is describing rather than advocating. Yet her expostulation ex cathedra about sex ("the most refined form of sexual attractiveness [as well as the most refined form of sexual pleasure] consists in going against the grain of one's sex") virtually duplicates the epicene flavor she acknowledges in "camp." More seriously, her analysis of "camp" culminates in an excuse for it on grounds which are morally presumptuous. "Camp" taste, she says, is a kind of love for human nature; "camp" feeling is "tender." Receptivity to "camp" is an antidote for those serious souls who are poisoned by "high culture and the high style of evaluating people."

Miss Sontag is less a critic or an aesthetician than she is a publicist with a subtlety and flair suitable for an epoch in which nothing but the recherché and novel will serve. Reading her reminds me of coming from the metaphysical poets, Emily Dickinson or T. S. Eliot, onto the long lines and rhapsodic lists of Walt Whitman. Indeed, it is not surprising that the shift in artistic purpose which is signaled in the post-Whitmanian poets, and which should have affected even the legitimate heir of the metaphysical-Eliot line (Lowell), should now make itself felt in criticism.

I don't think we need react to this phenomenon with Miss Sontag's "voracious enthusiasm," before which everything is an item of consumption ("I have the impression not so much of having, for myself, solved a certain number of alluring and troubling problems as of having used them up") and from whose vantage point, passing by in hectic "supercession," all kinds of work are equally to be cherished. At least, we ought to be clear what her sensibility threatens. In its expression, discernment is abandoned in behalf of sensation, evidence yields to incantatory assertions, and critical elucidation disappears, leaving in its place porous generalizations about the agonized modern mind, and hasty concoctions to lighten its burdens with a tolerance for junk.

A half hour's aimless flipping through recent issues of our major literary quarterlies will suggest that Miss Sontag is not unusual, though highly publicized, as befits a publicist. After the pioneer achievements of the last three decades, as Hayden Carruth has said, "readers are more interested in the non-literary forms of criticism, or in no criticism at all."

Yet we need to remind ourselves that the death of criticism is dangerous for art. Mr. Carruth, a poet, insists that he derived unaccountable benefits from the critical explosion through which he lived. Miss Sontag calls into question not only the intellect which criticizes but the intellect which creates. Her theory asserts the primacy of form in order to champion a new definition of art which one can see realized in the tiresomely self-referring nouvelle vague.

Between Miss Sontag's celebration of sensuous surface, and Norman Podhoretz's assertion that the novel has been supplanted by the essay as a bringer of news, there is a strong similarity. He has turned his back on art; she has lobotomized it.

Charles Thomas Samuels teaches English at Williams College. He has written for The Massachusetts Quarterly, The Yale Review and other magazines.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

There is no ghost or glimmer of new moral content in Joseph Losey's King and Country. We had all of it as long ago as Billy Budd and we've had it countless times since. A simple boy (Tom Courtenay) "walks away" from a war. Of course he is caught and brought back to stand court-martial. And this being the British army (World War I), the proceedings are conducted with the gentle implacability that British gentlemen traditionally display toward domestic animals and "other ranks." The young captain (Dirk Bogarde), appointed to defend the hapless creature, is moved by such candid helplessness to an eloquent plea of extenuating circumstances, loss of perspective by reason of battle fatigue and absence of premeditation. The tribunal is more than half convinced, but if the lad was sick, it is a catching sort of sickness and the larger view dictates the sentence of death before a firing squad. This is carried out so inexpertly that the captain himself must administer the coup de grâce, gazing deep into his protégé-victim's eyes and inserting the barrel of a revolver almost lovingly into his gaping mouth.

There was a time when people would solemnly debate the moral balance in this kind of charade, the assumption being that you could find ethical bedrock in war if only you dug deep enough. It's late in the day, I think, for that sort of agonized sophistry.

In a sense that's a pity, for there is good work in King and Country. In the first place, there is the duet between Courtenay and Bogarde. It may be old hat—the inarticulate honesty of the one and the yearning compassion of the other, the vain reaching across class; and when Bogarde is caused to quote Lewis Carroll in a moment of despair you may wonder for a moment if the film is meant as some ghastly parody. But the two are fine actors and they are working with what is—or was—the British social condition.

Much more interesting, though, is the chorus of the prisoner's fellow soldiers. These are Elizabethan zanies, rollicking about in French mud so fluid that it will not accept the rotting fragments of their dead comrades. This Falstaff's honor guard fights titanic sham battles with rats that outsmart them; on the eve of execution they lug jugs of home brew (trust them to cook it) into the death cell and fall into a maudlin homosexual roughhouse that culminates in a game of firing-squad blindman's buff. The fellows are quite mad from mud and cold, hunger and fear; and their officers, stepping about in spotless twill and polished leather, are quite mad not to notice it. There was a sort of hell's ballet going on in the background of the picture (and the extravagantly horrible set had the right staginess for it). I wish it had been made the whole picture, and the ethical cant thrown to the junk heap with Journey's End and Percival Christopher Wren.

De Santis' Italiano Brava Gente is about World War II, but it could as well have been 1916. Its manner is a weird cross between All Quiet on the Western Front and Alexander Nevsky. It seems that among his other wicked buffooneries, Mussolini sent an army to the Russian front, and this is alleged to be the story of what happened to it. With the exception of a contingent of black shirts who ape the Nazis and stay prudently in reserve, these brave but gentle Italians march deep into the great plains as the wheat ripens and the evenings turn chill. They fear the Germans, fraternize happily with any Russians they meet, and observe the first snowflakes with childlike gravity. Cossacks kill them, Germans kill them, they kill one

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps
Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________________
ADDRESS ____________________
CITY ____________________
STATE __________ ZIP NO. __________

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

another, and the cold wipes them out in a white pestilence.

All of this is painted on a very broad canvas, panoramic battle scenes and equestrian charges alternating with vignettes of personal sacrifice and humane encounters. The irony of misadventure is heavily underscored, with occasional episodes of hysterical implausibility. The project was ambitious and to little purpose. Retreat through the Russian winter is as worn a tale as the sacrificial execution of the innocent soldier, and de Santis' depiction of the brave little band laughing and cursing, dreaming and dying in that flat immensity is the inevitable cliché for the subject matter.

Indeed, I'm afraid I have had it, as far as "responsible" war films are concerned. They go on pretending that war is something to argue about, that its nature must be "brought home" to us. All of us have lived with war all our lives; we've never known anything but war, and the discussion has become stale, distasteful and humiliating. If we must have war films, let's stick with the Hollywood glamour boys and be honest about the obscene fascination of the subject.

Michael Goldman

If Marat/Sade is a problem play, the problem would seem to be: what is the problem? Peter Weiss has lately made it all too easy for us to continue raising irrelevant questions by offering his opinion as to "whose side he is on" in the controversy between his two protagonists. [See editorial, "Peter Weiss and Wolf Biermann," The Nation, January 10.] His political explanations, interesting as they are for other reasons, are not likely to be any more to the critical point than our own. We may be grateful, then, to the Film-Makers' Cinematheque for having put on display recently a number of Weiss's films, which offer somewhat more germane evidence as to his purposes as an artist. The films, five very short and one feature length, were directed by Weiss between 1955 and 1959, and represent the bulk of his work in the cinema. While they can make no one regret that he has turned playwright, they cast a fascinating light on his development. For the sensibility that emerges from them — and it is as much to be found in the occasional boredom as in the interest they arouse — is that of a superior de Sade, troubled by human sympathy, laboring to invent Marat.

The earlier, short films are more a film-maker's notebook than achieved productions, but an obsessive series of images dominates them. Fragments of the body appear and are recomposed. Arms, legs and heads are brought together in various perspectives and combinations. A man and a woman lie side by side, staring into space. The treatment is remote, disjunctive; the actors' faces are either blank and fixed, or briefly crossed by unrelating spasms of expression. A sense of strain, overstimulation and affectlessness prevails.

One film, Faces in the Shadows, departs from the general manner when the camera surveys the faces of old men in a crowded beer hall. It is a significantly tender piece of reportage. But these faces, "natural" and "animated" though they are, are also profoundly at a loss. Each is presented in careful isolation. The feeling in their faces searches for a reply; we never see them find it. The sound track is dim and garbled, imperfectly synchronized; perhaps it records not this but some similar scene. We are left, once more, with a feeling of sensual dispersal, of fragmentation, but now another element is present, reflecting and reinforcing Weiss's treatment of the human image — a sense of blank urban flow.

Both motifs are developed at greater length in The Mirage, which follows a day in the life of a pathetic urban wanderer, a teen-age boy on the verge of madness. In a series of episodes, the violence and waste of city life underscore his hallucinations to remove him further and further from reality. He is punched by boxers at a gymnasium, hurt by factory machinery, offered food only at what seems to be a morgue. Later, he eats some filth left out for birds, and runs amok. His erotic imaginings have the fragmented texture of the shorter films. On the morning of his departure we find him staring at a torrent of garbage being poured onto a dump; the sequence of shots suggests that he may be looking there for the blond girl who haunts his fantasies.

The Mirage lacks a dramatic interest equal to the quality of its feeling. It does not make clear where its hero's hallucinations leave off and the tortured world of the city begins, and the source and meaning of his aberration are equally in doubt. Has it been produced by the brutal and exhausted society he moves through? Certainly. But is not this society a madness too—a madness, so the film suggests, identical to his own? Can madmen produce anything but a mad world? At this point in Weiss's career, the paradox was merely implied. It took on dramatic life only in the figure of Marat, who stands out against the sad, fragmented sensual vision that de Sade represents, proclaiming its cause and cure.

Weiss may have good reason today to identify himself with Marat's revolutionary message. But these films remind us how much more complicated was the vision that went into Marat/Sade. Marat is de Sade's creation — an invented madman's mad invention, interpreted by madmen but amazingly like life. The rational impulse by which we conceive of revolutionary change no doubt can result in true criticism, but it is also the most desperate of our fantasies.

THEATRE

Harold Clurman

In 1959 when Jean-Paul Sartre's The Condemned of Altona was first produced in Paris the audience was deeply impressed and moved. It had cause. This play about a supremely wealthy German shipbuilder and his son was received as a parable. Though contemptuous of the Nazis, the older man had turned informer to get his son out of trouble — an act which led to the murder of a Polish rabbi. The son, who had attempted to protect the Jew and who scorned Hitler, was nevertheless a patriot and later, as an officer of the Wehrmacht, had resorted to torture of the enemy.

These events, antecedent to the play's action, establish the premise for the story of guilt that follows. Obtuse Frenchmen in the audience might have taken it as a cautionary tale directed solely toward the Germans; the more knowing saw the play as symbolic of the French condition during the internecine butchery in Algeria of the fifties.

Like the German shipbuilder's son in the play, the French hid themselves from knowledge of crime committed for la patrie. Many who protested were tracked down by hatred and violence. Though the vindictive were given to hypocritical rationalization of their brutality, others suffered inner torment and shame. In either case, these sentiments stemmed from two national humiliations: the early capitulation to the Germans and the successful rebellion in Algeria. The country was divided within itself. And, like Germany after its defeat, the French waxed ever more prosperous. It is perhaps no simple chance that the central figure of Sartre's play — the idealistic officer turned torturer — who has immured himself in the family citadel to hide his anguish and to shut out the evidence of his father's and his country's material well-being — is named Frantz.

Though the immediate stimulus for writing The Condemned of Altona may have been the Franco-Algerian tragedy, Sartre aimed at creating something more than a blunt political parable. The play's final moments reveal the deeper motivations. While father and son are on their way to a double suicide, a taped recording which Frantz had made in his seclusion is played. As the curtain is about to descend on the empty stage we hear:

> Centuries of the future, here is my century, solitary and deformed—the accused. My client [Frantz is "defending" himself] is tearing himself open with his own hands. . . . I will tell you the secret of these multiple incisions. The century might have been a good one had not man been watched from time immemorial by the cruel enemy who had sworn to destroy him—man himself. One and one make one—there's our mystery. The beast was hiding, and suddenly we surprised his look deep in the eyes of our neighbors. So we struck. Legitimate self-defense. I struck. A man fell, and in his dying eyes I saw the beast still living—myself. . . . Where does it come from, this rancid, dead taste in my mouth? . . . It is the taste of the century. . . .

We are all guilty. The murderer is identical with the victim. ("One and one make one.") Man must transcend himself. Two people in the play—particularly Frantz's sister-in-law, an "outsider," an artist — appear strong enough to leave the infested family mansion. Perhaps others too may succeed in escaping the vicious syndrome of Frantz's final indictment.

The play proliferates symbols. For example, Frantz and his sister Leni, cynically faithful to the ancestral establishment, have made love together. This signifies that those who bury themselves in guilt and shame, those who fear facing reality, commit a kind of incest.

This is strong stuff. The play abounds in psychological and philosophic convolutions. It is a "think piece." Yet after I had read it twice and then gone to see it some years ago in London I referred to it in The Nation as an interesting play which bores or as a boring play which interests! Now that I have seen it at the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center, the basis for this paradox has become clearer.

Sartre is a brilliant and courageous man. He has an amazing mind, tortuous as often as it is lucid. He has numerous skills, among them the ability to write plays that emit sparks which fascinate and momentarily illuminate. Dirty Hands, apart from other merits, is an arresting melodrama. There are passages in The Devil and The Good Lord which might be placed in an anthology of exemplary intellectual dialogue for the stage. Because of the urgent contemporaneity of his thinking, and his gift of statement on subjects of inescapable importance, whatever he writes demands close attention.

In general, however, and more particularly in The Condemned of Altona, Sartre is hardly an artist or even a consummate theatre craftsman. His compelling will to stab our conscience creats a certain intensity. At the outset the play induces a degree of suspense. But as it progresses through its three hours of volubility one grows fatigued by the author's strained effort and the inadequate sustenance it provides. The play's personages barely come to life, either as true characters or as powerful mouthpieces. There is no poetry in their speech, no flesh or blood in their contacts, and finally little excitement or drama in their confrontation. They do not make us believe in them on any level. We recognize in the extended dialogue an entirely serious and committed man, a person who, despite his occasional eloquence, in this instance remains only partly articulate.

The complexity in The Condemned of Altona is characteristic of Sartre. In many of his essays and critical pieces this complexity produces results that approach genius. At other times—and something of the sort occurs in a few of the play's passages—complexity becomes a pyrotechnic cleverness of rhetoric and debate. The intellect outsmarts itself. One becomes suspicious, feels oneself being deceived. The mechanism of the mind confronting us revolves and gyrates with an agility much too free to be useful. The mental inventiveness surpasses the quality of the insights. We are struck dumb in a kind of confused admiration without being convinced in our intelligence or satisfied in our spirit.

There is little point in insisting that The Condemned of Altona is a valuable social document. It isn't for us. Though the play may be assumed to have meaning here in America because of Hiroshima or the war in Vietnam, or because we too engaged in the fight against the Nazis, The Condemned of Altona is not written in a vein relevant to our experience or frame of reference. And it is still more futile to say that, for all its defects, it is a more substantial play than any other on Broadway. (That may be so, but who has ruled that we must go to the theatre?)

The French production was galvanized by the lightning shock of Serge Reggiani's acting as Frantz—another factor in the play's Parisian success. We need not be at all surprised that no equivalent of this exists in the performance at the Vivian Beaumont. The acting ranges from the thoroughly competent to either the somewhat embarrassingly strenuous or the tolerably mediocre. The whole under Herbert Blau's direction is done with determined sincerity and evident understanding, except for the set which does not make complete dramatic sense.

I avoid further particulars because the work of the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center should be reviewed

COMMENTARY*

* WORLD'S BEST ?

SEE FOR YOURSELF

TRIAL 8-MONTH Subscription $3.87 (Reg. $8./year)
Outside USA—add $1.

COMMENTARY, NA-2
165 East 56 St., N.Y., N.Y.
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed
Name
Address
City/State
New Subscribers Only

SUMMERLANE CAMP

In the tradition of

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

•

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

▪

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

as a whole at the end of the season. For this reason my strictures at the moment are aimed at the formidable French master rather than at the struggling young Americans.

Robert Pasolli

Off-off-Broadway, so named by its chief chronicler, The Village Voice, is a string of shabby camera theatres in lofts, coffeehouses, church basements, store fronts and, least glamorous of all, YMCAs—concentrated in lower Manhattan, mainly in Greenwich Village. For several years the obscure, somewhat murkily exotic pastime of an audience that couldn't have exceeded two or three times the total number of practitioners, off-off-Broadway now enjoys a much bigger demand for admission from persons eager to join what must look to them like a coterie. Perhaps a desire for the outré is what motivates this secondary audience, which must surely have heard about off-off-Broadway's characteristic excesses, both theatrical and moral. Or perhaps it is moved by a longing for a theatrical atmosphere more informal, amiable and humane than the condescending audience exploitation of the commodity theatre, on the one hand, and the chilling culture mongering of the institutional theatre on the other.

The Judson Poets' Theatre is a focal point in this expansion of interest in off-off-Broadway. The godchild of Al Carmines, associate minister of the Judson Church on Washington Square, this theatre, more than any other, has attracted a following for its frequently outrageous, always affable kind of theatre, touched by a special insouciance that seems to me to distinguish the Judson from the other groups. (The Caffe Cino, the Theatre Genesis, the La Mama ETC, the Open Theatre, the Clark Center, the Hardware Poets Theatre, the Chelsea Theatre Center and the Lincoln Square YMCA Theatre are the other prominent, on-going ventures.) The Judson's revival over the past two years of Gertrude Stein (What Happened, Play I, Play II, Play III and Three Sisters Who Are Not Sisters), its enchanting musical version of Winnie-the-Pooh, and its musical extravaganza, Home Movies (the most famous off-off-Broadway production of all, although its renown was largely due to ensuing commercial presentation)—these productions are among the most engaging theatre I have seen.

The recent bill at the Judson consisted of Red Cross by Sam Shepard, a young playwright of some fame off-off-Broadway, and a new adaptation of Sophocles' Antigone by Theodore Stinchecum, who also directed it.

Red Cross is a one-act encounter play about a young man, Jim, and the chambermaid who takes care of the room he shares with a young woman, Carol. In Carol's absence, the maid comes in to fix the room and surprises Jim at calisthenics. She submits amenably, while changing the beds, to a variety of his whims, including a long harangue about body lice and an impassioned swimming lesson, at the end of which she "drowns" from exhaustion. Recovering, she muses on the experience of "drowning" in a rhapsodic outpouring of beauty and power, then regains her self-possession and abruptly departs. The episode is set between two short scenes involving Jim and Carol which echo the physical jubilance and debilitation.

Red Cross is an enigmatic play on many counts, the playwright having left out a great deal of information ordinarily thought pertinent. He avoids elements of exposition, like identification of the scene and of the relationship of Jim and Carol. He avoids delineation of character, such as whether Jim is psychotic, playful or merely young. He leaves unclear the intention of the action: are the calisthenics symbolic masturbation, is the swimming lesson symbolic intercourse? Even his theme is elusive: is the encounter essentially between youth and maturity, man and woman, son and surrogate mother, or physicality and spirituality? His obvious symbols are ambiguous too, like the trickle of blood that appears on Jim's face at the end of the play, which could be an emblem of his having been defeated by the maid, or merely the testament of his lively lice—if, indeed, the lice were real in the first place. Those are some of the possibilities which Mr. Shepard hints at but does not confirm. Rather, he leaves them in suspension, as ambiguities which resonate against one another and against the stage action that produced them.

One wonders why ambiguity doesn't alienate the audience by obfuscation. I think the answer is that the playwright never looks up, but he plunges right through his stage action, giving no sign that he is aware of the peculiarities lurking behind it. It is bravura playwriting, sure and authoritative, and gives us an experience akin to the chambermaid's death by drowning. Like her, we glow with euphoria afterward, wondering about the experience. We have been tricked by the play's vitality, as she has been by Jim's, and our recompense for having submitted is, like hers, the pleasure of confrontation with a queer and mysterious reality.

The production, directed by Jacques Levy and designed in stark white by Lindsey Decker, was suave and effective. The actors' skin and hair and the blood on Jim's cheek were the only uses of color; it was eerily pure. Florence Tarlow, an actress frequently seen off-off-Broadway, was superb as the maid, reserved and controlled. Miss Tarlow is a naturally wacky actress, but she played everything straight here so that the wackiness showed only at the seams of her performance, a technique in keeping with that of the play. Her rhapsody after "drowning" was beautiful and moving.

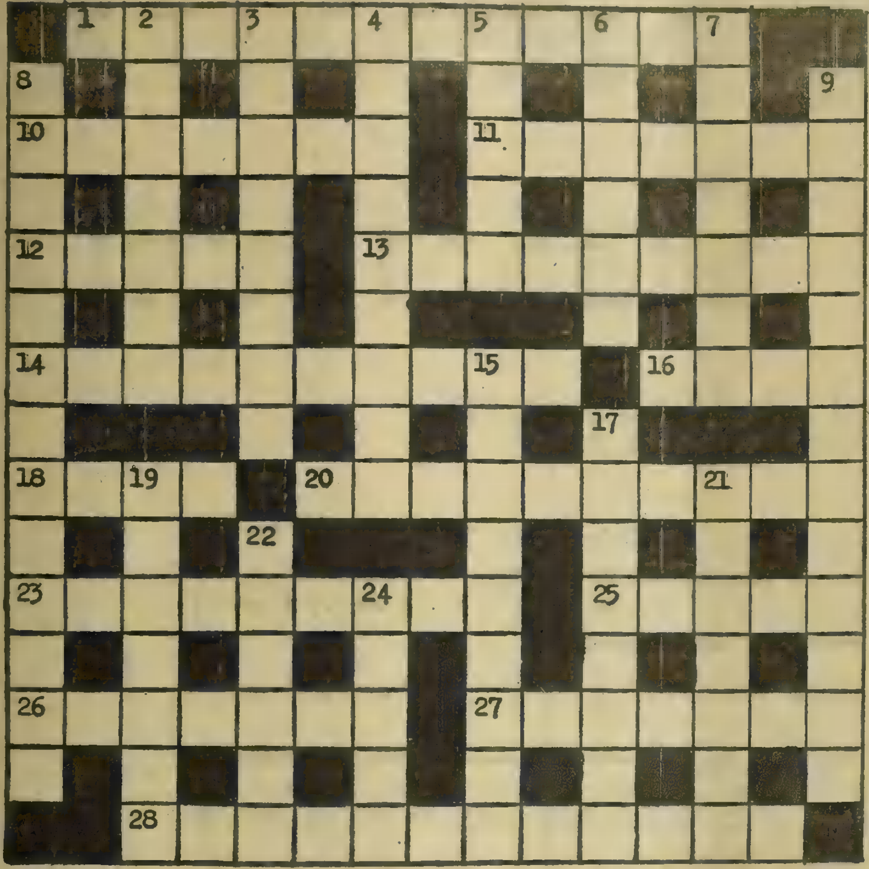
By contrast, Theodore Stinchecum's production of his own adaptation of Antigone was deadly. The play is hearty meat for any theatre, let alone the gentle Judson, but Mr. Stinchecum felt somehow the need to pour over it a rich sauce of physical production. Elaborate Japanese paraphernalia inhibited the movement, distracted one's attention and diffused what focus the actors managed to establish. Only Alice Spivak as a stridently kvetching Antigone rose out of the miasma to deliver up a characterization, but one would have preferred her to stay under. Worse than that, the strong, bleak and sinewy poetry of Mr. Stinchecum's version, which I had discovered in the two scenes I read, was swamped along with the actors. Several good production ideas were awash in all of this—mainly ritualistic elements live and on film—but they couldn't save the production which, paced for a snail race, was a ponderous evening in the theatre.

It is ironic that the Judson has mounted this tedious Antigone as a major effort just at the time when so much attention is focusing on it as the grande dame of off-off-Broadway. Many people walked out on the performance I attended and I was sad for the Judson. But that soppy emotion, I suspect, is gratuitous when directed at a theatre whose insouciance has been a major source of its strength. I hope, and assume, that the Judson won't lose its cool.

Robert Pasolli spent the 1962-63 season at the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis on a Ford Foundation grant, and was later associated with the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center in New York.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1141

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Like Mary, perhaps, about a poem form of the times. (12)
10 A capital fellow, obviously the Chief! (7)
11 Issue of how one is called back to eat, in a way? (7)
12 How one might like a Martini next to the washer, perhaps. (5)
13 Tiers might make them square, as an alternative. (4, 5)
14 Boone, as a statesman? (10)
16 Wild oats, possibly associated with Zeno's place in philosophy. (4)
18 Chooses the wrong spot? (4)
20 Not conducive to a sense of balance, if this. (10)
23 and 7 down An occasion for "Auld Lang Syne" on a seemingly perpetual basis. (4, 2, 3, 4, 3)
25 Direct attention. (5)
26 Proves false. (7)
27 Leave intentional deviation for effect! (7)
28 They should be familiar with the accounts of only half-complete fisherman. (12)

DOWN:

2 A long-standing one might make the speaker happy. (7)
3 Afraid the island is nothing to our country! (8)
4 May apples and makers of drugs? (9)
5 It's nothing to be 135 degrees overweight! (5)
6 State how to put a question in another state, briefly. (6)
7 See 23 across
8 Hash of turkey he'd O.K. would be fit for royalty! (3, 4, 2, 4)
9 Was Prince Houssain transported by one? (7, 6)
15 At one time Kipling had evidently not yet seen one. (9)
17 Having to do with the feet (size, number, etc.)? (8)
19 Driving movement, though some might be rather dopey. (7)
21 25 gets about in one that tries to make things pure. (7)
22 It might be pronounced "authoritatively." (6)
24 Hardy girl brought up under a decided advantage. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1140

ACROSS: 1 and 5 Bread and butter; 10 Lemon; 12 Earwigs; 13 In Dutch; 14 Slight; 15 Medical; 18 Reading; 21 Catsup; 24 Clapper; 26 Alerted; 27 Rehearsal; 28 On cue; 29 Sutler; 30 Used cars. DOWN: 1 Billed; 2 Esmeralda; 3 Dancing; 4 Nail set; 6 Upended; 7 Trait; 8 Rakehell; 9 Atrium; 16 Crustacea; 17 Procures; 19 In place; 20 Garish; 21 and 22 Charles the Bold; 23 Adders; 25 and 11 A shot in the dark.

PUBLICATIONS

THE DELANO GRAPE STRIKE
(See THE NATION, page 151, Feb. 7)
"HUELGA" by Eugene Nelson
The fully documented and action packed account of the greatest attempt since the 1930's by farm workers to organize and win decent wages. 130 pp., dozens of photos, $1.50 FARM WORKER PRESS, P.O. Box 1060, Delano, California.

Fun to Read!
Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.
THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY VS. THE PEOPLE. Read about Columbia University's unique methods of ridding ITS "neighborhood" of "undesirables" in the latest issue of RIGHTS & REVIEWS. Send 50¢ to 307 West 125 Street, NYC 10027. Contributions on race and related matters now being accepted.

WHAT did Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society, really say? Send $2.00 for your postpaid copy of "The Politician." Ampel, 502 Park Avenue, N.Y.C. 10022

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

INCOME TAX returns prepared. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers-instructors. LO 9-9026 or SW 5-7315.

PERSONALS

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

PART-TIME SALESMAN—Office Snack Bar. College student preferred. Hours flexible. Call Paul, 212 - HA 8-6504 after 7 PM, or write Box 581, c/o The Nation.

"PLAY IT AGAIN, SAM."
GIANT photo mural . . . typical "BOGIE" pose, (43"x30") from one of his most famous movie roles, lithographed on poster stock . . . shipped in protective mailing tube. $2.00 postpaid. Hudson Industries, Dept. N-1, 116 Charles Street, New York, N.Y. 10014

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in [illegible] U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

flict was in many respects, it nevertheless was fought, more or less, on "equal terms." Indeed, the heavy concentration of Vietnamese artillery under General Giap was what sealed the fate of the French defenders of Dienbienphu.

The nature of the war today is entirely different because of the technical means employed on the American side. It is no longer at all assumed here (as it was a year ago) that the Americans have no hope of winning the jungle war. On the contrary, it is thought possible that the Americans will "win." But how? By a process of almost general extermination.

The renewal of the bombings of North Vietnam has aroused great anger, especially among responsible intellectual groups here. Professor Duverger, analyzing American aims in Vietnam for Le Nouvel Observateur, has described the phenomenon as "external fascism." Internally, the United States remains a democratic country, but externally it inflicts fascism on disobedient foreign countries by means of napalm. "Would it not do American prestige in the Third World far more good to abandon South Vietnam than to go on with this war which is arousing the fiercest hatred against the U.S. in the Third World countries?"

To be sure, there are the universities that are shocked by all this. But will they be able, Duverger asks, to put a stop to this "external fascism," or will their protest lead to a revival of an even more virulent form of McCarthyism? The only thing, he thinks, that might have some effect on the U.S. is a major protest of West European public opinion, a protest directed most particularly against the unspeakable horror that thousands of Vietnamese women and children are being killed, crippled and wholly or half burned with napalm. A children's welfare society, Terre des Hommes, with headquarters in Geneva, begged the U.S. authorities in Vietnam to allow crippled and burned children to be taken out of the country and given the best possible medical treatment. The response was a blank refusal; it is not thought good for the outside world to see what napalm can do to children.

To date, no West European government, except de Gaulle's, has come out openly against the war in Vietnam—least of all the West German Government, which merely regrets that it can't send troops there. The Labour government is feeble for its own reasons; "and [as Duverger says] it requires the conservatives of The Times to save England's honor."

All the same, America is not popular now among the people of Europe. The thousand Guernicas of Vietnam are giving them bad dreams. For what happens even after a "victory" in Vietnam? And how much "prouder" and more trigger-happy will such a victory make the people of the United States? Do they seriously think they have a mission in Asia and other parts of the world; and is this the best way of fulfilling their mission? One can foresee a violent wave of anti-American sentiment sweeping Western Europe if the bombing of North Vietnam goes much further.

ALEXANDER WERTH

The Stopper

The Pentagon and the President have a "stopper" for all critics of Administration policy in Vietnam: "What, then, is your alternative?" At the moment, this unanswered question has the critics at a distinct disadvantage; the live options are neither obvious nor numerous. But two considerations must be kept in mind. By building up an enormous force in Vietnam, the Administration has itself created the dilemma it now asks its critics to solve. In other words, the formidable military presence which we have now established in Vietnam does pose some problems about how it can be removed without a distinct loss of prestige. This consideration weighs heavily with such responsible critics as George Kennan and General Gavin; in fact it forced them to make concessions which robbed their testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee of much of its effectiveness. And the other point is that the Administration (even assuming the good faith of its "peace offensive") has never clearly and conclusively demonstrated that it has exhausted all live bids for negotiation or the possibility of finding a role for the UN. Senator Ribicoff's proposal—that the President arrange a preliminary conference at Geneva with the thought of subsequently reconvening the Geneva Conference itself—is merely one of several unexplored avenues of escape from the dilemma.

If all possibilities for a negotiated settlement fail, there would still remain the option of a unilateral withdrawal of American forces. But this would, indeed, be the last alternative, and virtually none of the Administration's critics propose unilateral withdrawal—although none of them make clear why, given their view of this dirty war, they hesitate to take that position. We submit, however, that there is an explanation. Withdrawal would be a blow, perhaps a fatal blow, to the UN. It would be tantamount to conceding that the organization is powerless to cope, even indirectly, with a major threat to the peace involving one of the Big Two powers without the consent of both. Some such consideration doubtless explains Senator Morse's consistent contention that the issue of Vietnam must be brought to the UN. Granted that there are peculiar difficulties such as the nonmembership of China and the apparent reluctance of North and South Vietnam to participate in UN negotiations, the fact that intervention would be difficult does not dispose of the UN's duty, under the Charter, to seek peace in Vietnam—Chapter I, Article 1; Chapter V, Article 24(1). The good sense of the majority of the people tells them that it would be a good idea if the United Nations were to become involved (74 per cent of the Americans questioned approved this proposition in a recent Gallup poll).

The statements in this issue (p. 227) suggest how a role for the UN might be found in the Vietnam dispute. In effect, both proposals assume a reconvened session at Geneva as a necessary precondition, but "back to Geneva" has always been the logical first step for a settlement and presumably the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong would be willing to negotiate there on the basis of their Four Point proposal. One statement also suggests how it might be possible to induce the Soviet Union to join with Britain in reassembling the parties at Geneva. Until such possibilities as these have been fully tested (somewhat similar proposals have been raised in letters to the press by Seymour Melman, Irving Horowitz and Seymour Lipset), neither the Pentagon nor the White House should be permitted to fob off critics by simply asking: "What is your alternative?" At the moment, the tacit assumption that this retort is a stopper blunts the mounting criticism of Administration policy.

The War Fans

Atlanta

"Affirmation Vietnam," held on Lincoln's Birthday and trumpeted all over the city for weeks in advance, was to draw an overflow crowd to the new 50,000-seat Atlanta Stadium and declare thunderous support for American policy in Vietnam. The stands were seven-eighths empty on February 12. For one thing, it rained all day. Perhaps, also, the attendance reflected the fact that support for the war, though still felt by a majority of Americans, is polite and passive, with people standing behind the country by sitting in front of the TV.

This was not a bellicose crowd. Although one man did snatch a picket sign from one of the thirty people who marched silently around the stadium ("We Do Not Affirm This War." "We Condemn American Aggression." "Support Julian Bond and Free Speech." "Vietnam for the Vietnamese." "Stop Hysteria—Both Sides Are Wrong"), most of the opposition was expressed either in banter or earnest argument. On the picket line were Negro and white college students, a few faculty people, a blind man, a young woman pushing a baby stroller.

Sponsorship of "Affirmation Vietnam" reflected the new far-Right-to-moderate-Left coalition which has grown up around LBJ. On the list was one of Georgia's most vociferous racists, Roy Harris of the Augusta Courier; and also Ralph McGill. It included segregationist Peter Zack Geer, who led the attack on Julian Bond's right to be seated in the Assembly; and also Rufus Clement, president of Atlanta University. In view of the racist position of some of the Atlanta rally supporters of his war, Mr. Johnson may have been ill advised to charge his Senate critics with prejudice in his February 16 Chicago speech to the American Association of School Administrators. Inside the stadium Confederate flags were sold, alongside copies of The Green Berets and (surprisingly) Marvin Gettleman's book of documents, Vietnam.

Sen. Richard Russell told the crowd: "The time for debate as to our participation in Vietnam has passed." Sen. Herman Talmadge, following him, quoted Stephen Decatur: " . . . but my country, right or wrong." Another Georgian, Dean Rusk, was the wind-up speaker: "Let us be very clear and very simple." And he was. We were in Vietnam because "there is an aggression by North Vietnam against South Vietnam," and "we have a commitment to South Vietnam."

The crowd munched on peanuts, sipped Cokes, and applauded. Sgt. Barry Sadler stood at parade rest behind the microphone and sang The Ballad of the Green Berets. Organist Graham Jackson played Yankee Doodle and Battle Hymn of the Republic. The Emory University Glee Club sang There Is Nothing Like a Dame from South Pacific. The sound carried outside the stadium. A girl on the picket line, drenched and hatless, said: "It's like a Fred Waring concert. And I find that unnerving, because this is a war rally."

HOWARD ZINN

VIETNAM: WHAT ROLE FOR THE UN?

The Strategy of a Truce

Russell J. Leng

The Soviet Union would not consider such a thing; France did not think it wise to become involved; the Secretary-General felt that the matter should be handled in a more quiet, informal manner, and even the American Ambassador admitted that little could be accomplished at this time. Yet for better or worse the United Nations Security Council is now directly and formally involved in Vietnam.

As the United States has already discovered, the UN is likely to find that the cruel realities of the Vietnamese dilemma offer a hard testing ground for its greatest strengths and most deplorable weaknesses. Above all, it will test the nearly forgotten premise that gave birth to the United Nations: great powers must cooperate to keep the peace.

By now it is obvious that any effective United Nations action in Vietnam will require the approval and cooperation of the Soviet Union. As first glance, the Soviet's consistent official stand against involving the United Nations in the Vietnamese war would seem to doom the American initiative to an exercise in wishful thinking. But although the prospects of achieving a cease-fire in the near future through the UN are not great—as Ambassador Goldberg's letter to the Security Council so candidly admitted—they are not impossible. The endless

---

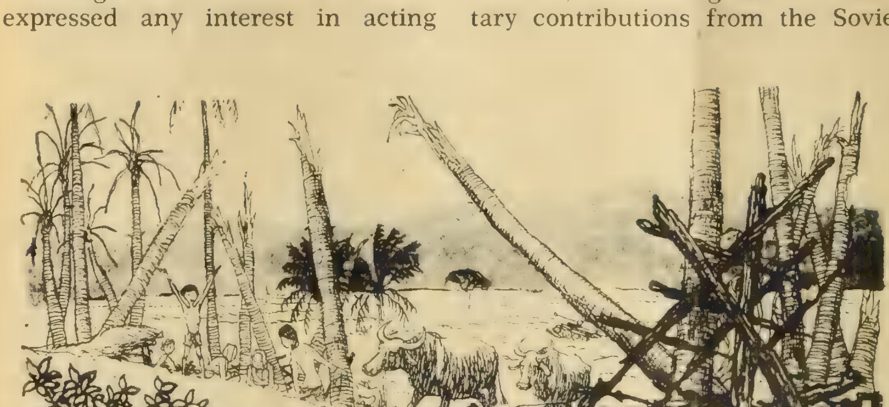
Russell J. Leng is a foreign affairs analyst with the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, who specializes in United Nations affairs. The views expressed here are his own and do not represent those of the Library.

rounds of private discussion and face-saving devices available to the organization are among its greatest assets. The Soviets are in no position to join with the United States in arranging peace negotiations if they still take global communism seriously, but they could respond to an initiative from the nonaligned nations —for example, to reconvene the Geneva Conference. In so doing they could gain stature with the Afro-Asians and, at the same time, bring about the peace they apparently desire without losing too much face among their more militant Communist brethren. The United States may be somewhat more willing to negotiate with the National Liberation Front if we are requested to do so through a similarly sponsored resolution.

Of course, there is still the problem of obtaining the cooperation of the other four parties to the dispute —Peking, the two Vietnams and the Vietcong. So far none of them has expressed any interest in acting through the United Nations. But here, too, with the possible exception of Peking (whose cooperation is not essential), a strong neutral initiative could bring about a consent to discussions.

When and if the question of peace is brought to the negotiating table, a reliable cease-fire will necessarily be one of the first issues to be considered. The United Nations is the entity most likely to end up with the responsibility for overseeing that truce. What are its prospects for success?

If its ability to open the way for difficult negotiations has been one of the UN's greatest strengths in the past, peace-keeping operations have provided some rather striking examples of its limitations. Money is the most obvious difficulty. The United States has moved from its adamant stand on the compulsory nature of peace-keeping assessments for the Middle East and Congo operations, but the long-awaited voluntary contributions from the Soviet Union and France remain outstanding and the organization continues to teeter on bankruptcy. Nevertheless, despite the predictably high cost of any operation in Vietnam, finances are not the basic problem. The United States could easily afford to pay the entire cost; it would be a good deal less than the current outlay for the military campaign.



Punch: Ben Roth

"Mother, Why Can't They Make Every Day a Holy Day?"

This does not mean that we can simply spray blue paint on the helmets of the 101st Airborne Division and magically turn them into a Korea-style United Nations force effectively controlled by the United States. What was possible in Korea, or even in the Congo, will not be possible in Vietnam. Whatever else may or may not have been proved by the Soviet Union's implacable stand on the Congo and Middle East assessments, it proved that the two-thirds majority in the General Assembly which we had come to depend upon, and which made peace-keeping action possible outside of the Security Council, has faded away. A United Nations force in Vietnam will be small and manned by a balanced force of "Socialist" and "non-Socialist" lesser powers. It will be initiated and, most probably, directly controlled by the Security Council, and thus subject to Soviet veto.

This rather awkward state of affairs is not solely a product of Soviet intransigence but the inevitable dilemma of an international organization which has been forced to take direct action in situations involving the conflicting national interests of great powers. The very success of peace-keeping operations in the past has made the great powers the more jealous of their control over the organization. The Soviets reacted to the outcome of the UN venture in the Congo no more violently than we would react to a similar situation in, say, the Dominican Republic. Perhaps even more important, the United Nations will not allow itself to become involved in policing a Vietnam cease-fire unless there is a reasonable prospect of success. The organization is currently much too weak, both financially and spiritually, to accept the burden of someone else's failures in Vietnam.

It is not surprising that the Secretary-General has been so insistent on having the NLF participate in any proposed peace talks. If the Vietcong is not satisfied with the terms of a peace settlement, a small

UN force is not going to impose compliance when more than 200,000 American troops and the entire armed forces of South Vietnam have failed. Thus, even with the support of both the United States and the USSR the UN cannot realistically consider policing a truce without active Vietcong cooperation.

It should not be forgotten that although the International Control Commission, which grew out of the Geneva Accords of 1954, may have been unduly handicapped by its small size and an overabundance of petty complaints, the lack of any real cooperation from either the North or South Vietnamese governments doomed it from the outset. A bigger force would have been no more successful then, and without the cooperation of all sides collapse would come even sooner today.

A workable peace settlement would seem to be dependent on the successful integration of the Vietcong into the political structure of South Vietnam. In such a situation, a United Nations peace-keeping and observer force could be quite effective in overseeing the withdrawal of North Vietnamese and American forces, controlling the release of prisoners of war, guaranteeing amnesty to guerrilla forces leaving the country, and even supervising elections. Without at least the minimal support of the actively engaged forces, including the Vietcong, it could do none of these.

It will be difficult to reach a workable peace settlement, but not impossible. The Vietnamese have been fighting for more than twenty years; neither side wants to continue the slaughter. The neutral aid facilities of the United Nations could do a great deal to help a war-weary Vietnam recover its strength and identity.

The United States has a vital stake in the future of the United Nations. Its potential for peacefully solving the disputes of the great powers still offers our best hope of survival in the nuclear age. We cannot afford to sacrifice that potential to cover our own failures elsewhere.

The Tactics of a Truce

Jack D. Forbes

To one degree or another all the parties engaged in the Vietnamese civil war profess a desire for peace, and yet the war continues. In part this is because no peace proposals made by either side have thus far included guarantees to protect the interests of all participants. The North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front appear to desire conditions very unfavorable to the Saigon junta and the United States, while the latter groups appear intent upon the annihilation or disappearance of the NLF. No peace can be arranged until conditions are set forth which recognize the interests of all Vietnamese factions, including tribal groups, Buddhists and neutralists.

In making any peace proposal, it must be assumed that all parties truly desire an end to hostilities, providing only that their relative positions of strength are not diminished by the immediate postwar stage of developments. Any serious peace proposal must realistically respect that condition.

The first step in any move toward peace would be the recognition by the United States that the Vietnamese war is a civil war, that the several most interested participants—NLF, Buddhists, tribesmen, neutralists, Saigon junta leaders, North Vietnamese, Catholics, et al.—deserve recognition as legitimately concerned groups and that no one of these parties can pretend to speak for the South Vietnamese or the Vietnamese as a whole. The United States must also face the quite obvious fact that the Saigon junta has no claim to call itself a legitimate government, being merely the end result of numerous unconstitutional seizures of power. It has no more claim to represent the South Vietnamese people than does the NLF or FULRO (the tribal alliance). In brief, there is no government in South Vietnam, but rather several factions engaged in a military-political struggle. And the United States must admit that it is the only significant non-Vietnamese participant in the civil war and that if it were not for the United States intervention the war would doubtless involve only Vietnamese.

Any serious peace proposal must, I believe, rest upon the following principles: (1) that a cease-fire must be arranged as a precondition for real negotiations under United Nations supervision; (2) that only the United Nations can properly supervise the transition to peace; (3) that South Vietnam will have to be under international control for a number of years to prevent a resumption of the civil war or the seizure of power by one faction; and (4) that all interested parties must not only be involved in the peace negotiations but must be provided with face-saving arrangements which will give all groups the opportunity for claiming a moral if not a military victory. I believe that the following proposal meets these conditions.

A cease-fire should immediately be arranged, on the basis of existing "fronts," no matter how complicated the boundaries may be. Second, all military units in South Vietnam should be immediately placed under United Nations command and all non-Vietnamese (principally U.S.) and North Vietnamese troops should be withdrawn under United Nations supervision according to a carefully arranged schedule.

At the same time that United States, North Vietnamese, Australian and South Korean troops are evacuated, equivalent numbers of United Nations units, derived from neutralist or nonaligned nations, should be introduced. Once all foreign and North Vietnamese troops have been replaced, a coalition government should be created, representing all factions, including tribal groups and non-Vietnamese minorities. As soon as conditions are appropriate, within perhaps six months, free elections should be held under the close supervision of United Nations authorities. Proportional representation for all parties and factions should be guaranteed, so as to insure the participation of all groups.

The United Nations forces should remain in South Vietnam for a period of at least five years subsequent to the first free elections and at least one year after the second free elections in order to guarantee that no powerful faction violates constitutional guarantees in the interim. Such a United Nations presence should also guarantee full freedom of speech and political activity.

---

Jack D. Forbes is a native of Southern California now teaching history at the University of Nevada.

During the five-year (minimum) period of United Nations supervision, the armed forces of all South Vietnamese factions should be demobilized and replaced by a minimum-sized police force under civilian control. Likewise, the Mekong River Project (or a similar scheme of economic development) should be implemented. The United States should—as it easily can—bear much of the cost of both the UN operation and the Mekong project.

Such a procedure as proposed above would, I believe, provide adequate protection for all factional interests. It would avoid further bloodshed and allow the South Vietnamese time in which to determine their own destiny. It would make full use of the United Nations, the only agency designed to settle a conflict such as exists in Vietnam. Finally, it would set a precedent for United Nations interim control of contested regions which might well be useful in Laos, Korea, Germany and elsewhere.

POVERTY, INJUSTICE and the WELFARE STATE

Part 1: An Ombudsman for the Poor?

Richard A. Cloward & Richard M. Elman

Americans think of justice primarily in connection with agencies of law enforcement, for such agencies have drastic powers, even over life itself. But at a time when the United States Supreme Court is upholding the right to counsel in criminal proceedings of all kinds and otherwise curbing infringements of individual liberties by law-enforcement agencies, it needs to be said that many other government agencies have only slightly less drastic powers, especially over low-income people. It is no small matter that a person may be arbitrarily defined as ineligible for public relief, no small matter that he may be arbitrarily evicted from a public-housing project. There are few institutionalized safeguards against the potentially unjust exercise of power by governmental "poor agencies," and virtually no place where low-income people can turn for assistance in availing themselves of the channels of redress that do exist.

In America, we continue to define poverty as resulting from all manner of personal devils which must be exorcised with commensurate autos-da-fé. England, by contrast, has moved far beyond the Elizabethan "poor-law" concepts which still dominate much of America's orientation toward the impoverished. Our welfare state is accordingly characterized by a lawlessness, a discrimination by class and race, a disregard for human rights and dignity, and a niggardliness that are recurrent, often routine, if not institutionalized. And if our social-welfare system is regularly unjust, it is because American public opinion about the poor makes it so.

There is a plethora of evidence to support this view. For one thing, America spends as small a proportion of its tax dollar on social-welfare programs as any other major social-welfare nation in the West; furthermore, if the changing value of the dollar is taken into account, we spend little more now than two decades ago. For another, the notion that our welfare programs are chiefly for the poor is a persisting fiction. In fact, most of the economic innovations of the last few decades have not substantially aided those for whom poverty is a desperate and constant condition. Social security payments, for example, mostly benefit working-class persons, and not all of them at that.

The regularly unemployed poor have not, to cite another example, gotten unemployment compensation, for one must have been employed to become eligible. Although this measure may protect a good many working-class people from the worst consequences of unemployment (at least temporarily), it is no great boon to the unemployable or the chronically unemployed. In retrospect, it seems fair to say that the chief function of this benefit is to enable the temporarily unemployed person to avoid the "means" or "poverty" test required of the chronically poor, who struggle daily to establish and maintain eligibility for the dole. Unlike the applicant for public assistance, who is obliged to divest himself of many assets while on relief, the working-class person can obtain economic benefits without having his insurance, savings and automobile attached. Working-class groups have not only increased their share in the fruits of the institution of private property through union organization; they have also understood the necessity of finding ways to secure themselves against such tides of economic misfortune as might thrust them back. The programs of the welfare state are one among many mechanisms by which these groups insure the continuity of their status.

Legislation for the poor, by contrast, makes benefits available to as few as possible, and then only under the most trying and degrading conditions. The New Deal established a huge public-welfare program under federal-state-local auspices, but great numbers of our poorest citizens are even now systematically excluded. Every state in the Union has passed laws withholding public-welfare benefits from persons not residents in the state for some specified period of time. In Michigan, for example, some public benefits are available only to people who have lived in the state for five of the nine years preceding application. For decades, residency provisions have penalized the poorest elements in the society, especially rural migrants within our borders and those crossing from Puerto Rico. Efforts to repeal these laws have been stubbornly resisted. New York—perhaps the most liberal state and certainly one of the wealthiest—has barely resisted the temptation to promulgate a more stringent residence law: such legislation has actually reached the governor during the past decade but was vetoed.

---

Richard A. Cloward is professor of social work at Columbia University. Richard M. Elman is a free-lance writer.

Residence laws probably violate the constitutional right to cross state boundaries without penalty. They are not the only examples of legislation governing "poor agencies" which are of questionable constitutionality. Issues of "equal protection" are constantly posed in the welfare structure. One is the requirement that self-supporting relatives (who already pay income taxes to support social-welfare programs) be taxed again to support their indigent kin. "Relative-responsibility" laws have been successfully reversed in some state courts, under the "equal-protection" clause of the Constitution, but no cases have yet reached the federal courts where more binding precedents could be established.

Efforts to secure liberalizing legislation founder much of the time, for powerful groups across the country are working to make the social-welfare apparatus even worse. At various times, it has been proposed that desertion be declared a federal offense if a family is receiving public assistance, that sterilization of welfare recipients who continue to bear illegitimate children be made mandatory, and that conviction for a felony be made grounds to deny any form of assistance. Even at a time when many wonder whether automation will not throw huge numbers into enforced idleness, programs of work relief which verge on peonage are continually being put forth. Although many of these proposals never pass into law, a good many do. A number of states, for example, have ceilings on public-welfare grants to penalize large families, ostensibly to depress the birth rate among the poor. In two states, Nebraska and Iowa, courts have declared these laws to be violations of "equal protection" on the ground that the child in a large family needs to eat as much as the child in a small family.

That the legislative framework of our social-welfare system is becoming more humane is, therefore, open to debate. Gains can be pointed to, but there are setbacks; and it must be recognized that some of the most regressive legislation has been passed in recent years. In the late fifties and early sixties, for example, a number of states passed "suitable-home laws" in response to public outrage over disclosures of high rates of illegitimacy on public-welfare case loads. Louisiana passed a law that any woman who had had illegitimate children while on welfare could be denied further aid, and more than 20,000 mothers and children were immediately struck from the rolls. Other legislatures, as in Florida, gave mothers a choice: surrender your illegitimate children for placement (i.e., institutionalization) or be dropped from the rolls. Thousands of mothers elected to give up assistance rather than their children, and the Florida Department of Welfare, calculating to the second decimal place the millions saved, put itself before the public in subsequent annual reports as a model of administrative efficiency and moral virtue. But in Michigan, where a similar law was passed, mothers who chose to leave the rolls found that the state was determined to get their children anyway: after living for a few months in absolute poverty, they were brought into court on charges of physical neglect, and the children were forcibly removed from their homes.

A characteristic of our welfare state is that administrative practice is almost always worse than statute. Broad grants of discretion in doling out benefits are given to administrators because there is no consensus at the legislative level concerning concepts of social welfare. Some measure of discretion is inevitable, for no set of statutes can provide firm guidelines for all the varied circumstances that will be presented for decision. Legislators assume that those who carry out the laws will be reasonable and prudent men, possessed of common sense if not of the uncommon sense to divine the intent of vague and ambiguous statutes. But in areas as controversial as social welfare, the language of statutes may be purposely vague, since greater specificity would reveal more sharply the differences among contending political groups and would thereby foreclose the possibility of any legislation at all. The task of explicating the statutes then falls upon the welfare bureaucracies, so that the political struggle shifts from the legislature to the arenas of administration.

The struggle to control the discretion of the administrator is, for the low-income person, an unequal one. Those he confronts are organized and powerful, whether taxpayers' associations, newspapers, civic groups, professional societies or political actors. They have the resources to maintain constant watch over agency practices, the knowledge to frame issues and put forward policies, and the power to influence and activate sectors of the populace in behalf of these policies. Lacking comparable weapons, the low-income person is merely a refugee from a battle that alternately rages and dies down, shifting from one area of his existence to another. Whether the field of battle is his morals (if in public housing), or his willingness to work (if on public welfare), he is its victim.

Housing for the poor is an instructive case in the operation of administrative discretion. Faced with far more applicants than can be accommodated, housing officials have had to make choices. In the process they have come to be only incidentally concerned about the need of applicants. They have established elaborate screening techniques to rebuff the unworthy, whatever their need, thereby erecting defenses against the continual charge that public moneys are being used to subsidize immorality. Applicants can thus be rejected (and quite regularly are) if they have illegitimate or retarded children, have been separated from a spouse two or more times, are alcoholic, or display what is defined as obnoxious behavior at the application interview. Families on welfare with illegitimate children are shunned—a curious policy by which eligibility for one meager public benefit disqualifies a family for another. And so it is that agencies established to dispense money and other material benefits become guardians of public morality.

But the chief characteristic of public agencies serving the poor is not the punitive use of lawful discretion: it is the exercise of unlawful discretion—the promulgation of administrative rules and procedures which undoubtedly violate either constitutional provisions or the immediate statutes governing departments. No more vivid evidence can be cited of the enormous impact of political pressures upon these agencies. The most flagrant example in a history of flagrant abuses is the "after-midnight raid" on ADC mothers—an unannounced visit, without benefit of warrant, in which a home is searched for male attire that might be taken as evidence that a man (whether husband or not) is available and presumably capable of providing support, or for some suggestion of immoral activities or child neglect, any of which might justify terminating benefits. (During the past summer, candidates for office in Nassau County—both the Democrat and the Republican-Liberal — asserted the right of the district attorney's office to make such raids; the Conservative candidate denounced the practice.) These actions surely violate constitutional prohibitions against illegal search and seizure. They are, nevertheless, conducted by virtually every welfare department in the country. When an Oakland, Calif., welfare worker refused to take part in a raid in January, 1962, he was dismissed for insubordination, and is now suing for reinstatement through the appeals courts of that state. At one stage of the proceedings, the state argued that people taking public assistance waive certain rights, not the least being the right to privacy.

Another instance of lawless discretion is revealed in the way relative-responsibility statutes are applied (assuming for the moment that they are constitutional). Laws in each state designate the categories of relatives who are to be considered responsible, but administrators expand on legislative intent by instructing staff to seek out additional categories of relatives (and even friends) as potential "financial resources." When such sources of support are located, the applicant may be denied assistance, or his grant may be arbitrarily reduced by an amount presumed to be available elsewhere.

Or consider the administration of New York's "welfare-abuses law," passage of which followed hard on the Newburgh controversy. This statute, a residency law, provides that a person may be denied benefits only if it can be shown that he came into the state for the express purpose of securing them. It stipulates that the burden of proof is on the local welfare department, and that emergency relief must be granted pending a factual determination on the issue of motive. As a practical matter, however, the mere fact that an applicant is from out of state is often taken as prima facie evidence of intent to collect welfare. Many thousands of families have been illegally disqualified since passage of the law in 1962.

But administrative lawlessness is not limited to matters of initial eligibility for benefits. Once on the welfare rolls, recipients in need of special grants of many kinds—for winter clothing, furniture, apartment security, for example—frequently fail to secure them. There are at least three reasons. The law states that requests for all grants must be investigated, frequently by a home visit, and overburdened departments cannot always spare the manpower. In addition, under pressure to conserve funds, departments often ignore requests for special grants. Finally, because of high turnover, public-welfare employees frequently do not themselves know what benefits the applicants are entitled to and how these can be obtained for them. For instance, welfare recipients in New York who live in rat-infested buildings can receive a so-called "rat allowance" to cover the cost of keeping their lights burning all night long; few welfare workers seem to know about special grants of this kind and few clients are told of them. By such practices, welfare clients are routinely deprived of substantial cash entitlements.

The American poor may not be able to protect themselves from injustice, but affluent groups can. As governmental powers proliferate, middle-class people are also becoming objects of abuses. Accustomed to having their rights respected, they are calling for restraints against government.

Traditionally, representative democracies have relied upon the legislator to mediate between the citizen and the public agency. With the growth of government, however, this arrangement—never very effective—has become mired down in complaints. To cope with the situation, a European legislative innovation, called the Ombudsman, has been proposed for America. Developed in Sweden more than 150 years ago, this innovation has evolved and spread to all other Scandinavian countries and to a number of nations in the British Commonwealth. Last October, the cause of the Ombudsman got a special boost when the British Labour government decided to establish such an office, even preserving the Scandinavian title.* On January 1 of this year, a somewhat modified version of the Ombudsman was established in Laval, Canada (a suburb of Quebec City); it is the first in North America.

The Ombudsman is a "justice officer," or "citizen's defender." He is usually a highly respected senior member of the judiciary or a renowned professor in law, and is assisted by a small staff of lawyers. Appointed by and responsible to a legislative body—in most countries where the Ombudsman exists, to a parliament—he is charged to investigate all complaints from citizens. In Denmark, for example, the Ombudsman is obliged by statute "to keep himself informed as to whether any person under his jurisdiction [i.e., any civil servant] pursues unlawful ends, makes arbitrary or unreasonable decisions, or otherwise commits mistakes or acts of negligence in the discharge of his duties." If complaints from citizens are declared valid, the offending functionary is asked to provide redress; if invalid, no reprisals can be taken against the complainant.

Typical complaints involve the right of a postman to have in writing the grounds for a disciplinary action against him (the Ombudsman agreed, saying that governmental agencies should routinely inform citizens of the reasons for official decisions); the denial of unemployment benefits to a plumber on what he alleged was inaccurate evidence (the Ombudsman agreed, castigating officialdom for not procuring complete and reliable evidence); a businessman's charge that a national bank required him to conduct all his business with them in writing because he had been abusive to bank employees (the Ombudsman referred the complaining businessman to the ordinary courts which he said had jurisdiction); a charge that the grounds for federal grants for road construction, made selectively to municipalities each year, had not been explained (the Ombudsman ruled for the complaining municipality, saying that criteria of selection should be published).

VOTE FOR
moro

Judging from a newly published volume of essays about Ombudsmanship around the world,* bureaucratic excesses have been effectively curbed by this legislative officer. The success of the Ombudsman is all the more remarkable because his powers are usually limited to investigation and recommendation. The Ombudsman typically publishes recommendations and can thus embarrass the bureaucracies. Representatives of the press are frequently permitted to comb through his correspondence, and his activities ordinarily make news. He is also empowered to make broad recommendations for new legislation intended to remedy sources of injustice by governmental agencies. And because of the esteem in which he is typically held, his recommendations are nearly always heeded. The Ombudsman's chief strength thus derives from intangibles: his personality, his public prestige, the support he cultivates in the press. He cannot, in short, move much beyond public opinion.

Within recent months, a spate of articles have appeared proposing that a parallel complaints office be developed at all levels of American government. Sweden's present Ombudsman, Alfred Bexelius, was interviewed in The New Yorker. An article in Harper's by Marion K. Sanders suggested that the creation of an Ombudsman might appease Negro demands for citizen review boards to take up complaints of police brutality. In the New York Times Magazine, Rep. Henry Reuss of Wisconsin explained his proposal to establish a nonpartisan "Office of Congressional Counsel." Similar bills have been proposed in state legislatures and municipal councils across the country. The general idea has been endorsed by civil liberties groups for both national and local government.

Proponents of American Ombudsmanship would endow the office with an immense purview. "If there are no avenues for correcting maladministration," Congressman Reuss has pointed out in the Christian Century, "programs for the general welfare, such as Social Security, public housing, and veterans' benefits, are full of possibilities for human injustice." Ralph Nader has listed the following abuses with which an Ombudsman proposed for Connecticut might wish to deal:

> . . . preferential treatment and influence peddling, inadequate or unpublished regulations, wrongful detention, state police over-zealousness or laxity, unjust procedures in agency hearings, arbitrary censorship or secrecy, agency reluctance or refusal to give explicit reasons for decisions, patronage excesses, inefficiencies and delays by state personnel, undesirable conditions in prisons and mental institutions, payoffs and kickbacks in state contracts, and discriminatory enforcement or flagrant non-enforcement of state laws.

Given the growing concern here about governmental abuses, it is possible that various adaptations of this mechanism will presently emerge in the United States. The likelihood that they will protect the rights of the poor therefore deserves careful scrutiny.

---

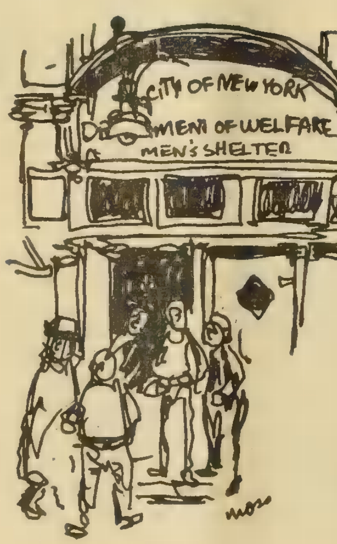
*The British action followed the notorious Crichel Down affair, in which the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries tried to rid itself of a particularly irksome farmer by ordering his lands to be confiscated, an action which led to a Question before Parliament.

*Donald C. Rowat, The Ombudsman: Citizen's Defender (with 29 contributors, including Ombudsmen from thirteen countries), Toronto, Canada: University of Toronto Press, 1965, 361 pp. All quotations, unless otherwise noted, are taken from this volume.

Debate about an American Ombudsman has thus far focused on questions of governmental organization: would an American complaints officer weaken rather than strengthen the traditional role of legislators as Ombudsmen en masse; could an institution nurtured in parliamentary systems be successfully adapted to governments marked by separation of powers; would the use of this device not give American courts further grounds for avoiding politically controversial issues in favor of narrowly technical ones? It has been assumed, and not debated, that the Ombudsman's services would be found equally effective by all American citizens. But the poor of our nation still confront special problems of injustice that have been resolved in most other welfare states, and discussions about the Ombudsman have not even approached a full appreciation of this fact.

In the United States, procedures to review the decisions of public departments have been successful when they found support in public opinion. The Loyalty Review Board, to cite one instance, compiled an extraordinary record, only one of its many recommendations having been spurned by a public department. Years after its abolition, the courts held that it had exceeded its legal authority; but its actions were hardly held to be excessive in the court of public opinion. An Ombudsman for the poor will fail for precisely the reason that the Loyalty Review Board succeeded: his recommendations would run counter to public attitudes toward the rights of the poor.

In countries where the Ombudsman has succeeded, social-welfare principles are generally accepted, even by conservatives. Compared with America, the poor in these countries have a tradition of political organization, often radical in ideology. Through political organizations—such as the British Labour Party—the poor have decisively influenced the shape of social-welfare legislation in their interests. By contrast, pressures to reform the welfare apparatus in this country have originated primarily in very limited sectors of the middle-class community, unaided by organized demands from the poor themselves. Deprived of this allied base of power, middle-class reformers have had to compromise the interests of the poor. Knowing of the injustice of social-welfare practices, but fearing that disclosures of any kind might arouse a dormant and hostile public opinion, reformers have worked "behind the scenes" and have not attacked the system forthrightly and publicly. They have found it necessary, in effect, to conspire with administrators (tacitly, at least) to conceal the full facts from the public. This accounts in part for the widespread ignorance that most Americans exhibit about the welfare apparatus and its abuses.



In America, then, all faces are turned against the welfare apparatus. Everyone seeks to secure the release of the poor from what is defined as the bondage of "welfare colonialism" or from the psychological entrapment allegedly induced by prolonged dependence on the dole. Only the strategies differ: conservatives would make welfare practices more punitive than they are to deter men from dependency; liberals would lift the poor from dependency by equipping them to become economically competitive. Even the crusade against poverty is a crusade against public welfare; Mr. Shriver has repeatedly stressed that the Office of Economic Opportunity does not sanction "handouts."

Concepts of economic individualism also permeate the civil rights movement. The movement calls upon Americans to strike down historic barriers to individual achievement such that the poor may rise, one by one, into higher economic strata. The Negro is said to want to share in America's wealth on the same idealized terms and by the same idealized means as other groups. Thus consumer boycotts have been organized primarily to enlarge opportunities for the employment of individual Negroes, especially in white-collar positions. Out of deference to this ideology, "compensatory programs" in education and "quotas" in employment have not been pressed hard, for they seem antithetical to a social order based on the theory of open competition and individual merit. This same way of thinking accounts in no small part for the fervor with which so many now embrace the philosophy of the Office of Economic Opportunity—especially as it is symbolized in skills-investment programs like preschool education and youth-employment training. The great mass of poor whose daily lives are controlled by the "poor agencies" thus have neither defenders nor have they organized to defend themselves.

Given these compelling political facts, one derives no reassurance from the observation that Ombudsmen throughout the world cultivate success by carefully selecting cases "of a decidedly nonpolitical nature." Such judicious screening would, in the United States, eliminate from purview most administrative injustices perpetrated upon the poor. It is important to understand, then, that Ombudsmanship is not a substitute for basic reform, and that only reform will produce justice for the poor. The Ombudsman cannot overturn whole systems of law and administrative practice that are rooted in the culture and politics of a nation. He is not a legislature, or a chief executive, or a court of law. He merely polices functionaries in public agencies according to prevailing values: Ombudsmanship, one observer has noted, "cannot cure all administrative ills. It will work successfully only in a country, province or state that is already reasonably well administered. When an administration is riddled with political patronage or corruption . . . a reform of the whole system is required."

And, one might add, when a social-welfare system is rooted in contempt for its beneficiaries, it is also the system that must be reformed, for the injustices spawned are countless. Taking up these individual cases of injustice, there being literally hundreds of thousands to contemplate, is a task that would shortly overwhelm an American citizen-defender of any kind. It would require, if nothing else, an investigatory apparatus as large as the system being surveyed and policed.

Advocates of an American Ombudsman have not been altogether unmindful of the pressures of public opinion to which the office would be exposed, although it is not opinion about poverty that they have in mind. Rather, they point generally to our loose federalism and diversity of national opinion. The Ombudsman has grown up in countries that are relatively homogeneous, especially in the factor of race. Economically and racially, the United States is among the most heterogeneous countries for which the mechanism has as yet been proposed. Consequently, it has been suggested that early experiments with the office might better be undertaken locally than nationally. There, presumably, one would encounter less diverse population grouping, and the task of cultivating public opinion would be easier.

But group conflicts, along both class and racial lines, are deeper the closer one gets to the local community. In recent years, disputes about integration in education, employment and housing have evoked bitter antagonism at the local level, and local officials have been virtually immobilized because of apparently irreconcilable differences among their constituents. By and large, federal perspectives on social welfare have been more liberal; most local practices would be much more punitive were it not for pressures from federal agencies. At a time when the Congress has been passing historic civil rights legislation, state bodies have been passing residence laws and suitable-home laws, not to speak of regressive laws in other categories, which partly reflect growing racial tensions. In New York, mounting pressure for an unqualified residence law stems from the in-migration of both Negroes and Puerto Ricans, for the high proportion of these groups on welfare rolls makes them vulnerable to attack by conservative political interests. As the Negro continues to strike at the roots of historic patterns of class and racial dominance, tensions will undoubtedly mount, and further punitive social-welfare legislation and practices at the local level may result.

Countries where the Ombudsman has been effective also tend to have high standards of public service. The success of the Ombudsman partly depends upon responsible and responsive government functionaries. America's social-welfare agencies have slowly been professionalizing, and one might see in these improved standards of personnel training an omen favorable to an Ombudsman for the poor. There is reason to doubt that this is so. Professional ideology is rooted in political ideology. Reflecting the values of their culture, American professional groups have not argued for the rights of the poor or for the legitimacy of dependency. Rather they have said that introducing better-trained personnel into the welfare apparatus will eliminate moralistic punitive practices and supplant them by scientific, rehabilitative ones. But whether strategies are puritanical or professional, the poor are still to be lifted from dependency in spite of themselves. Rehabilitative services should, of course, be extended to those who can use them, but submitting to such technical services should not be made a condition for access to economic and other material benefits; and that is how professionals have always seen it. Public housing, for example, now employs many kinds of professionals. If management finds the behavior of a tenant objectionable, he may be required to accept some form of therapy upon pain of eviction. Professionals have thus become new agents in an enveloping fabric of bureaucratic control of the poor and are, if only unwittingly, part of the problem that needs correcting. When an unwed mother makes application for public housing in New York City for herself and her children, to cite a further example, she is routinely referred to what the Housing Authority calls its "social consultation unit." There professionals employ their higher skills to make a determination of her "suitability"—not her need—for residence in a public project. Thus the rights of the poor are jeopardized as much by those who find legitimacy for their practices in the sciences as by those who find it in the scriptures.

Before an Ombudsman (or any other policing mechanism) can be of much aid to the poor, basic reforms of governmental poor agencies are required. How pressure for reform might be developed will be discussed next week.

World Trade Center

Manhattan's Tower of Babel . . .

Desmond Smith

This month, in a section of New York that calls itself the "home electronics capital of America," several hundred merchants find themselves in the meanest fight of their lives. At stake is "their" 16-acre chunk of lower Manhattan. At issue is whether the Port Authority will take it from them. If it does then "Radio Row" will be bulldozed into the Hudson River; in its place will rise two supercolossal office buildings, each 110 stories high, known as the World Trade Center. Such being the working methods of the public relations tribe these days, it is perhaps worth mentioning that the chief tenant of the so-called World Trade Center will be the state of New York. More than a quarter of the vast complex will be occupied by civil servants. As they gaze down at the declining port of New York they may well wonder what their problems of sewage in Syracuse, snow clearance in Oswego, or child care in Ossining have to do with world trade.

However, the methods used by central cities, suburban governments, public authorities and all who are in any way involved in bond-financed urban redevelopment (which nowadays includes such debatable "public benefits" as parking lots, hotels and office buildings) are notoriously susceptible to a credibility gap of ever-widening proportions. Unless we grasp the true nature of what is happening in our cities, urban dwellers some fifteen years from now may well have no city to walk in. When the little stores are bulldozed away, the neighborhood inevitably falls along with them. To understand how such changes come about it is worth taking a closer look at the New York Port Authority's battle for 16 acres of downtown New York.

The story begins in 1946, when the New York State legislature created a World Trade Corporation to examine the feasibility of a World Trade Center in New York City. After months of study the corporation urged that the World Trade Center idea be dropped. They recommended instead that New York concentrate on modernizing its deteriorating water front. But the idea of a World Trade Center (for reasons that will subsequently become clear) was too good to be abandoned. And, in 1958, it picked up a formidable sponsor—the Rockefellers.

With their vast wealth gushing forth daily from Standard Oil, the Rockefellers are to New York what the Medicis were to ancient Florence. From banking to real estate, from politics to corporate investments, the Rockefeller position is the one that closes any deal. So when David Rockefeller became interested in the World Trade Center in the late 1950s it was only a question of time before something happened. The first maneuver was to obviate any resistance from the city of New York. To do this, Rockefeller—who heads the Downtown Lower Manhattan Association—deftly suggested that the Port Authority restudy the question of a World Trade Center. It was a good move since the Port Authority, a bi-state agency, has become over the years powerful enough to make its own rules about what it will do in New York City. The outraged cries of the neighborhood retailers were, of course, ignored.

Five years ago, the Port Authority endorsed the project a good one. At a press conference it distributed photographs of a 76-story building which would be known as the World Trade Center. It all seemed reasonable enough unless you happened to be a merchant in the area. Later that same year the New York legislature passed a law authorizing the Port Authority to go ahead. Unfortunately for the sponsors, the New Jersey legislature refused to pass matching legislation. Once more it looked as though the World Trade Center was a dead issue. At this point the story details get a little murky but the outline is fairly clear. A political deal was apparently made between New Jersey and New York. In the middle, playing the role of broker, was none other than David Rockefeller's brother, Governor Nelson. To encourage New Jersey to go along with the Port Authority's plans, the Port Authority agreed to take over New Jersey's near-bankrupt Hudson tubes. Four years ago both states passed matching legislation making the two projects—the World Trade Center and the take-over of the Hudson tubes—"inseparable parts of one unified project."

Meanwhile the financial community's powerful pressure group, the Downtown Lower Manhattan Association, was not idle. Through the "old boy network" it persuaded the Ford Foundation-subsidized Channel 13, an educational television station, to run the propaganda film, Another Day Downtown. It was a shameful piece of public relations and brought a sharp rebuke from the FCC. But the real battle was taking place in the courts. The first action was a suit brought by the retailers who operate stores in the area proposed as the site for the World Trade Center. They charged that condemnation proceedings would be a deprivation of property without due process of law. The suit also sought to force the Port Authority into dropping the 76-story-building project altogether. The ground was that this was a taking of private property for other than a public use or purpose. The merchants won in the lower courts. But in the higher courts the Port Authority chose to argue on the grounds of "public benefit" rather than "public use." In recent years more and more court decisions have turned on the "public-benefit" test. In essence, the courts have said that public — and in some instances, private—money may be spent and private property acquired not only when the property is to be used by the public (a park, a playground) but whenever it benefits the public. This can lead to legal arguments of impregnable circularity. Thus the Port Authority contends the World Trade Center is a "public benefit" since world trade so clearly benefits the citizens of New York.

Two years ago, in a sensational reversal of the lower courts, the New York Court of Appeals ruled in favor of the Port Authority's arguments. One month later, in January, 1964, there came another interesting turn in the Port Authority-Rockefeller strategy. With the court battle won largely on the world trade question, the Authority now revealed new plans. The 76-story World Trade Center was a thing of the past. In its place the press was shown the model of a 16-acre-building complex comprising hotels, restaurants, shops and a 2,000-car parking garage. Towering 110 stories above street level were two gigantic office buildings. The sponsor announced that it would be the world's biggest real estate development—more than 10 million square feet of rentable space.

It will be recalled that the Port Authority argued before the courts the need for a New York World Trade Center "planned to house export-import trade activities of all kinds." Governor Rockefeller, within a week of the announcement of the giant complex, announced that the state offices in New York would all shift into the Port Authority development. There was a broad hint that one of the two buildings would be renamed the New York State Office Building. Perhaps New York City real estate interests should have anticipated that move. The evidence, however, is that Rockefeller caught them completely by surprise. In a second lawsuit begun in September, 1964, the realtors argued that even if the statutes under which the Port Authority acts are constitutional, the intent is not. They assert that the proposed World Trade Center is really a cover for a gigantic real estate venture. Moreover, since the Port Authority enjoys tax-exempt status, the realtors claim that the Authority will be given an additional opportunity Desmond Smith, a writer on economic subjects, is a Canadian now living on Long Island. From that point of residence he travels frequently on Port Authority trains, across Port Authority bridges and through Port Authority tunnels. Longer journeys he makes via a Port Authority airport.

---

to increase its revenues at the expense of private enterprise.

Since world trade is the Port Authority's sole justification for moving this fantastic project into New York City, it is worth noting that as of January, 1965, less than 300,000 of the more than 10 million available square feet had actually been leased to private business. Of this total the major share was taken by five banks, all of which do considerable business with the Port Authority. In spite of numerous junkets abroad, and a hard-sell campaign at home, the Port Authority has so far been unable to interest any new businesses involved in foreign trade in moving their operations to New York City and locating in the World Trade Center. WCBS Radio, which has run any number of hard-hitting editorials on this issue says:

> The Port Authority maintains it will rent all of the Trade Center space to firms and agencies in the export-import field. . . it was on the basis of what is called a public purpose that the Legislatures of New York and New Jersey empowered the Port Authority to condemn private land for the Trade Center. If, however, the complex of export-import industries cannot be attracted to the project, then no trade center is possible, and plainly no public purpose is involved. The taking of private property in that case would amount to willful government destruction. . . .

How could a public agency, originally created to take charge of terminal and transportation facilities in the Port of New York, run into such trouble by getting involved in a massive real estate development? The reason is complex and it begins with make-work. During its middle age the Port Authority's management has concerned itself less and less with bi-state transportation problems, more and more with floating successful bond issues. Beginning in the early 1920s with a few bridges and tunnels, the Port Authority today is a $1.5 billion empire, controlling air, truck and bus terminals, bridges, tunnels, a railway system, a hotel, several apartment houses, a horse-training track, and much else besides. From the Far Rockaways to Staten Island the Port Authority operates a bewildering variety of what it likes to call "facilities." All of this serves as excellent collateral for its super-inflated debt structure. The bulk of this vast property empire is in New York City. But, under the terms of its bi-state compact, the Port Authority pays no taxes.

In moving in on Manhattan—the richest stretch of real estate in the U.S.—the Authority has offered to pay the city, in lieu of taxes on the Trade Center, the sum of $1.25 million a year. To put this in perspective, a private developer owning the same property would be required to pay approximately $40 million a year! Over the past decade the Port Authority and the Triborough Authority have paid the city in lieu of taxes the minuscule sum of $15 million. Had this prodigious property empire been fully taxed during the ten-year period, financially hard-pressed New York would have received more than $282 million. Not surprisingly, since it is the bond market rather than the public interest that decides matters, all of the appointed officials of the Port Authority come from the financial community.

Where does the Port Authority's enormous income go? Take a look at its 1964 (latest available) financial report. With net revenues of some $78 million, the Authority paid off more than $56 million in debt. In addition it paid interest to the tune of a staggering $20 million on other debt. No wonder bankers love the Port Authority! Of the huge investment in its enterprises, nearly 60 per cent is represented by debt outstanding. This debt, purchased for the most part by banks, insurance companies, foundations and similar institutions, is the Port Authority's IOU to the real owners of these public facilities. Since the Authority's tax-free bonds are considered a very attractive investment, banks and financial syndicates are always eager to get a piece of the action. Among the half dozen successful bidders for entire bond issues (ranging in value from $3 million to $50 million) David Rockefeller's Chase Manhattan Bank is most consistently in the winner's circle.

It may well happen that the Port Authority will win this fight against the merchants and tenants of Radio Row. Practically speaking, getting the sleepy legislators of New Jersey and New York to revoke the enacting legislation would take some doing. But there is a growing dissatisfaction with the Port Authority's business methods among serious-minded citizens in both states. A major factor in this deplorable situation has been the ability of a small band of wealthy business leaders—led by David Rockefeller — to override the city of New York. This was made possible by the existence of a public authority that has grown arrogant and powerful with the years. Many of these "independent" authorities came into being when state tax revenues were small and when authorities seemed like a neat legal device to get around state debt limits. Nowadays there is something anachronistic in a system that allows a public agency—without benefit of public hearings—to appropriate a man's home or business to make way for another man's business. As the law stands presently the Port Authority's power is absolute:

> . . . such determination shall not be affected by the fact that such property has theretofore been taken for and is then devoted to a public use: but the public use in the hands or under the control of the Port Authority shall be deemed superior to the public use in the hands of any other person, association, or corporation.

When a New York City official was shown this particular section of the enabling act he gasped: "Why, with this power, they could even take city hall!"

I'd be inclined to say that to a very large extent the Port Authority has already taken over city hall. This has come about because New York is underrepresented in the state capital. The city, with 55 per cent of the population of the state, contributes nearly 75 per cent of all state taxes. Yet it gets back less than 60 per cent in state aid. For nearly forty-five years the Port Authority has made up much of the difference. Holders of Authority bonds have put up much of the capital for basic New York services, while New York's tax dollars have gone upstate never to return. As a result the Port Authority has become more responsive to its bondholders than to New York City taxpayers. Mayor Lindsay is credited with wanting to change these unsatisfactory arrangements. It will be interesting to see what happens to the sweet scheme to take over 16 tax-free acres of Manhattan if Mayor Lindsay and public opinion move against the Rockefellers and the vulnerable Port Authority.

LIBERALISM: OPPORTUNITY from IMPASSE

Frank A. Warren III

Liberalism today is under attack from a rising younger generation of radicals. What this means for the future of the Left is hard to say. It may be that the country has become so bureaucratized and anaesthetized that, with clever political handling, Johnson (or whatever "liberal" succeeds him) may smother this new radical impulse. The Schlesinger-Lerner position may yet prevail. But, then, as such disparate figures as John Dewey or Oswald Garrison Villard might remind us: liberalism has had a conscience. It is entirely possible that we are in for significant changes and convolutions; if so, we can say that contemporary liberalism has reached an impasse. This belongs to the future, however. And it is not the purpose of this article to prophesy, but to suggest that a historical perspective might at least help those liberals eager for a breakthrough to define where they are and how they got here. For this will not be the first nor, I believe, even the second impasse that liberalism has faced in the last thirty years; it will be the third.

Liberal intellectuals faced their first impasse in 1935. That was the year when many liberals joined hands with the Communists in the popular front. Historians have rightly noted the external factors—the rise of fascism in Europe and the threat of fascism at home—that pushed liberals into this move. But they have tended to neglect the problems that had developed within liberal thought itself since the beginning of the depression. The liberal position had come under the influence of Marx without developing a Marxist ideology. It had become aware of the dangers from the Right and the disastrous divisions on the Left without arriving at a maneuver for ending sectarianism. It had sensed the burgeoning social forces and new ideologies in Europe without altering its world view. It had moved swiftly past the moral absolutes of the progressive intellect without solving the problems of relativism. Finally, in the concept of national economic planning, it had gone beyond capitalist reformism without embracing either socialism or communism. It is this impasse in development, essentially an arrest of ideology, that accounts for the success of the popular front.

To many liberals it seemed that the popular front satisfied the need for ideology. To be sure, the ideology was rudimentary: it posited a basic conflict in history between "forward-looking," "progressive" forces and "retrogressive," "backward-looking" forces. That this ideology was often no more than crude sloganeering did not lessen its impact: here was a cluster of ideas that went beyond the status quo, but did not

---

Frank A. Warren III, a member of the History Department at Queens College, New York, is the author of Liberals and Communism, to be published by Indiana University Press in April.

New York Times, 1938

present itself in strict Marxist terminology. Since the early thirties, liberalism had been trying to move in the advance guard of history without committing itself to Marxist dogma. The popular front answered that need.

At the same time, the character of popular-front ideology was superficially nonsectarian. The impatience with internal division, the demand for unity that went far beyond any Communist manipulation (and which included liberals who refused to cooperate in the popular front), could be satisfied by the majestic opposition of progressive and backward social forces. In January, 1936, The New Republic argued that fascism had been growing in the United States by leaps and bounds, while radical groups had been making "faces at one another." Whatever the issues dividing the Left might have been, they said, the situation had changed so that now there was only "one test" for participation in a united front: "Are you for fascism (under that or some other name) or against it? If you are against it . . . that is enough." It was better to risk cooperation with people one did not like or with whom one might not agree on every point than to run the risk of Fascist dictatorship: "against a common enemy you need a common army." [During this period The Nation was setting forth a similar position. The Editors]

This aspect of popular-front thinking neatly jibed with a dualistic view of the world that predated the thirties, and which had remained stationary, paralyzed by the sudden onrush of fascism. Democracy was being threatened and anyone who did not adhere to this simplistic world view was aiding fascism. Any questioning of the motives or sincerity of the Communists, now leading the Fascist opposition, was dismissed as divisive—sectarianism in the aid of fascism. Moreover, the "progressive" view of Russia's world role made it that much easier for liberalism to embrace a relativistic attitude toward civil liberties. In answer to criticism of their double standard, the editors of The New Republic frankly replied that civil liberties were not the only standard, or "even the major premise," for judging countries. In addition, they said, Russian violations differed from the German because of Russia's goal—a classless society. And, unlike the United States Government, the Russian leaders had the excuse of operating in a revolutionary era. During the Moscow trials, the relativity of civil liberties became grounds for "suspending judgment."

Finally, the popular front replaced national economic planning when that attempt at ideology was proving inadequate to cope with the new social forces. The popular front, with its demand for anti-Fascist unity, and its replacement of revolutionary phraseology with "progressive" verbiage, bridged the gap between reform and revolution. The liberal had always been frightened of revolution. For example, George Soule in The Coming American Revolution, had tempered the whole process by turning it into a slow evolutionary development. The idea of starting to plan even under the existing system — popular with liberals in the early thirties—had kept one foot securely in the door of reform. The popular-front ideology of anti-Fascist unity diverted attention from drastic planning. It reinforced the tendency of liberals to embrace reform; at the same time, it allowed them to seem radical enough to criticize mere "reformers." Heywood Broun epitomized "advance reform" when he declared in August, 1938: "I am an ardent New Dealer but with the reservation that in my opinion Mr. Roosevelt and his policies are by far too conservative."

Thus the popular-front ideology, replete with slogans, furnished an impetus to liberalism that had seemed lost in early 1935. It replaced sectarianism with the unity that liberals had always demanded; it made evident to all the simplistic view of the world the liberals had insisted on; it skirted Marxist ideology and narrow reformism with a new "forward-looking, progressive" appeal; it re-emphasized and seemed to make valid a double standard of civil liberties; it replaced reliance on an apparently unworkable concept of planning with new anti-Fascist phrases that met the new world forces. Most of all, it mobilized liberal action into a series of "cooperative" activities for various social causes.

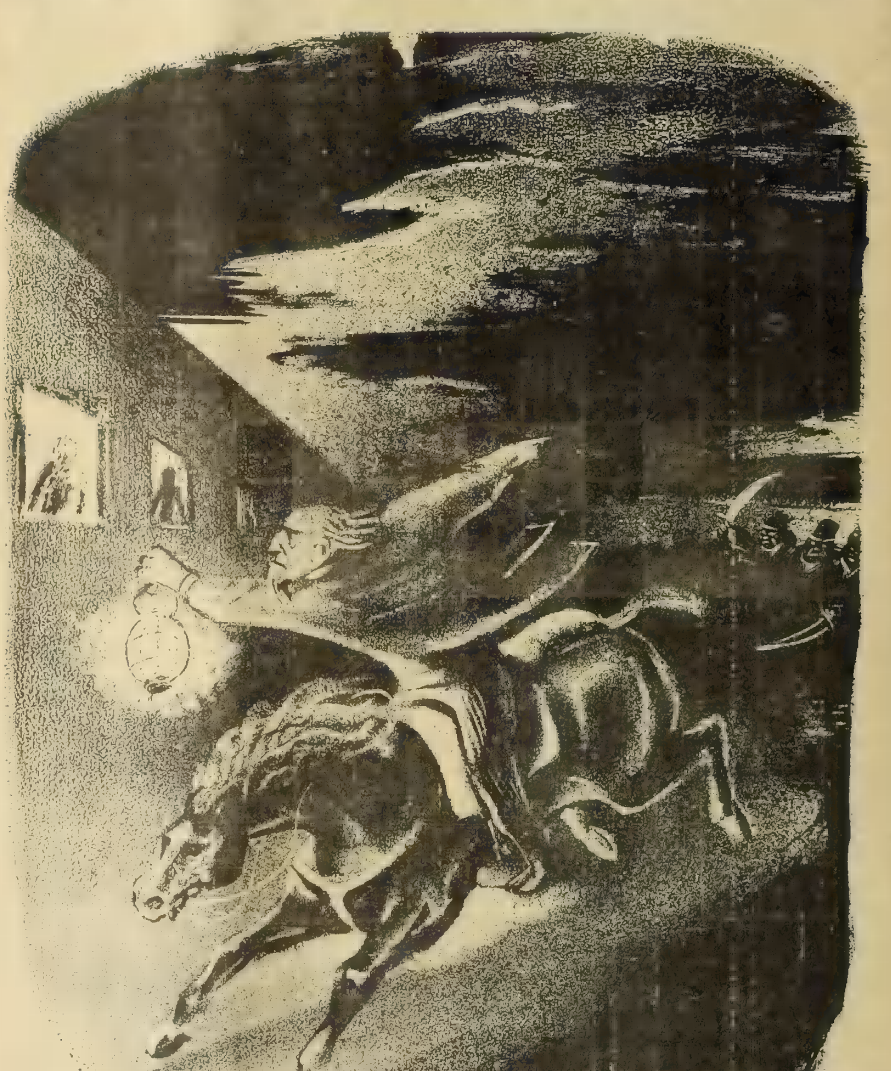
This "cooperation" became the ethos of the popular front. The concept of cooperation among diverse groups was not new; the novelty consisted in the inclusion of totalitarian communism in the "democratic" unity. It is this attempt that has led later commentators to marvel at the naïveté of liberals caught up in the popular front, to emphasize how little true cooperation there was and how much manipulation, and to express dismay at what the liberals often rationalized and submerged under the rhetoric of unity. This retrospective judgment would seem to indicate that liberalism has now advanced beyond the popular-front concepts. In many ways it has. Except for a few unreconstructed mourners at the tomb of unity, the mode of thought that prevailed in that period is not typical of contemporary liberals. Is there, then, no significance to the popular front other than its having been an interlude in liberal history that taught liberals the dangers of cooperation with the Communists? There is good reason to believe that an understanding of the popular front bears directly on an understanding of contemporary liberalism: in many ways, contemporary liberalism can be defined as a reaction to the popular-front mind.

Following the collapse of World War II relations between the United States and Russia (which may, in historical perspective, be seen as a kind of popular front between nations), liberals found themselves at a second impasse, analogous to the one that they had faced in 1935. The popular-front ideology was no longer adequate for liberalism, but a new ideology had not arisen to take its place. Social forces could no longer be contained within a black-white world view and a redefinition was in order. At home, the old labor-liberal alliance of the New Deal was under severe attack, and either stringent reformation of the alliance or a broader definition of liberalism was urgent. The conservatives were about to move against civil liberties—in fact, they had already started with the Smith Act—and it was necessary to look again at the rights of individuals in a democratic society. The optimism that many liberals associated with the popular-front mind now seemed inadequate to comprehend the horrors of either Hitler's Germany or Stalin's Russia.

Thus there came a revolt against the popular front that eschewed ideology on one hand, and moved toward a more complex view on the other hand. The old Left-Right division of the world was displaced by a view in which totalitarianism of any sort was seen as a new third force, neither Left nor Right. But since ideology was no longer thought a proper weapon, liberalism had to deal with totalitarianism on an ad hoc, "pragmatic," "realistic" basis. The result has been a liberalism committed to defensive action and narrowly conceived containment.

In domestic reaction against what was taken to be a dogmatic alliance with labor, liberalism has tried to broaden its base. Liberal intellectuals now seek to portray the Democratic Party as a multi-interest party—a clear contrast to their forerunners of the thirties, who wished to turn it into a popular-front party. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., has compared the New Frontier of John F. Kennedy with the New Nationalism of Theodore Roosevelt, an association that is meant to indicate that both men placed "national interest" and "public good" above the interests of any single social or economic class.

The broad movement toward "consensus" liberalism, culminating in the election of Lyndon Johnson, can be seen in historical perspective as a reaction to the popular-front idea of a liberal-labor alliance. At the same time, the double standard on civil liberties as formulated



William Gropper: New Masses, 1939

"The Reactionaries Are Coming!"

in the popular-front period has been subjected to re-examination, a re-examination that in some cases—particularly with Sidney Hook—has ended up with very similar philosophical premises: freedom is not an absolute, and therefore restrictions on civil liberties are permissible under certain circumstances. What was used to excuse Russia's abuse of civil liberties in the thirties has come to be used to restrict the civil liberties of Communists. Finally, in reaction against the optimism of the popular front, the pessimistic theology of Reinhold Niebuhr has become influential among secular liberals. The fallibility of man, his proneness to evil, have become liberal as well as conservative clichés since the war, just as man's cooperative propensities and good will were the liberal clichés of the popular front. This shift in the view of human nature has served to justify the "end of ideology" and the narrowly conceived pragmatic politics of contemporary liberalism. It has re-emphasized the impossibility of man's total reconstruction of society around ideological concepts.

Postwar "pragmatic" liberalism carried liberal intellectuals out of their impasse, as the popular-front ideology had carried liberal intellectuals out of their earlier impasse. But it seems fair to ask: has this change been progress? The lessons of Communist subterfuge have been learned by most liberals (J. Edgar Hoover to the contrary) and the sentimental view of unity that masked the horrors of Stalinism has been rejected. But while necessary, these developments hardly constitute the birth of creative liberal political thought. The popular-front ideology was accepted because it provided a rudimentary ideology; today liberals scorn ideology. But they have placed themselves again in the predicament of liberals in the pre-popular-front period: how to comprehend world developments without at least the rudiments of an embracing concept? The end of ideology plus the knowledge of Communist totalitarianism equals Vietnam. It is not an optimistic picture as far as liberalism is concerned. Nor has the new tough-minded, pessimistically based pragmatism helped domestically: too often it has been an excuse for backing off before conservative opposition.

Unmindful of this lack of creativity, contemporary liberals have missed the deeper lessons of the popular front, lessons that revolve around power, the role of the intellectual and the moral callousness of modern man. The liberals of the popular front, believing that it set the pattern of the future, chose to side with history and, therefore, ultimately, with power. It would seem at first glance that the contemporary liberal has transcended this, that he is well aware of the snares and traps that the winning side of history offers in terms of the corruption of power. But what actually has happened is not a lessening of the allure of power but a shifting of terms: the winning side of history has become the winning side of the Democratic Administration in power.

The allure of the sources of influence and power is directly related to the role of the intellectual. The liberal intellectuals of the popular front and the war years revealed an atrophy of the critical functions. Only fascism received its deserved condemnation. In all other areas — or rather, in all "Left" phases—too little was said not simply about Russia but about the New Deal as well. During the Eisenhower years, there was, of course, much discontent and criticism among liberal intellectuals. But one suspects now that their objections were more to the superficial style than to the substance. Under Kennedy, basically the same conservative foreign policy, with all too few brief flashes of hope; the somewhat modified, but essentially similar, conservative economic philosophy; the improved, but far too often ambiguous attitude toward civil rights, were hailed by liberals as a rebirth of liberalism—in, of course, the new "multi-interest," "national-interest" style.

These remarks are admittedly one-sided: there were liberals who objected to the Bay of Pigs; there has been some liberal criticism of Vietnam; this or that domestic program has been found inadequate. But I would suggest that the liberal intellectuals of the popular front, in their desire to be on the winning side of history, all too often became uncritical cheer leaders for the "progressive forces." And today, in their desire to be on the winning side with the present administrators of power, liberal intellectuals are again too often abdicating their role of critics, to become equally unthinking backslappers.

In the end, this liberal greediness to be "in" would be no worse—perhaps even better—than other forms of sycophancy if it had not so often revealed the moral callousness of modern man. The popular-front liberals, with their simplistic ideology and sentimental attachment to the unity of "progressives," betrayed a moral callousness when it came to those who suffered under Stalin's crimes. The contemporary liberal, with his new-found knowledge of totalitarianism, his hard-headed, realistic, tough-minded pragmatism, has temporized with social ills, avoided conflicts with conservatives in the name of consensus, and justified outrageous actions in the name of the "free world." Whether the country is to undertake some new departures in liberalism or whether it will continue to pursue the same path, at least let liberals take stock of where they have arrived. The old shibboleths of the popular front have vanished. But the popular front is relevant today not because, in rejecting it, liberals have progressed so far. As the liberal intellectuals capitulate to power, the popular front serves as a bench mark, reminding us that in coming so far liberals have learned so little.

LETTERS

(Continued from inside front cover)

poor. . . . That the strategy of the convention did not include a "frontal attack upon the 'American way of public welfare' " appears to me to be a mark of wisdom rather than an evidence of weakness as the authors seem to imply. . . .

One of the most noteworthy things that happened at the convention—nowhere mentioned in the article—was a strong feeling expressed by the fund-raising work group to the delegates that if the poor were ever to really control anti-poverty programs they would have to contribute to the support of the programs themselves.

In the political arena, it was proposed that poor people's organizations run their own candidates for office and that there be "total mobilization for political action." Whatever initial organizing tactics are employed, community-based, anti-poverty and equal rights groups, welded together and coordinated nationally, represent a potential force to be reckoned with on the American political scene.

John L. Erlich

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Book of Poverty

JEWS WITHOUT MONEY. By Michael Gold. Afterword by Michael Harrington. Avon Books. 240 pp. 75c paper.

Michael Brewster Folsom

No literary achievement of the 1930s has suffered more from the obscurity and calumny which a frightened generation has heaped on that decade than Michael Gold's Jews Without Money. It was not "forgotten," like Henry Roth's Call It Sleep, nor was it "rediscovered" by Establishment literati. The book was greatly popular: it went through perhaps twenty-five printings between 1930 and 1950. Its author remained a Communist (and a public figure) long after that ceased to be chic. Jews Without Money was writ large, and it was erased.

In perverse tribute, Gold's was the first of the "proletarian" works to reappear post-McCarthy, but battle-scarred. Some five years ago the proprietor of the rights to Jews Without Money arranged for its publication by a paperback house which otherwise specializes in "Bold, Lusty, Virile Fiction"—without informing Gold of that house's name or repute, and without preventing that house from expurgating the book. The version published did not include Gold's final paragraphs:

> A man on an East Side soap-box, one night, proclaimed that out of the despair, melancholy and helpless rage of millions, a world movement had been born to abolish poverty.
>
> I listened to him.
>
> O Workers' Revolution, you brought hope to me, a lonely, suicidal boy. You are the true Messiah. You will destroy the East Side when you come, and build there a garden for the human spirit.
>
> O Revolution, that forced me to think, to struggle and to live.
>
> O great Beginning!

That awakening (autobiographical fact) makes logic and triumph out of the tortured young life Gold retells: in one sense it is the whole point of the book. The bowdlerization was as silly as it was meretricious.

One looked forward to the subsequent Avon reprint of Jews Without Money with added anticipation and gratitude because of the previous grotesquerie. In an Afterword to the Avon edition, Michael Harrington speaks of the "sudden conversion of the narrator on the final page of this volume." But this volume, too, omitted those paragraphs.

We smile when a misordering of Henry James's chapters is handed down from edition to edition, for the invisibility of the mistake is appropriately suggestive of James's literary foibles. The persistent "invisible" corruption of the text of Jews Without Money is also suggestive and appropriate, if not so droll. In such manner the acquiescence to the expurgation of radical opinion from American intellectual and political life makes monsters and fools of us (even in spite of ourselves) and perverts art.

The expurgation here exactly duplicated that in the previous edition. Avon followed a copy of that corrupt text (including a garbled chapter title and other typographical errors). In fairness, it must be affirmed that Avon worked woefully in ignorance, and would much have preferred to print the book impeccably. Still, there is some sin of slovenliness. A responsible publisher should not accept, prima facie, a cheap reprint as a true text, even if that text was supplied, as Avon claims, by the publisher, and copyright controller of the hard-cover book.

Apprised of its error, Avon has provided reviewers and distributors with an explanation and an apology, and intends to bring out a second, corrected printing. One is recommended to forestall purchase until that printing is available. Though, frankly, it would be better still to start from scratch. Avon took precious little care in the physical production and appearance of the book—nothing comparable to its slick treatment of Call It Sleep. Deleted also are Howard Simon's series of dark, trenchant woodcuts which illustrate the original edition. Michael Harrington's Afterword is of no great merit—superficial, patronizing, mainly sociological, and not always reliable in fact. Gold was born in 1893, not 1894; The Liberator ceased publication in 1924, not 1926. An unfortunate error in punctuation foists upon Harrington the odd notion that Morris Hillquit was a "Tammany leader"—which, of course, Harrington knows he was not.

At present, an accurate version of Gold's text will suffice. For a durable, handsome, full record and appreciation of Jews Without Money as it was known and meant, we shall have to await yet another edition, more conscientiously conceived.

Jews Without Money is a simple work, and an artless one—if literary art consist in the self-conscious achievement of "style" and in the strenuous formal reordering of experience by the imagination. The book is not a novel, though commentators (including Harrington) persist in the misnomer. Gold did start out to write the book as a novel. In 1917 he published in The Masses a brief "Prologue to a Tentative East Side Novel"—a snatch of first-person narrative about a family named Gottlieb. In the early 1920s, Gold completed a novel, narrated in the third person, based on his ghetto childhood; but it didn't work, and he laid it aside (and the manuscript is now lost).

A novel requires a special stamina of the imagination to form, and stamina is not Gold's forte; he is rather a man of erratic brilliance. His lean, staccato prose suggests the impatience which forbids to him the sustained effort of the novelist. No sentence begins without its end securely in sight. (In this and every way Gold is Henry James's exemplary opposite: the two make the furthest

---

Michael Brewster Folsom is a graduate student at the University of California (Berkeley) doing research into the cultural history of the American Left.

February

From a raw land
The wind came, lusting
After long denial
To grip some live thing.

The ignorant sun
Shone, shone in winter,
Despite the winter
And the starved wind,

The sun burnishing
The wind, the wind
Clenching the sun —
Such the contention

Between these two.
We who walk there,
Numbed in the bright blast,
Crunch toward summer's blue.

Daniel Hoffman bounds beyond which men will not suffer narrative art to reach.)

The book Gold published in 1930 represented a fresh attempt to make form and sense out of his experience. In the late 1920s, an editor of The New Masses pressed for copy, he returned to his novel, recast a chapter in the first person, and printed it: "A Gang of Little Yids." That piece, which became Chapter 3 of Jews Without Money, was nothing more pretentious than a collection of related sketches of childhood. Gold found the form easy; response was good. He reworked some other parts of his novel and published them severally in The New Masses and elsewhere. Gold had learned to accommodate himself to his talents, and Jews Without Money just grew.

The book we have is a miscellany of vignettes, anecdotes, reflections, sketches. Gold often catches in words the same spirit and sense of ghetto life that the Ash Can artists—Sloan, Becker, Bellows—got on stone and canvas. What overall structure the book has is thematic, not narrative. Gold groups his matter more or less by subject—Jews and Christians, Sex, Economics—though there is no sense of the structure of sociological analysis either. Within his chapters, however, and their numerous subdivisions, Gold works with a firm hand developing a theme or a short narrative, forming it full, and bringing it to satisfying resolution. The book doesn't seem miscellaneous.

Jews Without Money is, by Gold's guess, about 85 per cent autobiography, though "autobiography" is scarcely more appropriate than "novel" as its designation. Nor is it really "fictionalized autobiography." That other 15 per cent, more or less, is enough to make the book slide away from autobiography—to blur a date, change a name, compress several characters into one—but it is not enough to make the book real fiction. (The procedures of Gold and the Joyce of A Portrait in some ways abut and mark each side of that illusive boundary beyond which the materials of autobiography begin to gather up and make something qualitatively different in the imagination of a novelist.)

"Michael Gold" is, of course, a pseudonym. It was adopted by Irwin Granich, during the Palmer raids, to hide the employee from the radical writer, and was copied from that of an old man he admired, a soldier in the Grand Army of the Republic. But by 1930, Michael Gold was the name of a public man, employed now by the revolution. The man became his pseudonym. Jews Without Money is mostly autobiography, but pseudonymous autobiography. It's as though Samuel Clemens had written of his parents as Mr. and Mrs. Twain. Or as though Joyce had become known to the world as Daedalus while Stephen Hero was distilling into A Portrait. (One wants to hold onto critical discrimination in these comparisons to greater men and greater works, but there is, in addition, something suggestive in the common false starts and long struggles of Gold and Joyce to find right possible ways of turning lives into letters.)

The unique nature of Gold's public identity gave him a freedom he needed and exploited. Retelling the experience he knew, he could stick comfortably close to the contours of fact and could speak in the first person with passionate sincerity. (It's a bit archly lit-critical to speak of a "narrator" in Gold's book; every word of it is spoken in his own voice, as in his own adopted name.) Just as Gold was thus able to avoid the necessities of a full-blown work of the imagination, just so could he avoid the responsibilities of the autobiographer, which were not his concern.

Jews Without Money is not about Michael Gold. We cannot turn to the book for the facts and dates of the man's life with any certainty; he did not intend that we should. The book comes to a telling penultimate period, just before those errant last paragraphs, thus:

> At times I seriously thought of cutting my throat. At other times I dreamed of running away to the far west. Sex began to torture me. I developed a crazy religious streak. I prayed on the tenement roof in moonlight to the Jewish Messiah who would redeem the world. I took up with Nigger again. I spent my nights in a tough poolroom. I needed desperate stimulants; I was ready for anything. At the age of fifteen I began drinking and whoring with Nigger's crowd.
>
> And I worked. And my father and mother grew sadder and older. It went on for years. I don't want to remember it all; the years of my adolescence. Yet I was only one among a million others.

There is frenzy here, emotional and syntactical; there is the felt experience of one man's anguish, which approaches and escapes (as Gold so often approaches and deftly escapes) mere sentiment and self-pity. But the latter paragraph grows calm, and changes everything. Gold anchors his personal

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW
VOL. X, No. 1 WINTER 1966

DAVID L. NORTON
Life, Death, and Moral Autonomy

PATRICK CRUTWELL
Alexander Pope in the Augustan World

WALTER ADAMS
On the Strategic Importance of Western Europe

JOAN WEBBER
Vocation: Literary Scholarship and Social Commitment

VIRGINIA B. FORTINO
Emotion and Musical Structure

DONALD N. FERGUSON
Reply to Virginia B. Fortino's Emotion and Musical Structure

HANS APEL
East Germany: A Reappraisal

H. BRUCE FRANKLIN
Hawthorne and Science Fiction

Subscription rates:
$1.00 each for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues); $5.00 for two years

Available at bookstores or from 110 Morrill Hall,
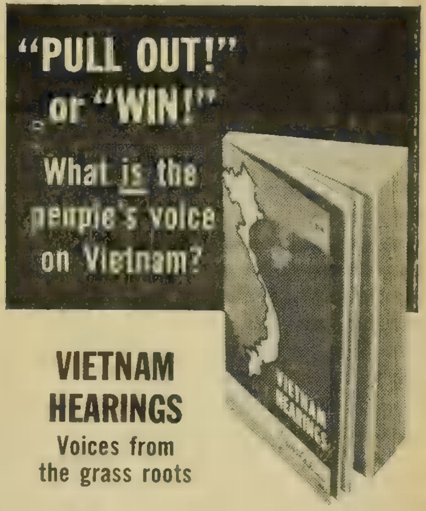
Michigan State University,
E. Lansing, Mich. 48823



"PULL OUT!"
or "WIN!"
What is the people's voice on Vietnam?

VIETNAM HEARINGS
Voices from the grass roots

A report of hearings held by Rep. Robert W. Kastenmeier in Madison, Wisconsin, to find out what his constituents thought about the war. "An extraordinary cross section of witnesses . . . who took great trouble and thought to organize and express their thoughts . . . One feels encouraged to try to do likewise."—HARPER'S MAGAZINE
$1.95 at all booksellers

DOUBLEDAY

experience in the condition of his people, the poor, and makes his experience meaningful, here and throughout the book, because it is ushered thus and only. (Those next, missing paragraphs are all the more crucial because a book might end without them; there is a sense here of periodic fullness and melancholy, perfect resignation which, uncontradicted, achieve precisely the opposite of Gold's intention.)

What kind of book, then, is Jews Without Money? It is just what Gold says it is:

> There are enough pleasant superficial liars writing in America. I will write a truthful book of poverty; I will mention bedbugs.

(Characteristically, that seeming-prefatory manifesto is buried between parentheses about a quarter way through the book.) "A truthful book of poverty" is a genus for which there is no accounting in the phylogeny of polite letters. Yet the book is no extraliterary document in the same sense as, say, Joseph Freeman's autobiographical American Testament, or Michael Harrington's own true book about poverty, The Other America. Unlike those works, Jews Without Money belongs in an undergraduate course in 20th-century American literature, for it is a work of literary art, with an imagination and a style of its own.

The imagination is that of a man who can tell a good story briefly, sketch a face or character or neighborhood or mood with few strokes, control the sympathies of his reader, or form the rhythm of a chapter out of helter-skelter recollections. The quality of ghetto life and the full forms and logic of the storyteller's art are felt. We live through Gold's experience, and we put down the book a little changed in ourselves: The gentile is turned Jew; the comfortable suffer.

To talk of Gold's style is problematic, for he is notorious on the subject: "There is no 'style' — there is only clarity, force, truth in writing." A narrow and unexamined opinion, surely, and one which is of little use to guide others in the forging of their art; but an opinion which was of no hindrance to himself, a writer who speaks with ease only in his own proper voice. Gold's style is undeniable, tough, singular. It is simply unselfconscious. The workings of the two paragraphs quoted above are one evidence of Gold's special tones and rhythms. Or take this:

> This was summer. An old melancholy Jew limped by, with six derby hats stacked one over the other on his head, and a burlap sack on his shoulder.
>
> "I Cash Clothes!" he wailed, gazing with weary eyes up and down the tenement walls. "I Cash Clothes!" and it made one's heart ache strangely, like the synagogue prayers at Yom Kippur.
>
> In my ears still ring the lamentations of the lonely old Jews without money:
>
> "I cash clothes, I cash clothes, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

Or this:

> Flies, bedbugs, sick cats, sunstruck horses, men and women, and busy saloon, and street circus — Summer.

Or this:

> *But Teacher! O Teacher for little slaves, O ruptured American virgin of fifty-five, you should not have called me "Little Kike."*
>
> Nigger banged you on the nose for that. I should have been so brave. It was Justice.

Or this:

> This thing, this Fyfka the Miser, this yellow somnambulist, this nightmare bred of poverty; this maggot-yellow dark ape with twisted arm and bright, peering, melancholy eyes; human garbage can of horror; fevered Rothschild in a filthy shirt; madman in an old derby hat:
>
> This perfection had a flaw; this monster needed women.

One could quote fruitfully on. Gold speaks no gaiety, some murky emotion, little wit, and no humor; but, within a certain defined range, he has many strong voices.

Necessarily, it seems, in the dialectics of literary opinion, when the works of a previous age begin to appeal again, one must argue that this work or that is worthy precisely because it violates the canons of bad taste which prejudice has assigned to that age. Some satisfaction can be wrung from the "ironic" contrast between Gold's "fidelity to life" in his book and his supposed fidelity to some notion of party-line literary theory. There is a real point to such swipes. In every age prevailing literary theory has given mediocre men excuse to write mediocre works "to taste"; in every age talented men have done better than the theorist's dicta (even their own) would seem to permit. The literary stupidities of the Red decade are patent and bear conscientious study. But it is easy to carp and snigger. We must talk of accomplishments, too, and their relevance to our own situation.

The specific culture and its version of poverty which Gold describes in Jews Without Money is all but gone: the Southern mountains and Lenox Avenue today face peculiar, knotty problems undreamt on Rivington Street at the turn of the century. (Though it is supercilious of Michael Harrington to say that the poverty of white Appalachians and Negroes today is the more desperate because they lack the "internal resources" of the "adventurous poor" of Gold's youth. And what about the adventurous Puerto Ricans who have inherited Rivington Street — pushcarts and all?) But Jews Without Money is not a period piece, nor is it culturally limited. Gold's knowledge of dignity in deprivation (and of degradation), of warmth and will to live (and of defeat) grow from a time and a culture, but are not limited to that time and culture. Gold's commitment is to the poor (not the Jewish poor); that commitment is felt and exemplary. One need not share Gold's ideological views to understand and appreciate his work, but one cannot forget that he understood it in the light of his Marxism, and that the overwhelming love and anguish the man shows in his book informed also his commitment to the Communist movement.

To contend, as Harrington does, that, minus "a few passages," the book could have been written by "a conservative or an a political" is to dem-

Commemorating the 30th Anniversary of the American Volunteers of the International Brigades in Spain

Special Offer of the Basic Historical Work

THE STRUGGLE FOR MADRID

The Central Epic of the Spanish Conflict

by ROBERT G. COLODNY, University of Pittsburgh

Paine-Whitman Publishers, 1182 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10001

Special price: $6 (with this ad accompanying order)

If you have seen the immortal film To Die in Madrid, you will want to read The Struggle for Madrid onstrate a radical failure of the imagination. Sympathy without action is sentimentality; root deprivation without organization (whatever is most fruitful at the moment) is despair. That is the point of the missing five paragraphs.

The essential pattern of Michael Gold's bewildered ghetto childhood and wretched adolescence, and of his response to the conditions of his life, is true of every time and culture in which poverty is felt and resisted. Gold's experience is really unique only in what he made of it: a simple book, rich in clarity, force, truth and art.

A Mass of Floating Anxiety

THE UNCOMMITTED: Alienated Youth in American Society. By Kenneth Keniston. Harcourt, Brace & World. 500 pp. $8.50.

Ferdynand Zweig

Kenneth Keniston has embraced two major themes in his book: one about alienated youth in American society, based on a three-years' research study of the undergraduates of Harvard College; second, about the alienation of American society from its deeper self (in the Hegelian sense), based on analysis and a searching inquiry into the ills and failures of a technological society. The two themes are presented separately and could form two different books; but they are brought together at the end in the assertion that "the stresses and losses and demands of our technological society are an integral part of the lives of alienated students."

The method, the treatment and presentation in each part are quite different; the first, richer and fuller, is specific and concrete, presented in more vivid terms and based on first-hand material; the second, though it abounds in generalities which can be found in sociological literature of the last fifty years, is a very able summary of the ills, the strains and stresses of our technological civilization: fragmented, mechanized, soulless, destroying the fabric of community life, producing "anomie" (in the two Durkheimian senses), aimless, deprived of its deeper meaning and positive values.

In the first section, a large group of Harvard undergraduates were subjected to tests based on indices of what was defined as alienation: namely, distrust, pessimism, resentment, anxiety, egocentricity, the sense of being an outsider, the rejection of conventional values, rejection of happiness as a goal, and a feeling of distance from others.

Those who scored high on the indices were classed as alienated, and from those a group of twelve was selected, identified as "extremely alienated"; those whose score was low were classed as conformists and another group of twelve was selected and identified as "extremely non-alienated." Those whose score was average were identified as "not extreme either way" and they formed the third "control" group. The students were interviewed and reinterviewed, subjected to the Thematic Apperception Tests (making up a story on the basis of twelve cards showing an ambiguous theme); they wrote a lengthy autobiography and a statement of their basic values and "philosophy of life" and also took part in a variety of psychological experiments.

An interesting portrait gallery of alienated youth emerged from this study, presented in a sketch of the personality of one supremely alienated student called Inburn, and in a collective profile of alienated youth, in which the specific traits are laid bare, analyzed and dissected. They are described as men bent on intellectual and aesthetic pursuits with an "intellectual passion," fond of verbal dispute ("arguing is their avocation"), agnostics, not believing in anything, with a global distrust of human nature and with an ideological distrust of any ideology. They are critical about everything and about themselves, described as fragmented in themselves. They are inclined toward existential pessimism, toward self-analysis and continuous dissection of themselves. They are apolitical, uncommitted in any way, but with a philosophy of "implicit conservatism" and the "doctrine of lesser evil." They scored on the IQ test a little higher than the other groups; there were also more honor students among them than among others. They were taking part in activities where their humanistic or dramatic interests could be expressed. They did not differ in behavior or achievement from others; they "differed not in what they do, but in how they do it." (It is strange that their ideas did not spill over into their behavior.) They were not Beatniks, they regarded the Beat as a silly and insignificant movement. But many of them seemed to be "troubled and upset by sexual problems" and they seemed to "reject the adult sexuality," especially of the aggressive type. "It would be wrong," asserts Mr. Keniston, "to give causal primacy to this sexual problem," but personally, having made a study of students at Oxford and Manchester Universities, who are also troubled and upset by sexual problems (The Student in the Age of Anxiety), I am not sure

---

Ferdynand Zweig, the Polish-English sociologist, is presently visiting professor at Tel Aviv University in Israel. He is the author of The Student in the Age of Anxiety (Free Press), The Worker in an Affluent Society (Free Press) and, most recently, Quest for Fellowship (Heinemann).

Han Suyin

comes away from America
'exhilarated and depressed;
terror-stricken and enthusiastic.'

She has penned her impressions
in a series of articles.

Read them in

EASTERN HORIZON
commencing January.

Subscribe to

EASTERN HORIZON

with

Eastern Horizon Press,
18 Causeway Road,
1st Floor, Hong Kong

Subscription Rates: U.S. $5.00 a year, post free by sea mail.

whether the author's assertion is as valid as he claims.

A number of findings about the alienated students were implicit in the indices of the tests, which served as a basis for their selection. The distrust of ideology was implicit in the bent toward general distrust; and the global distrust of human nature was implicit in their bent toward pessimism. The ideological rejection of American culture was implicit in their rejection of conventional values, in their resentment and feeling of being outsiders. Their "intense privatism," their rejection of social concerns, was implicit in their egocentricity, etc. This means that, in part, results were already built in by the very nature of the tests on the basis of which the so-called alienated were selected.

The inquiry would have been more convincing if we were given a portrait gallery of the two other control groups, and more satisfactory if five major problems, lumped together in the inquiry, had been kept apart and carefully disentangled. These are: Alienation of youth, a perennial problem, aggravated by the swift pace of social change; alienation of intellectuals, also a perennial problem, at present only aggravated by the triviality of modern mass communication; alienation against the human condition, at present focused on the Great Anxiety, a mass of floating anxiety based on experiences of the extermination camps, Hiroshima and the prospect of nuclear annihilation; the alienation based on marginal psychological characteristics and traumas; finally, the more specific alienation from American culture, per se.

The second theme of the book, the alienating society or the American culture, is presented in a challenging and thought-provoking section which analyzes and dissects the seedy side of the technological society with its supremacy of technological, instrumental values: barren, soulless and soul destroying. But when all is said and done, we are bound to realize that the critical dissection of society as described so eloquently by the author is not that of American society as such, but of a pure model of a "technological society." The author himself declares his book to be "directly and indirectly concerned with the human toll of our technological society." The model, or to use Max Weber's term, "the ideal type" of the technological society is, of course, one-sided, as all models are bound to be. It covers Communist Russia, Japan, England and West Germany, among others. It is in fact the model of an industrial society at its height. The supremacy of technical values may be stronger in the United States than in other countries because the United States is technologically and industrially more advanced. But the point is what to do about it? That is the crucial issue which is faced not alone by the West, in spite of the basic assumption of the book that "the dominance of technology springs ultimately from the failure of positive values in our society and from a collective failure of imagination in the West as a whole."

Using his own imagination, Mr. Keniston presents a very worthy plea for "a more generous tolerance for synthetic and constructive ideas," and for encouragement of the Greek ideal of "full human wholeness," the full development of human potentials, and the attainment of the greatest possible fulfillment of human personality. The author admits that those goals are rather vague but, all the same, they can point to a different set of values than those prevailing in a technological society. He sees three alternatives before us: Regression and reaction to a romanticized past, which he rejects; the continuation of the present road, but with some finishing touches here and there, which he also rejects; or to go beyond the technological society, overcoming its values in a new, more human society.

In his vision, this future society will be "one in which whole men and women can play with zest and spontaneity, can work with skill and dedication, can love with passion and care —a society that enjoys diversity and supports human fulfillment."

It is a pity that the author is not endowed with the imagination of a Karl Marx, Charles Fourier or Saint-Simon; he might have shown us the beautiful landscape which lies beyond the horizon of this "prosperous, ugly and sprawling society."

Even so, it is a book worth reading and pondering, as it presents a challenge to the ominous question: "Quo vadis, domine?"

The Shoe in the Shark

Michael Goldman

During the past decade, American poets have been engaged in an unprecedented testing of styles, a search for new sources of eloquence that has been remarkable in its variety. The search clearly has much to do with the idea of an "American" poetry itself: it is an attempt to find an expression suitable to our language and our national life. This is a vague enough notion, and in some respects a puzzling one. For although we are accustomed to speak as if a simple connection existed between a poet's work and his native land ("English poetry is moribund," "Williams sensed the possibilities of an American metric"), the nature of the connection remains obscure and even problematical. How can poetry—which must inevitably be made up of a number of personal, intimate and apparently competing visions of experience—be national in any significant sense? To answer, we must consider some of the ways in which poetry works in the mind of its audience and how it may meet there with the objects and difficulties of American life.

Quasimodo has defined eloquence in poetry as "discourse with a world gathered up in a narrow landscape"; and it is in this sense of the word that we may say the prevailing problem of American poetry today is one of eloquence. Every new poem of any quality has lately seemed to have a double function: it is first of all simply a poem, but it is also, and always uneasily, a polemic in a continuing argument as to the true or new or proper cadence and diction of our poetry. The question appears to be one of speech. But as Quasimodo's definition suggests, the heart of the problem lies in the landscape. Poetry seeks a condensed world, what William Empson has called "the pastoral," a landscape apparently small enough to be familiar and yet somehow containing the world. If eloquence fails us, it is probably not because our world has grown so difficult to contain but because so little in it has remained familiar; or, to put the case more accurately, so little of the familiar in our world has remained human.

It is as if Rilke was right forty years ago when he announced that the world of familiar objects was at an end:

> To our grandparents a "house," a "well," a tower familiar to them, even their own dress, their cloak, was still infinitely more, infinitely more intimate: almost each thing a > vessel in which they found something human and into which they set aside something human. Now, from America, empty indifferent things are crowding over to us, sham things, life-decoys. . . . Animated things, things experienced by us, and that know us, are on the decline and cannot be replaced any more. We are perhaps the last still to have known such things.

There are at least two ways in which this disturbing prophecy bears on us. First, if it is American objects that have vanquished the world, perhaps it is in some way up to our poetry to vanquish the objects, to assume the imperial task, to surprise the life-decoys back into life. Second, the date of the passage is 1925; at that time all the figures we recognize as outstanding in "modern" American poetry were flourishing—Eliot, Pound, Frost and Stevens had all found their voices. So that if we take Rilke's remarks as defining the difference between the old poetic landscape and the new, we find that the great recent figures in our own tradition, the ones on whom we tend to rely when we speak of "American poetry," and whom we are still laboring to understand, are inevitably remote from us as being largely unaffected by our major problem, the assimilation of "American things."

It is perhaps because of this difference that we find our own poets insisting on the assimilation of ordinary objects—especially manufactured ones—in a way that seems unsophisticated when compared, for example, with Eliot's comments on the relation of modern poetry to modern life. Eliot tells us we should try to get the rhythm of the motorcar into our poetry, and not the motorcar itself, but it is Louis Simpson who strikes a note more characteristic of poetry as it is being written today when he says in a poem entitled "American Poetry":

Whatever it is, it must have
A stomach that can digest
Rubber, coal, uranium, moons,
poems

Like the shark, it contains a shoe.

The emphasis on digestion is important, and I think the process here is different from what Eliot has in mind. The image of the shoe in the shark suggests the continuing recognizable presence of the lifeless object, but transformed by (and transforming) certain strong natural juices. The swallowing of the shoe by the shark is thus Simpson's figure for eloquence; this, too, is the gathering up of the world into a landscape.

Simpson's poetry—At the End of the Open Road (Wesleyan University Press) and the twelve new poems included in his Selected Poems (Harcourt, Brace & World)—is distinguished by its insistence on life. It is the "unlived life" that concerns him, "serious life," "my life that I hold in secret." He is working now to touch the great source of feeling that we all allude to, however vaguely, when we use the phrase "real life." It is one of his phrases too:

And so my real life, my feelings
Are left on the cutting-room floor
And swept away with a broom.

For the poet, the discovery of his real life poses a technical as well as an emotional problem, and to solve it he must learn to assimilate the terrible, banal objects that surround him, the life-decoys. In "The Laurel Tree" Simpson describes how tree roots have broken through his cellar wall:

As though there were something in my rubbish
That life would have at last.

I must be patient with shapes
Of automobiles and ketchup bottles
These things are the beginning

Of things not visible to the naked eye.

. . . It is so that spiritual messengers
Deliver their meaning.

In this patient, attentive gathering of objects into a spiritual landscape, we may discover the poetics behind Simpson's recent work. It is a response to Rilke's challenge, a poetics for a post-modern age.

The idea of making a poetry out of "American objects" suggests an "American poetry"; a common search for a landscape implies a common land. Simpson's development—and the Selected Poems gives us an admirable opportunity to see this—has been toward an increasingly national tone in cadence, in diction, and even in setting. He tends more and more to write about the West Coast, the "end of the open road," all the junk-ridden splendor of the American scene. We sense that at its best, his is an appropriately national poetry, and that, as is the case with so many of our poets who are moving in a similar direction, the personal solution to the problem of eloquence is also an American one. Quasimodo is being figurative when he talks of landscape, but he is also being literal; the idea of a real if transfigured locale is in his mind (and in his poetry), and we realize that his definition of eloquence may be turned around: the poet's eloquence creates the landscape of a nation.

But what do we mean by this? In what sense is poetry national, and how does a poet's personal landscape become a national eloquence? We may begin by noting a characteristic of any landscape: there is room in it for more than one man. Though there may be a moat or barbed wire surrounding it and pitfalls or bogs within, it can be entered. The reader of a poem is not, finally, asked to peer through the hedges at a man in his garden; he is invited to share the scene. And the scene has duration. Places attract us by the relations they suggest, and one set of relations develops from the possible presence on the scene of people who have come before us or after us or at the same time but through different entrances. A landscape invites us to imagine some sort of community, and so does a poem.

This community may seem a far cry from anything we ordinarily associate with nationalism. In literature, as in politics, nationalism usually strikes us as a taking away of humanity, an aggressive substitution of one kind of relation for all others. A man is asked to reduce himself so as to identify more closely with his countrymen and to impose his new identity on outsiders. Under these conditions, the national landscape resembles a staging area policed by draftees, a place not to live in but to attack from. In a sense, all personal relationships entail something of this familiar standardization. Like the life-decoys, they threaten the sense of our own vitality by imposing a manufactured presence upon it. Even at the most intimate moments, the presence of another person seems to involve us in some kind of libretto. The more public the occasion, the more manufactured our responses become. For this reason, we tend to think of poetry as the opposite of nationalism—a kind of antidote to it—and to resist any attempt to make poetry serve national purposes. But there is another kind of nationalism in which all possible relations take their place, whose landscape retains its quality, enriched by the people who explore its contours. It is an offering rather than a taking away, and it is this nationalism to which poetry contributes.

If the landscape of a poem is an inviting community, clearly our relation to the community is built up out of a number of different relations, each of which corresponds to some way in which poetry engages our minds. Broadly speaking, I think of three kinds of engagement which combine to produce the overall effect of a poem, and which, taken together, help to define its nationalism. To illustrate, we may imagine a painted landscape: we see a castle, a town, fields; they carry the light, which finally comes to rest on the face of a young girl. The artist, in the most romantic and least modest phase of his personality, instructs us as to the way the light moves in his blood, but he also uses the light to reveal a relation to the girl, the girl's connection with other men and women. In a third phase, however, he is the chronicler of the light on stones and wheat, a student of the sun in both its historical and astronomical aspects. The effect of these three phases of expression is, of course, simultaneous and interrelated. The viewer (or reader) is touched by the artist in his singleness and isolation; he is drawn into the town; his own sun changes; it becomes a common source; he shares his life with the girl.

The three phases have their counterparts in our common experience of poetry. The first phase represents the poet's individual deformation of the world by language and rhythm. The poem's texture stands for the inexpressible language of the self. (We think of Rimbaud's "J'ai seul la clef de cette parade sauvage.") Here we encounter the poet as narcissus, the poem as description. In the second phase we find the world of recognizable human relationships—the world of Yeats's fiction of Maud Gonne, or the wonderful moments in Quasimodo's poetry when he begins to address a second person and the apparently "descriptive" poetry that has gone before is suddenly transformed. Here is the poet as personal dramatist, the poem as story. The third phase relates to all that we mean when we use the terms "history" or "myth" to get at a presence of something that is not simply personal but that invests the objects in a poem with an enduring past. It is that sense of "reference" that Robert Lowell seems to hammer and pack so furiously into his earlier poems. It has a lot to do with the weight that simple objects bear in Rilke's poetry; here is the poet as lawgiver or racial memory, the poem as myth. We could say that the three phases correspond to the voice of the infant, the adult and the god (or priest); to the I, the you and the it; to lyric, dramatic and epic; to the lunatic, the lover and the poet.

This interaction among phases of the self would seem to be of value to the ideal community, to nationalism in the better sense. A nation is composed of distinctive individuals, each with his "real life" and proper madness, but it is also composed of men in their individual relations and in their relations to history. This is perhaps to say no more than that a nation is both a relation of people and a collection of people—but the analogy takes on significance if we add that the people must be fully alive; in Simpson's phrase, they must find and have their "real life." But the pressure of any relationship is to limit and conventionalize the individual. Though each of us is the reader of an inexpressible language, he is also an actor who tends to use the stock language and gesture of melodrama (or the newspapers) under the pressure of personal crisis or a social or political occasion. Poetry, by bringing each man's inexpressible language a little into the light, brings real life into his relations and his history. The "life-decoys" of which Rilke speaks and with which Simpson and the rest of us struggle are the signs of an incoherent nation, where the impulse toward fullness of life is thwarted and diminished. The attempt to establish a cadence (and it is of course not only a cadence but all the formal movements of poetry I have in mind) in which the objects of American life can take their place with eloquence is, then, an attempt to gather America into its own landscape, to establish, both for the poet and his audience, a community in which their real life may be lived.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 2-28-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

THEATRE

Harold Clurman

SWEET CHARITY

There is something singularly fitting about the placement of the new musical, Sweet Charity, at the Palace Theatre. I do not refer to the Broadway Baroque of the redecorated old vaudeville house but to its location on our "Main Street" at 47th.

Nearby is the "Latin Quarter"—loud, lavish, tough. Less than half a block away there is a poor man's round-the-clock "night club" (formerly a restaurant serving beer and oysters in old-fashioned plainness), a hangout where, accompanied by raucous sound, sparsely clad girls twitch their torsos close to the glass storefront, in full view of the idlers who crowd the sidewalk, bemused for hours by the free display. Also close by is one of those immense drugstores where the sleazy tired of the town appear listlessly to patch their more trifling wounds with plasters and palliatives.

Sweet Charity (Book by Neil Simon, Music by Cy Coleman, Lyrics by Dorothy Fields) is based on Fellini's touching film, The Nights of Cabiria, about a perpetually deceived and always hopeful Roman whore. In the musical she has become a taxi dancer in a New York hot spot. She has a heart of gold, aspires to marriage, and yearns for a better life. She wants to be loved and is always dumped.

I can tell you little about the quality of the "book," the score, the lyrics. Yet the show made an impression on me—a strong, rather discomfiting impression. It reflects its immediate environment; that I think is a merit. Willy-nilly, what is expressed is disjointedness—a broken-boned dislocation masquerading as gay energy.

Talented Bob Fosse who "conceived, staged and choreographed" the entertainment has created dizzying patterns of movement out of ugliness. The result is a kind of brilliant and ingenious hideousness which is a style—a style wrought from the streets and manners we observe as we enter and leave the theatre. The audience is at home in both. The show, despite quibbles and quarrels as to its various elements—discussion of which seems to me to miss the mark—is a success: it achieves what it sets out to do. It has unity.

The scenery by Robert Randolph is appropriately angular, brittle, luridly "glamorous," clever, like one of those window exhibits where modern ornamentation is employed after a fashion that hovers between a come-hither attractiveness and the nauseating. It works and moves the proceedings with admirable efficiency.

The gem or star at the center of all this is Gwen Verdon — our all-American Toulouse-Lautrec. Miss Verdon is phenomenal. No longer young, she has enormous vitality, a glorious figure, a delightful nature, theatrical radiance, and a mode of dancing altogether suited to the show's salient features. She transforms the inelegant into elegance. Sometimes she appears haggard and then again she becomes beautiful—a light that shines in darkness. She is human enthusiasm emerging triumphant amid the hard and tawdry.

Sweet Charity is Pop art.

FILMS

Howard Junker

THE ART OF ANIMATION

"Museums do a Macy's-Gimbels" said Variety recently, over a story that implied the Gallery of Modern Art and the Museum of the same name were engaged in a movie-festival feud—so much so that secrecy about up-coming programs was necessary.

The gallery, which includes the Huntington Hartford Collection, moved into contention as a museum movie palace with its current Busby Berkeley retrospective. In the fall it had presented a Hal Roach program and selections from the March of Time. Director Raymond Rohauer, who celebrates his first anniversary at the gallery next month, is an archive in himself. He holds the rights to Mack Sennett, Buster Keaton, Jean Cocteau, among others. He leads the fight against "stolen" prints, that is, dupes taken by museums without authorization, a practice pioneered by Henri Langlois of the Cinématheque in Paris. Rohauer is currently upset because the Museum of Modern Art loaned a print of Keaton's The General to Channel 13 in total disregard, says Rohauer, of the fact that he owns this classic. A similar fuss arose when the Modern decided to put on a Cocteau program which a distributor, Brandon Films, said it could deliver. Rohauer, apparently, thought otherwise, and as a result the Modern showed "The Art of Animation," a program selected by the West Coast chapter of the International Association of Animated Film-Makers in conjunction with the Los Angeles County Museum of Art.

Ordinarily, the Museum of Modern Art never takes outside shows, using its own staff to mount all exhibitions. Its new film curator, documentary maker Willard Van Dyke, made this "his" show by cutting about a third of the Los Angeles selections and splicing in a couple of New York films. The show then totaled thirty-five pieces from eleven countries.

Next year the program will be shared by County, the Modern Museum, the Annenberg School and perhaps a Midwest museum yet to be named. Annecy, France, has had an animation festival since 1960; Mamnia, Rumania, starts one in June—this American festival will give animators a much needed chance to show their work.

The first year's selection was not as good as theoretically it could have been. A number of the leading practitioners were represented but not always with examples of their best work. The East European animators, who apparently enjoy much greater freedom of expression than their live-action colleagues, have built up a fantastic reputation in the past few years. They were not adequately represented in the program.

Czech master Jiri Trnka presented a puppet film, The Hand. A museum seminar featuring New York frame-by-framers John Hubley, Leonard Glasser and Fred Mogubgub, and art directors Louis Dorfman of C.B.S. and Jerome Snyder of Scientific American, found Trnka's film heavy-handed. It tells of a little potter who is visited by a huge, gloved (human) hand, which demands that the puppet make a symbolic hand-in-salute. The potter refuses, is tormented by the hand, and finally forced to sculpture what the hand dictates. The potter is then awarded medals, given a laurel wreath and, upon his death, a state funeral. The Czech Government was reluctant to export this film.

Jan Lenica's "A," from Poland, shows a man, alone in a room, harassed by a huge letter A. Using the "variations-on-a-theme" structure, Lenica plays out the possibilities of A-ttack: A's kick the man, strangle him and so on. Too many animators take off on their gimmick before it has become an idea, and after much painstaking, are reluctant to throw out the excess. Lenica has a sense of timing and form, and the oppressive "A" wraps up nicely with the disappearance of A and the onslaught of B.

Lenica's Labirynt is a slightly less brutal, they-are-after-me fable. Here a little man visits Weird City and attempts to rescue a maiden from a monster. She sticks by the monster, however, and the little man is himself caught by a "hand" and given a computerized brainwash. Upon release he takes flight, only to be destroyed by a flock of harpies.

In the free world, black visions seem to rise out of Freudian, rather than political, despair. Most horrific of all was a string of Bosch-like, black-line vignettes, AOS, by Yogi Kuri of Japan. Kuri's machine-and-box nightmares sprouted arms and eyes and mouths, devoured various parts and parcels, spawned little men and so on.

For Le Nez, French animator Alex-

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________

ADDRESS ____________

CITY ____________

STATE ________ ZIP NO. ________

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

Howard Junker is a free-lance writer.

ander Alexeieff employed a pointillist technique using black-, white- and gray-headed pins, which are displaced frame by frame to give an eerie, wavy image. Le Nez tells the Gogol story of a man who wakes up without a nose and searches for it in a government building where a bespectacled Nose asserts that he, the Nose, is not the missing one. The next day the man wakes up with a nose, but he goes to the barbershop for a shave, is lathered up, hears the barber stropping the razor and—ATTENTION! ATTENTION! Fin.

While the best foreign entries tended to be morbid, anguished and pretentious—as if only serious films deserve to be exported—the American entries had a lighter touch. In part this can be explained by the government sponsorship which abroad gives animators time and facilities for metaphysics. Here, animators must do their own work between commercial chores, and since their only hope to get back their investment is through theatrical release, they keep their efforts humorous and non-esoteric.

Such American Big Statements as there were tended to be issue-oriented and rather impersonal. The Hangman by Les Goldman and Paul Julian dunned the viewer about the need for individual responsibility with regard to capital punishment. The Hat by John and Faith Hubley uses improvised dialogue by Dizzy Gillespie and Dudley Moore to voice the need for brotherhood, disarmament, etc. Message films, if they don't pretend to be something else, can be wonderful, as in John Korty's puff for the American Cancer Society which nicely separates moral from fable, saving the "don't-smoke" pitch until after a funny interchange between two guys who would like to quit, but can't.

The down-beat, UPA, Bert and Harry style may, after all, be the Great American gift to contemporary animation. Leonard Glasser's Howard is in the quick-paced, side-of-the-mouth, situation tradition which benefits from "limited" techniques, bold graphics, wry characterizations and lack of sentiment. Tall, eloquent Howard is dogged by fat, deaf Howard and short, ugly, stupid Howard. The Howards pursue Howard, and their bathetic tandem exit into infinity came closer to stirring "brotherhood" feelings in me than all the coy sermons on the bomb, the lines that divide us, etc., that serious animators seem to love.

In the days of the Disney factory, animation was unquestionably a craft, not an art. The animator was fitted in somewhere along the assembly line, and it was the rare Norman McLaren who devoted himself to abstract research and development. Now, with television's demand for gimmick, with the possibility of doing piece work for the commercial market, animators are beginning to sense themselves as individual artists.

The Sentence

The door is open inside is the pictures
I might as quickly as not cry about — as a letter there, "Al"

I never knew as that hand, blue, almost backwards — to intention, whatever energy locked in its mark, absurd as it is — not of whatever was but harder to know it as — as the door open to it and/or the pictures of nothing.

Aram Saroyan

Thus, Fred Mogubgub says it was he who devised the style of Enter Hamlet: Maurice Evans' "To be or not . . ." is illustrated word by word in quick, funny, single takes of comic-Pop situations. And since Stephen Verona, who has just set up on his own, tried this idea out on the Beatle song, She Loves Me, also included on the museum's bill, Mogubgub became upset. After all, in an art where what you say is so much determined by how you say it, technique is identity.

Fortunately, computers can do animation, too. An IBM demonstration showed how a sketch of a suspension bridge can be rotated, in perspective, by a computer. Bell Labs is working on computerized 3-D cartoons.

In view of the coming obsolescence of live animators, it was good to see a film student at the University of Southern California, David Hanson, return to Eadweard Muybridge and "flip through" that pre-cinemaster's still photo studies of a woman hopping, sitting, throwing, stooping. As long as there are elegant, nonlive-action ideas like that to be discovered, animation will continue. "The Art of Animation" made this point, and the Modern is to be congratulated for sponsoring the festival.

ART

Max Kozloff

SAO PAULO IN WASHINGTON

The American section of the Eighth São Paulo Biennial, rather indifferently received in Brazil, condescended to or vilified here, will close at its only United States installation, the National Collection of Fine Arts, Washington D.C., on March 6. Organized by Walter Hopps, of the Pasadena Art Museum, it is a remarkable, not to say splendid, show. In a sense, this exhibition stands as a counterpart to our offering at Venice two years ago, since it represents provocative recent abstractionists, where the other exposed a better-known mixture of Rauschenberg and some of the Pop artists. Even more, Mr. Hopps has chosen to be risky, that is to say, thematic, about his enterprise. There is an implied ideological perspective in the position granted Barnett Newman,* the radical color-field painter and revolutionary of the forties, who bestrides a group of avant-garde "legatees," neatly divided, three and three, between New York and Los Angeles. Aside from the intrinsic interest of this confrontation, the rhetorical insistence of his choices promotes the questioning without which a show cannot pretend to raise valid issues.

Historically, then, the thesis would be that the large, virtually vacant color façades of Newman legitimize the minute formal discriminations of current-generation abstraction. Although Hopps himself is extremely diplomatic on this score, Newman's gesture, emphasizing grandiose formats at the same time as minimal structural change, is seen as the exemplar of the extremely reductionist aesthetic today. Post-Cubist, this development can also theoretically be seen as post-humanist, because its goals are stated invariably in terms of its own physical mechanics, alien to the idea of "content" in any guise. All this is familiar enough, if not the poker-faced tones in which the artists habitually discuss it. For them, the creative act consists only of so many decisions and measurements and calculations that dryly round upon themselves. The artifacts that result are not associated with a vision.

---

*I plan to discuss Barnett Newman's work more fully at the time of his forthcoming exhibition at the Guggenheim Museum.

But psychologically, the problem is much more interesting. To all the exaggerated stylishness and self-indulgence, the flippant wallowing in Kitsch and coarse-grained hedonism with which American society now embroiders itself, this exhibition retorts with a seemingly chilling no. It questions the liberal assumptions under which we have, or would conceivably like to, come to terms with our decadence. After every license has been broached, every inhibition shushed, an old-time puritanism that now looks a little engineered, a little computerized, sheers away our campy baubles. These artists are not afraid to look rigid, dogmatic, even uninventive. They would perhaps reacquaint us with the axiom that the senses must sometimes be chastened, and the spirit rectified—and above all, with the fact that art can be silent, uneloquent. Such an image of American art abroad, and at home, is the more pungent because unexpected.

But upon close scrutiny of the works themselves, these theses are fortunately very hard to maintain. I say fortunately because to accept them at face value would be to simplify the challenges and ambiguities in our culture, of which art is the most sensitive reflection. For one thing, the cult of enthusiasm and bad taste is just as dehumanized in its implications as the most abstruse geometricizing. Both now embrace the anonymous technology and the vicarious packaging of sensations which shrivel escape to an ever more elusive directness of response, or even visceral reaction. In that sense, the psychological, if not the stylistic, opposition to Venice is false. One's capacity to respond to new works of art is increasingly conditioned by the conceptual and often ironic processes to which they restrict themselves. But within the boundaries of mechanized surfaces and nonallusive material, the possibilities of expanding a new kind of sensation, a phenomenal industrial dazzle, open up an extraordinary realm to be explored. The spectator can depart from these glimmerings as if they defined a new kind of nature (which, in fact, they do) to untouched areas of fancy. Pop art sublimates this dynamic; abstract art, subtly but emphatically retools it.

In the present show, the Los Angeles artists concentrate on light, immateriality, and only insofar as these qualities fuse into some texture, color. Whereas the New Yorkers concern themselves with solidity, shape, color contrast, and only to the extent that such things carry textural resonance, luminosity. It is an important distinction because the syntactical elements of flat plane, shaped canvas and rectangular volumes, are shared by the two groups without many or decisive variations.

Of the first trio, for instance, Larry Bell's chrome-framed glass boxes, despite the circles or ovals etched, or chemicals annealed, to their surfaces, are involved with radiant atmosphere —so much so that an agency seems to have breathed chromatic fragrances from within, equivocally clouding the apertures surrounded by façade mirrors. Though they are literal vacuums, these objects resemble hothouse conservatories of metallic gases reifying by spectrum glints into the transparency of that which contains them. Like Duchamp's bottled air, they are revealed only by the nothingness which they isolate; but like early Josef Albers, they also confuse perspectival projections of a cube through, or upon, flat surfaces. And through this maze of contradictions, blending immobility and transience, optical refinement with geometric schemata, there hovers the most touching optimism. It is at once nostalgically moderne, with all the finesse of the 1930s' haute monde, and prophetic too, of the electrical arcadia which the lunar age is bringing into view.

Bell's colleague, Billy Al Bengston, he of the motorcycle clubs and the sergeant's chevrons, sprays a plummy lacquer on masonite panels to form images that look like a cross between theatrical dressing tables and effeminate altars to the Holy Ghost. There is wild-eyed but studied flatulence about all this, which has misled his innumerable detractors into thinking they are dealing with cream-puff art. But his galactic, bicycle-reflector "Buster," for instance, distills enough tartness for the eye to hold on to the most offbeat color filters in American abstract art.

By far the most delicate and radical of the Los Angeles artists is Robert Irwin. At a distance of about 12 feet, and after several minutes of viewing, one's doubt about his two canvases — what kinds of colors compose them, what amount of space they depict— seems actually to increase. These questions reveal the incredulity of the eye rather than of the mind, for the latter does not really enter the experience at this point. What does one see? A large white rectangular expanse, immaculate at the edges, but ever so curiously and ineffably blushing toward the featureless center. This alone might sum it up. (That the rectangle is not a square, although it would be hard to say which two of its sides were the longer, and that its surface is not flat, but diffidently convex, are factors that do not immediately make themselves felt.) Contrary to expectations, the faint haze which blurs vision does not settle, but alters and redeposits its transparent, vagrant molecules in patterns the eye is powerless to control.

But even a haze would appear to have more body, and mobile power, than this dotted, dessicated mesh. It is the faintest of tissues because its porosity cancels out as a fluid matrix. Reflective white, with all the luminous atmosphere it implies, envelops the fragile matter from both front and back. Color, or more accurately, disembodied texture, loses itself in a microstructure, dusky in one instance, champagne tinged in the other. Actually, these canvases are printed by the rubber tines from cashiers' change mats—after which each of their thousands of dots is shaved to convey a special density. A clinical, almost raving pedantry results in pointillist hallucination.

But in exquisiteness of craftsman-

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

SUMMERLANE CAMP

In the tradition of

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

•

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

•

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

ship, and fantasy of space, the New York artists cannot touch those of California. The East Coast section of the show is represented by Larry Poons, Donald Judd and Frank Stella. They are logical-minded artists, interested in solidity and concreteness, and if they cannot whisper in nuances, they can at least make pictorial declarations with clarity and authority. Poons's "Han-San Cadence," for example, is a 12-foot frieze of almost day-glo ochre, upon which small turquoise and lavender ovals, oriented by a now unperceivable penciled grid, spangle the Newmanesque field. As Hopps justly says: "Poons has made one of the more radical and significant moves away from art forms which rely on connected line drawing, or on the contour edge formed by two joined areas. . . . By linking and interlocking reactions between points, by allowing interconnected foci to form in the viewer's eye, Poons has released a whole new order of ambiguity."

It is an IBM Impressionism, lurid in its hot, dry energy, with extremely close or far-flung color contrasts, and tense in its widely scattered, undifferentiated pick-ups which challenge a flagging eye. In the end, its buoyant after-images evoke a hectic, synthesized light that musically fades and starts as a counterpoint to the actual imagery.

Viewed simply as sculpture, Judd's boxes, orange-painted wood, or galvanized iron and colored-lacquer aluminum, the latter hung as post-lintel wall reliefs, in quadripartite modules, are spaced so evenly that they have units rather than relationships. As a result, they stay ostentatiously where they are, making of the visual experience a blank temporal entity, stretching without incident into past and future. Hypnotized by the virtues of repetition, and the clashes of unassimilated materials, Judd has produced some rather bold negations. As no doubt intended, they are also truly boring.

Conceivably the strongest and most lucid artist in the exhibition, Frank Stella has exerted an enormous influence upon the most lively young abstractionists in America. Parallel bands, executed in dulled metallic paints, and separated by pin-stripe channels of unprimed canvas, are the standardized components which he puts into mimetic accord with his notched, trapezoidal, or x-shaped perimeters. Each picture strikes one as a weird profile of a volume that ought to, but does not, get through and into the wall. Moreover, thanks to their unitary coloration (which does not suggest pictorial hue), his works are remarkably unpicturelike. They are gigantic extendable fragments, severely designed and undecorative, made up of modules that somehow minimize their own symmetry. Often, at the junctures where the bands change their path, his brush reverses its direction, so that there are almost imperceptible obstacles to the overall lateral flow — obstacles which yet seem to fold out segments of the canvases into illusory staggered planes (e.g., the nickel-colored "De La Nada Vida a La Nada Muerte"). With these extremely simplistic devices, Stella dramatically reshapes the whole abstract tradition, while bringing to attention some of the somatic contradictions characterizing visual experience of the sixties.

After acknowledging the beauty of Mr. Hopps's selections, I must quarrel a little with his ideological bracketing. If he would not claim the young men as exclusively Newman's progeny, I would deflate even their general obligation to him. In any event, their excitement brands his tame but willful heroics as of a bygone era. Rather, it is to Jasper Johns's art which these artists owe a debt that should not have been ignored. Without his frozen systems and emblems, it would be hard to imagine Stella and Bengston, the ruled chance of Poons, and even the monotony of Judd. They have retained some of the opaque, unsettling presence of his works, and blended it with the grandiosity of Newman. The resulting mixture of object and metaphor, stripped down to an anatomical vitality in New York, and polished to a ravishing glow in Los Angeles, marks this as one of the decisive exhibitions of American post-Abstract Expressionist art.

Adultery

We have all been in rooms
We cannot die in, and they are odd places, and sad.
Often Indians are standing eagle-armed on hills

In the sunrise   open wide to the Great Spirit
Or gliding in canoes   or cattle are browsing on the walls
Far away   gazing down with the eyes of our children

Not far away   or there are men driving
The last railspike, which has turned Gold in their hands. Gigantic forepleasure lives

Among such scenes, and we are alone with it
At last. There is always some weeping
Between us   and someone is always checking

A wrist-watch by the bed to see how much Longer we have left. Nothing can come
Of this   nothing can come

Of us: of me with my grim techniques
Or you who have sealed your womb
With a ring of convulsive rubber:

Although we come together,
Nothing will come of us. But we would not give
It up, for death is beaten

By praying Indians   by distant cows   historical Hammers   by hazardous meetings that bridge
A continent. One could never die here

Never die   never die
While crying. My lover, my dear one
I will see you next week

When I'm in town. I will call you
If I can. Please get hold of   please don't Oh, God, Please don't any more I can't bear . . . Listen:

We have done it again   we are Still living. Sit up and smile,
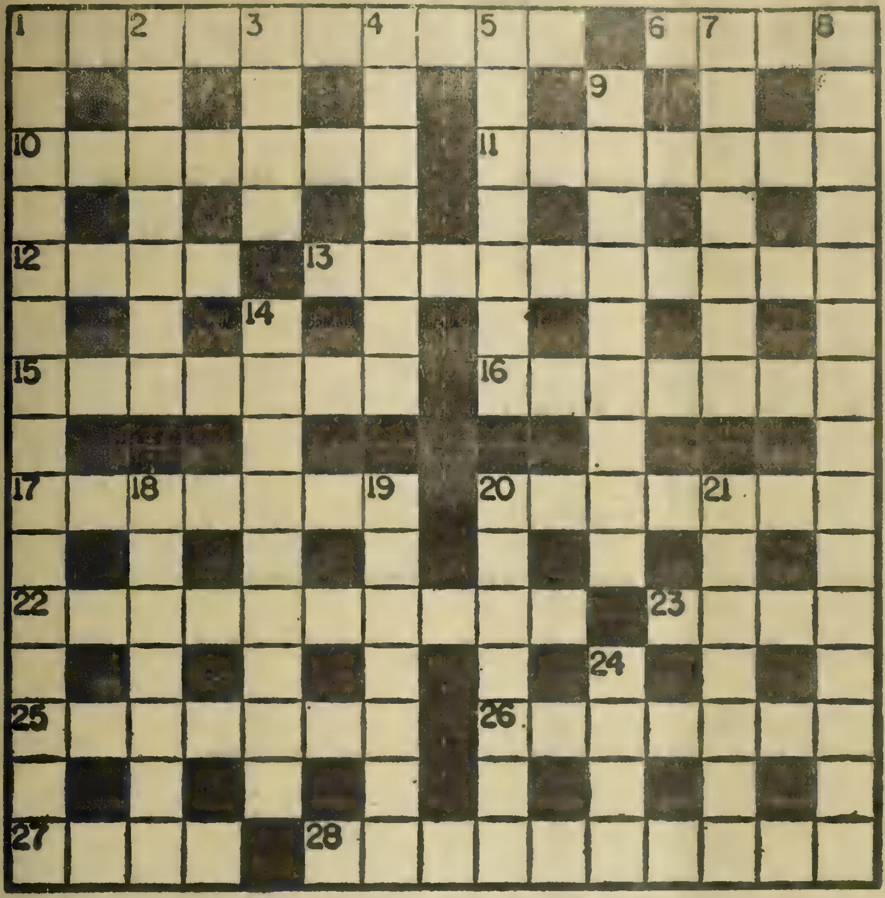
God bless you. Guilt is magical.

James Dickey

Crossword Puzzle No. 1142

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Setting right an outbreak of India's bugs. (10)
6 Patri would first make the auricular more fond of the country. (4)
10 Swell? No—though it describes the result of a swell effect. (7)
11 Does one have a staff function in High Church circles? (7)
12 Without the A.M.A. would the country be likely to go Red? (4)
13 In an overhanging manner? (10)
15 Is father serious? That's the beastly part! (7)
16 Gone all to pieces, but it used to float. (7)
17, 3 down and 2 down Not necessarily animal fables. (4, 3, 4, 7)
20 Some old cars are, now. (7)
22 A tree on which to look back, coming to the point, as a way to get out of trouble. (4, 6)
23 A woman of money, possibly—but not very much. (4)
25 In a few words, make the Watts environment take shape. (7)
26 A form of meditating should be delighting the fancy. (7)
27 School lock-out possible with this type. (4)
28 Those who forgot to fill in certain vital statistics might have to, with subordinates. (10)

DOWN:

1 Without regard for how to make the secret lids fly up? (15)
2 and 3 See 17 across
4 One might find his work soporific.
5 Scoring, but not very much. (7)
7 One might stick the wrong list inside. (7)
8 Cartridges should be added to the long-term account, perhaps. (8, 7)
9 Confess! You might prefer your children's party guests to, no matter how they leave! (4, 5)
14 Can't cease to make order, in two ways! (9)
18 Curls flatter, in comparison with astrakhan. (7)
19 Box-cars might be rolled out of one. (4, 3)
20 Some dancers might win the first, though some used to try for the last, as a matter of course in a small way. (7)
21 and 24 Set up to cover U-boat expenses? (7, 4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1141

ACROSS: 1 Contemporary; 10 Headman; 11 Emanate; 12 Drier; 13 Reef knots; 14 Kentuckian; 16 Stoa; 18 Opts; 20 Asymmetric; 23 and 7 Year in and year out; 25 Refer; 26 Refutes; 27 License; 28 Comptrollers. DOWN: 2 Ovation; 3 Timorous; 4 Mandrakes; 5 Obese; 6 Alaska; 8 The Duke of York; 9 Persian carpet; 15 Armadillo; 17 Metrical; 19 Traffic; 21 Refiner; 22 Dictum; 24 Asset

PUBLICATIONS

Fun to Read!
Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.
THE IDLER
125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

To Oppose War Is Not Enough,
We Need Creative Alternatives
THE FRIENDLY WORLD
welcomes subscriptions for people of all ages, in all countries. $5 yr.; $8 for 2 yrs. Includes "1966 World Holiday Çalendar" featuring Hans•Christian Andersen paper cuttings. THE FRIENDLY WORLD, GPO Box 1004, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11202.

WHAT did Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society, really say? Send $2.00 for your postpaid copy of "The Politician." Ampel, 502 Park Avenue, N.Y.C. 10022

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. $2. Entrancing. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on all Buddhist priests of non-warring countries to meet in a prayer convention in Japan, and make suggestions for bringing peace to Asia. Christians—pray. A Cease-Fire.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

INCOME TAX returns prepared. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers-instructors. LO 9-9026 or SW 5-7315.

PERSONALS

END JOHNSON'S WAR! VOTE FOR GODZILLA! Campaign Hdq. 110 N. Gaston, Kings Mt., N. C.

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

ENGINEER (BCE, PE) seeks position instructor College Math, English, Physics. Write Box 582, c/o The Nation.

PUBLISHER'S EDITOR — writer, analyses, revises fiction, non-fiction. French-English. Box 580, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Printed in the U. S. A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N. Y. C.

them to have nothing to say about the conditions under which genuine free elections might be held; much less can we expect them to knuckle under to Ky in the interim period. So we had better descend from the cloudland of fantasy and self-deception and face facts.

Ironically, our policy makers are the captives of fictions they themselves have propagated. The realities elude them because they feel compelled to talk as though South Vietnam were a real national entity, with a government chosen by the South Vietnamese. They cannot afford to concede that the NLF exists as a political force which actually controls and administers much of South Vietnam. Senator Kennedy has shaken the consensus which has permitted these fictions to dominate our thinking. Now, perhaps, the Administration will find it easier to acknowledge publicly that some sort of accommodation must be accepted, and raise their bid to a level that reflects the true situation.

Rising Pressures

Outwardly the Fulbright hearings may appear to have had little impact on Administration policy; there are even those who say that the hearings actually strengthened the President's hand. It must be conceded that the probing was limited and inept and that no clear alternatives were developed. There will be little immediate impact in Congress; the military and aid appropriations will be voted. But here Congress really has no alternative. It must provide "the boys at the front" with whatever the Pentagon says they need.

All the same, the Fulbright hearings have transformed the political situation. A large public was made vividly aware, through television, of the nature of the misgivings that critics of the Administration policy in the Senate have about what is being done in Vietnam. At the same time, the hearings, because they were viewed by a large audience, forced Administration spokesmen to be a bit more precise than they have been and, at the same time to sound a little less warlike. More important, the hearings set the stage for Senator Kennedy's statement which confronted—and may yet confront—the Administration with what has heretofore been lacking in the opposition: a clear political threat. The statement was a bid for leadership of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party; it challenged the Vice President even more directly than it challenged the President.

Both the Fulbright hearings and the Kennedy statement will stimulate the mounting popular opposition which, in turn, will feed back to the Congress. There is bound to be an interaction between Congressional opposition and popular opposition. If the Republicans can curb their fanatics and manage to appear to be no more aggressive than the President, they stand to benefit from whatever reaction develops to Administration policies between now and November. This consideration, in turn, will bring added pressure on the Administration. If it responds to this pressure by widening the war and by further escalation, popular opposition will mount as the casualties increase. On the other hand, if it gets a conference under way, the popular opposition would tend to abate and the Republicans would probably be forced to muffle their criticism during negotiations, which might be protracted, and a cease-fire in itself would be popular.

Other factors are developing. For example, pressure will be exerted by independent candidacies, such as Ronnie Dugger's announced candidacy for the Senate in Texas. At the same time that the CDC bowed to the tactical necessity of removing Si Casady to aid Governor Brown's bid for re-election, it adopted a strong resolution against the war and will call a convention of like-minded groups to mobilize still further pressure for a settlement. The Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy, through a committee headed by Norman Thomas and Rev. William S. Coffin, has initiated a "voter's pledge" campaign that has a fine potential. The campaign will culminate in a conference in Washington on April 30 at which delegates will be briefed on how to work for peace in Vietnam in this year's election. At this conference, the number of signed pledges will be announced. The pledge is a simple one but the intention is clear; it should win broad acceptance. The pledge reads:

> I pledge to support and vote for candidates in 1966 who agree to work vigorously: (1) for U.S. steps to scale down the fighting and achieve a cease-fire; for U.S. initiatives to encourage negotiations with all concerned parties including the Vietcong (NLF); and for a settlement which permits the Vietnamese people freely to work out their own future; (2) for the use of international agencies to settle disputes among nations; and for avoidance of military intervention in the affairs of other nations; (3) for the increasing use of our resources in constructive economic and social programs at home and abroad.

Hoover's Successor

Rex Stout's The Doorbell Rang, which no doubt J. Edgar Hoover regards as a vicious lampoon, actually tells the sober truth about an institution that has become more powerful than the executive department to which it belongs. Successive Attorneys General have stepped warily whenever duty led them near the sacred precincts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, for they have been keenly aware that Attorneys General come and go but J. Edgar Hoover goes on forever. Well, not quite forever—he is a year or more past retirement age and is rumored to have handpicked his successor. If one is to judge by a recent speech, his protégé will carry on, if appointed, in the Hoover tradition of covering the faults of the FBI with periodic ululations about the menace of communism which, despite the valiant efforts of Mr. Hoover and his 14,300 employees and a budget of almost $150 million, apparently keeps mounting.

Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen is surely not one to ignore whatever residual peril still lurks in that quarter, but he may have a sneaking suspicion that J. Edgar has been pulling the wool over the eyes of credulous citizens during most of his forty years of service, and has thereby managed to create an imbalance in the Justice Department which should be redressed at the first opportunity. That will be when J. Edgar finally decides that, though the country can ill spare his services, the day has come when it must try. Anticipating the inevitable, Senator Dirksen on January 7, 1965, introduced S. 313, relating to the appointment of a new FBI director. The bill was reported out favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary and passed the Senate on May 24, 1965; it was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives. This same bill also passed the Senate in June, 1963, but died in the House during the 88th Congress.

This legislation should be a matter of first priority in the present session. The bill itself can be read in twenty seconds. The malarkey in the covering report, lauding Mr. Hoover's achievements, may be profitably skipped, but here is the text: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That, effective as of the day following the date on which the present incumbent in the office of Director ceases to serve as such, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive compensation at the rate prescribed for Level II of the Federal Executive Salary Schedule."

That is to say, J. Edgar Hoover is not to be permitted to perpetuate himself in office by nominating his successor for the President to appoint; rather, the appropriate Senate committee is to scrutinize whoever shall be nominated, hear objections to him, if any, and recommend his confirmation only if it finds him fit. The director of the FBI occupies an office as important as that of any federal judge, even Justices of the Supreme Court. The appointment, when it comes, should receive the most critical attention of the Senate, and preparation for it should be made now.

A Clerical Trade Union

We live in strange times. Most Americans think of the Catholic clergy as a hierarchical, rigidly disciplined group, comfortably supported by the Church and no more prone to rebellion than officers of the armed services. How bizarre, then, that a member of a body so consecrated and so inured to obedience should propose the organization of a trade union for priests and, by extension, for the clergy of other denominations. Yet the Rev. William H. DuBay has done so, and when one reads his arguments they do not sound as fantastic as one would expect.

Born in Long Beach, Calif., and ordained in that neighborhood in 1960, Father DuBay is a priest much transferred. His first parish was in Northridge, an upper-middle-class section of the Southland, where he promptly got into trouble over his pronounced anti-racist views. Transferred to La Canada nearby, he asked for a transfer to Kenya, where his services had been requested. The aged James Francis Cardinal McIntyre, archbishop of Los Angeles, told him that if he wished to work with "those people" he would transfer him to a parish in Compton, one of the less glamorous suburbs of the area, and this was done. There the celebrated incident occurred, again over racial issues, which resulted in Father DuBay's writing a letter to the Pope asking for the Cardinal's replacement as archbishop. The Cardinal was not removed, and Father DuBay went to another parish, this one in Anaheim. From there he wrote a letter to the National Catholic Reporter saying, in effect: If you think we don't do right by Negroes you should see how we treat Mexican-Americans, 90 per cent of whom are Catholics! That did it. He was suspended by the Cardinal, later reinstated on condition that he become chaplain of St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica. Presumably it was thought that, ministering to the sick, he would settle down and be quiet, but here he is advocating a trade union for the clergy. (On the day he released this proposal, he was removed from the hospital post and made assistant to the pastor of St. Monica's Church in Santa Monica. This is his fifth job since he was ordained five years ago.)

Aside from the novelty of it, there are some interesting political aspects to Father DuBay's proposal. One is that the Catholic Church has greater influence in organized labor than any other denomination. It was predictable that Catholic instructors would sooner or later organize, as they have done at St. John's University in New York—the first such union in a Catholic institution. Lay instructors are increasing at Catholic schools and will continue to increase, which in itself creates pressure for unionization. From this it is only a step, although a long one, to the unionization of the clergy in general.

According to Peter Bart, who interviewed Father DuBay for The New York Times (February 23), the objectives of a priestly union would be to bargain for the establishment of grievance machinery within the Church, a tenure policy to guarantee a hearing before a priest could be suspended, an end to "arbitrary and oppressive" transfers by chancery officials, a uniform leave policy, freedom of residence and establishment of "professional" salary for priests that would eliminate their "dependence on the wealthy," etc. Besides their food and lodging, priests—other than those who take vows of poverty—are said to receive salaries ranging from less than $100 to $150 a month.

Father DuBay insists that his union does not wish to unseat the hierarchy, any more than the UAW purposes to get rid of the management of General Motors. He concedes cheerfully that lots of priests are afraid of him—"they think I'm a nut." If he is again suspended, he says he will seek reinstatement under state and federal laws granting employees the right to organize. Whatever the outcome of Father DuBay's movement, he is forcing non-Catholics to revise their ideas about the internal structure of the Church.

China Conference

THE DRAGON: Myths and Realities

Stanley Spector & J. Hartwell Moore

If Washington seems finally to have bowed to the demand for a public debate on Vietnam, there is still no sign that responsible officials want to talk seriously about China. More than sixteen years have passed since the Communist armies entered Peking in triumph and the war-weary Chinese placed their fortunes in the hands of the veterans from the hills and caves of Yenan. During this interval the Chinese population has grown at an estimated rate of 12 to 15 million each year, or by a total not much less than the present population of the United States. China's forces have directly engaged those of the United States in Korea; China has exploded two nuclear devices and has intruded on the international scene as a major contender for power and status. Its position and attitudes are now an essential ingredient in any formulas for peace — or war — yet the Administration shows no disposition to encourage citizens to think about what our relationship should be with that country.

Last month civic, educational and religious organizations throughout the Midwest took it upon themselves to bring to public view the realities and myths of China. This educational campaign took place in two major phases: Phase I was the China Conference, conducted at the University of Chicago's Center for Continuing Education (February 8-11). One hundred and forty laymen and China specialists convened in closed sessions to compare, evaluate and exchange information on Communist China today. Phase II consisted of a series of public meetings which were held immediately following the conference, in Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, Madison and Minneapolis. At each of these local meetings several experts who had served as panelists in Chicago joined local delegates to the conference in presenting and discussing the problems raised and views expressed at the earlier closed sessions.

Relations between the U. S. and the People's Republic of China have made it impossible for Americans to enter China, and although a great amount of information is available through Hong Kong, in scholarly journals and in the foreign press, the average citizen has little opportunity or inclination to do the information gathering job for himself. So the mountain came to Mohammed as some twenty-five experts from abroad, with recent experience in Mainland China, joined representatives of the American academic and business communities, the press and government agencies to present their observations and conclusions.

Among these were the British economists, Audrey Donnithorne and Joan Robinson; Jack Gray, professor of Modern Chinese Studies at the University of Glasgow; Michael Freeberne and Roderick Macfarquhar (editor, China Quarterly) and Dick Wilson (formerly, Far Eastern Review) from London; Professors C. P. Fitzgerald, the noted Sinologist and historian, and Myra Roper, both from Australia; James S. Duncan, C. M. G., former Deputy Minister of Defense for Air Ottawa; G. Leslie Willox, a Canadian surgeon who visited China in 1964; the Canadian journalists Mark Gayn and Charles Taylor; C. H. B. Oldham, a British member of the staff of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, Paris; Jan Myrdal, the Swedish author of Report from a Chinese Village; P. C. Mahalanobis, editor of the Indian Journal of Statistics; Josef Kolmas of the Oriental Institute, Prague; and (just back from three months in China), the novelist, Han Suyin of Hong Kong. The American panelists, names well known in the field of China scholarship were: Professors Norton Ginsburg, Peter Schran, Francis L. K. Hsu, Theodore E. Ch'en, Morton Halperin, John Lewis, Donald Klein, Ezra F. Vogel and William Gleysteen. Other participants were Edwin Jones (RAND Corporation), Leo Orleans (National Science Foundation), A. M. Halpern (Council on Foreign Relations, New York), and Paul Kriesberg (State Department).

When one adds to this list the hundred additional names of educators, foundation observers, State Department and Congressional committee staff members, editors, reporters, clergymen, civic leaders and plain citizens who comprised an "outer ring" of participants, it is clear that no consensus was to be expected. In fact, the ground rules of the meeting made clear that it was not to be a debate on American foreign policy, and that sweeping conclusions were not anticipated. Later, in the cities around the country, the issues of foreign policy could be debated, and the implications of the Chicago papers placed in the developing context.

At the conclusion of the first conference session ("China and the World Crisis") one visitor remarked that the participants seemed divided into two groups, "those who are objective and those who are subjective." The next morning a U. S. Government man made the same observation, but applied these tags to the opposite groups. In any case, this division seemed less striking than the contrast between those who had visited China recently and those who had not. Or to put it another way, between the Americans and all the rest. This is not to say that the Americans were invariably of one mind, or that visitors to China always agreed on what they had seen. At certain moments one could well wonder whether the speakers had, in fact, been to the same China (it is a valid enough doubt, considering the size and complexity of China and the pace of its change). Deep under, however, one glimpsed again a gulf that is familiar to our age: a stubborn adherence to a line (faith, myth) on the one side, and a naive acceptance of appearance on the other. The Americans, remote from China, tended to construct

---

Stanley Spector is professor of Chinese studies and chairman of the Committee on Asian Studies, Washington University, St. Louis. His Li Hung-Chang and the Huai Army is published by University of Washington Press. J. Hartwell Moore, a Vietnamese war veteran, is an anthropologist; he is associated with the Ethical Society of St. Louis.

tortuous theories and models, to repeat banal incantations; and the returned visitors glowed with the discovery that the Chinese are very, very human. In a sense this may be termed the real "Two-China" problem. Both Chinas are on the mainland and both Red, but there the similarity seems to end. Depending upon viewpoint, national background, political identification and depth of knowledge, the observer will see China either as a vigorous, progressive and progressing state, moving toward a better living standard for its people, toward social justice (eventually) and toward a rightful place on the Asiatic and world scenes; or as a modern version of the traditional Oriental despotism, practicing mass public slavery, starving its population through dogmatic adherence to outmoded Marxist doctrine, inhumane, intolerant and insatiably aggressive. Between these two extremes all kinds of variations and permutations of interpretation are found in the dialogue on China. Which version is the myth, and which the reality?

The opening session of the conference brought on these opposing views to confrontation. The introductory address by a distinguished American student of Communist affairs (direct attribution from the closed sessions is not permitted) presented a convincing demonstration that myth and reality are equally contending elements in the Chinese perception of America. We were warned that our notion of reality did not conform to that of the Chinese leadership and masses, and that the "objective world," as seen by Western eyes, was very different from what the leaders in Peking look out upon. The issue was joined when a panelist, one who lives part of each year in China and the West, pointed out that if Peking deals with a "seeming world," so does America; and that it is in this conflict of "seeming worlds" that the irrational and tragic drift toward war takes place. Each of the "seeming worlds" can be objectively substantiated: China has been the object of colonial adventures, China is now encircled by the largest mass of military firepower ever assembled. On the other hand, Peking does expound revolution and wars of liberation, does lend support and give aid and comfort to America's "adversaries," and does accept the notion that peaceful coexistence of the two worlds is a revisionist dream.

If the conference had an aim, it was to penetrate the veil of rhetoric and make visible the real face of China. To this end, six panels were established: (I) The Economics of China; (II) Manpower and Population; (III) The Reshaping of Chinese Society; (IV) Science and Education in China; (V) Chinese Foreign Policy; (VI) Politics and Government. Each panel was chaired by an appropriate member of the University of Chicago faculty. Several papers were prepared for each panel and presented in précis form, following which there was general discussion, first among the inner group of "experts," and then with the entire conference membership (which also included a number of experts).

In terms of economics, then, what is the real China that the assembled experts see? It is a land which, having faced a series of economic crises following the break with Russia (and the withdrawal of massive Russian support), the Great Leap Forward and the natural disasters of 1959-61, now shows returning confidence with the inception of its third five-year plan in late January, 1966. China hopes to swing back into a pattern of steady economic growth on the basis of self-reliance. Having been sobered by the catastrophic effects of the Great Leap, the leaders at Peking are willing to permit the survival of a private sector of agriculture, and are avoiding major policy changes which would cause rich peasants to reduce production. The industrial production targets are modest, with emphasis on refurbishing mines and transportation systems. There is evidence that priority is being given to defense industries. Where formerly heavy industry was the key to development goals, the focus now is more on agriculture and the development of industry for agricultural purposes.

Certain prevalent myths were exploded. The communes are very much alive, despite reports that they had been disbanded. Their functions are more limited, however, and greater emphasis is placed on the production team and brigade tiers. It was also asserted, with general agreement by the economists present, that China's economy is far more decentralized than is usually supposed.

Communist Party provincial committees seem to have become identified largely with provincial administrations; hence the party representatives cannot necessarily be relied on to enforce central policies against local interests. The economy was described as cellular, with each unit guaranteeing performance in a certain sphere to the authorities of the level immediately above it; in return for which it is allowed very wide latitude in the conduct of its internal affairs. With modernization, however, this cellular structure was judged likely to transform itself slowly into a complex system of relationships.

Across the conference table economists disagreed on the importance and necessity of collectivization. To many it seemed that the drastic measures undertaken since 1949 were China's only answer to the pressure of its growing population and the only road open to a self-reliant industrial base. But a few visitors asked whether such objectives might not have been attained more readily through private farming and its accompanying incentives. If any conclusions could be drawn, they were (1) that China's leaders are highly pragmatic and unlikely to lead the country into new Leaps Forward, and (2) that while China's industrial and agricultural goals must for a while remain far more modest than proclaimed in the late 1950s, real and perceptible progress can be noted. Thanks in part to the wheat import program and to the recent good crop years, food now seems plentiful and the population healthy. To date, although its planners may have grown more cautious, Peking has little reason to regret the economic path it has chosen. The notion that China, after the passing of the present leadership, will move toward democracy and "capitalism" must be seen as another of the "seeming" worlds into which harried American policy makers escape.

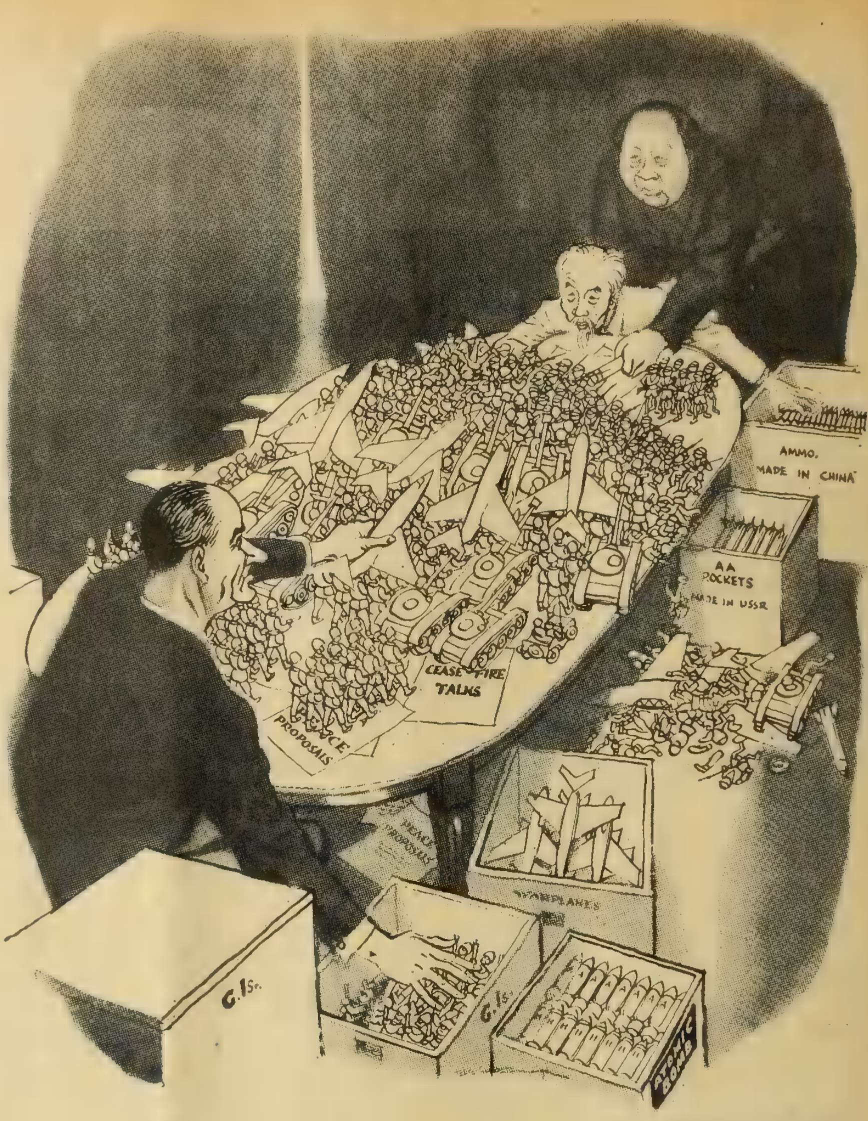
There is no escape, however, from the facts, whatever they may be in statistical detail, of China's population growth. The panel on Manpower and Population brought in estimates of from 700 million to 750 million for the year 1966, with a probability of as many as 2 billion by the turn of the century. We still have no firm figures on the size or growth rate of China's population; nor could the panel determine whether the Chinese Government itself does not know them or is suppressing the data. At any rate, Peking has been vigilant in dealing with problems of youth welfare, birth control and useful employment, although policies fluctuate.

Present emphases are on intensifying rural employment and on control of fertility through contraception and the encouragement of late marriage. There is reason to believe that the Communists may yet achieve a measurable drop in the birth rate. However, even this would not by any means prevent China from having the world's fastest rate of increase for decades and perhaps centuries to come.



Punch: Ben Roth

The Conference Table

On-the-spot accounts sketched the real China in greater detail for those attending the conference. The population was judged to be healthy and adequately fed; slums had been cleaned and improved; medical standards had risen sharply; the Han (Chinese as contrasted with minority groups of China) were moving into the Northwest territories, thus firming up China's boundary areas. There was no evidence of sexual segregation in the communes; more education was available to more people than ever before in China's history. This education aimed not only at establishing a new social, economic and political order, but also at producing new men, new ideas, new attitudes and new loyalties. The Communists prefer education, indoctrination and propaganda to coercion or force. The leadership has tried to avoid class separatism by combining education with labor service. A present emphasis in education is intended to rekindle the fire of revolutionary struggle and keep it aglow. Yet the veteran leaders show signs of disappointment with the generation born and reared in the comparative stability and comfort of the post-1949 period. Although there seems to be a much better civic attitude among the youth of today than prevailed formerly among their parents and grandparents, one observer felt that this sprang from national pride in a resurgent China rather than from ideological motivation.

A report on the development of science came to the conclusion that, although Chinese scientists today are cut off from most scientific intercourse, they have excellent library facilities and seem well aware of scientific developments abroad. The Chinese scientists seemed to be laying solid foundations for the growth of basic science, and the impression gained by many Western scientific visitors was that China could catch up with advanced world science in about twenty years.

Although most of the conferees were scholars, writers and scientists—men who in their own professions and way of life would choose maximum freedom — they seemed in large measure to agree that the present stringency of the regime in China was almost unavoidable. Those who have criticized the Communist leaders for exercising tight control have for the most part been people who live in countries where integration and a national consensus already exist. But, as one specialist suggested, Peking's obsession with organization, however harsh, may have been well founded. The political unification of China, with administration on a new and expanded scale, may prove to be the greatest achievement of the first generation of Communist leaders.

During the early stages of the conference, several of those attending expressed impatience at sitting through so many panels on the internal affairs of China before coming to Chinese Foreign Policy, which they felt was the crux of the discussion. Yet the planners did well to establish a solid foundation, that is to say a picture of a real (not "seeming") China as it faces problems of the most immediate concern to its people. Even in this area, though there was a general tone of agreement, few points were accepted in full by all. Facts varied and interpretations clashed frequently enough to assure the listeners that a true dialogue was in progress. It surprised us, therefore, as the discussion on Chinese Foreign Policy got under way, that we could detect an area of agreement broad enough to be called a general line (excluding, of course, views expressed by representatives of the State Department). The goals and strategy of Chinese foreign policy were summarized as follows:

According to one speaker, the Communists consider conflict to be an inherent structural feature of world politics, not a temporary abnormality. The basic Chinese strategy of "active defense" is applicable to external (as well as internal) military affairs. The enemy is credited with having the initiative, and the strategy of "protracted war" is still regarded as valid. Finally, the Chinese, in contrast with the Russians, still think of themselves as "encircled." In their post-1949 policy they have been unpredictable, sometimes involving themselves where stakes have been of vital importance, sometimes where the stakes were minor. Some of the situations involved considerable risks and costs; others were undertaken with close control over both risk and cost. The Chinese continue to think of the Korean War as a Chinese victory of considerable proportion. They believe anti-colonial revolutions are to their advantage, and probably do not regret investing in them, even though some of their investments (as in Africa) have brought about adverse reaction. This speaker believed that Vietnam has come to have an extraordinary importance to the Chinese: it is at the center of their policy of struggling with the United States, close to the center of their differences with the Soviet Union on strategy and tactics of revolutionary war, necessary for the maintenance of Asian Communist parties, directly connected with China's drive for power in Asia, and a very important factor in the effort to swing the Third World in the direction China wants. For all these reasons, he concluded, the Chinese cannot afford a defeat for communism in Vietnam, and may even find it necessary to obtain a real victory.

A second view stressed the specter of Munich as a powerful ingredient not only of the American attitude but of the Chinese as well. It was believed that China does not want a nuclear war, but that an American invasion following a nuclear attack could be repulsed. China does not seriously count on Russia's help and would consider a defeat of the Vietcong, although undesirable, as only a temporary setback.

A third panelist took the position that (1) Chinese leaders are rational and responsible; (2) they are committed to violence; (3) the three great powers are struggling for dominance of Asia; (4) China does not wish to become directly involved in wars of revolution, and (5) China will fight to defend its borders, as in Korea.

One long-time observer of Chinese foreign affairs listed six objectives: (1) banish the United States (with humiliation) from Asia; (2) discredit the theory of peaceful coexistence; (3) regain the lost territories (Taiwan, Central Asia, Hong Kong, Macao, Indian border areas and Outer Mongolia); (4) establish domination over border areas; (5) foster world revolution, and (6) reassert status as a world power. These objectives were seen, however, as being basically as much Chinese as they are Communist. The speaker did not see China as noticeably aggressive or expansionist, and thought that its ideology was frequently subordinated to its conception of national interest. He felt, moreover, that China's foreign policy would not change appreciably with any change of leadership.

The panelists and auditors were left to draw their own conclusions from the above observations. Minor and even major differences seemed to resolve themselves within the larger picture of Chinese policy that evolved in the conference hall. China was rationally involved in the defense of real national interests; its behavior was responsive to historical experience; it would not avoid violence, but neither did it seek expansion. It was difficult to reconcile this summary with the positions expressed by Administration spokesmen over the past decade.

The St. Louis regional conference, which was the one we attended, got under way on Friday, February 11, within six hours of the adjournment of the Phase I conference in Chicago. Phase I had been sponsored by the American Friends Service Committee, the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, the League of Women Voters and the Chicago Council of Foreign Relations, together with Northwestern University and the University of Chicago. Its extraordinary costs were met by the Johnson Foundation of Racine, Wis., and the Christopher Reynolds Foundation, Inc., New York, with additional assistance from other foundations. In spite of this support, invited delegates were required to pay a substantial registration fee. The St. Louis conference was open, public and free. It was supported by almost all of the civic, religious and educational institutions of the city. It was publicized widely as an attempt to examine in public, with the help of experts both local and from abroad, the issues confronting contemporary China. Unlike the Chicago Phase I session, there were no "off-the-record" and "not-for-attribution" ground rules. Give and take was encouraged between visiting experts, panelists and the public. Audiences were almost evenly divided among students, members of civic and international organizations, academics and community leaders. As one coed put it, "What impressed me most about the meeting was that there were so many gray-headed ladies in the audience. But, y'know, I guess they were probably just as surprised to see kids like me there."

The Friday night meeting opened with an address on China's foreign policy by Prof. C. P. FitzGerald (Australian National University). Any attempt to paraphrase FitzGerald's address does violence to his wit, elegance and balanced grace. The burden of his argument was that China's views of what constitutes security for the state, and of what circumstances menace that security, must be seen as a product of Chinese understanding of their own history. All Chinese agree that they have lived and still live in an age of peril, and that the present threat is represented by the United States. For the Chinese, communism is now the "way of life," the sole road to China's national security and the best hope of the world.

As a historian, FitzGerald holds that the general objectives of Chinese foreign policy will not change, and that instead of trying to change them, the rest of the world should be concerned with the way in which these objectives are sought and the steps taken to implement them. He sees as an immediate goal an attempt to win recognition of Western European states and, to a lesser extent (owing to remoteness), Latin America. China does not expect to convert Russia or to communize America. However, it will attempt to cover actions based on national security by a smoke screen of ideological propaganda. Above all, the Chinese are determined to wipe out traces of past weakness, to recover strength, reclaim lost territory and regain their due place in the world.

It is the failure of Westerners to recognize this aspect of China's policy that FitzGerald found to be the weakness of current Western thinking. Great powers have at all times followed their own interests, and China is no exception. With possible realignments of the great powers, and with mutual reassessment of their true national interests by China and the United States, in the light of improved knowledge and an overdue acceptance of a new situation, profound changes in the framework, though not the aims, of Chinese foreign policy may occur in the next decade.

Not unexpectedly, the majority of professors who questioned FitzGerald in an open panel clearly supported his views. The basic issue for the intellectuals was—and is—is there an underlying continuity in Chinese policy, based on relatively stable national interests; or has the revolution brought new objectives which imply no limits short of total domination? What seemed to surprise and must have pleased the speaker was the warm accord of the general public in the audience. Indeed, speakers in the Midwest never cease to be amazed by the intelligence, understanding and patience of audiences, once the realities are brought before them and the "seeming worlds" are left behind. This is particularly the case in St. Louis, which possesses a Center for East Asian Studies, programs on Asia at three or four colleges, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and 200 high school students engaged in the study of Oriental languages.

On Saturday morning, February 12, Josef Kolmas of the Oriental Institute, Prague, spoke at Washington University. His thesis was that while Tibet seemed inseparably wedded to China (in autonomous status), other areas with large minorities may eventually tend to split away. Of greater interest to the audience than the complexities of Chinese minority affairs was Kolmas' account of daily life as he had seen it in China. The final session of the St. Louis conference was devoted to summation. In setting up a politically "balanced" panel, the seeds of debate were sown. The issue was drawn on this occasion largely between those who had attended the Chicago conference and those who had not—a smaller parallel to the schism between those who have seen China, and those who have not.

Thousands of Americans have just now had an opportunity to learn at first and second hand about the myths and realities of China. The conference papers, when and if released, will make a useful publication. The question then remains: out of the millions of words and hundreds of hours, what conclusions can be drawn? Or, as one elderly St. Louis matron said, with an edge of frustration in her voice: "We've listened to you all, but what are we supposed to do?" It is high time that this became an issue of public hearing and discussion.

What became clear last month in the Midwest was that there is urgent need for closer examination of China. We must avail ourselves of every possibility to bring Americans to China and Chinese to America, to penetrate the curtain of "seeming worlds." Meanwhile, public discussion must be sustained and public officials must be forced to deal with the China question in terms other than platitudes and diatribes. A world is at stake.

THE BIG SHOOT . . . . Robert G. Sherrill

Washington, D.C.

Seeing a parked motorist discard a crumpled cigarette package on his front lawn, a disturbed man picked up the rifle he always kept handy at the front door and shot him dead. A 14-year-old boy, cleaning a high-powered rifle as nonchalantly as he had been cleaning it since he was 8 years old, fired it accidentally and the bullet went through the house and killed a National Institutes of Health official driving by.

This sort of thing had been happening every day in Washington—as it happens in every major city in the country—but local alarm became national when addled Raul Torres stepped off a Greyhound bus, just in from Yonkers, N.Y., and started walking up New York Avenue toward the White House. He was within a block of his destination when he pulled his newly purchased 30.06 Enfield rifle from its sheath; that brought the cops, and within minutes Torres—an escapee from a mental hospital and a fugitive from a warrant for his arrest for threatening the President by letter—was being packed off to another mental hospital. Before police bulled him to the ground, he had time to load the rifle with one armor-piercing bullet and fire it into the air.

The sound of that shot should have been enough, one might suppose, to frighten this Congress into passing some of the gun-restricting legislation that has been written and awaiting its approval for several years—specifically since President Kennedy was shot in Dallas. But at the same time that Torres was lurching along the street, dizzy with the grudges he had spelled out in a protest note: "Illegal court-martials, illegal prison terms, illegal mental hospitals," a cocktail party was getting started less than a mile away in the plush headquarters of the National Rifle Association. Congressmen were, of course, the honored recipients of the tall drinks, good food and hearty good humor that marks the gun fraternity. This was the opening move by one of the most powerful lobbies in America, to keep this session of Congress from reducing the awesome traffic in guns.

The Rifle Association's objective is to continue raising such a tempestuously pious defense of what it vaguely calls "the constitutional right to bear arms" (a right whose inalienability was wiped out by the noted Cruikshank case of 1876), that Congress will not have time or courage to look about the country and see just what is going on in the way of gun control—which is almost nothing. Only one state, New York, requires a license to possess a handgun, a fact of which New York was inclined to brag, until a special state investigating commission recently pointed out that the law is absurdly administered: permits are issued to 16-year-old boys, 70-year-old women, ex-mental patients and known criminals; of the thirty-five New York state residents attending the notorious Apalachin crime convention, twelve held New York State pistol licenses. Only one state, Hawaii, requires the registration of all firearms. In forty-one states there is no mandatory waiting period between purchase and delivery of a handgun; in other words, a man in a murderous passion can whip down to the pistol shop and get what he wants without a moment's delay. In nearly half the states you are legally entitled to walk about carrying all the concealed weapons you want; no permit is required, although of the 9,000 murders committed in this country each year, more than half are done with guns, and of these 70 per cent are done with handguns.

Federal jurisdiction is both scanty and indifferent. A recent check of firearms dealers in the District of Columbia disclosed shocking violations of the Federal Firearms Act's requirements that dealers keep permanent records of all guns imported and sold, including the serial number and the name of the purchaser. Of twenty individual dealers, eleven admitted they keep no records. Of forty business dealers, nine did not even possess a federal license, and six were keeping records judged to be "poor."

Control of interstate shipments is practically nonexistent. A 15-year-old Baltimore boy recently slaughtered his family with a .38-caliber revolver bought by mail from Martin Retting, the dealer who supplied Lee Harvey Oswald with the well-known telescopic sight; California mail-order guns were traced recently to thirteen customers in Chicago who had been previously arrested for murder; a University of Mississippi student bought a "souvenir" mail-order submachine gun that could, with a few simple adjustments, be made operable in two minutes. One mail-order gun dealer sends out a catalogue advertising .20 mm. Lahtis as "Ideal for long range shots at deer and bear or at cars and trucks and even a tank if you happen to see one."

Such is the influence of the National Rifle Association and its allies that, although scores of corrective gun-control bills have been introduced since President Kennedy's death, not one has passed either the national Congress or any state legislature. During 1964 alone, 210 bills were introduced in state legislatures but, as an NRA bulletin states complacently, "members reacted promptly, firmly, and in force. As a result, no severe legislation was enacted."

For the most part the NRA depends upon letter campaigns. Its officials claim to be able to hit Congress with half a million letters on seventy-two hours' notice, and this is probably not a cheap boast. On the state level, the effect is equally overwhelming and, frequently, abusive.

When Angelo F. Palmisano, a Maryland assemblyman, introduced gun-control legislation, he began receiving telephone threats on his life, and NRA-member letters came pouring in with tidings such as:

> You dirty wop. You should go back to your Italy and Mafia. How did you get in this country anyway? . . . I bet you are the type who has no gun in his house to protect himself and would let any housebreaker come in and help himself to anything, even your wife, and then you would pray for a humble spirit to bear it. God help America with such as you. Were your parents ever married?

NRA officials insist that when they stir up letter-writing campaigns they beg their membership not to be abusive; but somehow the hot blood of what the NRA calls "a shooter" just keeps breaking through. Congress got a taste of the NRA's technique last session (and it will undoubtedly get a repeat dose this session) because Sen. Thomas Dodd of Connecticut was pushing legislation to prohibit the interstate shipment of guns except between the manufacturer and the dealer, or between licensed dealers.

Dodd has had a peculiarly unpleasant experience with the gun buffs. After meeting for three years with the NRA and gun manufacturers, he finally came up with a bill in 1963 which was so weak that these officials said they would support it. He had no sooner introduced it than, whoosh!, thousands of angry NRA letters fell upon Congress. The bill died. That is a favorite NRA technique: cozy up to a reform politician and get him to cripple his own legislation; then when the malformed bill is introduced, crush it the rest of the way. The same device has been used in a number of state legislatures.

But Dodd decided to fight back. He was sickened by what he saw happening around the country: mail-order guns circumventing the Sullivan Act in New York; 4,000 mail-order guns pouring into Chicago over a three-year period, a fourth of them going to men with criminal records; 25 per cent of the mail-order guns received in the District of Columbia going to persons with criminal records; mail-order guns going to juveniles and ex-prisoners in Pennsylvania in contravention of the Uniform Firearms Act of that state.

He decided to push a modest bill of his own composition. It wouldn't be aimed at the friendly neighborhood gun dealer who supplied Torres; that sort of over-the-counter transaction between dealer and madman would not be interfered with. Nor would his bill prevent interstate shipments to federally licensed gun dealers like Louis Di Salvo, the Klansman who did indeed import guns into Mississippi and distribute them to his friends. Di Salvo, in his weird way, would still be considered legitimate under the Dodd bill. But at least Dodd's legislation would cut out the interstate shipments to just anyone—boys, ex-cons, perverts, crazy people.

That, to many, seemed reasonable enough. But not to the NRA. Frank Daniel, secretary of the NRA, smiled warmly as he recalled recently: "We sent letters to our 730,- 000 members and told them to let their opinions be known. Well, we really got results. There was probably no other response like it to anything happening in Congress. Changed a lot of opinions on Capitol Hill, too. After that, Dodd couldn't even get a quorum of his subcommittee."

Does this make the NRA a lobbying organization? It does not register as a lobby, and ordinarily its officials look sad if anyone suggests that they are lobbyists. When Franklin L. Orth, executive vice president, appeared to testify against Dodd's bill, the Connecticut Senator told him, "It seems to me that your organization is doing what I would call lobbying against this measure."

Goodness no! cried Orth. The NRA is not a lobby, it is a "great patriotic organization" like, well, like "the American Legion."

When Dodd asked Orth if he thought a patriotic nonlobbying organization should put quite so many lies in its brochures about the pending legislation, the rifleman replied demurely, ". . . sometimes in the heat of battle there are regrettable excesses which are not deliberate, or are born in misunderstanding."

This "heat-of-battle" excuse is strange for an organization that pretends to bend its desires to the gentle winds of public welfare. Disavowing any taint of commercialism—no, no, it is not interested in the multibillion-dollar arms industry or the multimillion-dollar sporting magazine industry — the NRA gets its tax-exempt status not under the usual Internal Revenue Code subsection that forbids "carrying on propaganda or otherwise attempting to influence legislation" but rather under the subsection that exempts "civic leagues or organizations not organized for profit but operated exclusively for the promotion of social welfare . . . and the net earnings of which are devoted exclusively to charitable, educational or recreational purposes."

Since this puts the riflemen in the same "nice" group with the League of Women Voters, lobbying is not actually forbidden to them, and sometimes, in their more candid moments, NRA officials talk more plainly than Orth did to the committee. When I asked Daniel if the NRA is a lobby, he said, "I guess it depends which side of the fence you are on."

From this side of the fence, one notices items such as these:

- The American Rifleman, about 9 million copies of which were printed by the NRA last year, has cut down its space for shooting and hunting articles in the last three years while increasing by one-third the space given to warning about firearms legislation.
- Between 1962, the year before Kennedy was killed, and the end of 1964 (the last period when an accumulated expense report is available from the Rifle Association), the organization's total expenses rose by about one-third, from an annual output of $3 million up to $4 million.

During the same period, however, the expenditure for "legislative and public affairs" work (read "lobbying") went up more than 100 per cent! That money was spent fighting off what E. B. Mann, editor of Guns Magazine, called the "hysterical" legislation shaped by Kennedy's end. In its private discussions, the NRA is quite candid about its objectives and successes in this fight. The next-to-last annual report put out by the NRA notes with satisfaction:

> Before and after the assassination . . . a total of 20 bills were introduced [in Congress] to restrict the interstate shipment of firearms obtained through mail-order channels. . . . [Among these was a Dodd bill.] Through the efforts of the National Rifle Association, many restrictive features of this bill were removed. . . .

The report pointed with special pride to a provision written into the Arms Control and Disarmament Act amendment by Sen. Bourke Hickenlooper of Iowa and Rep. Robert Sikes of Florida, which completely gutted the control features.

(Sikes's heroism was momentarily tarnished a few weeks later when he was arrested, in company with multimillionaire Ed Ball, retired General Nathan Twining, and Aluminum Corporation of America's vice president, R. A. Leanard, for hunting turkey over a baited field —a trick that, among most sportsmen, is viewed as being at about the same level as spearing fish in the bathtub.)

Sikes is a director of the NRA. A reserve general, he is also a very influential member of the House Appropriations Committee, which each year approves increasingly generous budgets for the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice — a quasi-army organization, most of whose directors are also members of the NRA.

The National Board gives away free ammunition and lends government-owned weapons to gun clubs affiliated with the NRA. In the last six years, it has given $12 million in subsidies to these gun clubs.

Largely because of speeches by Texas Rep. Henry Gonzalez, the National Board has had great trouble in recent years convincing anyone that it is not actually subsidizing hate groups. Ever since Robert B. de. Pugh, leader of the Minutemen, advised his eager extremists to join the NRA so that they could get free ammunition, the question has hung darkly over the whole program: Is the U.S. Government, through the NRA, arming kooks?

An Army spokesman told the Washington Star several months ago that reports of extremists joining clubs "really worries us. We don't know enough to say with assurance that we don't have any extremists in the gun clubs, but there's nothing to indicate that any member of a gun club has ever been involved in inappropriate things."

Nevertheless, the jittery secrecy with which the National Board and the NRA surround their membership rolls is not likely to give the public confidence. When Stanley Mosk, then attorney general of California, wanted to run a check to see if nuts were getting U.S. ammunition, the National Board said its membership lists were not "available." Daniel told me that Mosk did not ask for the NRA rolls, "but if he had, we would have refused to show them to him."

Two things have happened since then. First, the Defense Department "leaked" the news that it was cutting off its free-ammunition program. Gonzalez, checking around, found that this simply was not true, and he took the floor to needle the generals: "Obviously I would be delighted to learn that the rumors, attributed by the newspapers to anonymous officials, were true. But there stands the new budget, in complete contradiction to the rumors of cutbacks. How does one curb a free-ammunition subsidy by giving away $362,000 worth of free ammunition more in 1966 than in 1964?"

Daniel conceded to me that Gonzalez is quite accurate. "The Secretary of Defense reacted to all those charges" Gonzalez has made, he said, and panicked into saying there would be a cutback but . . . well . . . yes, "the appropriations remain the same."

To pretty up its position, the Defense Department did what any federal department in trouble is likely to do: it hired an outside consultant to see if the criticisms had merit. The consulting firm of Arthur D. Little got the job at a price of $100,000 (a figure Gonzalez spent three months prying out of the Defense Department, first getting the figure $7,500) and Daniel said that the report will be released this month. If you are cynically thinking that the report will show "there has been no infiltration of the gun clubs by extremists and no misuse of the government aid program," you are correct—that, says Daniel, is exactly what the report will say. Although the report is supposed to be still in the confidential stage, Daniel confides that he has learned of its contents from "a good authority."

So hurrah, the Big Shoot is in the clear again. Or it would be if it were not for the fact that still gnawing around the edges are the concessions to truth officials of the NRA make. Daniel admits that the job of checking the character of new members is too big for his outfit, so they turn it over to the adjutant generals of the various states. "Some states' adjutants make a very thorough check," he said, "and others don't." Some adjutant generals turn the check over to the state police. This is done, for example, in Mississippi.

The availability of free government ammunition may account for the fact that the NRA's membership has more than doubled in Mississippi since 1962—the fastest growth rate in the country—and we must take the word of the Mississippi state police that those 3,700 shooters are sterling fellows who will use their free bullets exclusively for target practice.

As the opposing sides begin to line up once more over the Dodd bill—which Daniel believes is dead and which, short of Presidential support that was once promised but has not yet been seen, very likely is dead in its present form—some odd alliances and enmities emerge. For instance, the right wing, which takes such pleasure in advising the world to Support Your Local Police, is opposed by none other than the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which likes Dodd's bill very much.

Atlanta Chief of Police Herbert I. Jenkins says his department confiscates about 2,000 pistols and 200 shotguns and rifles every year. "Almost every person who wants a firearm now," Jenkins complained, "has one or more, regardless of his moral or mental capacity."

Carl K. Miller, a commander in the Chicago Police Department, says about 6,000 firearms are confiscated in that city each year. He tells a story about the bus rider who missed getting off at his usual stop:

> This passenger became enraged and stated, "I am going to get off this bus if I have to blast my way off." With that, he fired four shots, wounding several riders. Another of the passengers, incensed at the audacity of the blasting rider, took out a gun and fired back, wounding several more riders. This happened in a supposedly civilized city on a bus carrying citizens to and from their work. I merely mention this because it is almost hard to believe that on a bus carrying people to and from work, out of the sixty or eighty passengers on the bus, two of them would have firearms.

It does seem strange until one recalls that Americans spend about $2 billion a year on guns, and that the government, in addition, sells about 100,000 cut-rate guns through the National Board each year.

To loyal members of the NRA, however, the odd—and discouraging—feature of Miller's anecdote is that so few occupants of that bus were armed. The NRA's ideal, as often stated, is the armed citizen, and although in a recent editorial The American Rifleman granted that "the expression 'armed citizen' has different meanings to different people," it went on to say that to the NRA faithful it meant, fundamentally, the ability to shoot back and the gun to do it with:

> The taking of a human life is a matter of deepest concern. Nonetheless . . . in many instances, the citizen has no choice but to defend himself or his home. If he elects to use a gun, that is his privilege. The important thing is that the individual must have the opportunity to make his own decision, and obviously his decision lacks meaning in such instances if he does not have the right and the opportunity to have a gun to enforce that decision.

POVERTY, INJUSTICE and the WELFARE STATE . .

Part 2: How Rights Can Be Secured

Richard A. Cloward & Richard M. Elman

Because the American poor, unlike the poor in most other democratic social-welfare states, have never developed continuing instruments of political power, the American welfare state defrauds them as it aids them. As noted in these pages last week, benefits are treated as charity rather than statutory entitlements; grant levels are abysmally low; constitutional rights are regularly violated by investigatory procedures; millions of the most impoverished are denied benefits by arbitrary statutes and policies (i.e., residency laws). Since the poor themselves are not likely to mount organized political pressure for reform, other strategies must be considered which would have the same impact. Three ways of attacking the injustices of the social-welfare state are discussed in the article below.

One form of attack upon the social-welfare apparatus should be mounted in the courts. Undue emphasis has been placed upon securing reforms through legislative action, and insufficient attention paid to legal remedies. Two types of legal action are required: one designed to achieve basic changes in the structure of social-welfare law, and the other to insure that laws are faithfully implemented at the administrative level. Much of the current discussion about extending legal services to the poor is intended to yield the latter objective. The Office of Economic Opportunity, for example, plans to finance legal resources for the poor in urban and rural slums. This program, to be discussed below, will bring lawyers into contact with the poor, where they will be quickly inundated by pressing problems demanding immediate action. Lawyers practicing under these circumstances will doubtless succeed in remedying injustice in one case after another through negotiation and administrative appeal or in the lower courts; they may even on occasion create a major legal precedent to which the welfare apparatus must accommodate. But crucial precedents are usually more efficiently pursued by organizations which do not offer mass services but specialize in finding "test" cases. Such organizations can develop specialized legal expertise in a given field, and can find the resources to pursue issues doggedly and tenaciously through the labyrinth of appeals, at the end of which a binding precedent may finally be established. We need, in short, an "association for the advancement of social-welfare rights," comparable in purpose and function to the NAACP and the ACLU in their respective fields of interest.

The issues of law that require intensive action are both substantive and procedural. As to the first, no aspect of substantive law in the field of social welfare is so murky as that pertaining to the question of whether various classes of entitlements are matters of legal right or public charity. Ambiguity especially surrounds benefits for the poor; most of the benefits directed toward the regularly employed classes having been less plagued. Here again, "social security" is a case in point. It is virtually unheard of that recipients require legal assistance in order to obtain this benefit. The clarity with which entitlements are framed and implemented thus reflects the relative political power of the groups which are their object. In the field of public housing, by contrast, ambiguity is striking. Legislation is written in such a way as to deny tenants any of the rights commonly associated with tenancy in private housing. Apartments can be inspected at will by management; leases are month to month; eviction can occur without recourse to the courts. Charles Reich, a professor in law, has suggested that social-welfare benefits constitute "new property rights" and should be vigorously pursued in the courts until they are so defined under law.

If benefits can be established as rights, to whom then do these rights pertain, and under what conditions? Here again, a variety of substantive issues are posed. Residence laws provide one notorious case in point, for, as we have noted, they appear to violate the historic right to cross state boundaries without penalty. Issues of illegal search and seizure arise from widespread investigatory practices now prescribed by existing legislation or administrative fiat—such as the "post-midnight raids" discussed earlier. It is customarily regarded as within the province of welfare departments to force unwed mothers to be examined regarding putative fathers as a condition for public assistance. Invasions of privacy are taken for granted in a system where no one has rights.

Eligibility for public-welfare benefits has sometimes been made contingent upon one's willingness to perform work for a governmental jurisdiction. One such case, involving male welfare recipients who were jailed for refusing to cut brush in hip-deep snow, was recently struck down in the lower courts as a form of peonage.

---

Richard A. Cloward is professor of social work at Columbia University. Richard M. Elman is a free-lance writer.

Ambiguity about "rights" versus "charity" is also reflected in the absence of adequate procedural safeguards. Under the guise of discharging an ethical responsibility to "protect the confidentiality" of information disclosed by clients, welfare departments have resisted the right of clients to be represented by counsel during interviews, investigations and many types of semi-judicial proceedings. But perhaps most striking is the fact that it is not clear, with respect to many benefits, whether an aggrieved person has the right to do anything more than complain. Appeals procedures, administrative or otherwise, are not often defined in legislation, and administrators do not usually choose to establish them. If a person has a grievance, it is often not known to whom he should turn or whether he must be heard. Until test cases resolve matters of this kind, rights cannot be effectively asserted.

The second form of attack should be a vigorous campaign of communication. Tyranny is not so likely to take root when men have access to information. The authoritarianism of social-welfare agencies is partly made possible by the pervasive ignorance they engender in their clientele. Where ignorance prevails, myths arise to explain what otherwise seems arbitrary and capricious. It is believed by some on the dole in New York City that welfare workers get $50 for each case they can close, for how else is one to understand the hundreds of instances in which recipients are discharged from the rolls for no apparent reason (e.g., "failed to comply with departmental regulations")? Myths serve to order the reality, but they also reinforce ignorance of it. And because recipients do not understand administrative decisions, officials can dismiss complaints out of hand. By converting issues of justice into instances of ignorance, attacks upon the rules are thus deflected and the system remains intact.

One can grant the low education of recipients without supposing that this goes far toward explaining their failure to grasp the workings of the apparatus upon which they depend for survival. Ignorance is a product of the system itself. Our social-welfare state is enormously complex—not because it needs to be, but because it serves our ambivalence toward the poor to make it so. Because, as we have pointed out, statutes are vague and ambiguous as to who can get benefits and strikingly clear as to who cannot, fantastic administrative energy is required to define criteria of eligibility. The resulting proliferation of regulations is incomprehensible even to those who create them. People who need a variety of services (money, housing, health care) must negotiate with an array of autonomous departments, each jealous of its prerogatives, each a complex rules system, each caught up in its own trappings of petty tyranny.

A public department can make itself surveyable to its constituents or can place them under surveillance. Our "social security" agencies assiduously explain themselves, advertising on radio and in newspapers to inform a broad audience of entitlements. They deplore unclaimed benefits and pursue those unschooled in their rights. But the claimants of social security are the once employed and the propertied; they are, in time, the majority of us, and agencies catering to a majority are not unmindful of its influence. Who advertises for clients for public welfare, for public housing, or for any of the "poor agencies"? For every person on the public-welfare rolls, at least one more is eligible but does not apply. Let them find their own way to appropriate agencies and through the maze of procedures that will stand between them and relief. Let them submit without challenge to investigation, for ours is a system obsessed with the fear that benefits will be obtained fraudulently, or by persons of questionable eligibility. No one may certify to his pauperism; it must be proved—repeatedly—and even then the evidence of home visits, interviews, forms and affidavits is not to be trusted. Elaborate patterns of illegal surveillance multiply. It is not thought that clients require information about the system; rather, the system must know about them.

A massive and aggressive program of public information could go far toward eliminating an ignorance that is both produced by and reinforces these barbaric practices. Such programs are by no means novel or untried. Some three decades ago, Britain's National Council of Social Service, a private organization, established a number of "citizen's advice bureaus" which have been operated with public funds since 1949, and are located in churches, settlements, family agencies, unions and elsewhere, close to those who need them most. The central office generates a constant flow of information to the local bureaus: it summarizes entitlements under new legislation, digests changes in administrative rulings, reports the outcome of appeals on one issue or another, and otherwise provides judicious advice and guidance to the users of public services. Is has been, from all accounts, a remarkably successful program.

American private social-welfare agencies — despite large subsidies from government — resist making functions of this kind central to their operations. Consonant with America's attitudes toward the poor, private agencies have devoted themselves unceasingly to various forms of moral, cultural and psychiatric uplift. Prior to the depression, they carried on cash-relief programs, using such funds as could be extracted from the well to do. Pressed by heavy demands from their clients, and with relatively little money to disburse, they became experts in making judicious grants, evolving criteria and techniques to distinguish the worthy from the unworthy. They instituted a system of "social-service exchanges" which compiled information on their clientele to insure against the possibility that a few recipients might be pyramiding meager benefits by migrating from agency to agency. When government acted during the depression, many voluntary agencies argued that the new poverty agencies—such as public welfare—should be staffed by experienced social workers who understood how to administer benefits without inducing dependency, that tragic flaw of America's poor.

The mental hygiene movement also penetrated the field of social work during the depression years, and it was not long before private agencies began to draw from Freudianism their images of man, his needs and his susceptibility to intervention. And so the private field progressively turned away from environmental assistance and embraced the new personality manipulations. But the economically dispossessed remained stubbornly oblivious to the subtleties of a psychology that stressed man's participation in the creation of his own problems, preferring to believe instead that they were the victims of arbitrary and capricious outer forces beyond human control. With their traditional clientele thus alienated, a good many private agencies announced that they would welcome opportunities to serve people "in need of counseling and guidance, whether financially dependent or not." By the mid-fifties, many agencies had succeeded in uplifting themselves by attracting a high proportion of middle-class constituents.

The "war against poverty" has again focused attention on the poor, and a new period of uplift has begun. The National Urban League, the Family Service Association of America and the Child Study Association recently joined to establish, with poverty funds, a program called "Project Enable." With the League's access to the Negro ghetto and the technological expertise of the Associations, a vast program of counseling and guidance of parents will be undertaken to improve child-rearing practices so that their children can become upwardly mobile.

It is now being said, curiously, that people are poor because they have no money—but no one has thought to give them any. "Welfarism" has become discredited; all forms of the dole are in particular disrepute. The new uplift stresses a cherished American value—economic advance by individual achievement. But the poor are mostly young or very old. For the old it is too late to advance; and the poverty of the young is so crippling that they are incapacitated for mobility once they come of age. The question of poverty, in short, is being confused with the question of economic mobility. Once again, America finds itself unable to deal just with poverty; it has always had to "save" the poor as well—exhorting them to abandon the immoral ways which cause their condition, or diagnosing and treating them, or launching into the next economic stratum those who could respond to the countdown. Merely to provide money so that all may start from a minimum standard of living affronts our belief in individualism and our faith in the efficacy of professional interventions to which all social problems can finally be made to yield.

Reflecting the culture of which they are instruments, private agencies have by and large failed to act as guardians and proponents of the welfare apparatus. Standards of financial assistance are still very low (even in industrial states, "minimum cost-of-living indexes" are computed, and grant formulas are fixed at two-thirds or less of the indexes); millions of families needing assistance are not being recruited to the rolls; and those who obtain assistance are still not getting all to which they are entitled. Specializing in "information services" may not lay the best basis from which to assert professional status, but it must be said that the poor need allies against the welfare apparatus a good deal more than they require the therapeutic and other skilled services which are the stuff of professional legitimacy.

Power finally belongs to those who are able to define for others their station in life. If men have been led to believe that they have no rights, being told that they do may matter little, for the belief can overwhelm the telling. In New York State, public-welfare agencies distribute a brochure to every recipient describing, briefly and abstractly, the rights of clients, including the right to take appeals from decisions considered unjust. And, as we have shown, the grounds for appeal are abundant.

The third attack, then, must be through the apparatus of appeals. In New York City, which contains more than 500,000 welfare clients, and almost half again as many rejected applicants, how many come to challenge the tens of millions of decisions regarding their various entitlements made in any year? For the whole of the city, in most years, there are about fifteen. Granted that the poor have little education and even less money for legal assistance, this is still unimaginably few.

To what interpretation will such a statistic yield? Only, it would seem, to one showing how the welfare system leads the poor to participate in their own victimization. Many welfare recipients endure that status for long periods of time, sometimes handing it down from generation to generation. Eventually, some come to believe that they know a great deal about the workings of the system, as indeed they often do, including ways to circumvent its rules. Those most familiar with the system often end by accepting its premises and thus ascribe legitimacy to its practices.

Doubtless, reluctance to appeal also arises from the fear that petty evasions of the rules will be uncovered during hearings. Nor is this the only instance one could point to in which men have given allegiance to the rules by which they are degraded, to the rules which they covertly violate. The lawless and authoritarian practices of the welfare apparatus thus produce correlative adaptations among clients. For when rights are ignored, men come to live by their wits, meeting caprice with chicanery; or they live witlessly, meeting the arbitrary with acquiescence.

Under such conditions, it will take more than information about rights to make them believable or to lead men to act upon them. If old patterns of accommodation are to be disrupted, there must be a demonstration that rights can be successfully asserted. And that will require advocates willing to pit themselves against an entrenched system. Where, then, are the poor to find these advocates?

One answer comes from the Office of Economic Opportunity, which has been promoting programs of legal services for the poor. Bar associations have rather vigorously opposed this intrusion by government into their part of the free-enterprise preserve, but that resistance may be overcome, for it is difficult to find any but the most obviously self-serving arguments to support it. The plans for "neighborhood law offices" and other legal programs under various auspices are, to be sure, a distinct advance over the present condition. Until now we have preferred to avoid the matter by ostentatiously praising the charity and idealism of those few lawyers in Legal Aid Societies and elsewhere who have resigned themselves to relative poverty by choosing to serve the poor. If, through OEO's largess, the number of lawyers entering the lists against the welfare state can be multiplied five- or tenfold or more, it is certainly all to the good.

The plan to expand legal services, however, has several defects. First, it equates the need for advocacy with the need for lawyers. But the great bulk of problems that arise in the day-to-day transactions between recipients and public agencies can be resolved by persons possessing only a rudimentary knowledge of the social-welfare establishment, provided that they are willing to be aggressive and tough-minded negotiators. Such pressure is all the more likely to be effective if backstopped by the threat of legal action, should redress not be obtained. The existence of legal power is thus more important than its exercise. Mobilization for Youth, on New York's Lower East Side, has conducted large-scale advocacy programs through a series of "neighborhood service centers" located in store fronts and staffed by professional social workers and case aides. Lawyers train staff members in the basic laws and rule systems governing public departments. The vast majority of problems brought to the centers are then effectively resolved by these nonlegal advocates, the more difficult cases being referred to MFY's legal unit of five full-time lawyers. With poverty funds, neighborhood service centers patterned after those on the Lower East Side are being established in other cities, although it remains to be seen whether the vigor of advocacy which distinguished MFY's program will be matched elsewhere, for such programs are not popular with the governmental officials who control poverty funds. Aside from this question, the point is that advocacy resources could be greatly expanded if scarce legal resources were conserved for in-service training, appeal procedures, court actions and other matters requiring depth of legal knowledge and experience.

The plan for "neighborhood law offices" also suffers the defect of being an altogether ad hoc mechanism. It will thus be dependent for funding on the vagaries of the political process. If the programs generate a great many problems for city government (as they surely will when the job is properly done), pressure may mount to shut off funds. Legal services can also be initiated in stable institutional settings — unions, settlement houses, family service agencies, inner-city churches—and this is slowly happening. Even if such institutions apply for governmental funds to initiate advocacy services, they would be able to carry on with private resources, should public sources dry up. Bar associations, it should be noted, resist the practice of law by organizations, the stated fear being that organizational interests will be "interposed" between client and lawyer. The danger is real, to be sure, for once organizations experience political backlash from the activities of their lawyers, internal pressures for more moderate advocacy may be felt. On the other hand, it is equally real that the reluctance to see nonprofit organizations hire lawyers has had the long-standing consequence of denying counsel to the poor.

In the end, we shall require arrangements that do not make access to advocates dependent upon the vagaries of poverty funding or the interests of private organizations. Once again we may need to look to European countries, where legislative measures—such as Britain's Legal Aid and Advice Act of 1949—guarantee the availability of lawyers and provide payment for services for the very poor. Clearly, the country is not yet ready to entertain such measures. But some form of socialized law seems inevitable if men's rights are to be secured.

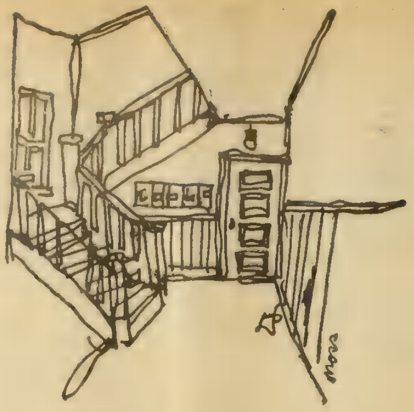
We have stressed reform strategies which take account of the lack of organized low-income political influence in this country. If, however, welfare recipients in large urban centers could be organized to press their grievances through dramatic, well-publicized actions, these strategies would be greatly enhanced. The notion that the poor should participate in the decisions affecting their dependency is not novel. In the depression years, the Workers' Alliance—a union of relief clients and relief workers—performed this important function in New York City. The Alliance staged sit-ins at welfare offices, mass demonstrations and letter-writing campaigns, and succeeded in securing improved benefits for its members.

Recently, groups under diverse sponsorships and in scattered localities have begun to organize around welfare issues. In some cases, as in Syracuse or Washington, they have been organized by professional social workers, using OEO funds. In Newark, Cleveland, Detroit, some parts of the South and elsewhere, they have been organized by newly emergent radical groups, principally SNCC and SDS. One would be hard put to describe these sporadic efforts as a movement, or even a potential movement. They have been isolated efforts to adjust individual grievances through protest.



In some instances, efforts have been made to establish procedures comparable to collective bargaining. If this process is to succeed, it must attract expert allies. A short time ago, for example, a group of Lower East Side Negro and Puerto Rican ADC mothers, represented by an attorney and a social worker, held a meeting with the Commissioner of Welfare to negotiate grievances. The immediate aim of this Committee of Welfare Families, organized through Mobilization for Youth, was to force the Welfare Department to supply its members with winter clothing. The Committee first notified the Commissioner that it had unsuccessfully made formal requests to the appropriate welfare investigators for the necessary cash grants. It threatened to picket if the Commissioner refused a hearing. The Commissioner agreed to a meeting with the Committee, and subsequently negotiated a formal grievance procedure with them. But, throughout the negotiations, the Commissioner continued to insist upon the traditional prerogative to investigate assertions of individual need, rather than to accept the validity of the Committee's assertions. While acceding to the principle of collective bargaining, he reaffirmed the right of the Department to conduct confidential interviews with clients, unimpeded by the presence of other Committee members, lawyers, social workers or translators. "Why should a discussion on why our members are not receiving the winter clothing which is due them contain so much 'confidential' information?," the Committee wrote to the Commissioner recently. And they went on: "If Mrs. John Doe is told by her investigator that her coat received in 1959 or 1960 should last '5 to 8 years,' or if a Mrs. Rodriguez is told that her investigator is too busy with 'more important things, and I don't know when I can get around to see you,' is all this 'confidential'?" Despite bureaucratic tactics of resistance, these efforts at reform—however faltering and few—are needed in a society whose social-welfare apparatus has always had its way with the poor.

And, finally, it should be said that new legislation—such as the proposed plan for a federally sponsored "guaranteed minimum income"—would solve most of the problems cited in these two articles, for it would eliminate their source. Nor should anyone mourn the passing of the local public-assistance agency, if that ever comes to pass. One reason for developing vigorous programs to protect individual rights—whether by information dissemination, advocacy, legal testing or collective action—is to dramatize the need for a new way to distribute income by revealing just how bad is the way that now prevails.

Deserts In The Sea . . . . . .

Richard G. Lillard

Los Angeles

Big questions are raised by the end of the sardine fishery off the coast of California and the possible beginning of the end for the anchovies and the larger fishes that eat them. Who "owns" the resources of the sea? How much longer can society allow the fishing interests to behave as all lumbermen once did (and as some still do when they are given a chance)? How long can coastal industry be permitted to use the fishing ground as a free and convenient dump? What is the economic place of recreation and sports in a world of short working hours, early retirement and stress on healthful outdoor living—of the sort that California is famous for? Private corporations and government bureaus have done much to obliterate the natural scene and the wildlife of the continent. Are short-term economic expedients to annihilate the creatures of the sea making the ocean emptier and less lively than ever before since Creation?

Last fall, in the face of much protest, the California State Fish and Game Commission began an experimental program that would give manufacturers access to the anchovy, one of the key forage fish in the natural life cycle of the sea. The commission authorized commercial fishing boats going beyond the 3-mile limit to catch 75,000 tons of anchovies during the 1965-66 season, for purposes of reduction—i.e., to be ground up into meal. Caught by the holdful, mature anchovies (5 to 9 inches long) would thus become food for cats, feed for fry and fingerlings in inland fish hatcheries, meal for chickens and minks, oil for paint factories, and fertilizer for field crops and subtropical gardens.

Until now, anchovies have been caught, anywhere offshore, to supply a small canning business for export to the Philippines and elsewhere for human consumption. While anchovies from California went to Oriental tables, anchovies from Portugal came to California for pizza parlors and cocktail parties. But mainly the California anchovies were netted by the tankful, to be used as live bait by local commercial albacore fishermen and by sports fishermen in skiffs and party boats and on barges and piers. Even on weekdays the piers and party boats and barges between Malibu and San Diego alone provide recreation for 3,000 or 4,000 fishermen, a great many of whom use wriggling fresh anchovies as bait. The president of Ocean Fish Protective Association says: "The anchovy must be viewed as the fish that has permitted Southern California to become the world's leading area for live-bait ocean sports fishing."

Ostensibly the commission's decision was to set up the experimental anchovy-reduction fishery in order to work toward scientific management of the entire anchovy resource. Already official studies had measured the growth rates of the fish, worked out their life cycle, estimated their numbers, and mapped some of their migrations. Counting the catches, tagging individuals, trying to watch total population—these would continue. Meanwhile, the presumption was that the granting of permits to catch, under certain conditions in specified waters, would add a new base to the state's fishing industry and general economic well-being. Immediate, sure profits would go to Star-Kist Foods, Van Camp Sea Food, Del Monte Fishing, Santa Cruz Canning, Ocean Beauty Packing and other firms.

The commission's action regarding the public resource of the anchovy schools came only after routines of bureaucratic drama. In 1955, the commission refused to grant reduction permits, and regularly during the early 1960s it denied such requests. In 1965, the canners and their allies turned to the legislature, which passed a bill ordering the commission to grant permits to take 115,000 tons of anchovies for reduction. While the bill lay on his desk, Governor Edmund Brown received sixteen letters favoring it and 214 opposing it, including an official letter from the city of Long Beach. The Governor vetoed the bill, saying that it was perhaps unconstitutional and that management of the anchovy would best be done by the commission, under existing laws, working on a long-range scientific basis. He added that he thought the legislative act was a mandate to grant reduction permits.

Homer

The commission then drew up proposed regulation for the "pilot program" and announced a public hearing in Los Angeles. Again a heavy mail came in, largely against the whole proposal. The Los Angeles Times, which seems more and more to become a quasi-public institution, editorialized in support of live-bait fishing and recreation.

The hearing on October 1 drew a talkative crowd of several hundred who heard thirty-three persons oppose the plan for reduction and three speak for it. Individual sports fishermen, owners of live-bait boats, and spokesmen for California Wildlife Federation, Ocean Fish Protective Association and Southern California Sports Council stressed the importance of anchovies as a major food supply for sports fish, the growing scarcity already of anchovies off the coast, the incomplete official knowledge of anchovy migrations and populations, and the threat to the recreation of thousands of persons, and to the jobs and incomes of live-bait suppliers and the makers and retailers of fishing tackle and equipment. Sea and seaside recreations are more characteristic of Southern California than commercial fishing.

There was testimony that live-bait boats were having to range

---

Richard G. Lillard, author of Desert Challenge: An Interpretation of Nevada and The Great Forest (both Knopf), is a professor of English at California State College (Los Angeles). Mr. Lillard is now completing Eden in Jeopardy, concerning the major changes which have occurred in Southern California since 1900, to be published by Knopf this fall.

farther and farther offshore to catch anchovies, that Mexico was starting to catch 40 tons a day off Ensenada for human food, and that anchovies were becoming scarce off the coasts of Peru and Chile. One bait-boat operator said that for California to allow about 1,000 tons a day for about 106 fishing days was not a pilot program. "It is big stuff." An individual fisherman brought on thumping applause and a severe call for order from the chairman when he shouted blame at "fast-buck men" who want dollars now with no regard for fish or other men. "We wrote letters and Brown vetoed. Now we have to do the whole thing all over again. It is just another grab and you men on the commission know it."

The fluent spokesman for the California Grain and Feed Association, representing 500 members who use fish meal for the big poultry and egg industry, pointed out that the cost of local fish meal (at $180 a ton) compared with the rising cost of Peruvian or Chilean meal (at $200) was clearly a factor in the chicken industry, as in the general cost of living. His figures drew no applause.

The commission members, caught between the poles of their task—regulating commerce and protecting recreation — adjourned to ponder and weigh the pressures. It was not a simple matter of "the people" versus business, because there were business interests on both sides. After a few weeks, the commissioners authorized the 75,000-ton program. Politically, the canners had won the round, though economic gains were slow to appear. (By the end of January, 1966, the new anchovy reduction business had landed only around 1,800 tons, owing to problems of prices and of redesigning fishing gear.) The recreational interests have continued to mutter and agitate. Feelings are strong, and the match is not over. Will the anchovy go the way of the sea-faring Chumash Indians, the sea otter, the sperm whale herds, the abalone, the Pismo clam and the Pacific sardine?

A speaker at the October hearing remembered with allowable hyperbole how "in 1937 the sardines were so thick at sea that you could get out and walk on them." Now they were gone. One of the fourteen different mimeographed handouts at the same meeting proposed a moratorium on the catching of sardines in California—which remains a proposal only. During the period 1934-45 the California commercial catch of sardines exceeded 500,000 tons each year, but a steady decline since 1951 has led to fewer than 7,000 tons in 1964-65 and under 1,000 tons—the lowest ever—in 1965-66. No "inexhaustible" natural resource better illustrates the speed-up of technological skill and the power of multiplying mankind to use things up. None better justifies the bill for Ecological Research and Surveys that Senator Nelson of Wisconsin gave the Senate last year. Sportsmen and conservationists are well aware of what happened to the sardine. They are determined that the anchovy shall escape the same fate.

When the sardines started to disappear, the fleets turned to four species of tuna, especially yellowfin, and began to fish them out. Now in 1966, tuna, too, are proving hard to find. Though California ranks ahead even of Alaska to lead all the states in the value of its annual catch of fish (and the value goes up with the years), the annual tonnage has been declining for exactly three decades.

So far there have been no loud alarms as to the fate of local fresh fish such as sole or the halibut that is caught in the Santa Barbara Channel, or for the white sea bass or the cigar-shaped yellowtail barracuda. But more and more the fish caught are juveniles rather than adults. And shellfish, helplessly sedentary as adults, are in serious trouble. An example is the smooth chione or mud cockle, very tasty, much sought at low tide in what sloughs are not yet filled in for subdivisions or dredged out for marinas. Abalones are so overharvested that low tide Channel Islands divers have been going down 100 feet.

Depredation on the continental shelf is accompanied by pollution on a massive scale. The sewage lines that coastal cities send to the sea from San Diego Bay to Santa Monica Bay are the largest perennial streams in the known history of the region. These richly organic rivers, some with raw, untreated sewage, all of them loaded with chemical products of a prosperous and heavy-eating civilization, spread out in "sewage fields" which fertilize increased numbers of photoplankton that in turn engender reddish and amber-colored seascapes, the "red tides" of photoplankton "bloom" that worry boosters and appall sensitive swimmers. The submarine mesas of solid sewage, together with loads of industrial waste dumped from barges, deplete the oxygen content of the water so that the fish depart and the giant seaweeds, natural lurking areas for game fish, die out. Man's wastes also supply acids that attack the shells of abalones and clams, opening them to infections, and further kill back the canopies of kelp. Sea urchins best survive, though in stunted form.

Below sea level and ordinary eye view, man is creating almost fishless deserts, and even these he is littering. For one fish-and-game solution to the problem of attracting the fish back to depleted and corrupted waters is to provide shelters, artificial caves and reefs or mounds of junked automobiles, scrapped refrigerators and obsolete streetcars.

Man's "improvements" of the shore line — breakwaters, jetties, harbors, marinas, steam plants, industrial and military installations—have all in one way or another adversely affected the biology of the sea. The anchovy again serves as an example. After 1929, the new breakwater at Santa Barbara, meant to promote yachting and boating, began to accumulate sand, building up many acres of unneeded beach and turning the harbor into a lethal cul-de-sac for anchovies. Each summer, preying fish crowded them into the warmish dead water where they died by the thousands.

And every summer for more than a decade millions of anchovies have died uselessly in Los Angeles harbor, where they have supported a $2 million live-bait business that in turn supported half of California's sports fishing. The cause is the legal wastes from major oil refineries, chemical plants and soap companies—part of the potent industrial complex that makes the Los Angeles-Long Beach harbor area a top American port. In the rainless summer months, industrial wastes give Dominquez Channel its only flow, 30,000 gallons a minute (more than any natural Southern California stream now gives to the sea in summer), turning it into an open, somewhat colorful, industrial sewer. Reacting with harbor water, the chemicals absorb its oxygen. The anchovies then suffocate and turn belly up to the beaks of birds. A blue-gray sludge of H_2S remains to stain the hulls of the world's commerce.

At the Top of the Voice

MAYAKOVSKY. Translated and edited by Herbert Marshall. Introduction by Sir Maurice Bowra. Hill and Wang. 432 pp. $10.

THE POETRY OF YEVGENY YEVTUSHENKO: 1953 to 1965. Translated, with an introduction by George Reavey. October House. Bilingual edition. 215 pp. $6.50. $2.95 paper.

Margaret Dalton

"The new young Mayakovsky of today," says Herbert Marshall of Yevgeny Yevtushenko. And there is indeed some parallel between the personalities and works of these two poets. If Mayakovsky was the poet of the Revolution, Yevtushenko occupies a similar position in the post-Stalin thaw. Something of Mayakovsky's personal dynamism and public appeal is present, though to a weaker degree, in Yevtushenko. In tone, language and form, Yevtushenko is at times very close to Mayakovsky. This is especially the case in his rhetorical poetry, declaimed "at the top of the voice" and addressed to the masses rather than to the "chosen few." These lines by Yevtushenko could easily be mistaken for Mayakovsky's:

The music of revolution gives cold shivers to many.
Somewhere, beyond the sea, chandeliers nervously shake in halls . . .
("The Mozarts of Revolution")

Like Mayakovsky, Yevtushenko is primarily a "civic" poet (though not to the exclusion of personal, lyric poetry), involved in contemporary issues and committed to the ideology of the Communist regime. Yet the dissimilarities which become apparent at closer scrutiny — caused by different political and intellectual climates and by differing poetical personalities — may possibly be more fundamental and decisive than are the points of contact. The revolutionary and post-revolutionary periods in which Mayakovsky was active were characterized by material deprivation and cruelty, but also by creative freedom and enthusiasm. Mayakovsky and his "co-Futurists" fervently believed that they were creating new art for a new and better society. Disappointment set in only later. Mayakovsky himself, one of the loudest, most grandiose and egocentric personalities in Russian literature, was eminently fit to represent this period in all its glory and excesses. None of this ebullient optimism was present in the fifties, the starting point for Yevtushenko's poetry. Despite the thaw, the memories of the terror of the thirties and the privations of one of the most devastating wars in Russian history were still vivid. Yevtushenko is representative of those young poets who were slowly groping their way toward more individual and less prescribed art; but they were hardly daring innovators: they looked back to poets like Mayakovsky, just as they looked back to the Revolution as a distant ideal which had been darkened and corrupted.

Compared to Mayakovsky, Yevtushenko is more restrained, more narrow in his emotional scale and, possibly, more lyrical. Although he will avoid the "lapses" and vulgarity of Mayakovsky, his tendency at overt moralizing strikes at times an unpleasantly pedantic note as compared to Mayakovsky's expansiveness. Despite the fact that Yevtushenko is still developing, it seems fairly certain that he will never approach the linguistic genius and emotional élan of Mayakovsky—just as the present cannot bear comparison to the tempestuous days of the twenties.

Mr. Marshall's large book on Mayakovsky presents an interesting collection of varied materials. The preface by Sir Maurice Bowra is followed by an introductory article on Mayakovsky and his poetry by Mr. Marshall, as well as a detailed chronology of Mayakovsky's life. The main part of the volume is devoted to Mayakovsky's poetry, supplied with commentaries by Mr. Marshall. Two appendixes present memoirs of Mayakovsky by contemporaries and poetic references to him by other poets (Pasternak, Aseyev, Akhmatova and Yevtushenko). The text is interspersed with photographs of Mayakovsky, reproductions of his paintings and caricatures, photomontages, and copies of some of the modernistic covers used for his poems. The visual impact of the book is impressive indeed.

In his selection of Mayakovsky's poetry, Mr. Marshall is, however, somewhat less successful. He seems to favor the post-revolutionary work of Mayakovsky, which was approved by Stalin, over his pre-revolutionary poems, which interested Pasternak. Only four short poems and the long poem, "A Cloud in Trousers," representative of the early Mayakovsky, are included in the volume. In his choice of post-revolutionary poetry Mr. Marshall presents some of the most unimaginative and dull political pieces Mayakovsky wrote, such as "Vladimir Ilyich Lenin," "The Fifth International" and anti-religious "agit-poems." One of the few exceptions to the monotony of the selection is the long poem "About This" — translated for the first time into English and championed with justifiable enthusiasm by Mr. Marshall — a sophisticated and interesting work of the early twenties.

Mayakovsky is, admittedly, a very difficult poet because of the complex metaphors which are central to his poetry, the neologisms and the rhymes (the latter often built on word play). It is impossible to reproduce all these features in a translation without sacrifice. The least objectionable sacrifice in the case of Mayakovsky is rhyme, since his use of rhyme is highly irregular and without the importance that it has in more conventional poetry. Mr. Marshall, however, with admirable audacity, attempts to reproduce all of Mayakovsky's poetic intricacies, including his rhyme. The result is neither accurate nor felicitous.

It is impossible to present in a short review the innumerable inaccuracies of Mr. Marshall's translation. They range from "poetic license" to outright mistakes. Mr. Marshall mercilessly inverts and distorts Mayakovsky's word and syntactic order (and thereby very often Mayakovsky's metaphors — to a point where they become completely unintelligible in English); he changes gender, number, omits or adds pronouns and adjectives, and even adds expressions that cannot be found in the original. A simple line such as "How did your Olga say it?" (in the poem "Jubilee" where Mayakovsky makes reference to Push-kin's Yevgeny Onegin) comes out in Mr. Marshall's translation as: "Now who was it said — your Olga, I think?" It may be added that Mr. Marshall's verbosity here is not conditioned by Mayakovsky's metrical pattern, since he does not follow it. It is utterly unclear to the present reviewer why, for example, Mayakovsky's line "a horse fell" (in the poem "A Human Attitude to Horses") is rendered by Mr. Marshall as "a horse is on its arse," just as the comparison of a lighted advertisement to the "biblical Nebuchadnezzar" (in the poem "Jubilee") has Mr. Marshall's embellishment "Nebuchadnezzar on all four eats"?

---

Margaret Dalton teaches in the Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures at Brown University.

Among other obvious mistakes are the translation of a corn merchant (labaznik) as a "parasite," of the slang word for face (murlo) as the verb "purred," of the phrase, "burning beyond the mountains" as "burning beyond sorrow" (confusion of the words gora (mountain) and gore (sorrow), of the poet "calloused from tramping" as "calloused from fermentation," etc. Some of the most crucial lines in the poem "To Yesenin" are rendered beyond recognition.

Apparently, Mr. Marshall's admiration for Mayakovsky ("the greatest poet of the Socialist epoch") makes him incapable of injecting any criticism into his commentaries (and certainly Mayakovsky has weaknesses); Mr. Marshall's remarks are in the vein of the uniformly laudatory tone found in most standard Soviet editions of Mayakovsky.

Despite the popularity and interest which Yevtushenko has aroused in the West in recent years, translations of his poems have appeared sporadically and in small numbers. George Reavey's collection and translation of fifty-four of Yevtushenko's poems must therefore be regarded as a valuable contribution to the study of this young Soviet poet who has aroused considerable controversy at home and abroad. Mr. Reavey prefaces his book with a perceptive commentary on the political atmosphere that has shaped and continues to influence the poet, as well as a general outline of Yevtushenko's background and eventful life.

The poetry is divided into three major chronological groups, with the majority of poems belonging to the earlier period, before the official reprimand issued to Yevtushenko in 1963. Despite the inclusion of such famous political poems as "Babii Yar" and "The Heirs of Stalin," the overall tone of the volume is that of personal, and intimate poetry ("You Are Big in Love," "A Scent of Brine," "To My Dog"). It is no doubt because of this emphasis on Yevtushenko's "lyrical" side that Mr. Reavey excluded from the collection Yevtushenko's Cuban poems published in the second part of "Tenderness."

Reavey's selection is interesting, and shows the various aspects of Yevtushenko; poems of questioning self-examination alternate with "civic," moralizing poetry, travel impressions of the West, and semi-philosophical reflections, illustrating Yevtushenko's turn toward richer poetic forms, deeper and more complex thought, and less glib self-assertion. It will be most interesting to watch his further development.

The setting of the original text of the poems opposite the English translation is very welcome to Russian and non-Russian readers. The translations aim at a maximum of precision and are, in general, extremely good. There are only a few mistakes, for example, svet chopornyi should read "pompous society," and pust' dni prevratnosti tajat should be translated as "what if the days conceal inconstancy." However, these are completely outweighed by the general excellence and sensitivity with which Mr. Reavey has mastered his difficult task.

Before the Great Barbecue

CARPETBAGGER'S CRUSADE: The Life of Albion Winegar Tourgée. By Otto H. Olsen. The Johns Hopkins Press. 395 pp. $7.95.

Allen Guttmann

Albion Tourgée, to a greater degree than his more famous contemporary, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, failed mawkishly when he attempted to delineate the 19th century's idea of the Good and succeeded grimly when he dramatized what he knew of Evil. In the starkest episode of Tourgée's novel, A Fool's Errand (1879), the carpetbagger hero finds the lynched body of his most loyal Negro ally. Unconcerned whites attend a nearby church:

> The wind turned [the body] slowly to and fro. The snowy hair and beard contrasted strangely with the dusky pallor of the peaceful face, which seemed even in death to proffer a benison to the people of God who passed . . . from the house of prayer, unmindful both of the peace which lighted the dead face, and of the rifled temple of the Holy Ghost which appealed to them for sepulture. Over all pulsed the sacred echo of the sabbath bells. The sun shone brightly. The wind rustled the autumn leaves. A few idlers sat upon the steps of the court-house, and gazed carelessly at the ghastly burden on the oak. The brightly-dressed church-goers enlivened the streets. Not a colored man was to be seen.

The scene, irony and all, seems as authentic as the horseback dashes of the hero's love-struck daughter do not. The scene is based on the murder of a Negro leader, a friend of Tourgée, whom the Ku Klux Klan had hanged from the branch of an oak less than 100 feet from the Alamance County Courthouse. Similarly, the grotesque death of John Walters, in the novel, is a fictive parallel to the murder, in Caswell County, of a Republican state Senator who was strangled and stabbed to death in the courthouse itself—by the most prominent citizens of the county. Comfort Servosse, the fool whose errand it was to contest injustice in "reconstructed" North Carolina, is clearly drawn from Tourgée himself. The novel is its author's testimonial to fourteen years of vain struggle against control of the defeated South by the very men who led the South to defeat.

A new edition of A Fool's Errand appeared in 1961, with an introduction by John Hope Franklin. Otto H. Olsen's full-length biography of Tourgée, dedicated, informed and wholly praiseworthy, recovers for us the embattled man — quarrelsome, tactless, conceited, obdurate, courageous, and absolutely right "to battle a monstrous evil that almost an entire civilization either endorsed or did not care or dare to defy."

Assured by Provisional Governor William H. Holden that Yankees who moved to North Carolina could expect "every favor" from the people and from the laws of the state, Tourgée, an injured veteran of the 105th Ohio Infantry, established himself in the fall of 1865 on the outskirts of Greensboro. Naively hoping to recover his health and to prosper materially, he quickly

---

Allen Guttmann is the author of The Wound in the Heart: America and the Spanish Civil War (The Free Press), and has written many essays on American literature and politics.

learned that the uppity Negro was not fully accepted in Guilford County. Neither was the white man, Yankee or native born, who thought the Emancipation Proclamation meant an end to servitude.

Governor Holden, a moderate, was defeated in the fall of 1865 by white-supremacy Conservatives. In 1866, the Conservative legislature rejected the 14th Amendment and brought down upon itself, as Tourgée had warned, the Reconstruction Acts of 1867, enforced by federal troops. Elections were held for a constitutional convention. Republicans dominated, largely because Negro voters were "unwilling to believe that those who opposed emancipation, denounced the Freedmen's Bureau, and resented equality were their best friends." Conservatives jeered at the "Gorilla Convention," "Nigger Convention," "Bones and Banjo Convention." (Seventy-four of the 107 Republicans were white Southerners, only fifteen were Negroes.) Tourgée, a leader in the convention and a major influence on the new constitution, was singled out in the newspapers for special abuse: the educated elite referred to the convention of "Baboons, Monkeys, Mules, Tourgée and other Jackasses." Undaunted, Tourgée served on a three-man committee to revise the legal code and went on to win a seat on the Superior Court for the 7th Judicial District.

Judge Tourgée found his troubles increased. The K.K.K. terrorized the district with the approval of the Conservatives. "Police officials belonged to the Klan, its members sat on juries to obstruct indictment or conviction, and mysterious altered words nullified indictments." The dilemma seems depressingly familiar. Negroes suffered heavy penalties for petty offenses and Judge Tourgée was assailed as the creator of disorder. Governor Holden, who had recovered office in 1868, was impeached and found guilty by a Conservative legislature that insured a conviction by ejecting Republicans from the hall. Unionists were slandered, threatened with death, driven from their homes, murdered and further vilified in their graves. These events Southern historians of fifty years ago glorified as "Redemption." The election of 1875, stolen by the Conservatives (who now resumed the title "Democrats"), was a prologue to the national election of 1876, when the North ended Reconstruction to glut itself undisturbed at the "great barbecue" of industrial capitalism.

Tourgée lost his judgeship in 1876, remained in the South three more years as pension agent in Raleigh, and left for good in 1879, the year he published A Fool's Errand. Seventeen years later, after a career in literature and in reform journalism, Tourgée contributed importantly to the last-ditch legal fight against complete segregation. He wrote one of the plaintiff's briefs in Plessy v. Ferguson, a brief whose forceful demonstration of the inherent inequality of racial discrimination was accepted after fifty-eight years, in the anti-segregationist decision of Brown v. Board of Education.

But Tourgée would have been among the first gloomily to insist, in 1954, that the Supreme Court's decision was not enough. At the end of A Fool's Errand, Comfort Servosse argues that North and South represent "two distinct, hostile, and irreconcilable ideas." Only Northern power can destroy the "demon" of racism. "If done at all, it must be done by the North—by the Nation, moved, integrated, and controlled by the North, I mean—in its own self-defense. It must be an act of sovereignty, an exercise of power." Tourgée was right, but perhaps too pessimistic. A new generation of "fools" and the exercise of federal power have brought us a little closer to the point Tourgée thought we had reached when he wrote Governor Holden about prospects in the South.

In the Non-Establishment Manner

MY ESCAPE FROM THE CIA (and Other Improbable Events). By Hughes Rudd. E. P. Dutton & Co. 253 pp. $4.95.

James P. Degnan

Technically, the best story in Hughes Rudd's first book of short stories is "The Fishers: 1932." Dramatizing the financial and moral problems of a family of Texas poor whites during the depression, the story is the kind of serious comedy that Faulkner and Flannery O'Connor did so brilliantly. When we finish reading "The Fishers: 1932," we not only know the comic-pathetic Mr. and Mrs. Fisher, small-town people one generation removed from the farm, Southern Baptists who've lost their religion, chronic sufferers from constipation whose only luxury is that they consume "surprising amounts of mineral oil from Sears Roebuck"; their ne'er-do-well son, Homer, a sinister type who looks like a "weasel in a tight, twelve dollar suit," who combs his hair with Crisco which "in the summer time started to run before he got to the car line," who works at the pool hall, dates unsavory girls, and who hates and is hated by his father; Homer's brother, Weldon, who because of the Fishers' "starchy 1932 diet," breaks wind at inopportune moments; and the townspeople who surround the Fishers; but we know a stratum of American society, and we know what it meant to be alive in the depression year of 1932. Mr. Rudd's story has the integrity and effect of visual art, of a Grant Wood painting or a Dorothea Lange photograph.

More interesting even than "The James P. Degnan, who teaches fiction writing at the University of Santa Clara, has written for The Atlantic Monthly, Commonweal, Ramparts and other publications. He is currently working on a novel, Memoirs of an Academic Tramp, a section of which will appear in an early issue of the Virginia Quarterly Review.

REMEMBRANCE Marc Sterling (Russia)

Original color lithograph by Marc Sterling, an outstanding Russian artist whose exhibitions are well known in Europe. The edition is limited to 180 impressions, each signed and numbered by the artist. Its colors are misty blues, yellows, greens, reds, beige. Mat size 20″ x 27″, picture 17½″ x 22½″. At $19, this original color lithograph is an exceptional value (comparable works widely sell from $50 to $70 today in the U.S.). Orders will be filled while the edition lasts. Guaranteed refund. Order today from ART OF ALL NATIONS, INC., Studio 3, Harmon, New York 10520

To receive catalogs of original color lithographs and engravings, rare prints, etc., issued from time to time during year, send $1.

Fishers: 1932" are works like: "My Escape From the CIA"; "Mavis at the Beach"; "Nightwatch at Vernal Equinox"; and a nonfictive piece treated fictively, "The Death of William Faulkner." What's interesting about these works—especially the first two—is that they are genuine originals both in subject and in treatment. "The Fishers: 1932," despite its technical brilliance, falls into a category: it is Southern Gothic; one thinks of Faulkner, of Flannery O'Connor, of Carson McCullers; of academic criticism and academic quarterlies; of university creative-writing classes and the well-made story; of Percy Lubbock and the old New Critics, and the artistic strictures of Henry James and Ford Madox Ford. It is, briefly, a story of the Establishment; that it first appeared in The Paris Review is appropriate.

Definitely non-Establishment, however, are the other works I've mentioned. They are utterly unpretentious and show the hand of a sensitive and intelligent reporter (Mr. Rudd is C.B.S. correspondent in Moscow). But more than an apparent indifference toward conventional fictive strictures and techniques, what makes these stories interesting and original is that they introduce a new voice, a new attitude toward experience, into contemporary American fiction. It is a voice which is anathema to the Establishment of the Right—the academic quarterlies and The New Yorker—and to the Left—the Evergreen people, the Beats and the Black Humorists. It is, in many ways a voice nearer to the early Kingsley Amis, the Amis of Lucky Jim, than to any recent American writer of talent. It is a resolutely middle-class voice, a deeply personal, healthy, decent, common-sensical, unmistakably masculine voice; a gentle and tolerant voice, yet a voice driven to comic, exasperated rage in the presence of phoniness. It is a voice that prefers the present to the past, democracy to monarchy, the rational to the mystical, the normal to the eccentric, the middle class to the aristocracy. It is a voice much more in tune with George Orwell or Bernard Shaw or the logical positivists than with Henry James or Virginia Woolf or the existentialists. It is, briefly, the voice of America's Angry Young Man, a character who has been around a long time but who has made no significant appearance in American fiction.

Like England's Angry Young Man, like Amis' Lucky Jim Dixon, whose dilemma is that he is unclassed, wandering between two worlds (he can't return to his working-class origins nor can he honestly adopt the attitudes and manners of the upper-middle class to which his government-sponsored education has admitted him), so also, America's Angry Young Man, Mr. Rudd's hero in such stories as "My Escape from the CIA" and "Mavis at the Beach," faces an analogous dilemma that presents itself in the question: How do I find a home between IBM and Berkeley—the beat as well as the academic worlds of Berkeley? How do I avoid becoming either the Organization Man or the Beat and/or Academic Man? How do I avoid living a life of no protest or a life of constant, meaningless protest? How, in short, do I preserve my identity against suffocating conformity on the one hand, and insane individualism on the other? Unable to answer these questions, Mr. Rudd's hero solves his problem momentarily by going to graduate school. Graduate school, particularly for the unemployable humanities student, is a limbo, a world of non-choice, a last psychic rest stop before the awful choice must be made. And Mr. Rudd does a fine job of describing this experience.

In "Mavis at the Beach," Mr. Rudd satirizes academic eccentrics and the Beats who inhabit Perry Lane back of Stanford University. But the story also subtly raises the question of whether the world of the eccentrics and the Beats isn't really morally preferable to that of the Squares. The story is very funny and very fast, considering the ground it covers. "My Escape from the CIA," told from the point of view of a Stanford graduate student who has somehow managed to steal Allen Tate's tweed cap, is equally so.

Perhaps the least satisfying of Mr. Rudd's collection are his war stories. At their worst, "Motto for a Wall," for instance, they are bad Hemingway; at their best, such as "The Man on the Trestle" and "The Lower Room," they are full of the clichés of military fiction—clichés of thought and attitude rather than of writing. "The Lower Room" is full of the predictable cynicism and surrealistic horror humor that make Joseph Heller's Catch-22 such an awful bore. "The Lower Room" may have won a Paris Review award and it may be, in the New Critical cliché, "crafted"; John Crowe Ransom might even like it. But it lacks that original and interesting voice, that unique comic voice which is Hughes Rudd's real and formidable talent.

FOR THE GREAT THRILL

Obtain a copy of

THE MARQUIS DE SADE'S

120 DAYS OF SODOM

If your bookseller is sold out, send $12.50, the price, to BOOK AWARDS, Dept. N, 458 Broadway, N.Y. 10013, and it will go to you postpaid.

COMMENTARY*
* WORLD'S BEST ?
SEE FOR YOURSELF

TRIAL 8-MONTH Subscription $3.87 (Reg. $8./year) Outside USA—add $1.

COMMENTARY, NA-2
165 East 56 St., N.Y., N.Y.
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name ....
Address ....
City/State ....
New Subscribers Only

Troublesome Comfort

G. B. SHAW: A Collection of Critical Essays. Edited by R. J. Kaufmann. Prentice-Hall. 182 pp. $3.95. Paper $1.95.

Laurence Goldstein

Time has treated George Bernard Shaw—rebel, prophet and gadfly—with the humiliating deference to which fame is subjected once the artist and his art are blurred into respectable harmony. Shaw still commands attention; but it is from a world very different from the one he debated, beguiled, taunted and lectured during his garrulous lifetime. There have been at least five books about Shaw published last year, in addition to the widely publicized first volume of his collected letters. In a New York off-Broadway theatre, the playwright as Presence was recently re-created nightly. And, of course, there are the countless university and community theatre productions of his plays.

Thus it comes as no surprise that Prof. Maynard Mack's scholarly "Twentieth Century Views" series finally addresses itself to a study of Shaw. In this short but remarkably diversified collection of fourteen essays, edited by R. J. Kaufmann, an attempt is made "to set Shaw free from the bonds of misunderstanding" by employing a wide critical prism with which to isolate, refract and illuminate the Shavian art. Beginning with a panegyric from a young Bertolt Brecht, it ranges through such diverse approaches as psychiatrist Erik Erikson's analysis of the familial environment on the Shavian talent and through Richard Ohmann's use of linguistic analysis to define the roots of Shaw's style. We are exposed to an astonishingly wide variety of critical skills. Theatre critics Eric Bentley and Robert Brustein share space with 19th-century scholar Louis Crompton, Elizabethan scholar G. Wilson Knight, and Shavian scholar Irving Fiske. Close textual analyses of Shaw's plays are set against studies of the themes, images and conceptions which thread the entire canon of his work.

---

Laurence Goldstein is assignment editor for U.P.I. Newsfilm and a free-lance film writer. He produced Calderon's Life Is A Dream in New York.

Norbert O'Donnell describes Shaw's genius as a tragicomedian in terms of the struggle of wills among Shaw's characters when opposed to the social problems which transcend the individual will. G. Wilson Knight illustrates the theme of bisexuality in Shaw's plays to illuminate Shaw's concern for man's wholeness of being. Bruce R. Park writes a detailed criticism of the critics of Shaw.

Each of the essays is written with an intelligent individuality which heightens both one's appreciation of Shaw as an artist and the critics' keenly fashioned analytical tools. Taken together they do as much to dramatize the techniques of modern criticism as to yield new insights into the Shavian talent. Yet the essays as a group fail to generate excitement. For all the scholarship, perception and critical imagination employed by the writers in this collection, Shaw is curiously deprived of the very strength which welded him to the early 20th-century imagination. Shaw, who dramatized the world as his personal opponent and then engaged it in vigorous debate, is relegated to the musty apotheosis of genius and judged from within the awesome shadow of his work.

With the exception of Robert Brustein's excellent essay, "George Bernard Shaw: The Face Behind the Mask," no notice is taken of the relevance Shaw's revolt holds for a world in which the Victorian tradition he attacked has vanished, and the majority of his social reforms have been assimilated into the vulgarities of everyday existence. Brustein perceptively points out that while "Shaw's messianic philosophy has alienated him from us; the myths of Shavianism neither console nor convince; . . . and his own illusions seem just as pronounced as the ones he sets out to expose . . . his works written to 'influence public opinion' are usually too complicated to evoke a simple response, for like the plays of all the better rebel dramatists, they involve the author's revolt in a shifting dialectic of attitudes."

While Shaw's genius rendered art out of protest, his strength is derived from his commitment to that protest. When the assumptions of his society are stretched upon his stage and house the world of his characters, the action draws its meaning from the total involvement of the characters with the fabric of that world. His men and women collide constantly with the overstuffed social and moral furniture with which they must contend. And if their falls amuse us, we are never allowed to forget for long that the props have been set by hands similar to the ones that have upholstered the seats from which we watch.

Shavian characters need a world of public conventions to sharpen the thrust of their individuality. They are skillfully placed within a fixed universe, and define that universe by moving in ways contrary to its laws. The more retrograde their actions, the brighter they shine and the more light they cast upon the world that spawned them. Saint Joan puts the torch to the practical pieties of her world and the limits of that world are exposed in the conflagration. Jack Tanner ro-

READ

STAUGHTON LYND

WHAT SHOULD THE U.S. DO IN VIETNAM?

A report of his recent peace mission to Hanoi, Peking and Moscow in the February LIBERATION

(TOM HAYDEN, former President of Students for a Democratic Society and like Lynd an Associate Editor of LIBERATION, will make his report in the March issue.)

Also in February •
AMERICAN ATROCITIES IN VIETNAM • ERIC NORDEN
POLITICS AND MORAL DISASTER • DAVE DELLINGER
WHAT DOES UNCONDITIONAL MEAN? • SIDNEY LENS
S.N.C.C.'S NEW BEGINNING • JONATHAN STEINBERG
ARTHUR WASKOW and C. E. WILSON on SOUTH AFRICA
A. J. MUSTE • GUNTHER ANDERS • EDWARD RICHER

"Liberation represents a point of view that is unique in New York journalism: anti-war, pro-Civil Rights and shrewdly and radically critical of current politics and official policies." Edmund Wilson

"Experience teaches that what Liberation writes about today will preoccupy the public mind tomorrow, perhaps when it is too late to do very much about it." Robert Hutchins

56 pages 75 cents $5 a year

The monthly of nonviolent revolution

LIBERATION
5 Beekman Street
New York, N.Y. 10038

☐ Enclosed is $5.00 for a year's subscription to LIBERATION, plus a FREE COPY of the special February issue with Professor Lynd's report.
☐ Enclosed is 75 cents for a copy of the special February issue.

Name ....
Address ....
City.......................... State............ ZIP..........

mantically assaults his world under the joyous banner of the Life Force, Idealism exuberantly challenging Convention, and the limits of both (and the possibilities of each) are exposed in the gentle, mocking humor. Major Barbara wars against the barbarities of Capitalism and is defeated, not because her cause is unjust, but because her response is inadequate to the complexities of her world. In each of the plays the assumptions of a world are being challenged and the possibilities for action within that world explored. It is the drama of that exploration, that determined need to cut across the grain in order to know the depth, that keeps the Shavian world continually relevant to our own.

At a time in which many of our writers have been moved to express their disenchantment with our society, most have sought a forum beyond the scope of their art. The inability to reconcile the vigor of their polemics with the vitality of their art has made petitioners of our writers. The psyche and the society in which its troubled presence exists are alien to each other. Satire becomes increasingly difficult as the values of our society become increasingly irrelevant to its aspirations. Too many Americans want to remain fully attached to our society and still maintain their integrity with a little social protest. No one challenges the system any longer. It is difficult to do so when public rhetoric has pre-empted the language of social reform. Universal welfare, suffrage and equality are the shibboleths under which we are ruled. To feel alien to a society that offers so much and demands so little makes malcontents of us all and reduces protest to cranky discontent.

Not long ago, finding a cause in our time seemed to take as much energy as pursuing it in any other. Now, when one is found, it becomes so fashionable so quickly that it requires more courage to oppose than to pursue it. Scorn has become a terribly old-fashioned emotion, and the words left to express our discontent have become increasingly strident. As the notion of consensus becomes less appealing, its democratic vocabulary becomes more inclusive. The more we resist, the less relevant language we have with which to resist.

In this world in which the writer's light is refined into a surgical beam while his cries are heard in the darkness beyond, it becomes an increasingly desperate pleasure to see the enemy and to be able to name him. George Bernard Shaw is still a comfort to trouble us.

THEATRE

Lloyd Zimpel

SURPRISE IN THE WINGS

In the seven years since it was formed, the San Francisco Mime Troupe waged "guerrilla theatre" against "the common enemy—cultural stupefaction" with little headway. Then last summer it brought forth A Minstrel Show, or Civil Rights in a Cracker Barrel, and scored a definite victory. A few months later, however, adherents to the cause of stupefaction celebrated a coup of their own when the Troupe's founder and director, R. G. Davis, was convicted for defiantly staging a show in a public park after his permit to do so had been revoked. Or so read the charge. According to the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, which is appealing Davis' thirty-day suspended jail sentence and one-year probation, the issue really goes to such matters as violation of the First Amendment and the exercise of "prior censorship," since the permit was lifted only because park commission officials deemed the play (Il Candelaio, by the 16th-century Italian philosopher, Giordano Bruno) "indecent, obscene and offensive."

This kind of hassle — along with such accompanying distractions as having the police tape performances, vague offical warnings to prospective Troupe sponsors, and the amused mocking of the newspapers—seeks out the Mime Troupe as certainly as foundation grants find their way to other companies. To be sure, the Troupe has not tried to avoid it. Davis insists on a "radical, independent, chaotic, anarchic" theatre, one approached by its creators, as he wrote recently in Studies on the Left, "sans pre-conceived notions about the result." After the creation is completed "we see who we are and what we have done." That nervy principle gives the Troupe's audiences a frequent sense of surprise waiting in the wings, an expectation further justified by the director's admission that his selection in actors runs to "the emotionally disturbed, the violent ones, the fallen away Catholics, the non-Jewish Jews, the deviates," rather than those of organization-theatre training. Part of Davis' own training came from the Actor's Workshop under Herbert Blau and Jules Irving.

However anarchic the Troupe's intention, some sound accomplishments have resulted, from the classical mime which occupied the company in its first years, to happenings or "events," to Commedia dell' Arte performed free in the city parks: Tartuffe, The Dowry, Il Candelaio, which last the Troupe persisted in putting on, with no further official harassment, even after Davis' arrest.

In the three years since it began indoor theatre with Jarry's Ubu Roi, the Troupe has ventured to couple Brecht's The Exception and the Rule, first with an anti-Administration talk on Vietnam by writer Robert Scheer, and then with Beckett's Act Without Words II; and to join Ghelderode's Chronicles of Hell with a poetry reading by Lawrence Ferlinghetti. The plays have properly been admired, with praise for the imaginative, disciplined direction.

In those same three years the Lloyd Zimpel has contributed to The Chicago Review, The Massachusetts Review, The Carleton Miscellany and other periodicals.

WHY DON'T YOU WRITE?

EARN EXTRA MONEY IN SPARETIME writing short stories, articles on business, travel, hobbies, local, club and church activities. Under the guidance of professional writer-editors, you learn by writing at home through the fascinating NIA Copy Desk Method. FREE "Writing Aptitude Test" tells whether you have qualities to become a successful writer. Write TODAY. No obligation. No salesman. 41st Yr. Lic. by N.Y. State. Acc'd't Member NHSC

NIA
WRITERS INSTITUTE DIVISION
Newspaper Institute of America
Suite 5196-C, Two Park Ave., N.Y. 10036

SUMMERLANE CAMP

in the tradition of

The Little Commonwealth
Summerhill

The Gorky Colony

Continuing an exploration of the boundaries of freedom in democracy; seeking to teach that love is something more than need; that work and creativity are inseparable.

■

Now in our 4th summer
Boys and Girls, Ages 5-19

●

BUCKBROOK FARM
North Branch 10, N.Y.

Night

Now the burghers are locked in bed,
Day's receipts dreaming in the safe,
Their lamps gone out like sleeping birds,
The mattress springs sighing like leaves
Under the wind of their meat;

Now the night has moored in the street
And yaws against the houses and
The dogs sniff about its freight,
Paw the ground without end,
As if its wake were a spoor, the night;

Now that lovers in their cars
Have followed darkness to the bitter
End of the street and into squares
Where their flesh has become another matter,
Like empty department stores;

Now that witches and the cauldron too
Have burned off with their fire
And left a homey stew
That sputters on, they sighing
Like mothers, wives, sirens of the flue

And Circes of the hearth;
Now that my son turned all
Upon himself has become a star
Merrily burning with vegetable
Serenity like a good cigar;

Now let my insomnias arise and litter
Down white blizzards on the tenement blocks,
Softly storm the cracker-box silhouettes,
Whirl on till the street's lone walker stops
And laughs, surprised by dancing letters.

Irving Feldman

Troupe achieved tentative official endorsement via a $1,000 annual stipend from the city's "hotel tax" (a bountiful resource once promised for support of cultural enterprises—the San Francisco Opera still gets $110,000—but much of which now finances the setting of the bait for conventions and tourists). Davis' beef with the park commission, and some public grumbling over A Minstrel Show, make it doubtful that the city's benevolence will long continue.

The current Minstrel Show, coauthored by Davis and Saul Landau and headed this spring for off-Broadway production in New York, is doubtless the Troupe's most popular undertaking and probably its most successful all around. It has a seven-man cast—a minstrel line of six yuk-yuk-king, tambourine-banging white and Negro actors, all uniformly got up in blackface, baby-blue satin tails, white gloves and kinky-hair fright wigs; and a pompadoured, stuffed-shirt interlocutor, grandly played by Robert Slattery. Willie Hart, Jr., Malachi Spicer and Jason Marc-Alexander bring a zesty impudence to the line.

The show nods toward the traditional minstrelry of J. D. Rice, with a few broad darky jokes: "How long were you in Canada, Hokus?" "Same's here, Mr. Interlocutor—6 foot 3 inches." But such gags and one or two "beloved Stef-fan Foster melodies," outrageously burlesqued, are largely a means to get things energetically under way. The show quickly shifts into a series of sketches on concerns of the contemporary American Negro: the comparative merits of white and Negro policemen; "the Rev. Brother Luther Doctor Martin Junior King"; the Negro stud ("I'm all Africa!") and the white woman; lower-class vs. middle-class Negroes; Watts; some of the platitudes of Negro history (Crispus Attucks here is revealed as a terrified janitor shoved outside to protect the white folks when the redcoats started shooting).

The myths, fears and distortions—from both Negro and white viewpoints—surrounding such subjects are stripped away with varying degrees of satirical cleverness, insight and brash humor. And with frequent earthiness as well. The number of jests in one way or another involving male genitalia (suggesting the sexual background to the Negro-white condition, just as the repeated reference to janitors alludes to another, but less painfully examined, aspect of the problem) have stirred up considerable reaction. The Hearst Examiner editorialized on "smut . . . filth . . . bad theater and bad taste" and raised the possibility of "taxpayers" applying pressure to put the Troupe out of the theatre it borrows. And in his column in the same paper, Kenneth Rexroth warned of the dangers of "moral frivolity," and questioned how the course of history might have gone had Lenin ever shouted "Kerensky is a - - - - - !"

Included in the show—indeed, a high point of it—is a short film by Robert Nelson, O Dem Watermelons! In perfect thematic harmony to the live show, it reaches hilarious heights of irony when it persuades the audience to join the minstrels in singing a piece of Stepin Fetchit dialect as prelude to a ten-minute history of the oppression of the watermelon. The sad vegetable is kicked, stabbed, exploded, dropped, sawed, launched in a rocket, disemboweled, shot, and used to excite a young woman; but in the end, like a watermelon Keystone Kop, it pulls itself together and chases its tormentors into the distance.

Ultimately, A Minstrel Show allows the audience to celebrate its own

I WANT TO KNOW

How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out

If Russians Have Horns!

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. How it brings Americans of all ages and occupations to Russia for 3-week visits with counterparts. How it gives hospitality to Soviet visitors in U.S. And how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years.

NAME ____________________
ADDRESS ____________________
CITY ____________________
STATE __________ ZIP NO. ______

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10036

sophisticated racial attitudes, but at the cost of being drawn up short by uneasiness from time to time. And despite a Brotherhood Week pitch in the final moments when the minstrels elaborately remove their gloves to reveal the color of their skin (three are Negro, three white), the audience is not let off the hook entirely. At best it is left to ponder whether an institutionalized civil rights industry, relentlessly homogenizing, does right by the race issue when it obliterates from public consciousness whatever is vaguely grotesque or stereotyped in the style and spirit of any one race.

Even before the park-permit fight and the première of A Minstrel Show, the Mime Troupe was in the middle of the what's-really-happening-in-S. F. scene. Now a lot more people know it exists; some of them even attend performances. It is safe to say their mettle will again be tested by the Troupe's forthcoming production, Uncle Tom's Cabin.

A Farewell Picture

My eyes look their twinned corridor far, focus for a while, then lose again that year it snowed the picture of the world and radio clocks learned war by heart all night.

My father nailed only game with his rifle.
People, no; only the game — until that year mistakes came up his arm and shattered our snowflake faith's integrity.

Steady as ever was, but never again so clear, so eager to be blind —
I see again and again that great snowflake smash on my father's face like a valentine.

William Stafford

MUSIC

Benjamin Boretz

For all our self-conscious concern with the American past of contemporary American music, and with the heroism and originality of our lonely forerunners, our actual awareness of the musical identities of the composers and works that constitute this past was for a long time quite minimal. The central tradition of our own new music has been pre-eminently European; and Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Webern obviously have an immediate musical presence for us that Ives, Ruggles, Ornstein, Gruenberg, Weiss, Crawford, et al.—however nostalgically we invoke their names—simply do not. Traditionally, this phenomenon is explained as the inescapable result of the very environmental conditions that generated our prewar composers' loneliness, if not their originality: unquestionably, their total isolation within their own society and (for the most part) from other musical cultures was responsible for the almost complete absence of opportunities to encounter their works in performance. Yet their ideas had powerful consequences for postwar American music, and—perhaps even more important—their example and effort ultimately resulted in the radically transformed professional environment within which our composers can now live and function.

Thus it has remained a persistent American musical dream—especially among composers — to realize these early "advanced" works in performance, in the hope of discovering in them an interest and relevance as musical literature equivalent to their suggestive power as compositional approaches. And the new contemporary-music performance groups that composers have been establishing in American universities and elsewhere are beginning increasingly to address themselves to this literature. In fact, one result of this development has been the almost instantaneous re-recognition of Varèse as a major 20th-century master whose long unheard qualities had a remarkable revelatory force for music composed almost forty years ago. And Ives, whose "revival" had already been proceeding fitfully in the orchestral and recital domains, has suddenly emerged, against the contemporary background, as much less a solitary Paul Bunyan than a curiously ephemeral figure whose compositional and imaginative powers were simply overwhelmed by the complexities he had innocently unleashed with his transcendental whimsies; but who nevertheless did invent some remarkable local ingenuities of surface sound and rhythm. Ornstein, Gruenberg, Weiss and Crawford (except for her astonishingly prophetic string quartet) on the other hand are still generally unknown.

Of all these composers, however, the one whose name always had the greatest invocational cachet was undoubtedly Carl Ruggles. His appeal, sound unheard, to our contemporary consciousness was, from several points of view, irresistible: not only was his personal and professional obscurity most total of all, but his output was extremely limited, consisting of only a few works lasting a few minutes each, and each of which, moreover, had taken many years to compose. One could read in Charles Seeger's article on Ruggles in the old Henry Cowell collection of articles by American composers about their colleagues that: "At the present time [March, 1932] any critical study of Carl Ruggles and his work must proceed under this handicap—that the Sun-Treader, magnum opus of his mature period, which received its première in Paris on February 25, 1932, has not yet been performed in New York and cannot be considered except in so far as a pencil score, rather difficult to read, has been shown to friends." One realized incredulously that, aside from the publication of the score, exactly the same situation pertained thirty years later (and as far as a New York performance is concerned, pertains today).

Finally, a few years ago, a Ruggles record did appear, in Columbia's Modern American Music series; even this, however, was not free of its ironies: there is so little music on the record that (whether inadvertently or not) the last two bands contain the same piece (Evocations). Still, one could learn at last that Ruggles' reticence appeared to be related to a compositional responsibility and concern that compared attractively with Ives's careless prodigality; for instead of the wildly divergent masses of disparate sounds and textures poured out in Ives's music, Ruggles' effort in the recorded works appeared to be entirely directed toward the creation of a unitary coherence of texture and continuity. Thus each piece has a single textural curve—almost invariably from a quiet, thin-textured, middle-register beginning to a midpoint of maximal density, volume and registral dispersion, and then back again—created wholly out of the contrapuntal interrelation of continuously flowing "voices." Within the texture, as well as from one point to another in the textural succession, the coherence of this curve is sustained by a complete equalization of elements: each voice traverses a similar "melodic" span that consists entirely of successive permutations of the same set of intervals, and the combinations of voices at every point produce an almost constant sonority of simultaneity—the achievement of which might alone have accounted for all the composition time involved.

This homogeneity extends to tone color as well: in the recorded works, all the "lines" are projected by maximally similar timbres; strings in Lilacs and Portals, and piano in the four Evocations (an earlier work, Angels, was scored in a version for muted brass, as well as one for strings). One had, throughout, the impression of an uncompromising concern for textural clarity; indeed, the "composing with intervals" becomes so manifest that there seems to be a one-to-one relation between the underlying structure and the presented surface, to the degree that "surface," in the sense of a multiplicity of perceptual levels, cannot be said to exist at all. Even the rhythmic profiles of the parts seem entirely determined for the clear acoustic projection of each attack. And in the Evocations, where the nonsustaining articulation of the piano generates a subtler, more "open" texture, the foreground pitch successions invariably seem only arpeggiations of the background sonority.

The very fact that this music demands observations of this nature suggests a degree of relation to our own music far beyond that of Ives. But further, one could hear in the Evocations of 1943 a subtle play of intervallic transformation that seemed to traverse—however belatedly—some of the concerns of Schoenberg's Op. 11 piano pieces: and not only did the expository "plainness" of the presentational surfaces evoke an "American" quality that links such disparate composers as Aaron Copland (of the 1930 Piano Variations) and Jim Randall (of the 1965 Mudgett for computer synthesis) but the relation in the concept of rhythm and line of the opening of Portals to the opening cello recitative of Elliott Carter's First String Quartet was strikingly evident.

Surely, then, one was confronted by an extraordinary artistic phenomenon. But, equally, the overconstraint through which Ruggles' qualities of coherence had been accomplished (by an obviously laborious empirical process) appeared to limit seriously the structural scope of his language to what amounted to a single relational event in each piece. In the end, all the pieces seemed fundamentally identical, and each in itself seemed equivalent only to a single event in a larger work. Neither Gunther Schuller's performance at Tanglewood last summer of Men and Mountains (which did add the timbral dimension of horns and strings, but again in such an invariant conjunction that the result was a single horn-string timbre throughout), nor most of the works performed on the Bowdoin College Ruggles Institute last January (including all those on the Columbia record plus Angels and the naive early song, Toys) significantly modified this view.

But the last concert of the Bowdoin festival, given in Portland, Me., by the Boston Symphony, included the first American performance of the Sun-Treader, a few days after the release, probably not entirely fortuitous, by Columbia of its first recorded performance. And indeed, Ruggles' first effort to extend his language into a longer-range continuity generates a differentiated continuity of an interesting kind. For in this work, textural curves of the Portals-Lilacs kind actually do function as single events in the total succession, and the construction in terms of alternations (for the most part) of recurring invariant blocks of texture produces a continuity remarkably like Varèse's. But where Varèse's events are single impulses, or complexes sharply isolated in time or register, Ruggles' continuously expand in line and register, generating a curious counterpoint to the underlying stasis. The most impressive aspect of Sun-Treader is the structure of instrumentation, which begins with all choirs doubling the same lines, then paralleling the increasing density of texture with increasing independence, and finally breaking into side-by-side passages for the individual sections alone before the final recurrence of the opening sonorities. And again, the associations with later American music are vivid: the measured tympani accelerando of the opening and the unison string writing that recall the Carter Variations for Orchestra, and the full-sonoritied opening followed by a "dissolve" into harp-wind chamber texture that remind one of Sessions—especially the Second Symphony—are particularly arresting.

In the end, however, the circumstances of this first performance were perhaps more interesting even than the work itself. Sun-Treader is hardly a fully realized work; in many respects, it seems the first important step toward a compositional integration that never took place. One wonders what the consequences might have been thirty years ago for Ruggles of the kind of university involvement in music that can now produce a Boston Symphony performance of a "new" work, engender the release of its recording, and make available regular performances of "advanced" contemporary music in places like Portland and Brunswick. The consequences of its absence, in all the uncomposed and incompletely achieved works by

FRESH FROM AIMS!

☐ HUMANIST PHILOSOPHY IN CONTEMPORARY POLAND AND YUGOSLAVIA by Prof. H. L. Parsons	$1.00 (paper)
☐ ETHICS IN THE SOVIET UNION TODAY, 2nd edition by Prof. H. L. Parsons	$1.00 (paper)
☐ CONSIDERATIONS ABOUT THE CERTAINTY OF KNOWLEDGE by Prof. Arnost Kolman	$1.00 (paper)
☐ THE THOUGHT OF CLAUDE BERNARD by Prof. Ernest Kahane	$1.50 (paper)
☐ MARXISM AND DEMOCRACY: A SYMPOSIUM	$3.50 (cloth) $1.95 (paper)
☐ MARXISM AND ALIENATION: A SYMPOSIUM	$1.00 (cloth) $1.95 (paper)
☐ TEACHING 'ABOUT COMMUNISM' IN AMERICAN PUBLIC SCHOOLS by A. Zelman	$2.00 (paper)
☐ ONE CONTINUAL CRY: WALKER'S APPEAL TO THE COLORED CITIZENS OF THE WORLD: 1829 by H. Aptheker	$1.00 (cloth) $1.95 (paper)
☐ NAT TURNER'S SLAVE REVOLT: 1831 by H. Aptheker	$1.00 (cloth) $1.95 (paper)
☐ SHAKESPEARE: A MARXIST BIBLIOGRAPHY by M. B. Folsom	.50 (paper)
☐ BIBLIOGRAPHY OF LATIN AMERICAN LABOR AND TRADE UNION MOVEMENTS	.60 (paper)
☐ FREE SAMPLE COPY OF AIMS NEWSLETTER

Checks may be made payable to AIMS

AMERICAN INSTITUTE FOR MARXIST STUDIES
20 East 30th Street, New York, N.Y. 10016

Name .... Address ....

City .... State .... Zip No. ....

our principal musical progenitors, are all too abundantly clear.

RUGGLES: Evocations. John Kirkpatrick, piano. Lilacs; Portals; Juilliard String Orchestra; Frederick Prausnitz, cond. Columbia ML 4986.
Sun-Treader (with Robert Helps: Symphony No. 1). Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Zoltan Rosznyai, cond. Columbia ML 6201/MS 6801.

FILMS

Robert Hatch

Advance reports have extolled Pier Paolo Pasolini's Gospel According to St. Matthew for the reverence and simple piety with which it enacts the story of Christ's life and teachings. Cast with Sicilian village folk, it was, we were told, a work of creative imagination to supplant the succession of Biblical circuses that have been shown to us since the earliest days of moving pictures.

To be sure, the film is made in the bleakest style of Italian realism, with leaden skies, arid sets and a unifying pall of dust over man and nature; and this may signify sincerity, not to say religious fervor. But the effect is to diminish the great myth. The performers were chosen, I would guess, for the rough earthiness of their features, with no inquiry being made as to what use they could make of them. The result is a prevailing woodenness of countenance that induces a melancholy boredom. The Christ was selected, obviously, for his long oval face and thin-boned physique, but otherwise he is a disaster. He conveys petulance, short temper and vanity—a man less capable of attracting disciples or inspiring faith would be hard to find, and the fact that he bears a debased resemblance to medieval representations of Christ only induces a feeling of embarrassment.

The Gospels are prodigies of compression, and their poetic strength derives in large part from the economy of the telling. The film — and every New Testament film I have ever seen—thins and blurs the impression by spreading it across time and scenery. The recurring episode of the little band of Disciples scurrying along chalky roads to ill-defined destinations is dramatically flaccid. The experience of having the body of Christ's teachings flung at you in one continuous monologue, much of it delivered over the shoulder on the march, is unnerving. Matthew set down the words of the Lord years after the event; the attempt to render his selected recollections in a sustained flow of the world's most familiar quotations is grotesque. The miracles are transparent flimflam and inevitably give the impression that Christ was the first modern public relations expert. I had never seen the walk on the water attempted on film before; it turned out to be wading on a flat beach at low tide and I would have preferred to keep my sense of awe.

These flaws, though blatant in the present film, are generic to all New Testament pictures. The Bible is metaphor, allegory, poetry; it is not a movie script. It requires distance, imagery, tableau, if it is to be made visually persuasive and moving. The Play of Herod, as reconstructed by the late Noah Greenberg, still works superbly today.

One can argue, of course, that Christianity came out of just such scenes and just such people as the movie men have imagined. In that case, the surpassing miracle is the grandeur that the spirit and art of man has made of these meager resources. And in that case, further, the effect of such films as this is to unwork the miracle. There is no profit in it.

There's a pretty good socio-entertainment idea buried in The Chase. You take an old-style Western sheriff and set him the job of keeping peace in a new-style, oil-rich Texas town. Instead of rustlers and horse thieves, drifting gamblers and the girls upstairs, his wayward charges are millionaire playboys, bully-boy bank clerks and young married women with a craft, and a lust, for turning their men into swine. By extrapolating the old symbol of public decency into the rancid present you make vivid the point that even our vices have turned nasty. And of course a useful amount of violent incident can be worked into the moral tale.

It might not have been great art, but it could have been a great picture; with Lillian Hellman writing the screenplay, Arthur Penn directing, and Marlon Brando and E. G. Marshall in leading roles, it should at least have been memorable. Alas, the sets, the style of action, the characterization, motivation and dialogue, the sick relish for blood, are routine television criteria for high ratings. Only the sex is a little overt and seamy for the home screen; in this Texas milieu adultery appears to be a form of status display, and it is remarkable what a naughty girl can do with the word "pistol" in a town where all the men in the hangover set go about armed. But the picture will have to be cut to fit the one-hour, eight-commercial formula, and such titillations can readily be excised.

Responsibility for the sadly unenterprising goals of The Chase rests with Sam Spiegel, the producer, and Mr. Penn, the director. What Mr. Spiegel thinks of it I don't know (it is doing good business, so I have a guess), but Mr. Penn was interviewed not long ago by The New York Times and still more recently wrote a letter to that paper in which he denied statements and attitudes attributed to him by the interviewer. His feelings about the picture are thus not clear, but one cannot escape the impression that forces beyond his control—those summed up by the word "Hollywood"— are still operating in the post-Hollywood era.

The person one would really like to hear from is Brando. The public wastes its money when it pays admission to see the equivalent of what is available from the networks. But Brando wastes his talent when he appears in work that lacks originality of relationships or subtlety of expression, and that is a more grievous loss. He is good in The Chase, as he is almost always good—you cannot take your eyes from him; he never makes a meaningless gesture and he gets the results he needs with an economy of means that is theatre poetry. But once again the results are not worth his achievement of them, and Brando remains our most underexploited actor.

The Best Way To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 3-7-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

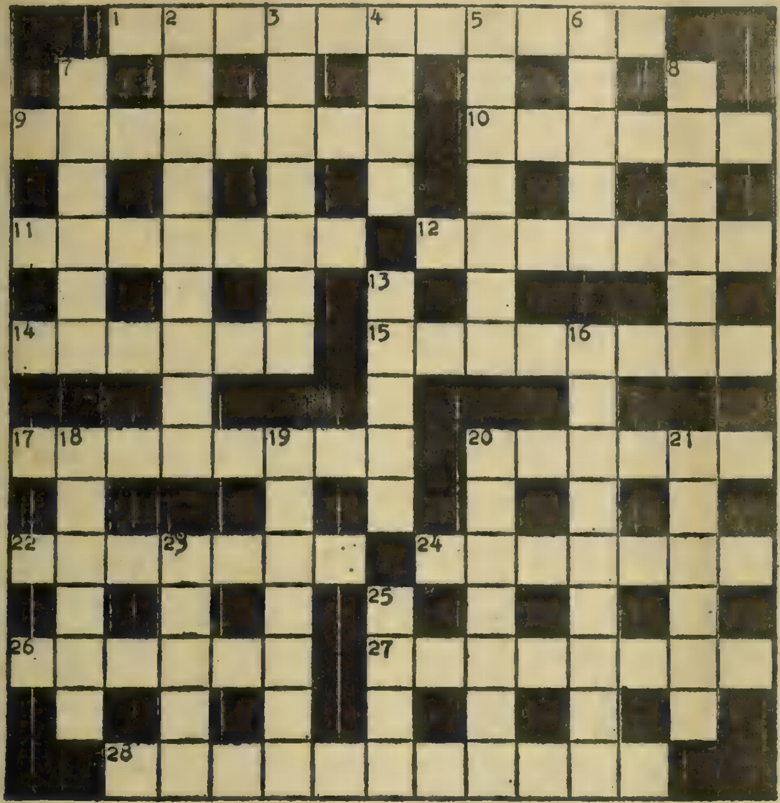
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1143

By FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 and 16 down In the government, would the cabinet contain flag rank? (3, 6, 2, 9)
9 Hurried back and made the boat go? Came to the point, at least! (8)
10 Speed loses it, but it should be crunchy. (6)
11 These could really fix one's enemies! (6)
12 A band of mink, perhaps, might make things even. (7)
14 Mars might show them, but certainly 7 has one. (6)
15 Is shared unevenly in the same course as 10? (8)
20 Sounds like the respiratory trouble I have came from the night air, as they thought. (6)
22 Certainly not go to pot inside—though one might find it as a last course. (7)
24 The sort of soup that might make a mess, accidentally. (3-4)
26 By the sound of it, they could scratch part of the document. (6)
27 A pillow over the phone might—as haze might be. (8)
28 The quarterback's masterpiece is not a pleasant thing to come to. (1, 6, 4)

DOWN:

2 Their game might be a home one for Jackson. (9)
3 How these blanks should be filled might be proverbial. (7)
4 Hamlet's forefathers were, according to Gray. (4)
5 and 17 across Suggests a rather vulgar curiosity might be credited to you. (7, 8)
6 One who displays 5 and 17, by the sound of it? (5)
7 Hat father put on—a fellow on the rise! (6)
8 The lunatic type might not have such benefits. (6)
13 So-called assassin? Inhuman! (5)
18 Paste? It's alimentary! (6)
19 Do radicals go to more than one?
20 Gum up one of the directions to the arbiter on the fence. (7)
21 Making a low sound? (6)
23 Putting on weight in the fall? (5)
24 A helper might place one on the right track! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1142

ACROSS: 1 Disabusing; 6 Otic; 10 Swollen; 11 Crozier; 12 Eric; 13 Imminently; 15 Pastern; 16 Galleon; 17, 3 down and 2 down Cock and bull stories; 20 Classic; 22 Fire escape; 23 Anna; 25 Laconic; 26 Amusing; 27 Yale; 28 Appendages. DOWN: 1 Disrespectfully; 4 Sandman; 5 Nicking; 7 Thistle; 8 Carrying charges; 9 Come clean; 14 Cetaceans; 18 Caracul; 19 Dice cup; 20 Cupcake; 21 and 24 Sinking fund.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N. Y. 10014

THE UNIVERSITY OF LEEDS
CHAIR OF GEOGRAPHY

Applications are invited for the CHAIR OF GEOGRAPHY and the Headship of the Department of Geography in the Faculty of Economic and Social Studies, vacant on the appointment of Professor R. E. Dickinson to a Research Chair in a separate unit.

Preference will be given to specialists in aspects of human geography, and knowledge of an overseas region, particularly China and the Far East could be an advantage.

Salary not less than £3,400 a year. Applications (sixteen copies) stating age, qualifications and experience and naming three referees, should reach The Registrar and Secretary, The University, Leeds 2, England (from whom further particulars can be obtained) not later than 15th April, 1966; candidates overseas may apply in the first instance by cable naming three referees, preferably in the United Kingdom.

PUBLICATIONS

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS SUPPLIED. Access to One Million Titles. Free Lists. Library Want Lists Invited. Ardent Book Finders, Dept. N, Cos Cob, Conn.

Fun to Read!

Send $1.00 today for a six-month trial subscription to THE IDLER, a hard-hitting yet entertaining liberal monthly in the tradition of American personal journalism.

THE IDLER

125 5th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

SECULAR PASSOVER HAGGADAH, modern historical insights, beautiful illustrations enrich story of the Exodus and the Seder Ceremony. A rewarding item for each member of the family. $1.00. Danfred Publishers, Box 7036, Roseville Station, Newark, N.J. 07107.

"UNION AND LABOUR SPEAKERS' HANDBOOK" for better conditions, more pay, control inflation, finance development internally. Bound copies $2—50 (trade discount). BALA PRESS, BALA, N. Wales, U.K.

ART

Highlighting Creativeness—MIDWESTERN ART REVIEWS, Box 947, Chicago, 60690. Trial subscription $3.

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA) 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, Wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

INCOME TAX returns prepared. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers-instructors. LO 9-9026 or SW 5-7315.

PERSONALS

SIX different colorful anti-war buttons $1.00 postpaid from: Student Peace Union, 5 Beekman Street, New York City 10038.

END JOHNSON'S WAR! VOTE FOR GODZILLA! Campaign Hdq. 110 N. Gaston, Kings Mt., N. C.

BUY YOUR BOOKS
through The Nation

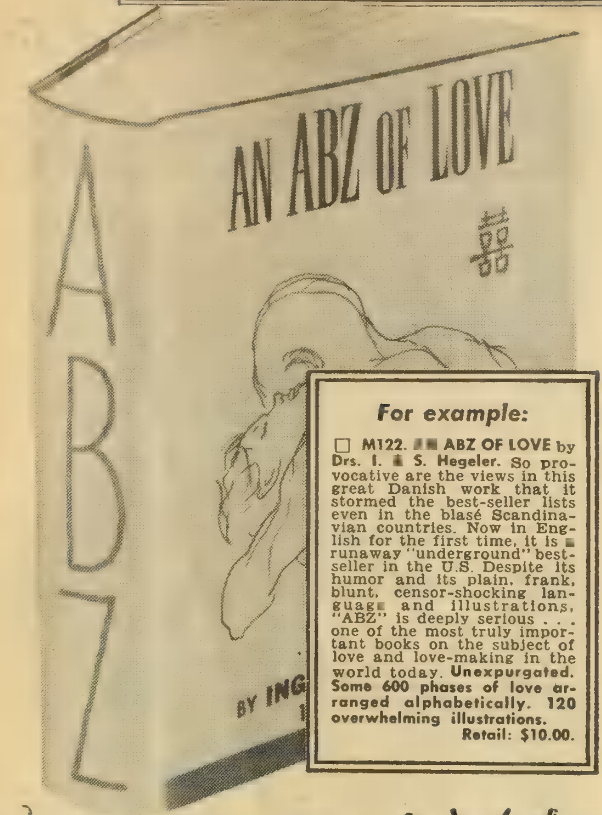
A COMPELLING OFFER FROM "AMERICA'S MOST EXOTIC BOOK CLUB"



Any 3 Books FREE

For example:

☐ M122. AN ABZ OF LOVE by Drs. I. & S. Hegeler. So provocative are the views in this great Danish work that it stormed the best-seller lists even in the blasé Scandinavian countries. Now in English for the first time, it is a runaway "underground" best-seller in the U.S. Despite its humor and its plain, frank, blunt, censor-shocking language and illustrations, "ABZ" is deeply serious . . . one of the most truly important books on the subject of love and love-making in the world today. Unexpurgated. Some 600 phases of love arranged alphabetically. 120 overwhelming illustrations.
Retail: $10.00.

YES, WE WILL GIVE YOU AS A NEW TRIAL MEMBER—

- ANY 3 BOOKS FREE—even including, if you choose it, the $10 "ABZ of Love".
- PLUS 1 OR MORE OTHER BOOKS at the extra-discount price of only $2.95 each regardless of regular retail prices up to $15 and more!
- PLUS FREE GIFT BOOKS of your selection. For every third purchase you later make as a regular member, you may choose any gift book in our current Catalog.
- SAVE UP TO 90% NOW. If you join the Society now, you can save up to 90% under retail prices. The more books you take now, at the $2.95 extra-discount price available to new members only, the more you save.
- AND SAVE UP TO 40% REGULARLY. Membership selections and alternates are offered at prices up to 40% below publishers' regular list prices.
- "KEEP OR CANCEL". If after 2 weeks' examination you are dissatisfied with the books you select on coupon below, just return them, without cost or obligation, and your trial membership will be promptly and cheerfully cancelled.
- "MYSTIC ARTS BOOK NEWS" FREE, bringing you advance reviews of new exotic books published each month—books which, because of their special and often controversial natures, are not usually obtainable at any price in ordinary retail stores. (Members nevertheless receive discounts as above.)
- BECAUSE many of the books offered in this announcement are in short supply, fulfillment of this offer can only be guaranteed for [illegible] days. Please, therefore, enter all your choices BY NUMBER on the Request Form—and mail without delay.

☐ M110. THE CRADLE OF EROTICA by Edwardes & Masters. An earthy scrutiny of the unusual and unrestrained sexual practices of Afro-Asian peoples as evidenced in their own literature (which is copiously quoted). Shedding as it does bright new light on the meaning of "normal" vs. "abnormal", there is no comparable work in existence. Retail: $5.95

☐ M2A. THE HISTORY OF WITCHCRAFT by M. Summers. Here's a fascinatingly detailed modern account of the nefarious orgies of witches and would-be witches through the ages — and the hideous retributions society levelled against them. Retail: $10.00

☐ M148A. ODDITIES: A Book of Unexplained Facts by R. Gould. Profusely documented accounts (with maps, photographs & drawings) of eerie unexplained facts such as an unusual breed of Philippine vampires, "devil's hoofmarks", moving coffins, a perpetual motion machine never disproved, vanished islands, phantom ships and the mysterious planet Vulcan. Retail: $5.00

☐ M148B. ENIGMAS: Another Book of Unexplained Facts by R. Gould. Here the author's accounts include, for example: giants and giantism, strange sounds of the Nile, a case of incredible longevity, the uncanny disturbances at Great Bealings, a tragic naval mystery, a never-disproved success in alchemy. Profusely documented with maps, photos & drawings. Retail: $5.00

☐ [illegible]. THE MERRY MUSES OF CALEDONIA by Robert Burns. Here at last are the bawdy, long-suppressed songs and verses — unexpurgated — of this great and robustious Scotsman! Retail: $10.00

☐ M117. THE HORN BOOK by G. Legman. A strong case for unexpurgated literature is this remarkable work. Its copious examples of sex in literature and folklore stand in healthy contrast to the substitutive acceptability, today, of sadism and terror. Retail: $12.50

☐ M169. FEMINA LIBIDO SEXUALIS. Compendium of the Psychology, Anthropology and Anatomy of the Sexual Characteristics of Woman by Ploss and Bartels. 285 uncensored illustrations. Includes primary, secondary and accessory sexual characteristics; sexual impulse in woman; infantile sexuality; racial characteristics of the female genitalia; infibulation; circumcision; the female breast; racial characteristics of erogenous areas. Retail: $15.00

☐ M103. ETRUSCAN MAGIC & OCCULT REMEDIES. Presented by the eminent and eminently readable Charles Leland, here are the extraordinary rediscovered cures, curses and sensuous rites of the great lost civilization of Etruria — still used today by a small, little-known group of descendants in Northern Italy. Prof. illustrated. Retail: $10.00

☐ M115. NEW MASTER COURSE IN HYPNOTISM by H. Arons. The amazingly successful hypnotism techniques of Harry Arons in complete word-for-word, step-by-step detail—exactly as used in his famous classes (This manual is accompanied by a unique hypnotic measurement device.) Retail: $6.00

☐ M102. PICTURE MUSEUM OF SORCERY, MAGIC AND ALCHEMY by G. de Givry. 376 illustrations. The best and most representative illustrations ever gathered in one volume are here. The text, translated from the French, is equal to the illustrations. For the author is one of the great savants of the occult. Retail: $17.50

☐ M162A. THE PSYCHEDELIC READER. Here is the extraordinary story of all the new consciousness-expanding drugs as told by those who are actually using and studying them — people from varied backgrounds and professions, from medical doctors to writers (including Julian Huxley.) Retail: $5.95

☐ M172. TANTRA: The Yoga of Sex by O. Garrison. India hid the secret rituals of Tantra Yoga from the hated British prudes. For the first time in English, here is the straightforward, easy-to-read manual of Tantric learning, which open-minded and serious readers may use "to change their sex lives from boredom and maladjustment into the complete, fulfilling and beautiful sacrament it was meant to be." Retail: $7.00

ORDER YOUR BOOKS BY THEIR NUMBERS ON REQUEST FORM

REQUEST FORM—SEND NO MONEY

Mail to: Mystic Arts Book Society, New Hyde Park, N. Y. 11041 NA-1

Enroll me as a trial member and send me the 3 FREE BOOKS indicated below—charging me only for the one or more other books ordered at the special new-member price of only $2.95 each.

My only obligation is to buy three future selections during the coming year from the scores of exotic books to be offered at savings up to 40% under the publishers' retail prices. Further, for every third purchase as a regular member I am to receive a free gift book of my own selection.

(PLEASE INDICATE YOUR CHOICES BELOW BY NUMBER)

1. SEND THE FOLLOWING SELECTIONS FREE—with New-Member Purchase(s) at right. ☐ ☐ ☐

2. SEND THE FOLLOWING SELECTION(S) AT SPECIAL NEW-MEMBER'S PRICE ($2.95). ☐

Name..

Address..

City................................State...........Zip.......

AN AMERICAN IN CUBA ERWIN ROY JOHN

THE NATION

March 14, 1966 35 cents

MAR 1 2 1966

FREEDOM'S CRISIS

LAST STEEP ASCENT

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

REPUBLICAN TURKS

The Draft Under Fire

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

CONGRESS & FOREIGN POLICY

The Timid Political Will

EDWARD A. KOLODZIEJ

THE SCRUTABLE EAST

REVIEWS BY

EDWARD R. F. SHEEHAN
JONATHAN MIRSKY
EDGAR SNOW
KENNETH REXROTH
MARILYN YOUNG

LETTERS

abuse of authority

Berkeley, Calif.

Dear Sirs: I am a very close friend of Lieut. Henry H. Howe whose plight was described recently by John Rechy ["'Conduct Unbecoming . . .' The Lieutenant on the Peace Line," The Nation, Feb. 21]. The article omitted some pertinent facts about Lieut. Howe's case which I feel should have the attention of you and fellow Nation readers.

In addition to those aspects of Lieut. Howe's treatment in the stockade described in the article, he was kept under constant twenty-four-hour guard, the light in his cell was kept on at night, and no one was allowed to speak to him. These practices along with solitary confinement seem extremely harsh for a prisoner convicted of nonviolent offenses. . . .

I recently wrote to Lieut. Howe at Fort Leavenworth and had the letter returned as undeliverable because I was not on Lieut. Howe's authorized list of correspondents. If the letter was undeliverable, why did the censors still open the letter and read it? Their censoring my letter, evidenced by official stamps on the letter itself is, in my opinion, abuse of authority.

John M. Cys

first casualty

St. Petersburg, Fla.

Dear Sirs: If the immoral and genocidal war the U.S. Government is imposing upon the people of Vietnam were legal, as the American Bar Association is reported to have claimed, then the United States Constitution would have to be illegal, for it specifically provides that only the Congress can declare war. . . . This most unfortunate declaration by the A.B.A. merely proves again that some lawyers can be found who will declare murder legal and the will of God. It is further proof, however unfortunate, that truth is the first casualty of war, hot or cold.

Hugh B. Hester
Brig. Gen. U. S. Army (Ret.)

dubious choice

Providence, R. I.

Dear Sirs: I would like vigorously to second the doubts expressed by B. C. Bingham on the desirability of having Barnaby C. Keeney, president of Brown University, as chairman of the National Humanities Council (letter, The Nation, Feb. 14). For the past five years I have been a graduate student at Brown University and, as a result, I have attained a good deal of familiarity with Dr. Keeney's questionable record on such matters as academic freedom, student protest groups and censorship of student publications. In May, 1960, Brown University suspended and prevented the graduation of the two editors of the senior yearbook because it allegedly contained "objectionable material." This performance was repeated again in May, 1961, this time with regard to the student literary magazine Hubris. From November, 1961, to April, 1963, the university banned the sale of the book Tropic of Cancer in its bookstore. . . . On Nov. 17 of this academic year, Dr. Keeney vigorously attacked the Students for a Democratic Society for being a "frankly revolutionary movement." The Brown Daily Herald of Nov. 18, however, expressed its disappointment that Keeney's comments were based on "distorted facts and twisted inferences." The Pembroke Record went even further, calling Keeney's remarks "a McCarthy-like guilt-by-association chain of inferences."

Paul K. Hoch

EDITORIALS

the consensus that isn't

Being the skillful politician that he is, President Johnson prefers to govern by consensus, and for a time after his election in 1964 he could plausibly claim that he was doing so. The consensus then began to show cracks, but these were superficial enough so that the President could paper them over. Now the cracks are so deep, and widening so rapidly, that the paper tears as fast as it is applied, and all can see that the consensus is in disarray.

More than any other factor, Vietnam did it. Politics is a rough-and-tumble affair, but in this case justice was done. Mr. Johnson broke faith with the people who voted for him on the issue of moderation in foreign affairs; no sooner was he elected than he leaped into the shoes of Barry Goldwater. Nor can it be said that he got into trouble over something immaterial. Vietnam is a complex of issues of vast importance, not only to Americans but to all the peoples of the world, and good policies in other areas could never compensate for the evil to which Mr. Johnson committed the United States in Southeast Asia.

The methods which worked before will not work again. As things were, the President could invite critics to the White House, slap backs and twist arms a bit, and restore order. Now all he can do is to deny that irreconcilable differences exist. Neither his opponents nor the facts of the situation will permit that for very long. The polls are already beginning to show the futility of it. According to the Harris poll, in January, 63 per cent of those questioned thought Mr. Johnson's handling of the Vietnamese war was "excellent or pretty good." In February, the percentage had fallen to 49. The drop was not due to any one cause —it was about equally divided between those who wanted the military effort to be increased and those who wanted to see the President do more to bring about negotiations—but the division bears precisely on the underlying difficulty. Mr. Johnson has tried to placate both the militarists and the moderates (those who were for getting out of Vietnam without conditions have never been more than about 15 per cent of the population) and this policy of tergiversation has satisfied neither faction.

The hawks, of course, have had much the best of it, but by their nature force is never applied on a scale large enough to satisfy them. The hawks, or at least the most hawklike among them, will not rest until the Chinese Reds are goaded into action and the bombs can be unleashed on their nuclear installations. The moderates, on the other hand, will be further antagonized by the increase in American forces from the present 200,000 in South Vietnam to 400,000 by next January—an increase which has already been decided on and which is in the Pentagon works. And many voters, who feel rather than think (but feelings are not a bad guide in some political situations) are turning against the President in large numbers. Eric Sevareid notes a "steady congealing of opinion among the women of this country," and predicts that the President and the Democratic Party will, within the next few months, "be in serious difficulties with the American voting public."

DEC 27

The one development which could save Mr. Johnson's political hide at this juncture is a concerted bid by the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese to negotiate. Both must agree; neither one alone will suffice. Such a deus ex machina is improbable. And if it did occur, Mr. Johnson would be in further trouble. His Vice President has just recruited another division of South Korean troops, and General Park laid down a condition: the Communists must be exterminated. That is also the view of General Ky. No doubt Mr. Johnson would like to have foreign arms to twist, but he is not apt to get the opportunity.

el desastre

Everyone knows by now that on January 17 a Strategic Air Command B-52 bomber and a KC-135 tanker collided while refueling over the village of Palomares in Spain, killing eight American airmen and dropping four "nuclear devices," of which three have been located and the fourth is still missing. But for forty-four days, Washington kept the incident wrapped in a blanket of impenetrable secrecy during which Department of Defense officials engaged in colloquies with newsmen such as one quoted by Tad Szulc in The New York Times (February 4): Reporter: "Can you tell me whether you've located the missing bomb?" Briefing Officer: "I don't know of any missing bomb, but we have not positively identified what I think you think we are looking for."

Such morbid preoccupation with secrecy, if it involved a civilian in some sphere of activity other than military nucleonics, might get him committed to a mental institution, but in the services it is the norm. It is not the norm for the unsophisticated peasants of Palomares, who still are only dimly aware of what hit them. They call it "the disaster" because it has disrupted their lives, subjected some of them to possible radiation or chemical poisoning, and transformed their village into an operational base for the U.S. Navy and Air Force. The missing bomb must be located, and so far an expenditure of $28 million has not located it.

Among the many bizarre features of the incident is the disposal of some 1,500 tons of Palomares topsoil contaminated by spilled plutonium, which is both radioactive and highly poisonous. Szulc reports from Madrid that it is to be shipped back to the United States "for laboratory tests." A sample of a few pounds or, since we Americans do everything on a big scale, a ton or two, would suffice for the most thorough testing; but the Spaniards certainly want none of it, so Uncle Sam is taking back the whole load. The services have built a jetty some 200 yards into the Mediterranean to facilitate the loading of the surplus topsoil aboard ocean-going barges. What will be done with it in the United States is no doubt another military secret.

The crucial question which this unhappy incident raises is: why did it have to occur? The bomber was flying from Seymour Johnson Air Force Base in North Carolina on a flight toward an "Eastern country." The Strategic Air Command, that is to say, is still carrying the air war to the Soviet Union and its satellites, although tensions in that part of the world have subsided considerably, and numerous nuclear-tipped missiles are targeted on every military base and city in the affected area. Are the Russians carrying on

IN THIS ISSUE

March 14, 1966

EDITORIALS

282

ARTICLES

285 Republican Turks:
The Draft Under Fire
Robert G. Sherrill
288 Freedom's Crisis:
The Last Steep Ascent
Martin Luther King, Jr.
292 Congress & Foreign Policy:
The Timid Political Will
Edward A. Kolodziej
294 Two GI's in Limbo
Harry W. Ernst
296 An American in Cuba, Part I:
Seeing Oriente in a Jeep
Erwin Roy John

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

300 Cities of the Dreadful Night
Edward R. F. Sheehan
302 Ho Chi Minh: Poet in Leg Irons
Jonathan Mirsky
303 Tree of Many Branches
Edgar Snow
304 On the Roof of the World
Marilyn Young
306 As Much Fun As Simenon
Kenneth Rexroth
307 The Common Scolds
Howard Junker
307 Photography (poem)
John N. Morris
309 Theatre
Harold Clurman
310 Off-Broadway
Robert Pasolli
311 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor
WARREN MILLER
Assistant Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor
MARION HESS
Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON
Assistant to Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN
Art
MAX KOZLOFF
Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science
CARL DREHER
Poetry
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address [illegible] well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 202
No. 11

similar flights toward American cities, and refueling en route over the territory of other countries? Aerial refueling involves very large aircraft flying only yards apart; in these and other operations, something like twenty accidents have occurred over the years. Does it make sense? If so, would the Administration deign to tell us how?

Republicans and the draft

The article by Robert G. Sherrill (p. 285) anticipates the demand by approximately thirty House Republicans for an investigation of the draft. Their statement alleges gross inefficiency and inequity. A typical charge is that out of 546,000 men between 19 and 26 now classified 1-A, about 118,000 have not yet been examined and the papers of another 280,000 are stalled in the "bureaucratic pipeline" between local draft boards and Army induction centers. Another criticism deals with the vague specifications on age and mental and physical capacity and the priorities in which various manpower groups are called for service. The Representatives also call attention to a recent report of the Comptroller General which concludes that 9,000 enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy and Air Force are working in nonmilitary activities, such as officers' and noncommissioned officers' clubs, hobby shops, bowling alleys, golf courses, and commissary sales stores.

This by no means exhausts the long bill of particulars that has been drawn up against the draft by those who have studied it. Yet nothing happens. Commissions are appointed, but their reports are shelved. Here, then, is an issue the Republicans could push to advantage between now and November. But why is it that whenever a group of Republicans manages to lay hands on an issue of great popular appeal, the top leadership can be relied upon to veto it? Are the leaders haunted by some deep-seated death wish? Sen. Everett Dirksen is doing his best to squelch the proposal to investigate the draft. But the thirty Republican sponsors should not be put off by Old Ev's disapproval; they have a good issue if they will only press it. There is great unrest and dissatisfaction with the operation of Selective Service, and it is greatest in those areas — campus communities being merely one example — where the GOP must find new adherents.

official information: how good is it?

"In the White House," Theodore C. Sorensen remarked the other day, "I felt sorry for those who had to make judgments on the basis of daily newspapers." Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., concurred, saying that after participating in governmental decision-making he felt that in such matters the relation of journalism to reality was often less than that of the shadows in Plato's cave. As Sorensen realized, these views go to the heart of the modern problem of democracy, for he added that if he thought the "information gap" was insuperable he would not have much faith in democracy.

Members of Congress, as well as ordinary citizens, do in fact often excuse their inaction and nonthinking with the plea that the President is fully informed, while they know only what they see in the papers or on TV. If the interests of the government and those of the people were identical—if the President and his assistants were wholly patriotic, wholly selfless and wholly logical, and if diplomatic and intelligence reports were wholly accurate—there would indeed be no need for participation by the people in the affairs of government.

But all these assumptions fly in the face of reality. Perhaps oftener than not, the interests of the people are opposed to those of the government, especially in the realm of foreign affairs. Every government must be watched, and the principal virtue of democracy, and its cardinal advantage over totalitarianism, is that under democracy the government is subject to the surveillance of those who mistrust it.

And what about the validity of the inside dope reaching the Administration? It is regarded as reliable when it fits within the framework of a preconceived policy, which may itself be disastrous. Last December, in Newsweek, Emmet John Hughes (who, like Sorenson and Schlesinger, is a former servant of a President) began a column with this statement: "The moment is sobering, even chilling, for critics of U.S. policy in Vietnam. Almost devastatingly, they have been proven right—not largely, but overwhelmingly." How come? Was Robert McNamara getting false information and, himself gullible, passing it on to a gullible public? Or was he getting valid information and telling lies? Or was he the victim of his own wishful thinking? Give him the benefit of every doubt, and the fact remains that with all the secret information at his disposal, McNamara has been misleading the public for more than six years.

Then there is the question of ethics. Governments do not have principles; they have only interests. In the furtherance of these interests, and to the extent of their assumed ability, they threaten or make war, and this is what they call patriotism. The crucial diplomatic and intelligence reports that a government receives have to do with its own military capacity in relation to that of actual or potential enemies. With few exceptions (of which the United States in its present phase is not one) governments operate under the law of the jungle. That they becloud their actions with a pretense of idealism does not alter the facts of brute force.

The true patriots are those who, as individuals and through religious and other organizations, strive to restrain their government in its pursuit of nefarious ends by force of arms. Sometimes they are in office, but more often their only power is that of criticism and conscience. The greatest imaginable blessing for mankind would be if the President could hear their voices amid the din of official information that supports his plans to expand the war.

research and responsibility

Despite the eminence and respectability of two New York physicians accused of experimenting upon twenty-two gravely ill patients without their informed consent, the state's Board of Regents has declined to avert its eyes from either the ugly facts or the unpleasant implications of the case. Acting on the recommendations of a special subcommittee composed of two lawyers and an investment banker, the board found Drs. Chester Southam and Emanuel Mandel guilty of unprofessional conduct and of "fraud and deceit in the practice of medicine."

An internationally renowned cancer researcher at Sloan-Kettering Institute, Dr. Southam sought and obtained Dr. Mandel's cooperation, arranging for the conduct, in July, 1963, of the experimental series. The patients were at the Jewish Chronic Disease Hospital in Brooklyn, of which Dr. Mandel was, and remains, the medical director. Dr. Southam wanted to measure the speed with which patients who were very sick, but cancer-free, would reject tissue-cultured human cancer cells. Previous experiments had established that healthy individuals rejected the implanted cells far more rapidly than patients already in the advanced stages of cancer. If persons in advanced, noncancerous illness rejected the foreign cells as rapidly as healthy subjects, certain theories of cancer immunology would thereby be confirmed. Dr. Southam's approach to research in the field is widely regarded by those who should know as one of the more significant lines of investigation. There was never, everyone agrees, the remotest chance that the patients would get cancer from the injections.

Most of the medical profession apparently also agrees that there was no need to tell them that the cells were cancer cells. Drs. I. S. Ravdin, vice president for medical affairs of the University of Pennsylvania, and George E. Moore, director of Roswell Park Memorial Institute in Buffalo, N.Y., another cancer research center, testified in defense of Dr. Southam's admitted failure to tell the subjects that the material to be injected was cancer. Practically every researcher follows similar practices, they told the subcommittee. Dr. Southam testified that he saw no reason to mention the fact, since no harm would ensue, and therefore "it is not pertinent to the phenomenon which is going to follow," namely rejection of the implanted nodule. He was positively unwilling to use the word "cancer" for a further reason: it would needlessly frighten the patients. As a physician, he said in effect, he had a duty to withhold such irrelevant but scary information. Instead, the patients were told that the injection was a test of their resistance or immunity to disease, that a lump would form which would go away, and that was all. Nothing was said about cancer or research.

In a decision to which all doctors could well give heed, the board brushed this reasoning aside. It noted that some of the patients were probably in no physical or mental condition to understand the nature of the experiment, even if they had been informed of it. "One of these same patients was operated on two days after the injections," it dryly observed, "and . . . prior to making the operation . . . the hospital obtained two separate written consents each signed by both the patient and a relative." The "alleged oral consents" obtained for the experiments, it concluded, "were not informed consents and were . . . fraudulently obtained."

The fraud lay in depriving the subject of an experiment of any information that might have resulted in his refusing to cooperate. It is not, the Regents held, for the physician to decide what is relevant or irrelevant, but for the volunteer; and no fact may be concealed from him, even if his decision not to cooperate as a result of disclosure of such a fact is considered by the profession to be completely irrational.

The Regents took an exceedingly dim view of some professional attitudes toward laymen whose cooperation is sought in such situations: The record, they declared, indicates that some physicians feel "that they can go ahead and do anything which they conclude is good for the patient, or which is of benefit experimentally or educationally and is not harmful to the patient, and that the patient's consent is an empty formality. With this we cannot agree."

Publisher's Note

With this issue, The Nation has undergone a face lifting. The typography and design have, as you can see, been revamped; the cover has been adorned with a modest bit of color, and the magazine is now printed by offset on paper with a superior printing surface (and a longer life expectancy). Thanks are owed to Gertrude Snyder for her help in effecting the design modifications.

These changes emphatically do not denote any change in the purpose, focus or character of the magazine. Nor are they to be taken as steps in the direction of slickness. Their sole aim is to improve the appearance of The Nation, and the readability of what we have to say.

REPUBLICAN TURKS

THE DRAFT UNDER FIRE

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

Quietly reorganizing in the House of Representatives is a covey of members—eventually perhaps as many as thirty, says their ringleader, Thomas B. Curtis of Missouri—who are determined to force Congressional participation in shaping the future of the draft. This little pocket of insurrection against a heavy-handed Presidency—like "The Fifteen" in the Senate—is one of the few exciting, even noble, attributes of this Congress.

No more executive hocus-pocus from Mr. Johnson, they insist, no more million-dollar "phantom committees" that tuck the draft problem solemnly under arm and disappear forever into the labyrinth of the Pentagon: no, say Curtis and his boys, if they have their way, this most unjust of all civilian burdens must be brought back to Congress for its solution.

It takes courage to make this move as the passions of Vietnam debate grow intense, but the present structure and administration of the draft have become intolerable to these Congressmen. The problem goes far beyond the "Why me?" question that arises in the minds of the small fraction of eligible men who are tapped for uniform. That question could be put down with a black-bean lottery, upon which the answer would be easy enough: You lost. If chance were substituted for a pretended logic, there would be no grounds for argument about fair play.

But in addition to the justice of the selection technique, there is first of all the question of whether a peacetime (this is still officially peacetime) draft should exist at all. To be sure, it is a question we may expect future Presidential candidates to be leery of answering negatively, remembering that Adlai's offhand suggestion that the draft be ended was effectively twisted by Eisenhower into a sign of left-wing softness; and that Goldwater's opening assurance at Prescott that "Republicans will end the draft altogether, and as soon as possible. That I promise you" was twisted by Johnson into just another sign of Barry's kookiness.

The question persists, nevertheless, and is acknowledged to be sensible even by some generals whose sole interest in the matter is maintaining a sturdy and efficient army. Just a little more than a year ago, Brig. Gen. Lynn D. Smith, head of the Army's enlisted personnel directorate, stated in Military Review that with only 4.6 per cent of the 10 million young men between 17 and 26 years of age actually going into the army in 1963, and the "universality" of selective service destined to become even more of a farce as the population of the country swells, the present draft is satisfactory neither from an emotional nor a practical standpoint.

Even if the draft were truly universal, he wrote, it wouldn't do because "Requiring 10 million young men to take military training might improve the physical and moral stature of the nation's youth [a ploy much used in discussion by Selective Service director Lieut. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey], but it would not materially help the army. . . . One of the problems facing the army today is that a significant portion of its strength is continually in training and not available in units. . . . If the army had to train three million men per year, manning the training base would magnify rather than decrease turbulence in the operating unit."

What the Army needs, he argued, is not the present system wherein 95 per cent of the men joyfully quit the service as soon as they can, but a body made up of men who will stay on the average for ten years. In short, a professional army.

"Cost of such a program? It would be a money-maker. The dollars saved by training 50,000 to 75,000 new men for the Army each year, instead of the present 200,000 or 250,000 would more than compensate for the cost of qualifying the 10-year veteran for a place in the civilian economy. . . . The current strength could actually be reduced if the annual turnover of men was reduced."

Another question still to be tracked down is the suspicion on the part of some critics that the draft is—or may be—used by the government, not wholly as a method for providing bodies but as a method for brainwashing young men on the one hand and "keeping them quiet" on the other. The late Robert Taft, Sr., was not the last to express fears that "by handing boys over to the arbitrary and complete domination of the government, we put it in the power of the government to indoctrinate them with the political doctrines then popular with the government." (The recent court-martial conviction in El Paso of a young lieutenant for participating—though in civilian clothes and off duty—in a protest march against our Vietnamese policy may be to the point. See " 'Conduct Unbecoming . . .' Lieutenant on the Peace Line" by John Rechy, The Nation, February 21.)

The nearest thing to an admission that this kind of groupthink is being employed came when General Hershey told the House Armed Services Committee that selective service, either directly or by threat, manipulates the entire lives of the nation's youth, not just that shadowy period when they are in uniform. "For the past twenty years the selective service system has been what we call a channeler," he said. "That is, we have channeled people into training for professions and occupations that were said to be very necessary for national life, and once they had finished it, we have continued to defer them if they are engaged with contractors and other people who are producing things for the armed forces. . .

"The deferment is the carrot that we have used to get individuals into occupations and professions that are said by those in charge of government to be the necessary ones."

In response to this description of Americans as rabbits, John Lindsay, then Congressman, accurately summed up: "Thus, in the name of national security and government interest, the future course of emphasis in our society may be changed by the state, indeed by the military apparatus."

An analogous issue is the suspected use of the Army as a kind of quarantine ward for young men with "dangerous" ideas that might spread. On the college level, the use of the draft for putting them out of circulation has been notably demonstrated at the University of Michigan where some sitters-in were immediately shifted into 1-A (see "Punishment by Conscription: General Hershey's Big Stick" by Carl Cohen, The Nation, December 27, 1965); but so much bad publicity followed that action that hereafter the Hershey Raiders will at least have to disguise their disciplinary drafting under the banner of necessity. That this may already have started is suggested by Hershey's statement that he has run out of eligibles in other brackets and must now turn to the students.

Since the Selective Service juggles its census with such blinding deftness, it will be difficult to disprove the "necessity" argument, but it is worth noting that only a few days ago Bruce Chapman in the New York Herald Tribune quoted no less an expert than Frank Mott of the Labor Department's Office of Manpower, Automation and Training—which keeps a close eye on the shiftings of the bigger hunks of our population—to the effect that the desperate search for new 1-As leaves him puzzled. "So far as we can judge," Mott is quoted as saying, "there should be no problem meeting draft needs even with the increased call."

One close student of the Selective Service System pointed out recently that Hershey's office and the Army have a slick routine for keeping the draft going: to maintain the pretense of universality, he pointed out, Hershey cuts down the "eligible" pool with haphazard and whimsical exemptions, and then sucks all the remaining eligibles into service and cries, see, voluntary enlistments couldn't do the job! The Army, for its part, is periodically reluctant to recruit all it could, lest it destroy the pretense that the draft is necessary.

Too insidious to believe? Well, on this point, Congressman Curtis charged on the floor of the House that "it has been candidly admitted by Army recruiting sergeants, in private conversations, that beyond a certain point they are quietly advised 'from above' that they are not to recruit any more young men even if more young men are eager to enlist." He challenged the Department of Defense to allow twenty recruit sergeants to be called and put under oath about this—the challenge was never accepted.

Another well-known device for creating a "shortage" in the fighting forces is the wasting of trained fighters and technicians in the wrong jobs—something for which the militarists have a curious talent. Two years ago, the General Accounting Office revealed that the Army had put 35,000 soldiers in the wrong jobs—helicopter mechanics being used as life guards and dog handlers, et al. But this small public disclosure changed nothing. In January, after a new inspection, the General Accounting Office found the military still employing its manpower as follows: A ground communications repairman was working in the Keesler Air Force Base hobby shop; a tank mechanic was serving as a game warden at the Fort Hood rod and gun club; a Navy man knew no skills, since he had been a pin setter at the officers' bowling alley at a San Diego air station since his enlistment.

The need for the draft appears to have no relation to the "reserves," a happy group whom Defense Secretary Robert McNamara—apparently viewing it as a kind of Concord militia, not to be used until the Yellow Peril's flotilla rides through the San Pedro breakwater—has said he does not intend to call up "at this time." Some manpower shortage!

At the other end, with boys too poor or too ignorant to go to college, the government is suspected of using the Army as a dampening influence on social unrest. As Charles Bartlett expressed it in the Washington Star: "The manpower needs of the military are combining with apprehension over the plight of the uneducated to foment new ideas for redirecting the nation's unutilized youth."

Hershey's plan to induct 30,000 uneducated boys and school them up to the minimum level was turned down by the Senate. But there is more than one way to make sure that the front lines are filled with potential troublemakers, and there is some reason to think that the Job Corps may be one of them. Of the first 200 graduates of the Job Corps, three went to college and eighty joined the armed forces, having been physically and mentally tooled up for their new service by time in the Job Corps.

Hershey often makes remarks that indicate he looks upon the Army as an excellent finishing school for clods, but there is plenty of evidence that this is just recruit-poster talk. Testifying before a Veterans Affairs subcommittee last year, Arthur W. Farmer, deputy chief benefits officer of the Veterans Administration, said that the Army is brimming over with educational opportunities for the underprivileged. Sen. Robert Kennedy pinned him on that one.

> Kennedy: "You said a boy going into the military services advances his education while he is in the military service. What percentage do that? How many have moved on a year in high school? Or how many received a high school education in the services?"
>
> Farmer: "Without being able to give you specifics, I would have to say that it is not inconsiderable."
>
> Kennedy: "You don't know?"
>
> Farmer: "That is right."
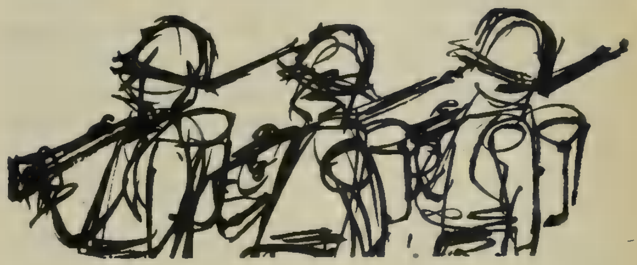
>
> Kennedy: "Why don't you say you don't know. That is what the answer is."

What are our reasons in terms of both dollars and humanity for maintaining the present Selective Service System? Why is it impossible to have open hearings to consider the merits and demerits of a voluntary, professional army, similar to Canada's? Is the draft being used to abuse and subdue? Is the recruit program purposely held down?



The Johnson Administration offers neither answers nor the mechanics for getting answers, and it has actively connived to prevent anyone else from getting some answers.

In March and April of 1964, a great wave of enthusiasm was building up in Congress to really dig into the draft question and make some sense of it with a bipartisan Congressional committee. Both Curtis and former Sen. Kenneth Keating had bills that looked promising.

But only four days after Keating—joined by Allott of Colorado, Bennett of Utah, Miller of Iowa, Morton of Kentucky and Prouty of Vermont—introduced his draft review bill, President Johnson called a press conference and announced a "comprehensive" review of the draft—to be conducted by the Department of Defense. He thus killed any chance Keating and Curtis might have had.

The President's move involved a strange about-face. Back in 1959, when Eisenhower had attempted the very thing Johnson was now proposing, he was thoroughly denounced by leaders in the Senate for trying to pre-empt Congressional duties. Said Sen. Richard Russell:

> Congress has the responsibility. It will not escape it by giving to the executive department the power to appoint a commission to review the matter. Is the President likely to appoint a commission which will support the view of Congress and will be somewhat critical of his position? Or will it not be more likely to sustain the views of the President? It is about time that we got away from attempting to meet every problem by the appointment of a commission. . . . Usually we end by getting the same recommendations from the commissions that we have had from the Department of Defense on the same subject. It is really a new way of asking for the views of the Department of Defense.

Precisely the same complaints could have been addressed to Johnson, and yet when he does not even bother with the front of a "commission" but puts the study directly into the hands of the Pentagon, one does not hear a peep out of this Administration's Congressional henchmen. It did not puzzle them, apparently, that a study initiated by Kennedy had been going for seven months. What had happened to it? Why a new Presidential study on top of one that was already in progress?

All such quibbling was set aside when, with a great flourish and a $1 million budget, the Department of Defense assigned thirty-five men full time to complete the new study, the deadline being last April. Although the report is now almost a year overdue, nothing has been heard from the study group, except for a few preparatory leaks to favorite newsmen that the draft will have to be continued as is, indefinitely.

John McClaughry, an aide to Prouty, nicely summarizes the strategy:

> Johnson may not be the inventor of the phantom committee, but he is rapidly becoming a master of its use.
>
> Several Congressmen or Senators—it doesn't matter of which party—get interested in what they believe to be a serious problem. They agitate for a serious study effort, by a select committee of Congress or by a special Presidential commission. Bills are introduced, speeches delivered, letters sent to the President stating the urgency of the matter and pleading for its support.
>
> But for reasons of his own the President does not want the issue aired. The solution: with much fanfare the President establishes a phantom committee. On paper, the committee makes a frontal assault on the problem it faces. In practice, the committee does little or nothing. Its main purpose is to quiet the demands of Congress by assuring the public that something is being done.

Curtis and the others knew what Johnson was up to, but for a while they had to pretend that he was sincere. Now they have waited long enough to show that the President has no intention of attempting to cope with the draft problem, and they are ready once more to ask that the Congress take control. There must be quite a few young men who wish them luck.

FREEDOM'S CRISIS

THE LAST STEEP ASCENT

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

At the beginning of each year, Martin Luther King, Jr., presents in The Nation an annual report on the progress of civil rights. The essay here following is the sixth of these reviews, the earlier ones being: "Equality Now," February 4, 1961; "Fumbling on the New Frontier," March 3, 1962; "Bold Decision for a New South," March 30, 1963; "Hammer of Civil Rights," March 9, 1964, and "Let Justice Roll Down," March 15, 1965.

At the end of 1965 the civil rights movement was widely depicted as bewildered and uncertain, groping desperately for new directions. The substantial legislative accomplishments of the past several years, it was argued, dealt so extensively with civil rights problems that the movement had become stagnated in an embarrassment of riches. Negro leaders, we were told, did not know how to maintain their assembled armies nor what goals they should seek.

The dominant white leadership of the nation, in perceiving the civil rights movement as uncertain and confused, is engaged in political projection. The Negro freedom movement has a policy and a program; it is the white power structure that gropes in indecision. White America, caught between the Negro upsurge and its own conscience, evolved a limited policy toward Negro freedom. It could not live with the intolerable brutality and bruising humiliation imposed upon the Negro by the society it cherished as democratic. A wholesome national consensus developed against extremist conduct toward nonwhite Americans. That feeling found expression in laws, court decisions, and in the alteration of long-entrenched custom. But the prohibition of barbaric behavior, while beneficial to the victim, does not constitute the attainment of equality or freedom. A man may cease beating his wife without thereby creating a wholesome marital relationship.

The quality and quantity of discrimination and deprivation in our nation are so pervasive that all the changes of a decade have merely initiated preliminary alterations in an edifice of injustice and misery. But the evils in our society oppressing the Negro are not now so heavy a social and moral burden that white America cannot still live with them. That is the dilemma of 1966, for which the white leadership has no clear and effective policy. The logic of growth means that the civil rights odyssey must move to new levels in which the content of freedom is security, opportunity, culture and equal participation in the political process. Negro goals are clearly defined, their tactics are tested, suitable and viable. The lag is appearing in the white community which now inclines toward a détente, hoping to rest upon past laurels. The changes it must accept in the new circumstances, however logical, have not been faced nor accepted as compelling.

The period which has been completed, though attended by turmoil and spectacular events, was relatively easy to accomplish. Negroes not only furnished the drive but by disciplined adherence to nonviolence swiftly educated and won millions to the righteousness of their demands. For the white majority there were few hardships, and the lifting of some burden of guilt adequately compensated for any limited inconvenience.

The future is more complex. Slums with hundreds of thousands of living units are not eradicated as easily as lunch counters or buses are integrated. Jobs are harder to create than voting rolls. Harmonizing of peoples of vastly different cultural levels is complicated and frequently abrasive. It is easy to conceive of a plan to raise the minimum wage and thus in a single stroke extract millions of people from poverty. But between the conception and the realization there lies a formidable wall. Someone has been profiting from the low wages of Negroes. Depressed living standards for Negroes are a structural part of the economy. Certain industries are based upon the supply of low-wage, underskilled and immobile nonwhite labor. Hand assembly factories, hospitals, service industries, housework, agriculture operations using itinerant labor, would all suffer shock, if not disaster, if the minimum wage were significantly raised. A hardening of opposition to the satisfaction of Negro needs must be anticipated as the movement presses against financial privilege.

Beyond this, long-established cultural privileges are threatened in the next phase. We have seen in the effort to integrate schools, even in the more tolerant Northern urban centers, that many reasonably unbigoted persons assume a new posture with the introduction of unfamiliar problems into school systems where they have a personal interest. In the quest for genuinely integrated housing, the intensity of opposition from many who considered themselves free of prejudice has made it clear that this struggle will be attended by tenacious difficulties.

It is against this reality that the new period must be analyzed. Negroes have benefited from a limited change that was emotionally satisfying but materially deficient. As they move forward for fundamental alteration of their lives, a more bitter opposition grows even within groups that were hospitable to earlier superficial amelioration. Conflicts are unavoidable because a stage has been reached in which the reality of equality will require extensive adjustments in the way of life of some of the white majority.

There is no discernible will on the part of white leadership to prepare the people for changes on the new level. This is the program that is absent. No one has been told what slum elimination actually entails or what the transition from equality to opportunity really involves. One is forced to believe that the answers have not been forthcoming because there is no genuine conviction that such fundamental changes need be on any early agenda.

All profound social movements reach a plateau of this sort, short of the summit, and the presence of new opposition should not dismay us. Because we have accumulated substantial successes we have been able to reach the inner walls of resistance. That was our goal. The new obstacles should not be deplored but welcomed because their presence proves we are closer to the ultimate decision. These walls will yield to the same pressures that left the outer battlements in fragments behind us.

Government policy with respect to recent legislation reveals the contradictions that cloud the forward movement of civil rights. At the beginning of 1965, it was clear that the Administration was satisfied to rest on the legislation of the previous year. It felt the digestion of so heavy a feast of victories would occupy the civil rights movement for years. But our first step in February to employ these rights released the whirlwind. The attempt at Selma to brutalize Negroes once again stimulated decent Americans to a glorious moral moment of flaming indignation. President Johnson's passionate reaction made political history and his Administration moved with commendable dispatch to enact the Voting Rights Act of 1965. It was aided very significantly by the Goldwater debacle. The elections of 1964 broke the decades-old Congressional alliance of Dixiecrats and Northern conservatives, and sent to the Congress some fifty new Representatives who were receptive to fresh thinking.

With the passage of the memorable Voting Rights Act, the Administration once more proclaimed that the door to freedom had been flung open. Not since the promulgation of the Emancipation Proclamation had the hopes of Negroes been so high. But the year that came in like a lion went out like a lamb. There were increases in voting registration, there were some accretions to the list of token desegregated schools; but sweeping implementation nowhere appeared. Restraint and caution became public policy. The 1965 voting law applied to more than 500 Southern counties, but more than six months after its enactment only thirty-seven counties had received federal registrars. In the most important county of the South, where the city of Birmingham is located, every form of sophisticated evasion was employed. We had to organize daily demonstrations, to face again police brutality, and to arrive almost at the brink of another holocaust, before the Department of Justice finally acceded and appointed federal registrars. The open door to freedom turned out in practice to be but slightly ajar, and even after mass action only a sliver of freedom was sliced off and served to a desperately hungry people.

Title Six of the same act had armed the government with substantial power finally to force school desegregation. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare wrote militant letters to school boards explicitly declaring that federal muscle would be used to break the resistance of a decade. Yet when the sound and fury abated, school desegregation continued merely to crawl forward.

The poverty program, which in concept elated the Negro poor, became so embroiled in political turmoil that its insufficiencies were magnified by paralyzing manipulations. Big-city machines felt threatened by it and small towns, particularly in the South, directed it away from Negroes. Its good intentions and limited objectives were frustrated by the skillful maneuvers of experienced politicians. The worst aspect of these negative experiences was the doubt cast upon the program as a whole and the discredit sustained by those Negroes involved directly in its administration. To launch a program with high-minded goals and to fail to safeguard it from opportunists and enemies amounted to sabotage, whether deliberate or undeliberate. It should have been obvious that Negroes, who alone were under pressure for results, would encounter difficulties in administration. They were ill prepared to handle the complexities that attended any novel and wide-ranging program. Yet they would have been successful even with their limitations if their efforts had not been impeded in so many instances by hostile municipal officials. At almost every turn malevolent press reports and irresponsible charges denigrated the projects that Negroes headed. Rumors and suspicions of corruption and waste proliferated until it became a hazard to assume responsibility.

Only a few weeks ago the President presented a plan to Congress for rebuilding entire slum neighborhoods. With other elements of the program it would, in his words, make the decaying cities of the present into "the masterpieces of our civilization." This plan is imaginative; it embodies social vision and properly defines racial discrimination as a central evil. However, the ordinary Negro, though no social or political analyst, will be skeptical. He knows how many laws exist in Northern states and cities that prohibit discrimination in housing, in education and in employment; he knows how many overlapping commissions exist to enforce the terms of these laws—and he knows how he lives. The ubiquitous discrimination in his daily life tells him that more laws on paper, no matter how breath-taking their terminology, will not guarantee that he will live in a "masterpiece of civilization." Laws affirming Negro rights have in every case been circumvented by ingenious evasions which render them void in practice. Laws that affect the whole population—draft laws, income-tax laws, traffic laws—do work, even though they are unpopular; but laws passed for the Negro's benefit are so widely unenforced that it is a mockery to call them laws. The missing ingredient is no longer the will of governments to enact legislation; what is absent is the will to make it operative. There is a double standard in the enforcement of law, and a double standard in the respect for particular laws.

The Negro in 1966 now challenges society to make law real on the neighborhood level, down in the ghetto streets where he lives, works and seeks opportunity. Equal protection of the law is still substantially a national myth and a national disgrace in the reality of Negro life. In 1966, the Negro response is no longer a passive skepticism, nor is it expressed in the cynicism of inaction. A decade of sporadic and sometimes coordinated nonviolent action has educated him in the methodology of social change. He has learned how to compel the enactment of law, how to utilize to a degree some laws and how to expose spurious laws. He has learned that his adversaries are cunning, skillful and resourceful in obstruction and evasion. He has learned that governments do equivocate and retreat, no matter how exultant they are when they seek credit for legislation. Finally he has learned something about himself: Negroes are not now merely a subject of change but an active organ of change. This is the new political equation in contemporary society.

The regression of government after momentum has developed, the omission of the necessary planning and implementation to give reality to the law, are not accidental phenomena. The defaults merge into a pattern reminiscent of the period following the Civil War. Chattel slavery was abolished, but a program to transform slaves into citizens was omitted. Negroes left the plantations in hundreds of thousands expecting that the government that freed them would pursue the logic of its own act and create a structure into which they could fit. When this was not done, Negroes themselves improvised, sacrificed and struggled to gain a foothold on secure shores. However, the omissions inexorably caught up with them, and their enemies, only partially defeated, gained the breathing spell to reassemble and renew their power. The era of hope ended with the return of Negroes to a more sophisticated form of slavery that was to last nearly a century.

The danger of this period is not that Negroes will lose their gains. History will not repeat itself in a simple cycle. It can, however, fail to move forward and can become stalled on a higher plateau without prospect of reaching the summit.

The white power structure had to remake the South and Negroes seized the moment of change to fit the fabric to their needs. Evolving modern industrialism is being forced to reshape urban centers into which 70 per cent of the population is already absorbed. Once again Negroes will not allow change to flow around them, but will insistently demand to be elevated with the majority. The key question now confronting the nation is whether a swiftly transforming society is to be permitted to give tokens to the Negro, while the white population ascends to new levels of social development.

Historic decisions have yet to be made which will determine the context of the future. The dominant white majority appears to lack policy and sincere purpose, but the Negroes, contrary to common belief, have a policy and a program. Having driven a sharp wedge into the once solid wall of resistance, they plan to hammer it in with increased force and vigor. Already they have shaken the political foundations of the South. Where once Atlanta was a singular example of Negro political emergence, today tremors are shaking state-wide areas of segregation. Utilizing the 1965 Voting Act where it was implemented, and acting without it where it was nullified by inaction, Negroes have patiently built significant voting power. They are a major factor in the forthcoming gubernatorial race in Alabama, that symbol of implacable resistance. In six counties of the state Negro registration exceeded white by the end of 1965. The hallowed state capitol, from which the Confederate flag still flies, will be host to black legislators, estimated at not less than eight members in the House and one member in the Senate.

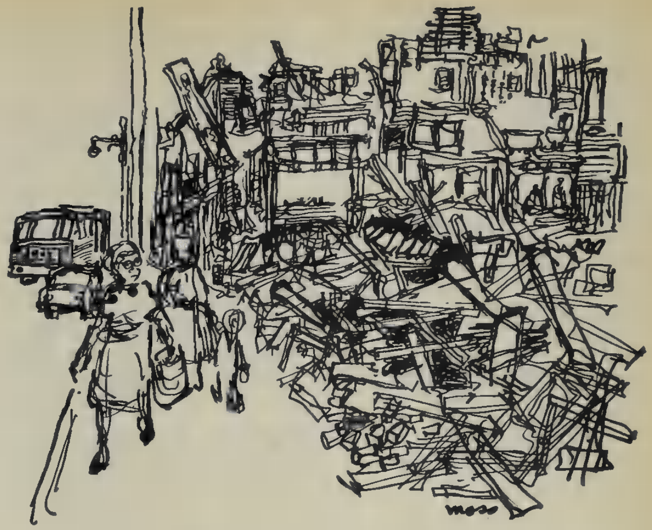
More important than this, however, is the transformation of the old segregationist official from a single-minded racist into something approximating a Northern style politician. In January, in Alabama, as the lines of black people stretched before registration offices day and night, the state Democratic Party removed the slogan of white supremacy from the party symbol. It may still live on in many hearts, but it is disappearing from tongues. Two years ago, I wrote in The Nation that the solid South was already fissuring along a seam that divided the industrializing regions from the old plantation South. Today the entire Old South is in dissolution. The momentum of change will not abate. Negroes are signing themselves into citizenship at the rate of thousands each day.

In the North, a new, more complex front is emerging. Neglected during the entire period of change, the slums are smoldering and seething. It would have been wiser for white America to have seen for itself that the slums were intolerable and dispersed them. But many white people of even reasonably good will simply know too little of the agony of ghetto existence to make slums as dispensable as segregated lunch counters. People of ill will still stubbornly cling to the determination to maintain a double standard of social and economic justice.

The experience of SCLC in Chicago already indicates that Negroes of the North are prepared to move and that token concessions will not blunt their drive. When 168 organizations representing all levels of the community are able to unite around a militant program to end slums, ghettos are on the way out even though for the moment they maintain their bleak existence.

When SCLC went into Birmingham in 1963, we said that if this capital of segregation suffered even a single defeat the effects would radiate across the South. Birmingham has met a succession of defeats and is influencing not only the South but the North as well. Chicago is the capital of segregation in the North; transformations of its slums will leave no Northern city secure with its own.

Mass nonviolent action continues to be the effective tactic of the movement. Many, especially in the North, argue that the maximum use of legislation, welfare and anti-poverty programs now replaces demonstrations, and that overt and visible protest should now be abandoned. Nothing could prove more erroneous than to demobilize at this point. It was the mass-action movement that engendered the changes of the decade, but the needs which created it are not yet satisfied. Without the will to unity and struggle Negroes would have no strength, and reversal of their successes could be easily effected. The use of creative tensions that broke the barriers of the South will be as indispensable in the North to obtain and extend necessary objectives.



These are partial elements of the Negro's program for freedom. Beyond these is one of singular importance which will be featured in the North—economic security. This is usually referred to as the need for jobs. The distinction made here between economic security and jobs is not semantic. A job in our industrial society is not necessarily equivalent to security. It is too often undercut by layoffs. No element of the working people suffers so acutely from layoffs as Negroes, traditionally the first fired and the last hired. They lack the seniority other workers accumulate because discrimination thwarts long-term employment. Negroes need the kind of employment that lasts the year through. They need the opportunity to advance on the job; they need the type of employment that feeds, clothes, educates and stabilizes a family. Statistics that picture declining rates of unemployment veil the reality that Negro jobs are still substandard and evanescent. The instability of employment reflects itself in the fragile character of Negro ambitions and economic foundations.

Whether the solution be in a guaranteed annual wage, negative income tax or any other economic device, the direction of Negro demands has to be toward substantive security. This alone will revolutionize Negro life, including family relations and that part of the Negro psyche that has lately become conspicuous—the Negro male ego.

Our nation is now so rich, so productive, that the continuation of persistent poverty is incendiary because the poor cannot rationalize their deprivation. We have yet to confront and solve the international problems created by our wealth in a world still largely hungry and miserable. But more immediate and pressing is the domestic existence of poverty. It is an anachronism in the second half of the 20th century. Only the neglect to plan intelligently and adequately and the unwillingness genuinely to embrace economic justice enable it to persist.

Social conflict is not the product of skilled agitation. The apathy from which Negroes suffered for so long was derived from their powerlessness and their acceptance of the myth that abundance was not available. They are now accumulating power; they are taught by every media of communication that we are so opulent we can enjoy both butter and guns. That is why they confront the white power structure with their program and challenge it to produce one of its own. The creative combining of both programs would unite social and economic justice into a single package of freedom.

The Negro in 1966 does not issue his challenge in isolation. Selma in 1965 made clear that there are white Americans who cherish decency and democracy; who will physically come to the scene of danger; who will fight for their nation not only on foreign battlefields but where its integrity is threatened within its borders. When 50,000 Americans, white and Negro, Protestant, Catholic, Jew and nonbeliever, assembled in haste from all corners of the land at Montgomery, there lived again in a luminous moment the spirit of the Minute Men who at Lexington and Concord electrified the world.

Negroes expect their freedom, not as subjects of benevolence but as Americans who were at Bunker Hill, who toiled to clear the forests, drain the swamps, build the roads—who fought the wars and dreamed the dreams the founders of the nation considered to be an American birthright.

CONGRESS & FOREIGN POLICY

THE TIMID POLITICAL WILL

EDWARD A. KOLODZIEJ

Assistant professor of government, University of Virginia, Mr. Kolodziej will publish this spring The Uncommon Defense and Congress, 1945-1963 (Ohio State University Press).

The most critical questions raised by last month's Fulbright hearings did not concern the present situation in South Vietnam. Why, one is compelled to ask, did the Congressional probe come so late, long after it might have had a salutory impact on United States policies in that area, and why has there not been a continuing Congressional debate, not only on Vietnam but on all aspects of American global strategy and foreign policy?

A study of these puzzling questions reveals fundamental weaknesses in popular and Congressional attitudes toward foreign policy and in the institutional response of Congress in defining that policy. Since its inception during the Eisenhower administration, the Vietnamese commitment has been shrouded in secrecy. The demand for secrecy and, concomitantly, for limiting public and Congressional debate, grew progressively as American involvement became deeper in the 1960s. The underlying justification for these constraints was, and still is, that the nation lives in a hostile world and domestic dissent must be suppressed lest the enemy gain from internal disagreement. The logical corollary is that only through such restraint can sufficient national will, including human and material resources, be harnessed to defeat the enemy on the battlefield or at the conference table.

It is in this frame of mind that the Congress has repeatedly been asked to make solemn pronouncements in support of contemplated Presidential actions abroad, whether in South Vietnam, the Middle East, the Formosa Straits or Greece. These resolutions, framed in the broadest possible language, inevitably give the President the broadest freedom of action and discretion. He is handed a blank check on which to write the amount of American commitment to a variety of often dubious foreign projects, without continued and close Congressional review and consent. In effect, Congress mortgages its moral and political right to influence and criticize the application of Administration policy. It cannot very easily criticize the President's actions when it has so generously defined his mandate. The evolution of Vietnamese policy exemplifies the unhappy consequences of Congress' abdication of its governmental responsibilities, now only belatedly and imperfectly discharged by the Fulbright hearings.

The periodic and almost ritual affirmations of Congressional resolve to support the President have the added pernicious effect of creating the misleading impression that fundamental decisions on foreign policy have been taken after careful Congressional scrutiny. A considerable part of the ideal of democratic government—that government policies rest on a majority consensus forged in heated debate and discussion—is thus sacrificed to the claims of strategic necessity.

But need the sacrifice continue? While it is foolish, if not a little dangerous, to doubt that the nation lives in a turbulent and perilous world, it is equally simplistic to think that this condition of life is temporary or atypical. The mass of the American people and even the Congress may not realize it, but the United States has lived in precarious circumstances throughout most of this century. The traditional principle that the President and the government should be unreservedly and uncritically supported for the duration of a current crisis is therefore of doubtful applicability. The crises facing the nation have mounted, multiplied, and been almost continuous since World War II, and there is little likelihood that the future will bring relief.

In this context, urgent and sustained calls for unity in foreign affairs lose their force. However valid any particular appeal may be, there is now the serious danger that a consistent pattern of suppressing differences will become habitual and that the nation will become accustomed to a radical and ominous transformation in its system of government.

And for what purpose? The frenetic search for security through secrecy, deception and managed news can lead ultimately only to the loss of the security so avidly sought. In a democracy, enduring and effective security and foreign policies imply broad popular consensus based on full knowledge of objectives and their implications. An ignorant or coerced Congress and public are not dependable elements in constructing and executing an effective foreign policy, particularly as they become increasingly aware that they have been misled or duped. What is more, policies are likely to be sounder if they are adopted after sharp and exacting debate over the alternatives available, and to be more responsive to new conditions if subjected to periodic and systematic review. By such means the nation avoids, for example, the ossification of policy positions so characteristic of totalitarian regimes.

Debate may give a superficial impression of internal rupture and rift, but its proper functions are to inform and, equally important, to help the nation and Congress choose from among alternative proposals. Strong, not weak, policies are its aim: a united, not divided, nation its principal objective. If debate on foreign and security policy takes place only episodically, erratically, and then only haphazardly, rather than on a systematic and predictable basis, especially when the vital interests of the nation are at stake, how can those abroad avoid the supposition that deep fissures exist in public opinion when debate does suddenly and unexpectedly erupt? How can the nation convince others that debate and decision are intrinsic parts of its governing process, that they are sources of strength, not weakness, if it has not convinced itself?

A point generally overlooked is the formidable obstacle that the existing organization of Congress, with its fragmentation of power and responsibility among a bewildering number of committees, places in the way of greater and more probing foreign policy debate. Devising a coherent foreign policy implies an overall knowledge of the nation's goals abroad, the threats, military and nonmilitary, to their realization and—most critical of all, since national resources are inherently limited—hard choices as to which objectives will be supported, for how long and to what extent. Congress, however, does not operate that way. Strategic and foreign policy problems, encompassing a variety of military and nonmilitary factors, are broken down and parceled out among a host of independent and often conflicting committees in the areas of foreign relations, armed services, government operations and atomic energy—to name only a few. Further refinements are made in the appropriations subcommittees that parallel in number and complexity the standing and special committees.

Foreign policy issues, having been meticulously divided among the committees in terms of narrow jurisdictional prerogatives, are not subsequently pieced together to form a synthetic view and comprehensive evaluation of the nation's foreign and security policies. Instead, each committee concentrates on gathering disparate and not necessarily related scraps of information that fall within its area of interest. The task of systematically coordinating the information and insight of the various committees, a precondition to constructive Congressional debate of Administration proposals, is neglected, indeed consciously shunned. Yet it is only by posing alternatives that Congress can exert a beneficial effect on foreign policy.

As a result of existing Congressional arrangements in the legislature, the pattern of Congressional understanding of the foreign and security imperatives facing the nation is as coherent as a blind man's attempt to make a crazy-quilt rug. Some legislators stress economy, others the threat of Red Chinese expansion, still others Soviet penetration of Latin America or an alleged internal Communist threat. Lacking guidelines to select among the foreign policy problems that come before it in terms of their relative importance and mutual implications, and having little incentive to develop them, Congress is poorly equipped to enlighten itself or the public, even less the executive branch, by discussion and debate.

The dispersal of power in Congress produces not only a shriveled political intelligence but also a timid political will. Expediency breeds in an atmosphere of decentralized power where policy is the product of shifting, unstable coalitions from problem to problem. Each Congressman and committee, operating willy-nilly from a position of weakness, is induced to press for only marginal alterations in existing policies, or to avoid raising profound questions at any point in a pattern of marginal shifts in Administration proposals, although the accumulation of changes over time, as in Vietnam, may fundamentally transform the nation's position abroad. Unable through their own efforts to change policies in any significant degree, each legislator and committee commits his piece of power to limited purposes. The rule of thumb is simple enough: the broader the issues raised the larger the number of interests and viewpoints that are challenged, and, accordingly, the more powerful the potential opposition that may be galvanized. Legislators are conditioned to believe that it is better to seek changes in those policies that can be revised by the small amount of power at their respective disposal, than to attempt to move mountains by one's intellect and rhetoric and still remain ineffective.

While many thus brawl and battle over marginal adjustments of policy, others adopt less taxing courses of action. They either oppose most Administration initiatives, especially those requiring the expenditure of funds for economic aid abroad (as in the cases of Reps. John Rooney and Otto Passman), or they shirk foreign policy programs and wager their meager chips of power solely for personal ends. If a stand on a foreign policy issue cannot be avoided, there are compelling incentives to ally with the President. The legislator thus gains a powerful friend where otherwise he might create a formidable enemy. Thus Congressional styles differ, but in the end they all share the defect that none prompts the legislator, individually or working through committee, to search for major alternatives to Administration proposals that might improve the nation's position and image abroad.

Given the debilitating effect of decentralized power and responsibilities in Congress, it is surprising that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings have been held at all. Their tardiness conforms to a general pattern that has emerged from World War II. Only when outside shocks have been administered, as in the case of the Korean War in 1950, the flight of Sputnik in 1957, and the prospect of general war in Asia in 1966, does the Congressional policy process respond—temporarily and traumatically—to meet a clear and present danger to the nation's interests and objectives. Once the emergency has passed, it returns to its curious organization and procedural habits. The policy process thus falls further and further behind the accelerating rate of revolutionary developments abroad that it is supposed to influence and shape.

While no ready cure exists to make Congress more adaptive to foreign policy problems, it would be useful to seize upon the annual passage of the federal budget as an occasion to review and debate the entire range of the government's policies on a timely and predictable basis. A change of this nature would require the reintroduction of a general appropriations bill into Congress in place of the present practice of passing twelve to fifteen disparate and seemingly unrelated appropriations measures during each Congressional session. The budget, which is the President's plan for the distribution of the government's resources, outlines the cost and presumed benefits of both foreign and domestic programs. The human and material resources needed to achieve stated goals are revealed at that time, and comparisons can be made as to the utility and wisdom of each. The relation of foreign and domestic policies can be more clearly grasped if they are viewed as integral parts of a larger allocation process. Since the budgetary cycle is annual, a comprehensive review and debate of federal policies can easily be regularized and institutionalized. Deviations from existing policies from year to year can be more quickly and sharply identified for special examination and debate. Debate on the federal budget can become the core of the legislative process and the basis for a more informed public and a more influential and effective Congress. But it is important to recognize that improvement in this context, though it might be significant, would be only a start. It would much resemble the first incision of a major operation to save a dying patient who is not at all sure that he is suffering from an implacable ailment, and objects, violently, to each necessary step in the operation.

TWO GI'S IN LIMBO

HARRY W. ERNST

Mr. Ernst is Washington correspondent for The Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette.

"I have little doubt they will be spending Christmas with their families," the Associated Press quoted an unidentified U.S. official in Bangkok. "They left Korat Monday afternoon (Dec. 6) aboard an Air Force plane bound for the U.S.," The New York Times reported.

But three months later Sgt. George E. Smith of Chester, W. Va., and SP/5 Claude E. McClure of Chattanooga, Tenn., who criticized the Vietnamese war after they were freed by the Vietcong in November, still haven't arrived in the United States. They may be lucky if they spend Christmas, 1966, with their families.

The enlistments of Smith and McClure expired while they were prisoners, but the Army says that their status as enlisted men continues until they are discharged, which won't be until the charges against them are cleared up. The Army has told inquiring Congressmen that it intends to keep the two young soldiers on Okinawa until it disposes of their case. "The Army never said they would be flown home for Christmas," a Pentagon spokesman said.

After getting as far as Okinawa, Smith and McClure were charged with aiding the enemy "in its efforts against the United States by preparing, furnishing and delivering to the Vietcong certain documents, statements and writings inimical to the interests of the United States."

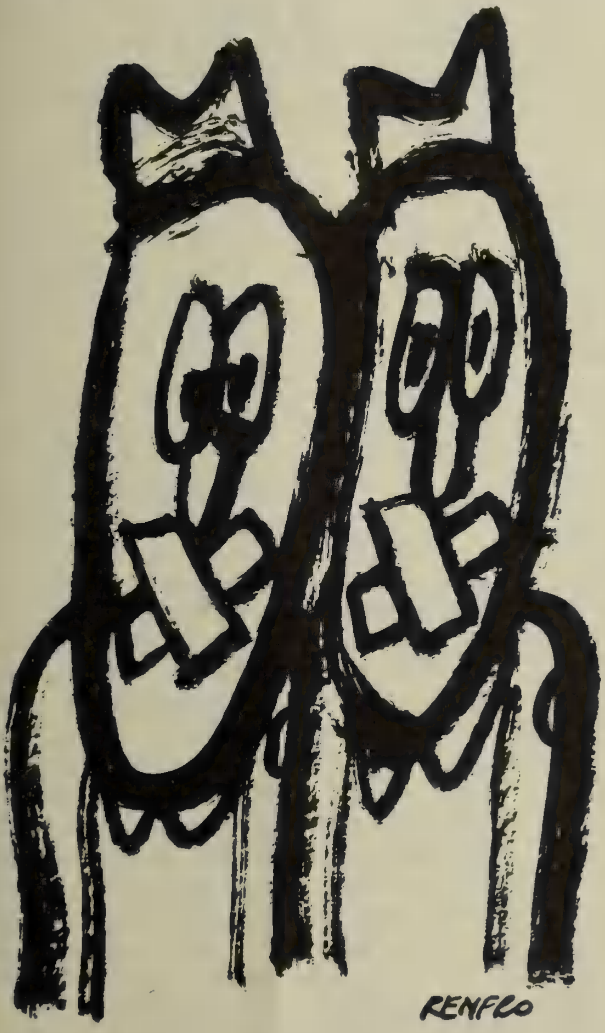
No such documents have been released by the Army, which says a preliminary investigation is still under way to determine whether the charges should be dismissed or the two soldiers should be brought to trial. The Army denies that they are being held incommunicado as several peace groups have charged. Newsmen have been unable to interview Smith and McClure, but the Army says that this is at their request, made through the "legally qualified military counsel" assigned to them. "Sergeants Smith and McClure are on a full-duty status at an Army installation and have not been under any form of restraint," the Army wrote several Congressmen. "They have been permitted to send and receive mail, make telephone calls, visit service clubs and libraries as they desire."

An ocean between them and their country obviously isn't considered a "form of restraint" by the Army. The curious way in which the Smith-McClure case has been handled, coupled with the Johnson Administration's low marks for credibility in matters concerning the Vietnamese war, challenges the Army's picture of the two soldiers sipping beer and browsing through magazines on a Pacific island while facing possible execution (the maximum penalty for aiding the enemy).

Why did the Army apparently switch signals on other U.S. officials and fly Smith and McClure to Okinawa instead of home for Christmas? After all, they had been prisoners of the Vietcong, which overran their Special Forces camp near Saigon in 1963, for two years. Wouldn't it have been only simple decency to reunite them with their families while the investigation proceeded?

Why have newsmen been unable to talk with them on Okinawa? If it is because of concern that pre-trial publicity might be detrimental to their case, why hasn't the Army said so? Its failure to use that argument, which would bolster its position, especially if the men were returned to the U.S., indicates that the Army isn't deeply concerned about such legal safeguards.

Peace groups suspect that the Army's real motive in keeping the two soldiers on the other side of the globe is to avoid stirring already troublesome anti-war sentiments at home. After they were released by the Vietcong, Smith and McClure said they wanted to see strong efforts made to end the war in Vietnam, which they doubted the U.S. could win.



"The inference is inescapable that these men are being held in Okinawa to penalize them for their views . . . and to prevent their return to the United States where they might be able to tell their story to the American people," Mrs. Margaret Russell wrote President Johnson. She is chairman of the Washington Area Committee on Vietnam.

The case of Smith and McClure also raises a basic constitutional issue that could become critical as more American soldiers are sent to Vietnam. Arthur John Keeffe, professor of law at Catholic University in Washington and an authority on military justice, says the Army possibly has no legal right to detain Smith and McClure.

Keeffe was chairman of a naval board that reviewed the court-martial sentences of 2,500 men in Navy prisons at the end of World War II. The board's report became the basis for the Uniform Code of Military Justice under which Smith and McClure have been charged. Keeffe argues that Smith and McClure are in effect accused of disloyalty or treason (aiding the enemy). He thinks it would be unconstitutional for the Army to court-martial them on such a charge because the Constitution requires the holding of treason trials in federal district courts before juries and the government must establish that an overt act of treason was committed.

"It looks like their case might be won with competent legal defense," Keeffe observed. "But a writ of habeas corpus [requiring the Army to bring them before a civilian court] should be filed against Secretary of Defense McNamara in a regular U.S. District Court."

However, no one supposes that the Army officers assigned to defend Smith and McClure will raise the constitutional issue by appealing to civilian courts. Such action would be interpreted by their superiors as an indictment of military justice.

Although the American Civil Liberties Union is investigating the case, it doesn't now have any clients to represent even if it decides to become involved. Smith and McClure are on faraway Okinawa where the Army says they aren't being held incommunicado but only want to be left alone. And thus far their families have shunned offers of free legal aid. Smith's mother, Mrs. Thomas M. Potts of Chester, W. Va., says she has been advised by a friend that it is "better to keep it quiet right now and not have anything in the papers."

The Smith-McClure case already resembles a tale by Kafka. No one but their accusers are able to talk with the two soldiers whose enlistments have expired, but who are charged with a serious if vaguely defined crime that supposedly rests on evidence which only their accusers have seen. Pre-trial publicity may be the only hope of assuring justice for Smith and McClure. If the President really cares about the credibility of his Administration, he should return the two soldiers to the United States, make certain that they are provided with competent civilian legal counsel, and permit newsmen to question them in the presence of their attorneys.

AN AMERICAN IN CUBA: PART I

SEEING ORIENTE IN A JEEP

ERWIN ROY JOHN

Some months ago, Dr. John was in Havana, attending an International Conference on Cortical-Subcortical Relationships in Sensory Perception, at the invitation of the Cuban Academy of Sciences. At the close of the conference, which had been preceded by a formal tour of the countryside, he made the proposal which resulted in the experiences detailed below and in a second installment to be published next week. Dr. John is research professor and director of the Brain Research Laboratories, New York Medical College.

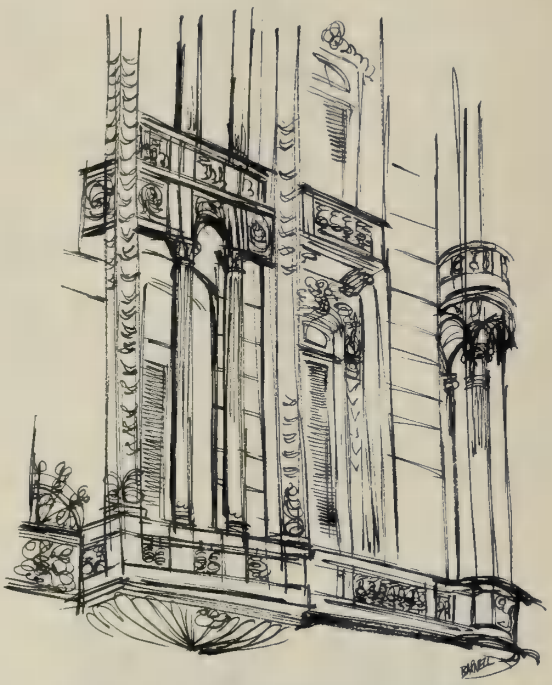
The day before the International Conference ended, my American colleague and I went to a reception with President Dorticos. Since American participation had been an unprecedented relaxation of our ostracism of Cuba, he found the time to chat with us and said, in passing, that it was a shame we had not more opportunity to form our own impressions of Cuba. I responded politely, but stored his comment away in my memory. The next day, Capitán Nuñez-Jiménez, president of the Cuban Academy of Sciences, spoke at the closing session of the symposium. Afterwards, the participants were all invited to take a formal tour of Oriente province, including the Sierra Maestra mountains where Castro began his bid for power.

Purely on impulse, I approached Capitán Nuñez-Jiménez, and told him that further formal exposure to Cuba, however pleasant, was too artificial and contrived for me to get any trustworthy impressions. Emboldened by his nod of agreement, I made what I thought was an outrageous suggestion. I offered to spend several days exploring Cuba if he arranged the following: I wanted to be flown to Santiago de Cuba in Oriente province, to be provided with a jeep, a good mountain driver, an interpreter and a document from the government authorizing me to go where I pleased and do whatever I might choose to do. In exchange, I would undertake on my return home to tell whoever might be interested exactly what I saw, whether good or bad. As I spoke, a spark of interest came to his eyes, and he replied: "That's an extremely interesting idea. I'll let you know."

The fact that I was willing to make the proposal is itself perhaps one striking indication of the impressions I received about Cuba. However, I expected to hear nothing further about it, or at most to receive a polite refusal. The next night was the beginning of Carnival, and I was standing with a group of scientists engrossed in studying clusters of semi-clothed young ladies perched on extravagantly decorated floats, when a slim young miliciano tapped me on the shoulder and said, "Come." Reluctantly, I followed him through the crowd to the corner, where I found Nuñez-Jiménez waiting. He handed me an envelope and said: "It has been arranged. You will leave tomorrow morning. Your interpreter will be at the hotel at 6 A.M. Have a good trip."

The envelope was inscribed: "To all civil and military authorities." The official document inside said in part: "The wishes of Dr. John are those of the Revolutionary Government. We thank you in advance for your cooperation with him in all possible ways." It bore the seal of the Academy and was signed by Capitán Nuñez-Jiménez.

At 6 the next morning, I met my interpreter in the hotel lobby. Efraim Trujillo left Cuba in the early 1950s and came to New York, where he started a successful decorating business. In 1959, he returned to Cuba because, as he put it, "I am a Cuban, and I wanted to build a new Cuba." He was a sportily dressed young man, habitually wearing sunglasses and a sweater. He spoke fluent English. My high school Spanish is halting, but adequate for slow speech and understanding slow conversation. The ground rules which we immediately laid down were that Trujillo would speak slowly and would translate all the conversations sentence by sentence, so that I could keep tabs on all that was said. He was an enthusiastic participant in my project, and insisted throughout our travels that everyone answer the sense of my questions.



We drove to the airport, where we boarded a flight for Santiago de Cuba. Upon our arrival, we found waiting a Russian Yak jeep and our driver, a young bearded ruffian named José Ismael Gendis. "El Morro," as he was called, was a native of the Sierra Maestra, and proved that he could drive a jeep where goats were hesitant to go. This 23-year-old was also extremely considerate, not only asking frequently whether he could be of service, but departing at a gallop to do whatever I might ask.

We ate a hasty lunch of cold crayfish, as a prelude to leaving civilization, and piled into the jeep. I had learned before leaving Havana that one of the major political prisons was at Boniato, a half hour's drive outside Santiago, and announced that we would visit it. Trujillo was dubious about our chances of getting in, but agreed that it was worth trying. As we pulled up at the main gate of the prison, I raised my camera to get a snapshot of the guards for the folks back home, and found myself staring down the barrel of a Russian submachine gun. The guard leveling the gun told me that one did not take pictures. After some haggling and study of my precious letter, Trujillo persuaded him to lower his gun and let me keep my camera.

The lieutenant in charge of the guard detail then appeared and took us to the office of the comandante, a brusque and stolid individual who wanted to know what business we had in his territory. We explained that I was an American interested in learning about the living conditions of political prisoners, and that I had permission to do so. The comandante was not very sympathetic to the idea, although he remained scrupulously polite throughout. When I said that I wanted to tour the prison, talk with the prisoners and photograph what was of interest, he reached for a book on his desk. "These are the regulations I am instructed to carry out, and they explicitly forbid anyone from talking with or photographing the prisoners. Unless my superior, the Minister of the Interior, arrives personally and so instructs me, I must adhere to these regulations. You may tour the prison, but no conversation and no pictures." I agreed to abide by the rules.

We left the office and walked through the prison grounds, which consisted of about twenty large barracks and mess halls surrounded by open land. I noticed several groups of prisoners lounging in the shade of the buildings. Two such groups included men with guitars, and occasionally bursts of song could be heard. A baseball game was in progress on a diamond behind the barracks, with both guards and prisoners participating. Guards were on first and second, with two strikes on the batter when we entered a nearby barracks. Each cell block was locked, and armed guards were in the entrance way. Inside, the men were taking showers, dozing on their bunks or watching television. A few were cooking their dinners on gas stoves which were in each cell. I was informed that families were permitted to send food to supplement the prison diet. Everyone looked adequately fed. The cells were unlocked. A prisoner and a guard were playing chess in the aisle. Laundered clothes were hanging in several cells. Each cell contained six to eight bunks arranged in tiers two or three high. Everything was scrupulously clean.

At the end of each cell block was a classroom, with about twenty desks and a blackboard. The first we entered contained a group of eight prisoners and a prisoner instructor. They were engaged in a class on long division. The prisoner at the blackboard was obviously embarrassed by his inability to handle the problem. On the wall were charts of the solar system, a world map and a slogan: "Education is the battlefield for our fight against the past."

Prisoners work six hours daily at various jobs. Many of them spend several hours a day in the classroom, on a voluntary basis. I was told that most, but not all, of the prisoners participate. With apparent pride, the comandante informed me that 95 per cent of the prisoners in his custody are now literate, compared to 40 per cent literacy when they were imprisoned. I was surprised by the implication that many of the prisoners were peasants and workers; I had supposed that they would come predominantly from the middle class. The rehabilitation program includes training in reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, mechanics, carpentry, agricultural methods and politics.

Prisoners receive occasional passes to go home, can be released when they have learned a trade or when "political acceptance" seems to have been accomplished. I would estimate that there were about 5,000 prisoners at Boniato. I have been told that there are about 12,000 political prisoners altogether, and that from 300 to 400 are released each month. The most recent execution of which I heard was in April, 1964, of one man who supposedly betrayed a group of four who plotted the assassination of Batista.

My request to visit the sick bay was refused, for unstated reasons. It may well be that there are areas in the prison which I did not visit and where a different picture could be seen. In the portion that I did see, however, there was no evidence of brutality or mistreatment of prisoners. There is an obvious and intensive rehabilitation program, adequate food and housing. At the same time, discipline is strict. Barracks snap to attention when an officer enters, and the prisoners are most definitely in prison. Their conditions seemed at least as good as those of the German POWs whom I guarded for a brief period after World War II.

From Boniato, I swung around to the southwest and headed up into the Sierra Maestra foothills. The road was good and we climbed quickly. Our route took us through well-tended countryside, dotted with small houses surrounded by shrubs and kitchen gardens. Chickens, pigs and goats were abundantly evident. The farm workers whom we passed were using hand implements, and I saw no agricultural machinery, although occasionally a truck lumbered through a field. As the afternoon wore on, we passed groups of children playing baseball. The several small towns along our route were uniformly dreary but clean. Many houses had battered American cars parked nearby. Boys wore shirts and jeans or dungarees, and girls wore colorful print dresses. All children were wearing shoes. Adults were often clustered around open-air coffee stands, or in the corner bars which sell both beer and liquor. From time to time, we stopped for coffee or a snack. The coffee was strong and excellent. Sandwich stalls sold salami, cheese and ham sandwiches. I found the ham very good and the cheese, from the Soviet Union, tasted like sharp Cheddar. Bread was excellent. Sandwiches cost 20c to 35c; beer about 50c.

Adults were dressed casually, but were usually neat and clean. There was an air of camaraderie in the cafés, with frequent horseplay and laughter. We passed a number of store-front reading rooms and classrooms, in which groups of people were studying. Here, as in Havana and elsewhere, one got the impression that Cuba was a vast schoolroom. The "battle for the 6th," a program directed at raising the whole population to at least the 6th-grade level, is broadly publicized and appears to have enlisted genuine participation among vast numbers of workers.

At dusk, we reached Ciudad Camille Cienfuegos. Here, in the heart of the mountains, a huge school-city has recently been constructed. We arrived to find reading rooms, recreation halls and classrooms ablaze with light and full of children. We parked and walked over to a gym packed with boys and girls doing acrobatics, playing basketball and just milling around. The children ranged from 12 to 18 years old. They were uniformly dressed. The girls wore pink blouses and gray skirts, and the boys wore white shirts and gray pants. They were shining clean and bubbling with good spirits. Trujillo stuck his head in and watched for a while, turned to me and said: "What do I care what the norteamericanos think? This is what the revolution was for!"

We enlisted a friendly student to find a professor, who appeared shortly and amiably provided us with a guest bungalow for the night. This was a neat, sparsely furnished three-bedroom dwelling with a kitchen. We ate ham sandwiches and beer which El Morro organized from somewhere, and went out to watch the children for a while. Groups of girls and boys were marching to and fro, chanting in cadence and singing in unison. This militaristic activity was a jarring note in an otherwise pleasant picture, but the drill appeared to be voluntary, children falling into ranks or drifting away as their mood dictated. I struck up a conversation with a young man who had taught music in the school for two years. He had studied in private school and with the director of the Santa Clara symphony. He and a group of other teachers provided me with information about the curriculum and procedures of the school.

There are presently four working units in the city, and two more which I saw were to begin operation in a month. About 1,900 students are now in residence, and the two new units will accommodate 1,000 each. These students are brought together from the mountain schools, of which there are at present 638. Some of these schools are staffed by only one teacher, the largest have twelve. The total student enrollment in mountain schools is 35,000. According to the principal of one of them, there were only eighteen schools in this region before the revolution.

The organization of these schools varies. Some are day schools, with students receiving lunch at school. Some, in more sparsely settled areas, are weeklong boarding schools; students arrive each Monday morning and depart each Friday evening. At Ciudad Cienfuegos, students live from February to October. Families come to visit on Sunday. In November, half the students go home for a month's vacation, while the other half study agriculture by on-the-job training at school farms. In December, these groups switch. Regular schools have a three-month vacation.

The students at Ciudad Cienfuegos now come from the Sierra Maestra, and have been selected to become secondary schoolteachers. Next summer, the program will be changed to a technological and agricultural high school. Students from Oriente, and from the Escambria and Cordillera mountain regions in Piñar del Rio, will come here after they finish the 9th grade. Four thousand students from those areas are presently housed in student areas in Havana, receiving intensive training so that they can enter Ciudad Camille Cienfuegos next summer. We saw much evidence of these students while in Havana, since they occupy an area consisting of many blocks of luxurious mansions, converted to classrooms and dormitories. The 120 teachers for this new technical school are now completing their training at Havana University. They will teach such subjects as soil chemistry, agricultural techniques, veterinary medicine. The expansion rate planned for this facility is extremely demanding, with 20,000 students and a three-year program planned by 1970. Twelve other "agri-institutes" are already in operation, scattered through the provinces, with a total enrollment of 18,000 students.

As might be expected from the crash nature of this educational program, there are obvious and glaring inadequacies in the instruction. They became apparent in interviews which I conducted the next morning with students and teachers picked at random. Teachers, frequently volunteer workers from other Latin American countries, instruct classes that are perilously close to their own educational level. The students, although bright and enthusiastic, know consistently less than one would expect from an American child at the same grade level. Extemporaneous oral quizzes, which I improvised for the clusters of students surrounding me, revealed a qualitative familiarity with such subjects as physics or geometry, but a quantitative inadequacy. When I asked a group of geometry students how they would know if a proposed formula, say for the area of a triangle, were accurate, it became clear that the idea of a geometric proof was new to them. Rote learning rather than understanding was the educational goal. Looking at the colorful modern buildings and the eager faces, one could not fail to lament the waste of the educational opportunity. Cuba must make a generation of properly taught students to serve as the teachers for these intellectually hungry youngsters, yet it lacks the trained manpower for this bootstrap operation.

Given an opportunity the children bombarded me with questions: "Why did we oppose Cuba's revolution? Why did we mistreat Negroes? Why did we bomb Vietnam?" Their attitude, like that of so many Cuban adults I had met, reflected inability to understand our actions rather than hostility.

We went next to the infirmary, which we found to be a modern one-story building, staffed by young University of Havana graduates, full of pride for their hospital. The hospital contained eighty-five beds, of which seventy-five were occupied. Patients included students at the school and some people from surrounding villages. Mountain folk clustered about the steps, waiting to see the doctor. The major causes of hospitalization were gastroenteritis and parasitic infection. Neither of the doctors whom I interviewed had completed a full internship. Both had graduated from the University of Havana Medical School last year; they felt able to take care of the bulk of the medical problems they faced, and sent difficult patients to Manzanilla, thirty-five minutes away, where there are two general hospitals. The hospital was clean and orderly. I saw Chinese, Czech, Hungarian and Soviet drugs and equipment, as well as some American instruments and drugs from the prisoner exchange. I asked the doctors if they listened to the Voice of America. They laughed and said they did. They enjoyed the music and thought the factual accounts broadcast about Cuba so absurdly untrue as to be ridiculous. This opinion corresponded with other comments I heard.

ARITMETICA II

I found an interesting set of questions and answers written on the blackboard in the hospital classroom, apparently part of the weekly lesson in politics:

> (1) What do we say when we are accused of exporting revolution? Revolution cannot be exported, only ideas.
>
> (2) What can Cuba offer to other people? Ideas and examples of how to work and help the people.
>
> (3) Where did our revolution come from? Our workers, farmers and students.
>
> (4) When is it necessary to make a revolution? When conditions are like those in Venezuela, in Nicaragua, in Costa Rica.

We left the hospital in late morning and headed up into the mountains. The concrete road gave way to a dirt track, which wound and climbed through rugged and wild mountains. About an hour later we passed the construction site of a large dam, where modern earth-moving machinery was abundant. Climbing higher, we picked up two workers who were returning home after some time spent cutting cane in the valley. They felt that the volunteer cane workers from the cities were extremely helpful. Although very inefficient at first, they were usually able after several days' experience to contribute a real day's work to the harvest.

Several hours later we arrived in San Lorenzo, an orange-growing mountain village, composed largely of mud huts with thatched roofs. I had taken off my shirt during the hot drive, and as I moved to get out of the jeep El Morro reminded me that there were girls in the village. Properly covered, I asked to talk with the local priest, and was told that there was no church and no priest in San Lorenzo, nor had there ever been. Members of Jehovah's Witnesses, who are fairly active in that area, make occasional visits. A fair-sized building on the edge of the town square proved to be a school containing 1,132 students from neighboring mountain areas. Students live in school dormitories. They ranged from 11 to 16 years old, and from the 2nd to the 6th grade. The school has forty teachers, headed by a principal trained at the Santiago School for Teachers. There are four other elementary schools of comparable size in the district, and a secondary school for 5,000 students in Mina del Prio. These schools are for brighter children, and use an accelerated program, the purpose being to provide a supply of students for teacher training schools. Four other schools in the district pursue a normal curriculum.

Walking around the village, I saw a woman drawing water in a bucket from a small stream, and asked her if we might chat for a moment. She had two small children, playing by the side of the stream. Her husband works in the grocery store as a clerk, for 75 pesos a month. I asked her how well she could manage for her family on that income. She said she worked in the drugstore as a clerk and also made 75 pesos a month. She said that she could feed her family adequately. They have meat every Saturday night, eggs several times a week and an occasional chicken. Enough money is left to buy clothes or cloth for sewing. I asked what she wanted most for her house, and she said she had everything she needed. Pointing to the small new medical clinic on the edge of the village, she indicated that the village people were well off.

The grocery store was across the square from the school, and I went over to check the stocks and prices of a mountain store. After drinking a lemon soda, we asked the proprietor if we might look at the storeroom behind the counter. Abundant supplies of the following were on the shelves:

Rice, 20c/lb.; white flour, 9c/lb.; peanut oil, 51c/lb.; condensed milk, 20c/can; fruit soda, 5c/bottle; soap 14c/bar, unrationed canned meats from various Eastern European countries, 34c to 48c/can; various canned fruits, averaging 30c/can; and huge metal tins of crackers $4 for 200 crackers. Fresh beef costs about 40c/lb., and is rationed to permit ½ lb. for each person per week. Bread costs 20c/lb. In addition to these foods, there were Chinese pencils for 5c, glasses for 9c and flashlights for 70c. Canvas shoes cost $2.90 per pair. The campesinos raise their own chickens, pigs and vegetables. Hanging from nails on the wall were seven Soviet submachine guns. I picked one up and found the drum fully loaded. The storekeeper smiled and said: "We must defend our revolution!" (To be continued)

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Cities of the Dreadful Night

AN AREA OF DARKNESS. By V. S. Naipaul. The Macmillan Company. 281 pp. $5.95.
THE ANGUISH OF INDIA. By Ronald Segal. Stein and Day. 319 pp. $6.50.

EDWARD R. F. SHEEHAN

A Bostonian, a journalist and novelist who has been in the American Foreign Service and has traveled widely in India, Mr. Sheehan is the author of Kingdom of Illusion (Random House), a novel about power politics in the Middle East. He is now in Paris writing a novel about power politics in Massachusetts.

A few years ago I had occasion to visit Calcutta and Las Vegas within the same fortnight. It would be difficult to say which of the two I found more terrifying. Nehru once called Calcutta "the city of nightmares," but it seemed to me that in its own way Las Vegas might merit a similar description. In Calcutta, strolling one afternoon by the banks of the River Hooghly, a tributary of the divine Ganges, I came upon a creature whose sex I could not at first identify, crouching in a garbage pit. He, or she, wore what seemed to be an undershirt on top and a batch of brown rags around the loins. A mop of filthy hair covered the creature's face but did not mute its cry for baksheesh, and then she lifted the brown rags to reveal the secrets of her body. Not only was she in the advanced stages of starvation, but apparently near the final phase of pregnancy as well. I stooped down, stuffed some rupees into her hands, and ran away.

A day or so later I visited the municipal crematorium down on the docks. The bodies to be burned, clad in white garments, were laid out on wooden cots and festooned with flowers. One body was not clothed as the others, and when I approached, it appeared familiar: here were the same brown rags about the loins, the same filthy undershirt, the same infested hair, brushed back now in death. In her arms she clutched a tiny, inanimate bag of skin and bones. Was this my beneficiary, I wondered, and had she borne this baby in the garbage pit by the banks of the holy Hooghly? Had some compassionate Hindu found my rupees clenched in the woman's hands and, in his reverence for the dead if not for the living, used them to pay for this modest immolation?

And then Las Vegas. What struck me most was not so much the meretricious opulence of the casinos, the vulgar vapidity of the comedians, nor even the decadence of those bronzed and pomaded patrons bunched about the slot machines. No, what I remember best is the ultraviolet lamp sterilizing the toilet seat in my motel ("Sanitary—For Your Protection," read the paper band around the toilet seat); the Sanitary Napkin Disposal Bag placed nearby ("For Personal Hygiene and Cleanliness—Preferred by Particular Women"); the sealed cellophane around my water tumbler ("An Individual Service—This glass has been made sanitary and carefully wrapped to Keep It Clean for your personal use"). All that, and the drive-in hamburger heaven, where they attached a pliable pipe to my car window and bathed me in refrigerated air while I, on that mild summer evening, munched on my Dagwood Bumsted Super-Burger.

The contrast between Calcutta and Las Vegas continued to haunt me as I read these two horrifying books on contemporary India. For if we are to accept the conclusions of V. S. Naipaul and Ronald Segal, India is in a hopeless condition, and not even a vast increase in aid could make any serious difference.

An Area of Darkness is dazzling—considerably more so than Segal's work (for Naipaul is an accomplished novelist), but for some reason the results are less impressive. One is repelled by the India that Naipaul conjures up: "The starved child defecated at the roadside while the mangy dog waited to eat the excrement." One is also slightly repelled by Naipaul. Himself an Indian, born and raised in Trinidad, educated in England, Naipaul undertook a year's journey in the land of his fathers in a tormented attempt to discover his own beginnings. But his discoveries are so inseparable from his own complexes that halfway through his pilgrimage we long to go the rest of the way without him. Nothing he sees in India seems to please him; compulsively, he ridicules practically everything he encounters. He even complains because the trains run on time. ("A service so complex and fine deserves a richer country"). Consequently, one wants to agree with the judgment of Raja Rao on this book: as a report on Indian conditions it is devastating; as a portrait of India it is devoid of understanding.

And yet, however much Naipaul may get on our nerves, we cannot shake off the suspicion that sometimes he understands all too well:

> They tell the story of the Sikh who, returning to India after many years, sat down among his suitcases on the Bombay docks and wept. He had forgotten what Indian poverty was like. It is an Indian story, in its arrangement of figure and properties, its pathos. It is Indian above all in its attitude to poverty as something which, thought about from time to time in the midst of other preoccupations, releases the sweetest of emotions. This is poverty, our especial poverty, and how sad it is! Poverty not as an urge to anger or improving action, but poverty as an inexhaustible source of tears, an exercise of the purest sensibility.

Pitilessly, he scrutinizes the superstition which still infests India (even cabinet ministers consult astrologists); the absurd mimicry by educated Indians of an England that never really existed (an army officer exclaims, "I say, by Jove! I feel rather bushed!"); the abandoned public defecation:

> Indians defecate everywhere. They defecate, mostly, beside the railway tracks. But they also defecate on the beaches; they defecate on the hills; they defecate on the river banks; they defecate on the streets; they never look for cover. . . . These squatting figures . . . are never spoken of; they are never written about. . . . The truth is that Indians do not see these squatters and might even, with complete sincerity, deny that they exist: a collective blindness arising out of the Indian fear of pollution and the resulting conviction that Indians are the cleanest people in the world.

Segal's book, much less subjective than Naipaul's, is in some respects even more discouraging. A liberal South African journalist, Segal was asked by his publishers to go to India on the theory that he would approach it without the preconceptions of someone accustomed only to the rich white societies of the West. But Segal is honest enough to spell out his preconceptions at the beginning of his book: "I can see why others may believe it more important to be holy than to be fed, but I cannot believe it. I am an unregenerate materialist and in my view no sense of mystery or grace of manner, no delicacy of movement and form, can compensate for the massive damage done by Indian hunger."

Segal and Naipaul each stresses the continuing and pervasive importance of caste in modern India. Indeed, to Segal, caste remains the fundamental rhythm of the subcontinent's life. Both authors find Hinduism, for all of its romantic and mystical associations, the most destructive of religions. Despite all of Gandhi and Nehru's pleadings to the contrary, it is the twin Hindu essentials of karma and dharma that continue to paralyze the great mass of India's millions: the Hindu is born into a particular caste because of his deeds in a previous life; he must accept his condition, no matter how degrading, without question. Indifference is the ultimate Hindu virtue. Under such a metaphysic, protest and reform become impossible; society remains static. Naipaul writes:

> Study these four men washing down the steps of this unpalatable Bombay hotel. The first pours water from a bucket, the second scratches the tiles with a twig broom, the third uses a rag to slop the dirty water down the steps into another bucket, which is held by a fourth. After they have passed, the steps are as dirty as before; but now above the blackened skirting-tiles the walls are freshly and dirtily splashed. The bathrooms and lavatories are foul; the slimy woodwork has rotted away as a result of this daily drenching; the concrete walls are green and black with slime. You cannot complain that the hotel is dirty. No Indian will agree with you. Four sweepers are in daily attendance, and it is enough in India that the sweepers attend. They are not required to clean. That is a subsidiary part of their function, which is to be sweepers, degraded beings, to go through the motions of degradation. . . . And to this they willingly submit. They are dirt; they wish to appear as dirt.

As for the rich, it is their caste function to be rich, which they accept with equal fatalism; to respond to the suffering of others is to be irreligious; it is their dharma to resist any attempt to make them share their abundance. Relatively few Indians dispute this, least of all the poor themselves—even the landless, many of whom find land reform morally repugnant.

It is Segal's thesis that under such conditions significant economic advance is out of the question—nor can it become possible until India gets a government that is truly willing and able to make a frontal assault on the immemorial character of Indian custom. He has collected an overwhelming body of evidence to prove his case. The real income of most of India's people has probably declined since independence in 1947, if for no other reason than because the population increase has simply canceled out most of the meager statistical progress that has been achieved. Human fertility in turn has contributed to the rapidly expanding specter of famine. Under the mounting pressures of population—India now has nearly 500 million people—the impoverished Indian of today is astonishingly less well fed than the one of a century ago. In 1878, the average per capita consumption of food was 25.7 oz. a day; now it is about two-thirds of that. If the population growth continues at its present rate, India will number 800 million by the late 1980s and a billion before the year 2000, when there may well be even greater starvation than there is now. In the light of all this, Segal finds India's series of Five-Year Plans "less a programme for disciplined development than an intricate exercise in wishful thinking." Indeed, by trying to compromise between the "spiritual" noncoercive reformism of Gandhi and the "secular" revolutionary theories of Nehru, the country's whole experiment in a mixed economy has fallen between the two stools. Furthermore, Nehru's failure as Prime Minister to follow through on his pre-independence Socialist ideals—his failure to pursue in any effective way his ideological conviction that India's political freedom would remain meaningless until Indian society itself had achieved economic justice—is one of the great contributing factors in the country's present predicament.

For though it is "Socialist" by doctrine and reputation, India's government in fact pampers the rich. The share of the public sector in the output of organized industry was less than 10 per cent five years ago and remains probably less than 20 per cent today. The callousness of the Indian rich is apparently without limit; they, too, are afflicted with the Indian inability to see, and to them the encompassing misery of their countrymen is simply invisible. Sixty per cent of the population earns less than $70 per capita per year, while the rich evade taxation with impunity; the top 10 per cent of the population enjoys more than a third of the national income and a quarter of the country's aggregate consumption. Moreover, it is the intimacy between government and business in India that is responsible more than any other factor for the incredible corruption which pervades the government in city and village alike. "The rulers remain remote from the ruled," Segal writes, "but the rulers are now merchants and manufacturers as well as administrators. Together they constitute a new kind of caste." The reigning Congress Party has become particularly enslaved to the entrepreneurs who, more and more, deserve to be called the ultimate rulers of India today.

Segal despairs of India until its nominal rulers begin to rule—and by that he means rule ruthlessly, restraining privilege and embracing anew Nehru's earlier exhortations to employ whatever coercion is necessary to attain the country's declared Socialist goals. "The alternative, an even further impoverishment of the poor who compose the vast majority of the Indian people, bears no real relation to democracy or freedom." One might add that Shastri, Nehru's successor, proved himself unequal to this task; he did not so much govern India as preside over its deterioration. Indeed, though India may not need a Mao, it seems to be in obvious need of an Atatürk. Whether Mrs. Indira Gandhi, Nehru's daughter and Shastri's successor, can attain to such a role remains to be seen; one tends to suspect that she cannot and will not.

Could more American aid help to turn the tide? Again, Segal appears convinced that, lacking that outright revolution in the Indian psyche itself, American aid will remain an irrelevant or at most a marginal force. Whether or not one agrees with Segal's skepticism about the future, it does seem safe to say that American aid to India since 1947 has not been very effective—nor even has it been quantitatively impressive in proportion to the population of the country and its ghastly problems. Nehru's foreign policy of nonalignment—a perfectly understandable policy under the circumstances, not the least being India's geographical propinquity to the Soviet and Chinese giants—deprived India of the immense American help it needed during the most crucial moments of economic planning. Under Dulles, the American Government was far less concerned with the destitution of the Indian people and their experiment in democracy than it was obsessed by the military threat of communism and the need for strategic alliances. Excluding arms, American aid to India in loans, grants and surplus food has exceeded $5 billion in value during the last twenty years, the preponderant part of that having been extended since 1960; moreover we have increased our food shipments following the latest drought. But even when combined with all other aid from all other countries, including the Soviet Union, the total foreign investment in India has averaged less than 81c a year per inhabitant. (In 1958-59 alone, foreign aid per capita to Israel was $46.80.) American assistance to India, even conceding all of the factors discouraging investment catalogued by Segal, has been culpably inadequate.

And so my memory of Las Vegas, juxtaposed with Calcutta, continued to form my frame of reference as I read these books. America's Gross National Product will probably exceed $720 billion in 1966. President Johnson's foreign aid budget—much of which will pay for nonproductive arms assistance and 80 per cent of which is actually to be spent within the United States—amounts to only $3.4 billion for the coming fiscal year. That represents only 3.5 per cent of the federal budget and less than one-half of 1 per cent of our GNP. Meanwhile, as India starves, we consecrate ourselves to the obliteration of every last microbe on our toilet seats, and to the building of bigger and better Dagwood Bumsted Super-Burgers. If the Indians suffer from the sin of indifference, then so do we. And if Indian poverty is degrading, then so—before the fact of that poverty—is American prosperity. The gulf between Calcutta and Las Vegas is as much a judgment on us as it is on Naipaul's defecating multitudes.

"But the Indians themselves don't really want to be helped," insist Naipaul and Segal. They may be right about that, and obviously Segal is right when he says that the fundamental resolution of India's problems can only come from within India itself. But certainly a nation that can afford to put a man on the moon can do more than it has done till now to assuage the squalor of terrestial India. A few years ago the American Congress refused to subsidize the construction of an Indian steel mill because it was "Socialist." Certainly we can begin to look beyond our own jingoism and recognize that, lacking as it does the preconditions essential to a capitalist system which is both viable and just, India needs not less socialism but a lot more. Certainly we can strive to encourage the more rapid evolution of a truly distributist (and non-Communist) regime in India. Certainly we can direct our aid, not to deflecting Indian socialism, but to helping it function effectively. The cost of such a venture might be very high. But if India badly needs to get a greater fraction of our abundance in order to go on living, then even in a worse way do we need to give it in order to go on living with ourselves.

Ho Chi Minh: Poet in Leg Irons

PRISON DIARY. By Ho Chi Minh. Translated by Aileen Palmer. (Second Edition.) 101 pp. Hanoi: Foreign Languages Publishing House. $1 paper.

JONATHAN MIRSKY

A teacher of Chinese at the University of Pennsylvania, Mr. Mirsky has recently returned from a visit to Vietnam.

It is possible that Lyndon Johnson knows that Mao Tse-tung is a poet. Someone on the President's staff may have mentioned the importance of Mao's writing poems for his image as an Asian leader, and our leading political tactician will assume that Mao engages a poem writer. But poems from the wispy old Red in Hanoi! The Chief of State after whom our President has named one of his dogs! The poems are in Chinese. Clearly this new (translated) edition must be the final link in the Washington-perceived, Hanoi-Peking chain.

The collection does, indeed, shed a faint gleam on early Vietminh-Chinese relations. In 1942, when he was 52, Ho Chi Minh was arrested as a spy in south China. The circumstances are unclear, the few authorities disagree, and Ho himself says little about the affair. For fourteen months he was ceaselessly shifted from local jail to jail under what the poems describe as arduous conditions, complete with leg irons.

Shortly before his arrest Ho briefly re-entered Vietnam for the first time in thirty years after a round-the-world conspiratorial existence which puts veterans of the Long March to shame. Who else in the Communist world (or any other) can claim to have (a) baked for Escoffier at the London Ritz; (b) helped found the French Communist Party; (c) attended the University for the Toilers of the East in Moscow; (d) lectured at the Chinese Military Academy when Chiang Kai-shek was its superintendent; (e) been imprisoned by British Security in Hong Kong and successfully defended (in absentia) by Sir Stafford Cripps in London, and (f) worked as a signals specialist in the Chinese Communist Eighth Route Army — all before 1942? During this period, in 1930, he had founded the Vietnamese Communist Party while watching a soccer game in Hong Kong.

The two years before his imprisonment saw a marked acceleration in Ho's drive to organize the Vietnamese Nationalist underground; they coincided with Japan's seizure of Vietnam. Returning to China Ho was arrested in the territory of a Nationalist Chinese general who probably suspected him of being a Communist agent (the general has since denied everything). The same officer, upon Ho's release in 1943, is said to have installed him in a provisional Vietnamese government-in-exile, but none of this is possible to pin down; the introduction to the Diary is deliberately vague, claiming that in 1943 Ho "took the road back to the frontier."

The editor remarks that Ho Chi Minh's name "has long been known to the public in the West," and that: "We do not wish to expatiate on the political life of the author." Things might be easier for everyone had the publisher been less retiring, and the Diary is, in fact, a valuable small lens for peering into Ho's personality.

What kind of a poet is Ho Chi Minh? He writes in Chinese, and four of the originals are included here with the translations. I confess to having scorned them at first: individually they seem banal, obvious and lacking in fresh imagery. The English translation is dull but accurate (dealing creditably with an example of Ho's ability to pun with ideographs). A French translation of the same poems by Phan Nhuan, published in Paris by Pierre Seghers, is quite delightful. But one must read the whole Diary.

This is, after all, a running account of prison life. The spirits of the prisoner rise and fall. Ho's poems never achieve the sweep of Mao's, but should we expect anything else when the poet is enclosed and his view limited to glimpses? Compare two poems about journeys, the first by Mao:

Mountains!
Faster I spur
  my coursing horse,
  never leaving the saddle,
I start as I raise my head,
For the sky is three foot three above me!
    (Translated by Jerome Ch'en)

This, by Ho:

Along the way we travel, the guards are carrying pigs.
Pigs travel on guards' shoulders, while men are dragged in irons.
Once a man is forced to surrender his natural human freedom
The value of a man is less than a pig.

According to the preface, Ho wrote in Chinese because "his jailers would have suspected all material written in Vietnamese." No doubt true, but more to the point is that educated Vietnamese habitually used Chinese for serious literary expression. Such an explanation is less satisfying when extolling a great nationalist hero (and nowadays the poems are available in Vietnamese). The language is simple but generally in familiar Chinese forms, although the traditional heavy use of allusion is absent. Here again Ho differs from Mao, whose poems are so densely allusive as to sometimes require comment from the poet himself.

A paradox of modern Chinese poetry, however, is its use of ancient forms with an essentially modern tone (not to mention subject). There is about it an insistent public optimism which leaves one exhausted. (Mao's poems are lacking in this Rotarian quality; their particular assertive qualities find an echo in early poet-warriers.) From the thirties, leftist Chinese critics insisted that poetry must depict real life, inculcate certain values and, above all, be intelligible. Mao wrote: "What we demand is unity of politics and art, of content and form, and of revolutionary political content and the highest possible degree of effectiveness in artistic form." This has led to many tiresome poems about assembly lines and the toiling masses and, often, little art. (Mao is the exception.)

At the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century a group of Vietnamese patriot scholars, educated in the traditional Chinese classics, promoted a movement of reforms in Vietnamese literature. One of their main goals was the simplification of style, especially the elimination of Chinese classical allusions. Ho Chi Minh was influenced by this school, some of whose members had studied in Japan and France.

Ho Chi Minh's greatest traditional poetic power lies in his contemplative privacy. True to fashion the diction is simple, but the unfailing determined hopefulness of Chinese Communist poetry would sound especially false emanating from provincial jails. What we find instead is world weariness:

> Having climbed over steep mountains and high peaks,
> How should I on the plains expect to meet greater danger?
> In the mountains I met the tiger and came out unscathed:
> On the plains, I encountered men and was thrown into prison.

Wistful contemplation:

> For prisoners there is no alcohol nor flowers.
> But the night is so lovely how can we celebrate it?
> I go to the air-hole and stare up at the moon.
> And through the air-hole the moon smiles at the poet.

Fatalism:

> Each of us has a ration of half a basin of water
> For washing or brewing tea, according as each may choose:
> If you want to wash your face, then you must go without brewing tea:
> If you want a drink of tea, then you have to go without washing your face.

Miserable loneliness:

> In the cold autumn night without a mattress, without blankets,
> Lying with back curled round and legs folded up close,
> I try in vain to sleep. The moonlight on the plantains
> Increases the sense of cold, and through the window bars
> The Great Bear draws up alongside and looks in.

Dragged through thirty prisons, exasperation sets in:

> With transfer after transfer the journey stretches out.
> I have had enough of this.

Finally even the poet who wrote: "Instead of weeping I prefer to keep singing," begins to lose hope:

> The blue sky purposely shines out to tease me.
> Eight months now I have lost in the grip of the fetters.
> And a day seems worth a thousand taels of gold.
> When shall I ever again enjoy days of freedom?

Mao Tse-tung, too, had his moments of melancholy. Written in 1957 about the execution of his beloved second wife, there is a poem not a line of which can be understood without some literary detective work. The reason is simple: Mao was writing twenty-seven years after his tragedy. Ho was living in his.

An insight into Vietnamese independence is found in this poem:

> All over Asia flutter the anti-Japanese flags:
> Big flags or little flags—they are not all the same
> Of course, big flags we must have, but we need the little flags, too.

Less politically significant, but memorable from a man whose words are now studied on Vietnamese desks everywhere:

> To live without freedom is a truly wretched state.
> Even the calls of nature are governed by restrictions.
> When the door is opened, the belly is not ready to ease itself.
> When the call of nature is pressing, the door remains shut.

We must, finally, remember the audience. Ho Chi Minh is a great figure in Asia. Literally millions read his words (although his printed output, unlike Mao's, is meager). The charm noted by virtually all who have met him, his sympathy for his fellow prisoners, his occasional preoccupations with scabies, bowel movements and lost teeth can only enhance his stature as a humane revolutionary leader. The propaganda impact must be terrific. Ho Chi Minh's tribulations will not interest Lyndon Johnson, but his attention should be caught by these lines:

> Without the cold and desolation of winter
> There could not be the warmth and splendor of spring.
> Calamity has tempered and hardened me,
> And turned my mind into steel.

Tree of Many Branches

THE CRIPPLED TREE. By Han Suyin. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 461 pp. $5.95.

EDGAR SNOW

Author most recently of The Other Side of the River (Random House), Mr. Snow has for many years written extensively about China.

Han Suyin is the daughter of a Chinese railway engineer and his Belgian wife, whom he met when a student in Brussels. Their marriage produced eight children; the quantity reflected a Catholic conscience rather than grandiose planning. By grace of this disorder, Han Suyin herself arrived rather late under the shade of a China which she describes, not without humor, as more hell than paradise. The Crippled Tree follows the years 1881 to 1928, and their inherited handicaps to free growth and natural fulfillment.

> I wanted to write a book about my father and mother and about China, and one day the idea took shape in action, and then it grew, as such seeds do, sprouting and then straightening into a distant shape, a tree of many branches; and as I too lived through years full of change and revolution, I too had to look back, look homeward, and write about that earth-changing time which took place in our generation.
>
> I was born because there had been, in China, a Boxer Rebellion (as Europeans called it) in 1900, and because of this event, which the Chinese call the Uprising of the Righteous Fists, my Chinese father, instead of becoming a classical scholar, married my Belgian mother.

Readers who know Han Suyin's romantic A Many-Splendored Thing, and works of fiction and international intrigue published since then, may be pleasantly surprised at the maturity and new analytical dimensions in The Crippled Tree. Subtitled, China: Biography, History, Autobiography, it is also Belgium, Eurasia, King Leopold's Congo adventurers in Kansu, growing up in Brussels, Szechwan and Peking, and two enraged strangers caught in East-West love and nonmeeting of minds, all enlivened by sketches of China's ordeal of emergence in the modern world, starting as far back as the opium wars of the 1840s.

The recipe sounds impossible, but an artist is at work. The result is clear, witty, fascinating and informative literature of some world importance. When the volume ends (1928), we are left eagerly waiting to learn more about an attractive-repulsive little girl, then aged 11, named Rosalie—as Han Suyin was known during her Catholic childhood in China.

Seeing Rosalie as an incident, an "effect" of history, Han Suyin searched for her discrete causes—parents, grandparents, great-grandparents, and societies that gave them their certainties and delusions, their capacities for love and misunderstanding. Obsessed by the same curiosity that made her a successful medical doctor, the author tirelessly pried testimony from all accessible witnesses clinging to the limbs of her intertwined family trees.

Her "history," to be sure, will not satisfy historiographers hot for absolute truth. History as she pursues it often is what Chinese around her believed to be true; much of it will enrage or astonish some Western readers. But much can be learned by reflecting on it. What Han Suyin's father's generation of Chinese believed to be history turned out to have as much to do with the making of new history as what Americans believed, and that may continue so in the future.

What we are given then is China and Eurasia to Han Suyin, the inside of it as seen by an exceptionally astute child and adult, and an explanation of herself and to herself, and of and to her disparate worlds. Her father and mother seen as principal characters—to each witness a different image—do finally emerge as distinct, if bewildered, more victims than victimizers, lost and lonely, contradictory, well intentioned, fully believable human beings. Rarely has a book so frankly told the pitiless truth about old China and its family life, and never has the same book with equal impartiality depicted its counterparts in European society as seen through Eurasian eyes.

Much has been written by theorists about the blending of Eastern and Western cultures. Here is a book about those who tried it by love, and failed. Or did they? If the end justifies the means, the many-splendored (if somewhat splintered) Han Suyin seems to prove the contrary.

On The Roof of the World

THE TIMELY RAIN: Travels in New Tibet. By Stuart and Roma Gelder. Foreword by Edgar Snow. Monthly Review Press. 248 pp. $8.95.

MARILYN YOUNG

Mrs Young is a student of American-Far Eastern relations.

A good deal of the excitement of the Gelders' book is, despite the subtitle, not with new but with old Tibet. As the first Western journalists to visit Tibet since the Communist take-over, the Gelders may be forgiven if the physical wonders and baroque theology of the country intrigue them as much as the hard facts of land reform, local government, taxation and agriculture. The authors inquire into these subjects, to be sure, but their account is anecdotal and distressingly vague. Their information rests, apparently, not on government reports or statistics but on a series of interviews with relevant people. These are consistently interesting but only partially informative. It would have been helpful had the Gelders managed to combine personal accounts with other sources, as Edgar Snow did so successfully in The Other Side of the River. As a full and complete account of the new Tibet, then, the Gelders' book is bound to disappoint.

As a travel book, which in fairness is all it claims to be, The Timely Rain is fascinating. Indeed it is doubtful if any book about Tibet could be otherwise. Very few Westerners have ever traveled in Tibet; even fewer have successfully reached its spiritual and political capital, Lhasa. The effect of the country on its visitors is apparent in the subtitle of a 1923 British book on the rivers of Tibet. Starting off tamely enough, The Mystery Rivers of Tibet, the author cannot restrain himself from adding: A description of the little-known land where Asia's mightiest rivers gallop in harness through the narrow gateway of Tibet, its People, Fauna and Flora. Only the remoter parts of Africa seem to exercise the same power on the imagination. On the "roof of the world," the confusion and exaltation engendered by lack of oxygen and overwhelming natural beauty are further enhanced by the intricate, all-consuming ritual of Tibetan Buddhism.

Until 1959, one out of every four Tibetan males were monks; 700,000 of the 1.25 million people living in Tibet proper were serfs; an aristocracy of 200 families shared power with the clergy and a "middle class" of perhaps 10,000 merchants; shopkeepers and artisans made up the rest of the population. Few countries anywhere in the world exhibited such extremes of wealth and poverty. Yet the dignity of the people, the resignation with which they bore their fate (buoyed by the belief that their next reincarnation might be a much richer one), the splendid opulence of the nobility, combined to rob most visitors of whatever sense of social justice they may have had. Tibet was usually described as a country of surpassing happiness where, as in the fine days of medieval Europe, each man knew his place and gladly occupied it.

The Gelders are, on the whole, entirely free of this attitude. Yet they too were sometimes seized by the beauties of Tibet as it was and, knowing that it will change, however slowly, out of recognition, they were able to empathize with earlier visitors. One excellent quotation from an English journalist who accompanied the Younghusband expedition of 1904, perfectly captures the ambivalent reactions of most Westerners:

> Lamaism may be an engine of oppression, but its victims do not protest; and there before one's eyes . . . is Lhasa. It may be a barrier to all human improvement; it may be a living type of all that we in the west have fought against and at last overcome . . . but under the fierce sun . . . and the white gauze of the almost unclouded sky of Lhasa, it was not easy to find fault with the creed, however narrow and merciless, which built the Potala palace. . . . To Lamaism alone we owe it that when at last the sight of the farthest goal of all travel burst upon our eyes, it was worthy, fully worthy, of all the rumour and glamour and romance with which in the imaginings of man it has been invested for so many years.

Reading a travel book is very nearly like traveling with the person who wrote it—of all relationships surely the most difficult. Generally the Gelders make excellent companions. Although they cannot boast the hardships which earlier travelers endured, their terrifying flight through the narrow passes from Sining to Lhasa assures one that Tibet is only slightly easier to reach than it ever was. There is also a new highway stretching from Chengtu in China to Lhasa. If, in China proper, the Communists have tremendously increased the volume of motorized transport, in Tibet their advance has been more modest. Until 1951, according to the Gelders, the only wheeled vehicles in all of Tibet were the rusting heaps of two cars owned by the 13th Dalai Lama. Now there are a variety of carts and roads on which to use them. The Gelders make no secret of the poverty, squalor, poor housing and low standard of living they found in Tibet.

The Gelders (who were not guests of the government during their trip) were able to interview anyone they pleased. One of their most fruitful talks was with the former mayor of Lhasa, now an official in the local government. This frankly critical man (who, depressingly, tried to mute his criticism in later meetings with the Gelders) noted that the Chinese had erred in not restraining overenthusiastic Tibetan cadres who, contrary to stated Chinese policy, were overtly hostile to religion and gave the impression that "when reforms were introduced, religion would be suppressed." The Chinese, too, had taken too many political prisoners after the rebellion and their policy of making the able-bodied monks work for their own sustenance was offensive to many Buddhists. The official's account of the 1959 rebellion, of the moderation generally shown by the Chinese, and of the necessity of the reforms they had introduced, supports the conclusions the Gelders had reached from their own observation and other interviews.

Using the 14th Dalai Lama's autobiography as a model of the accepted, if distorted, version of Chinese behavior in Tibet, the Gelders are at pains to demonstrate that:

(1) The Chinese did not suppress religion prior to 1959, nor do they do so now. The number of monks in the monasteries is radically lower than previously, but this is due to a variety of factors, including the practical decision on the part of some that the clergy was no longer an upwardly mobile profession. Religious ceremonies are permitted; the traditional art of butter sculpture is allowed (the Gelders saw and photographed one screen 6′x11′ which took one and a half tons of butter to construct), although the people are no longer subject to religious taxes but give as much or as little as they wish. Able-bodied monks must farm their own land, but the elderly receive a government pension. The practice of entering a young child into a monastery is allowed, though the boy may choose to leave when he is 18.

(2) The Chinese liberated the serfs and distributed the land only in 1959, after it was abundantly clear that the ruling elite would make no move on its own to reform the social system, or cooperate with Chinese reforms, however gradual.

(3) The Chinese claims to suzerainty over Tibet are well established historically, and the invasion of 1951 was no more than any strong Chinese government would have done. Indeed, the Communists kept the fighting to a minimum and, in stark contrast to the behavior of Chinese troops in 1910, neither occupied Lhasa (which was open to them) nor mistreated the populace.

(4) Working with limited resources and with an exquisite regard for the customs of the country, the Chinese have somewhat improved the standard of living for most of the people. Nobles who did not participate in the rebellion have

"GREAT SOCIETY" OR NATION IN CRISIS:

What Are You to Believe?

IS AMERICA'S STAR RISING toward a great new Utopia, or sinking into a morass of overpopulation, poverty, and crime? Are we making enormous strides toward a golden era of peace and prosperity, or rapidly digging our own collective grave?

Read the papers and books, listen to the reporters and commentators, participate in informal discussions—on a given day you can hear "the truth" that proves either end of the scale, as well as any interim degree. And every answer comes fully equipped with its own set of statistics!

Well . . . what can you believe? Are two-fifths of our citizens sadly impoverished, or do nine-tenths of us live in homes with modern plumbing, television sets, and other modern conveniences?

There is only one way to see the true picture, and that is to be sure that you're seeing the whole picture. You can believe the facts . . . but you can't be certain of their significance unless you've got access to all of the facts. And all of the facts about American society, past and present, are contained in a new Library that has been compiled by Fairfield Publishers for this special mail-order offer—the Library of American Data, three interrelated volumes of vital information, including the immensely readable and controversial best-seller, This U.S.A.

TRUTH—FROM PRIMARY SOURCES

Virtually every statistical fact relevant to American life is part of the Library of American Data. In fact, a major portion of this unprecedented collection actually consists of U. S. Government data gathered specifically by the Bureau of the Census for its own publications.

But even the millions of facts gathered and recorded by our government in the past 175 years cannot provide the whole story of America's historic evolution—and so, supplementary data have been collected from more than two hundred additional private sources, then organized and edited by the Census Bureau.

